Representative Belmont, of New York, has introduced a resolution directing the Committee on Ways and Means "forthwith to report to the House whether or not any class or classes of industry in the United States, infant or aged, and, if so, what class or classes, require aid or support from the federal government, either in the form of customs duty levied on imported articles or in any other form of bounty, subsidy, charity or donation; also, to report what class or classes of industry, if any, do not now require such aid and support."

The Pension bill was passed by the House on Seventh-day, it appropriates for army pensions $85,000,000; navy pensions, $1,000,000; fees and expenses of examining surgeons, $275,000; pay of agents, $290,000; contingent expenses, $10,000. The Fortification bill, also passed by the House, makes an appropriation of $325,000.

The Treasury Department was on the 10th instant, furnished with an official copy of the opinion of the Attorney General to the effect that Chinese can pass through the United States. The Department will, in a short time, promulgate regulations in accordance with this opinion.

The Secretary of the Treasury has authorized the coinage of a 5-cent nickel piece of a new design, which is considered as being more in accordance with the law as regards weight and inscriptions than the present 5-cent nickel piece. The new coin is a little heavier than the present one and a little larger and thinner. On its face is a head of "Liberty," surrounded by thirteen stars; on the reverse a wreath surrounding a Roman numeral representing the denomination of the coin.

The total exports of petroleum and petroleum products from the United States during the eleven months which ended on 11th mo. 30th last were $41,670,160, against $44,415,673 during the corresponding period of the preceding year.

The Newhall House, a six-story hotel, at the corner of Michigan street and Broadway, in Milwaukee, was destroyed by fire on the morning of the 10th: eighty-one persons perished in the flames or were killed by jumping from the windows, and about thirty others were injured, of whom several may not recover. The hotel was built in 1857. On the ground floor were the Manufacturers' Bank and a number of stores and offices, and the loss on property will reach several hundred thousand dollars.

The latest reports of the recent blizzard in Dakota, Minnesota, Northern Wisconsin and Iowa, say that a number of people have been frozen to death and lost in the snow, and that railroad travel is much impeded.

A syndicate of Chicago capitalists propose to lease a track of land thirty miles square in the Indian Territory for grazing purposes at a rental of $50,000 a year. The Indians are said to be ready to make the bargain, and an effort is being made to obtain the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

A Pittsburg pawnbroker has observed that 99 per cent. of the money he lends is spent on intoxicating drink.

The small-pox is reported to be so prevalent in Shiloh, Kentucky, that all business is suspended there, and many of the inhabitants have left. Several physicians have died of the disease, which is malignant in type. A member of the Washington Board of Health, sent to Baltimore on Fourth-day to investigate the small-pox in the latter city, reports that nearly 3000 cases of the disease exist there, only 200 of which were reported by the Baltimore health authorities.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 390, which was 19 less than the previous week, and the same number as in the corresponding week of last year. The number of males was 192, of females 198: 42 died of consumption; 42 of inflammation of the lungs; 22 of diphtheria; 18 of old age; 15 of bronchitis; 15 of typhoid fever, and 10 of small-pox.

Cotton continues dull, but prices were unchanged. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 10¾ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ a 7½ cts. for export, and 8½ a 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is firm, but the extreme views of holders resist business. Sales of 2700 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5 a $5.75; Pennsylvania family at $4.75; western do. at $5 a $5.50, and patents at $6 a $7.25. Rye flour is dull at $3.75 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is quiet but firmer; sales of 5100 bushels red in ear lots at $1.01 a $1.12, as to quality and location. Rye is nominal at 58 cts. for No. 2 Pennsylvania. Corn is in fair request and firm, with sales of 7000 bushels in lots to the local trade at 58 a 65 cts., as to quality and location. Oats are dull and weak; sales of 8500 bushels in ear lots at 44 a 49½ cts.

Beef cattle were in fair demand and prices were a fraction higher: 3000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5 a 7 cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were in demand and prices were a fraction higher: 9000 head arrived and sold at 4½ a 6½ cts., and lambs at 6 a 7½ cts. per pound, as to condition.

Hogs were in demand and prices were firm: 6300 head sold at the different yards at 8 a 9½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—The steamer Victoria, of the Warren line, which arrived at Liverpool on the 11th, landed 1580 sheep and 378 oxen. This is the sixth trip she has made with the new system of ventilation by extra funnels and air shafts in the funnel casing. During this time she has brought over a total of 7846 sheep and 3211 head of cattle, and has lost only nine cattle on the passage.

A great number of arrests were made in Dublin on the 12th and 13th of this month, under the Crimes act. A number of them had arms in their possession, and are charged with conspiracy to murder. The arrests were effected in various parts of the city. The prisoners are principally of the artisan class.

A British note in regard to Egypt proposes that, in order to avoid any abuse of the freedom of the Suez Canal, it shall be enacted that in time of war a limitation shall be placed on the time during which the vessels of a belligerent power are permitted to remain in the canal, and that no troops or munitions of war shall be disembarked, and no hostilities shall be permitted in the canal or its approaches, or anywhere in the territorial waters of Egypt even in the event of Turkey being one of the belligerents. The recurrence of an emergency resembling the late rebellion is provided for by a clause excepting measures for the defence of Egypt from the above restrictions. Every power shall be bound to bear the cost of the immediate repair of any damage its vessels may cause in the canal. Egypt shall take all measures in her power to enforce the conditions imposed upon ships of belligerent Powers using the canal. No fortifications are to be erected on the canal or in its vicinity. Nothing in the agreement shall be construed as curtailing the territorial rights of Egypt further than is expressly stipulated.

Among other subjects, the note declares the question of the suppression of slavery and the slave trade to be one which the British Government has much at heart, and that it will miss no opportunity of advising the Khedive to take steps calculated to attain the end in view.

Vienna, 1st mo. 10th.—The town of Raab, Hungary, and the adjacent villages have been only saved from inundation thus far by the frost. When the thaw began the water suddenly rose all over the district. At 3 o'clock yesterday morning the inhabitants were aroused by alarm bells and began a rapid flight. Large numbers of fugitives crowded into a solidly built theatre which stands on an island in the midst of the Park; but here a new panic arose, the water gradually rising as far as the first gallery. Meanwhile, around Raab, the dykes breaking, at length admitted the deluge which soon reached the inner town, containing 6000 fugitives, as well as the ordinary inhabitants. A considerable number of lives were lost, but fortunately the flood did not reach some of the higher parts of the town, and ceased to rise at noon.

Later.—The inhabitants of Raab have abandoned the town. The floods rose so rapidly that many persons, in trying to escape, fell through the ice and were drowned. An epidemic is imminent, owing to the over-crowding of dwellings and privation.

Pesth, 1st mo. 15th.—The Danube has subsided everywhere above Mahass, on the west arm of that river, but the fugitives cannot return to their homes as their houses are destroyed or filled with ice. Throughout the flooded districts of Hungary there will certainly be a famine unless assistance is prompt. The extent of the flooded country in the Middle Rhine district exclusive of the tributaries of that river, is computed nearly half as large again as the Lake Constance. King of Bavaria has given a second 10,000 marks for the relief of his distressed subjects.

A Berlin despatch to the London Times says Emperor William, at his own instance, has increased the contribution from the Imperial fund toward relief of distress by the floods from 500,000 to 600,000 marks. The Emperor said, in making the increase, that it was intolerable to him to think of the hungry shivering from cold and hunger while he was sitting in a warm room.

The Daily News' Berlin despatch says it is estimated that the losses by the floods will reach 80,000,000 marks.

Persons frozen to death are found in the streets of Moscow daily. There have been four deaths from cold at Kharkoff. It is stated that the Czar has issued a decree dissolving all the secret societies in Russia.

On the 13th inst. during the performance at a theatre in Berditseff, in Russian Poland, a fire broke out in the building, and before the spectators could escape the whole structure was ablaze. The fire broke out toward the end of the performance, and was caused by the careless handling of fireworks on the stage. The curtain became ignited, and the flames quickly spread through the walls and roof. The audience, numbering eight hundred persons, rushed to the front door, but it opened inward, and as the crowd pressed forward it was rendered useless. A rush was then made to the two doors, both of which were nailed up, thus compelling the people to take to the windows, from which they sprang into the street with their clothes a sheet of fire. The fire brigade arrived within half an hour, but it was impossible to extinguish the flames, as the water tanks were frozen. The fire lasted two hours. A despatch from Vienna says the ice broke while the fire brigade were crossing the river to Berditseff, thus preventing them from reaching the fire more promptly. It is estimated that 90 men, 120 women and 60 children perished in the flames.

During the twelve months which ended on 9th mo. 31st, 1882, there arrived in Canada 175,418 persons, of whom 76,728 went to the United States.

DIED, at her residence in West Philadelphia, on 25th of 12th month, 1882, DEBORAH C., wife of J. R. Howell, in the 46th year of her age, a member of West Chester Particular and Birmin Monthly Meeting of Friends, Pennsylvania. Her illness, though short, was attended with evidences that the work of preparation had been going on. Her expectations on behalf of her family were fervent, and resting implicit faith in her adorable Redeemer. Her relatives consolingly believe that, through unmerited mercy, she has been received into that glorious domain where the weary are forever at rest.

Pennsylvania History.

the Projected Palatinate of Sir E. Plowden.

Within the last decade the attention of all gentlemen of antiquarian taste has been led to the investigation of undetermined questions relating to the early history of New England. It would seem a reasonable assumption that history can be rightly written from a contemporary stand-point only, but it is evident that it requires that a century or two should pass before we can really reach the truth of events. Records then become the available data, confirmed by letters or incidental notices found in the journals of contemporaries, that long after their death may come to light through the press. This source has the invaluable merit of freedom from the bias of passion and interest, and must be received as the final verdict.

The early history of Pennsylvania has been the subject of controversy, and the course of William Penn has been the theme of detractors and admirers. That those who were influenced by religion, and whose sympathies were alien to the pure principles that shone in the mind of Penn, should endeavor to detract from their exalted character, is not surprising, but that any should question his integrity and his self-sacrificing spirit can be explained by supposing that his detractors were the motives of the founder by those who would have actuated themselves in similar circumstances.

Our generations passed away, and a century and a third after his death, his correspondence with James Logan, his business letters, revealed his unshaken probity and firm adherence to the principles of Truth, and to convictions he had long entertained respecting the rights of the people. Amid station and wrongs and spoiling, he held aloft a lofty and philanthropic spirit, and though sorely tried, "he kept his constancy to the end." This correspondence, many will remember, was published in "The Friend," under the able editorial care of the late accomplished Alfred Cope, and constituted the most valuable contribution that had been made to Pennsylvania history during the present century.* This was the opinion expressed to the writer by the late Job R. Tyson, who had, by close study of early Pennsylvania history, made himself a thoroughly competent critic of contributions to her annals. The numerous papers on early Pennsylvania history by this accomplished scholar, some of which were published in "The Friend," evidence his deep interest in the subject. These are doubtless the result of studies preparatory to a History of the State, which death, that spoiler of many a fair scheme, prevented him from completing. His proclivity towards historical studies, his elegant and ready pen, and above all his genuine sympathy with the Christian principles of the founder, and warm admiration of his character as a man, a philanthropist and a statesman, would have rendered him a chosen instrument as a writer of a history worthy of the wonderful origin and remarkable annals of the first Christian Commonwealth. His "Examination of the various charges brought by historians against William Penn, both as a man and as a political governor," may be read in "Memoirs of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania," vol. II. part II., p. 127. In a tract entitled, "Bi-Centennial Reading," by Frederick D. Stone, Librarian of the Historical Society, and appended to the Bulletin of the Library Company of Philadelphia, for July, 1882, may be found an outline notice of the abounding material that must engage the attention of the earnest student of Pennsylvania history.

The marked proclivity towards historical studies evinced by our late friend Alfred Cope; his wide and varied culture and intimate acquaintance with our colonial times, and their civil and religious troubles; as well as his familiarity with the sound Christian views of Friends, rendered his often humorous and always facile pen, the fittest instrument for exposing the errors, misconceptions and abounding perversions of the author of "Grahame's Colonial History."

Friends in their course in Pennsylvania and elsewhere, it would seem, have ever been a favorite theme on which to exhibit the malevolence or envy of the Scotch Presbyterian writers, since the day when George Fox visited Scotland and proclaimed the Scripture doctrine of the universality of Divine grace, and against which the priests drew up a series of curses to be read in their "steeple houses," to which curses the people were all required to say, amen.

In the criticisms upon "Grahame," Cotton Mather, the representative of Puritan theology, comes in for his just share of chastisement, and who more than Cotton, deserves to be gibbeted to lasting infamy—the author of the following letter which bears internal evidence of authenticity, and which so happily portrays the spirit of the man and his fellows, that its construction could scarcely be improved. The "Reverend" Cotton, is herein presented by himself as willing to become particeps criminis with those who would have been pirates and slave-traders. Alas! for the darkness of those days and their "Christian theology!"

The letter is said to have been discovered among some old papers in the Massachusetts Historical Society, and bears date "September ye 15, 1682," and is addressed to "Ye aged and beloved John Higginson."

"There is now at sea a shippe (for our friend Elias Holderoft, of London, did advise me by the last packet that it would sail some time in August) called ye Welcome, R. Green was Master, which has aboard a hundred or more of ye heretics and malignants called Quakers, with W. Penn, who is ye scamp at ye head of them. Ye General Court has accordingly given secret order to master Malachi Huxlett of ye brig Porpoise, to waylaye ye said Welcome as near ye coast of Codd as may be, and make captive of ye said Penn and his ungodlie crew, so that ye Lord may be glorified and not mocked on the soil of this new country with ye heathen worshipp of these people. Much spoil can be made by selling ye whole lot to Barbadoes, where slaves fetch good prices in rumme and sugar; and we shall not only do ye Lord great service by punishing ye wicked, but shall make gayne for his ministers and people.

"Yours in ye bowels of Christ,

"COTTON MATHER."*

That the spirit of this letter ruled among the authorities in Boston is confirmed by Abel Cushing in his "Historical Letters," where he says: "Under this adjudication [that of the court] one of the treasurers actually sought to send [Lawrence] Southie's children to a slave market at Barbadoes. But to the lasting honor of the profession, no ship-master could be found to take them; and one especially affirmed that should he be tempted to engage in so foul a business, he would never trust himself at sea again in the best ship that ever swam, and he bade the wicked treasurer go home and repent."

These valuable criticisms and exposures of the false presentation of the course of Friends in Pennsylvania and New England, may be read in volumes XIX. and XX. of "The Friend," Philadelphia, 1845-6 and 1846-7. That they have not been republished in book form, and thus rendered accessible to the general reader we much regret. Their republication would even now be timely.

A vast addition has lately been made to the mass of inedited matter from which the history of Penn's "Holy Experiment" must be drawn, or which shall corroborate that already written. This has been scoured and

[* If this letter is not the production of C. Mather, it must have been written by one who understood the spirit of the times. As to its authenticity, I am unable to determine, having met with nothing that would conclusively decide the question.—ED.]

deposited in the fireproof room of the Pennsylvania Historical Society, and awaits the advent of him who shall come fitted by nature, by the study of social science, by rhetorical culture and by sympathy with the lofty aims of the Founder to give to the waiting world a history which shall stand out in high relief as a model both for excellence of style and the unsurpassed worth of its subject.*

Gleanings from Quaker Annals.

The following account of a trial of George Fox, at the Lancaster assizes, has been preserved. It affords a sketch of the period, a curious specimen of the calm, and somewhat amusing inflexibility, with which the poor oppressed Friends in their turn perplexed and troubled their persecutors. The judge and jury might well be confused and vexed at such exposures in technicalities of law as can scarcely be surpassed.

When two days or thereabouts, had been fruitlessly occupied in tendering him the oath of allegiance, I was called again to hear the sentence. Whereupon, the judge asked me

* This large addition to the resources of our historian were obtained through the liberality of the late Alfred Cope, John Jordan, Jr., and other members of the Historical Society, who purchased the papers and pamphlets relating to our history, which were offered for sale by book collectors who had accidentally been apprized of their value, and had rescued them from the devouring maw of the paper-mill, whither they had already been consigned. This collection relates chiefly to Pennsylvania history after the death of Penn, and has already proved itself of special value by throwing light upon many hitherto obscure points. Though mostly arranged and classified, it has not been catalogued or indexed, and may fill about one hundred folio volumes.

It has since been supplemented by the acquisition of MSS. obtained from the heirs of Edmund Physic, who, for nearly half a century, was in the Proprietary service, and by a volume of Penn papers, the gift of Saunders Coats. The Historical Society of no other State in the Union possesses so rich a collection of original MSS. illustrating its early annals.

The writer, in common with others interested in the labor of collecting old documents, and rescuing them from the destroying tooth of time, regrets that more generous contributions are not made by our wealthy and liberal-minded citizens to the fund for copying, arranging and binding those invaluable records, historical and genealogical. Already a good work has begun in the alphabetical transfer of the records of marriages, births and deaths of the Society of Friends in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. Much of this has been a labor of love; and the genealogical history of many descendants of the first settlers has been thus satisfactorily reached, and a vast amount of painstaking and expensive research has been spared the enthusiastic delver into the mysteries of his family line. Large sums have also been expended on this work, and much remains to be done, and the cause lingers for want of means, to prosecute the worthy object to its completion.

The Society of Friends in England, in order that its original records of marriages, births and deaths might be accepted in British Courts as authorities equal to the parish records of "the Church," prepared an alphabetical registration of their immense mass of records of this class, amounting it is said to several tons. Their transcript employed a large force of clerks upwards of eighteen months, and many thousand pounds sterling were expended thereon. The whole is classified under the heads of the respective Quarterly Meetings, and as they stand upon the shelves of the Office of Friends in London, present a long array of quarto and folio volumes of the size of the large ledger of a merchant, securely bound in Russia, and are open freely to the inspection of members and zealous seekers for genealogical information.

The writer passed a week in the office, and can testify to the wonderful fineness of this unrivalled collection of material for the family history of many members of our Society, and for identifying their place of residence what I had to say, why he should not pass sentence upon me.

I told him I was no lawyer, but I had much to say, if he would but have patience to hear. At that he laughed, and others laughed also, and said, Come, what have you to say? he can say nothing.

Yes, said I; I have much to say; have but patience to hear me.

I asked him whether the oath was to be tendered to the king's subjects, or to the subjects of foreign princes?

He said, to the subjects of this realm.

Then, said I, look into the indictment; ye may see that you have left out the word subject, so, not having named me in the indictment as a subject, ye cannot premmure me for not taking an oath.

The error being discovered, was confessed as such by the judge.

But I told him I had something else, to stop his judgment; and desired him to look what day the indictment said the oath was tendered to me at the sessions.

They looked, and said it was the eleventh day of January.

What day of the week was the sessions held on? said I.

On a Tuesday, said they.

Then, said I, look at your almanacs and see whether there was any sessions held at Lancaster on the eleventh day of January, so called.

So they looked and found that the eleventh day was the day called Monday; and that the sessions was on the day called Tuesday; which was the twelfth day of that month.

Look now, said I, ye have indicted me for refusing the oath in the quarter sessions held at Lancaster, on the eleventh day of January last, and the justices have sworn that they tendered me the oath in open sessions here that day, and the jury, upon their oaths, have found me guilty thereupon; and yet see, there was no session held at Lancaster that day.

A great ferment among the justices, succeeded this stroke; some of them stamping on the ground, and declaring that the mistake must have been made on purpose.

But this is not all; I have more yet to offer, why sentence should not be given against me.

I then asked, in what year of the king was the last assize here holden, which was in the month called March last?

In the sixteenth year of the king; said the judge.

But, the indictment says, it was in the fifteenth year.*

This error was also discovered, and compelled to be acknowledged.

Then they were all in a fret again, and could not tell what to say; for the judge had sworn the officers of the court, that the oath was tendered me at the assize mentioned in the indictment.

I told the judge, I had yet more to offer, to stop the sentence; and I asked, whether all the oath ought to be put in the indictment, or no.

Yes, said he, it ought to be all put in.

Then, said I, compare the indictment with the oath, and thou mayest see these words, viz., [or by any authority derived or pretended to be derived, from him or his see,] left out of the indictment, which is a principal part of an oath. And in another place, the words heirs and successors, are left out.

The judge acknowledged these, also, to be great errors.

But, said I, I have something further to allege.

Nay, said the judge, I have enough; ye need say no more.

If, said I, thou hast enough, I desire nothing but law and justice at thy hands; for I do not look for mercy.

You must have justice, said he, and ye shall have law.

Then I asked, am I at liberty, and free from all that ever hath been done against me in this matter?

Yes, said he, you are free from all that has been done against you. But then, he continued, starting up in a rage, I can put thee on oath to any man here, and I will tender it to you again.

I told him, he had examples enough yesterday, of swearing and false swearing, both to the justices and the jury.

Give him the book, said the judge; and give him the book! re-echoed the sheriffs and the justices.

If it be a Bible, said I, give it me.

Yes, yes, said the judge, give it him.

The oath was then read.

When it was read, the judge asked, whether I would take the oath or no?

Then said I, ye have given me a book to kiss and to swear on; and this book which ye have given me to kiss, says 'Kiss the Son' and the Son says in this book, 'Swear not at all;' and so says also the apostle James, say as the book says, and yet ye imprison me! How chance ye do not imprison the book for saying so? How comes it that the book is at liberty amongst you, which bids me not to swear, and yet ye imprison me for doing as the book bids me?

Nay, said the judge, but we will imprison George Fox; a promise which he failed to perform.

G. F. lay in prison all that long cold winter till the next assize; in which time, says he, "I was so starved, with cold and rain, that my body was greatly swelled, and my limbs much benumbed. But the Lord's power adds, was over all."

My Escape from Two Massacres.

As Illustrating God's Cure of his People. By Elias Barakat, late of Syria and Egypt.

I was born in Damascus, Syria; our house was near the street called Straight, and near also to the wall from which the disciples cast down Paul in a basket. My parents belonged to the Greek Orthodox Church, but when Dr. Lansing came to Damascus, my parents were led to a clearer view of Christian truth. The two missionaries opened a girls' school, and I, then but five years old, was sent to that school with my two sisters.

When I had learned to read short words easily, my father used to assemble the whole family, in the evening, to listen to my reading of the Bible. I generally read two or three chapters, and my father and my uncle explained the passage read, to the rest of the family.

When Dr. Lansing returned to America was sent to a Roman Catholic school; here I did not learn much, as both the priests and the children indulged in petty persecutions, because they knew that I was a Protestant. When Dr. Lansing came back ria, however, the girls' school was again opened, and with it a boys' school and a Bible school. I and my younger brother continued to attend the boys' school until [6th month] 1860, when the massacre of Christians in Damascus took place. Similar massacres of Christians by the Mohammedans took place that year in most of the towns of Syria, the port towns excepted, for there the Mohammedans were overawed by the foreign warships.

On the day of the massacre my brother and I went to school as usual. During the day we heard the sound of firing on the streets, but did not suspect what was the matter. I went up to the roof of the house to look out, and the first thing I saw was a burning house. When I came down, neither teachers nor scholars were to be seen; and, taking my mother, I rushed out into the street. When we got out, we found that one of the streets through which we must pass was in flames; and we started to go back to the school, but we were met by a Mohammedan, who offered to take us to his house and save us from being killed. Just then two armed men met us, and one drew his sword to kill me; but the Mohammedan who had taken us under his protection, said, "Take care, these are my children." That Mohammedan was a good man; for others used to kill the elder children, and to take as their own the little ones; but this man, in the providence of God, kept us safe some other children until he could restore all to our people.

After the first outbreak, an order came from the governor of the city, that all the Christians who had escaped the massacre should be confined in the castle. My mother and sisters reached there in safety, but my father was killed, and one of my sisters would have shared the same fate, had not a merciful Mohammedan interposed, saying to her would-slayer, "Are you not content with killing my men, and burning and plundering the houses?"

When my mother and sisters reached the castle, they searched for us in vain among the thousands of people who had taken refuge there. At last they asked a baker, who was a friend of the man who had sheltered us, and said: "I know of two boys answering that description, who are hiding in a friend's house. I do not know their names." In the evening he called at the Mohammedan's house, and when he found out our names, he promised that we should be restored to our friends next day.

Next morning there was a knock at the door. We were almost afraid to open it, for several times Mohammedans had come in search of Christians,—for they knew how hearted the man was who had taken us. When the door was opened, however, it was our dear mother, with the baker; and they took us to our sisters. I cannot tell you what great was our joy.

Dr. Lansing had gone to Alexandria, Egypt, before the massacre; and when he heard of what had happened, sent for us. Before we went to Alexandria, however, my mother died of grief at the murder of my father, and my youngest sister soon followed her. The government was compelled by the Christian powers to restore to the Christians what they had lost. We received a little money, which was put into the hands of the missionaries in Alexandria; and this was used in educating us in the school there, and afterwards in the Protestant Syrian College of Beirut.

After I left Beirut College, I was for fourteen years engaged in Alexandria, Cairo, and Asyoot, in teaching, and in the translation of religious tracts. Passing over three years, I come to my wonderful escape from the late massacre in Alexandria.

In [the Fifth month] of this year, my wife and I returned to Alexandria, from Asyoot, to spend the summer vacation with our friends there. During the first ten days of our stay, we heard bad news about a religious war, and of the occasional killing of Christians.

On [First-day, Sixth month 11th,] I was in school with my sister, her husband and children, and my brother; but my wife was at home sick. When the service was over, we started to return home, but were met at the door by a Christian who told us that the Mohammedans were slaying the Christians in the principal streets, and he directed us to narrow and crooked streets by which he thought we might safely reach home.

Fortunately we did not meet, on our way home, any armed Mohammedans. Two young men, indeed, with poles in their hands, encountered us; but as the three men of our party wore tarbooshes or Turkish caps, they did not recognize us as Christians. My sister, however, wore a Frank [European] bonnet, and one of the young men lifted up his pole to kill her, seeing by her bonnet that she was a Christian. Her husband thereupon called out, "Take care! This one belongs to me," and the young man desisted, thinking that he was a Mohammedan and she his servant. So we got safely home.

As soon as we entered the house, we locked every door, and barricaded them with the heaviest things we could find. We kept very still, speaking seldom, and then only in low voices, nor did we dare to look out of the windows. In the streets we could hear the Mohammedans crying, "This is our joyous day! Long live Arabi Pasha, and death to the Christians!" We heard some say, "There are Christians in these houses; let us go in and kill them." All the time we could do nothing but pray, for we expected death every minute.

Without, men and women were passing by, loaded with things which they had stolen from Christian stores. The most delicate Mohammedan ladies, whose faces were veiled when they went into the streets, could be seen on that day running about with uncovered faces, and carrying on their heads the goods of the Christians.

I need not tell how fifteen hundred men were slain that day, by the rabble, by the Bedawin, and by the police, who had received orders to shoot every man who wore a hat,—as by that sign they knew the Christians.

All the afternoon and all the night the street-cars were engaged in carrying the dead bodies and throwing them into the sea; and next day the police were employed in cleansing the street from the blood of the Christians, and gathering up the pieces of their bodies; for the cruel Mohammedans were not content with killing the Christians, but also mutilated the bodies.

For two days we were afraid to stir out of doors. On the third day bread was needed for the children; but we managed to get a little Mohammedan boy, a servant of a neighbor, to buy some bread for us.

On the fourth day the streets were safer. As soon as we could go out, we went directly to the steamship office, and asked when the first steamer left Egypt. An English steamer was to leave the next day. We did not wait for the morrow, however, but hastened on board. My wife covered her face like the Mohammedan women, and I walked at a distance behind her, and my sister and her husband did in like manner, and we all met on the seashore. We hired a little boat to take us on board; but when the boatman found out that we were Christians, he charged us three dollars instead of from twenty to thirty cents.

When we got on board we were glad, and very thankful to God for preserving our lives. We took a deck passage to Malta, for the boat was crowded with refugees. We suffered a little from the waves, which beat against us, and wet our clothes, but when we remembered Alexandria we were thankful.

When we reached Malta, we found it crowded with refugees. There was no hope of getting any employment by which to support ourselves; so we went to Marseilles, and, finding the same difficulty there, we set sail for America.—Selected.

Memoir of Anthony Purver.

Anthony Purver, late of Andover, was the son of a farmer at Up-Hurstborn, near Whitchurch (Hants), at which place he was born about 1702. He lost his father when very young; his uncle took care of him and brought him up. At ten years of age he was put to learn to read and write, and the first principles of arithmetic. He gave early proofs of an extraordinary genius, and was so much the admiration of his neighbors that they would frequently lay wagers on his great abilities.

About — years of age he was confined at home by illness for six weeks; during the intervals of his disorder he applied himself so assiduously to his studies, that he gained a competent knowledge of all the rules of arithmetic, &c. When he returned to school he explained to his master (who was ignorant of them) the doctrine of the square and cube roots. There is nothing more essential to a great genius than memory. The person before us was extraordinarily endued by nature in this particular; for about this era of his life he declared that he could get by heart 12 of the longest chapters in the Bible in 12 hours' time; and this he actually accomplished, to the astonishment of his friends.

After some time he was put apprentice to a shoe-maker, who also kept a small farm, so that, during the early part of his career, he was often put to watch the sheep, and for his amusement employed the leisure hours in reading indiscriminately any book which came in his way. But more particularly the Sacred Records drew his attention, and I have heard him say that he delighted in reading them; and though he gave preference to these writings, he also indulged his desire for knowledge by the perusal of books in the various branches of science and literature. Amongst others there fell into his hands a book written by Samuel Fisher (who had been a priest of Lidd, in Kent), entitled "Rusticus ad Academicos," in which several wrong translations in the Bible are pointed out. The perusal of this book put him on the study of the Hebrew language, which it will be seen he afterwards acquired.

But he did not remain long in this situation, not liking the employment: nor did it admit such a degree of application as was necessary to the prosecution of his further enquiries. At 20 he opened a day school at Up-Hurstborn. Being pretty well known in those parts, and always considered as a rare instance of self-acquired learning, he soon got many scholars. And having now commenced, he applied himself very closely to the languages and universal science. He soon became master of those books his obscure situation furnished him with. Afterwards becoming desirous of enlarging his knowledge, he left off school and came to London.

He published a book called "The Youth's Delight," printed for I. Wilcox, Little Britain, 1727. Here he was furnished with an opportunity to study the Hebrew: he acquired such knowledge in this ancient tongue as to read and write: sometimes he conversed with the Jews in their favorite dialect.

About the twenty-fourth year of his age he became acquainted with some persons called Quakers in London; and being a serious man, was convinced at a meeting held in their Meeting-house, "The Bull and Mouth," in Martins-le-Grand. He embraced their principles; and on that day month he was convinced appeared in a public testimony among them at their said Meeting-house.

In 1727 he returned to his native place, and opened a school a second time. Here he applied himself closely to the Hebrew, and began to translate the books of the Old Testament into English. He also studied physic and botany. He travelled into Essex, and through several counties into Bristol. On his journey at Coggeshall he wrote a copy of verses, and afterwards published them under the title of "Counsel to Friends' Children," and being at Hambrook, about four miles from Bristol, in the latter end of the year 1737, he lodged at the house of Josiah Butcher, a maltster, and concluded to reside there, instructing his son Samuel in the classics, and employing his (own) time in his studies, and translating some of the lesser prophets in the Old Testament, having done the Book of Esther and Solomon's Song before.

Here he became acquainted with Rachel Cotterell, a young woman of good ability and some property, who with her sister kept a boarding-school for girls at Frenchay, near Hambrook aforesaid. To whom he made his addresses, which were accepted, and they took each other in marriage in the Meeting-house of the people called Quakers at Frenchay, the 17th day of the month called August, 1738, and soon after opened a boarding-school at Frenchay.

"A particular friendship," says John Player, one of the pupils, "having been long cultivated between my father and mother and his now wife, I became a scholar at this school, and continued with him some time; and though he paid good attention to his scholars, yet he closely applied himself to his studies, being much employed during school hours in examining the present version and comparing it with the Hebrew text. He was indefatigable in his studies, being generally at his books by 4 o'clock in the morning and not leaving them till 8 in the evening, and often later."

While he lived at this place he obliged the world with a translation of the Book of Genesis.

After having lived here ten years he removed to a place called the Fish Ponds, one mile from his last habitation; at this place also he kept a school, and notwithstanding the cares of his establishment, and the labor of teaching a number of pupils, he still continued his application to his studies. The hours between his school were not spent idly; of those which other people appropriated to rest, the major part were by him devoted to study.

The issue of his marriage was a daughter named Hannah and a son named Anthony, who died in his infancy. But the daughter lived to be married to Isaac Bell of London, and had one child by him, who was named John Purver. Both father and son are living (1791). She died soon after. This son was taken by his grandfather and bred up and educated by him at Andover, in Hants, to which place Anthony Purver and wife removed from near Bristol in 1758.

Soon after his removal to this place he completed his grand work—a translation of all the books of the Old and New Testament from their original tongues; a performance never accomplished by any one man before. But before he translated these books, he took great pains in examining all the authors he could procure on this subject. In this he was considerably assisted by that great encourager of arts and sciences, Dr. Fothergill.

He has endeavored to restore the original reading, and has added to the work some curious and admirable chronological tables.

Dr. Fothergill approved the work so much that he decided on acquiring the copyright, which he afterwards printed at his own expense for public utility. He purchased the copyright for £1000 and 20 sets of the work in sheets, only Anthony Purver was to correct the press for this sum, which he did, the proof-sheets being sent to him at Andover, where he continued to reside until his death.

He died at Andover, in 7th mo. 1777, and was buried in Friends' burial-ground there. His widow survived him many years.

JACOB BELL,

Friends' Magazine, 1831.

From JOHN PLAYER.

It may here be mentioned that before he left the neighborhood of Bristol he had declined his school, and employed his time chiefly in his favorite work, and at times so closely pursued it that he disregarded the necessary care of his health. It was not infrequent for him, when he met with a subject which the translators found it difficult to reconcile with the context, and which seemed in the common translation contradictory, to retire alone into a room and there wait for Him who had the key of David to unlock the mystery, being fully convinced that the Sacred Records were a sealed book to all who did not experience a degree of that Spirit by which they were revealed and in which they were penned, to preside over the mind, in order to open the understanding to the true knowledge of them and the intent of the Divine will through them.

Being thus persuaded, he has, in some of these his retirements, so far disregarded all care for the body as to sit alone for two or three days and nights, waiting for the Divine opening of the mystery. Twice in particular, whilst he resided near Bristol, I remember his wife sending for my father to come to persuade him from so close attention, being apprehensive [that] it would impair his health or the faculties of his mind. But it was observed that after being thus sequestered he generally appeared more lively and conversible, though at best a bad orator, and slow.

From "THE YORKSHIREMAN," edited by Lu Howard. (Vol. iv. 1836.)

Two publications of great labor and expense known to have been begun and finished under Dr. Fothergill's patronage, the great "Botanical Dictionary" of Miller, and Purver's "Translation of the Bible." Of the latter, which was executed (solely at the doctor's expense) by a member of our Society in obscure life, it may be observed that it would have appeared to much greater advantage had the author been as well qualified to write English as he undoubtedly was to translate from the Scripture tongues.

Inelegant but faithful, and furnished with a great quantity of original notes and tabular elucidations, it has probably furnished unacknowledged help on many a difficult passage to more noted commentators.

From Wilson Armistead's "SELECT MISCELLANIES." (Vol. ii., page 272.)

Anthony Purver, who made a translation of the Bible, was by trade a shoemaker. He began to teach himself Greek and Hebrew with a book before him, and his work on this last in his lap.

Whilst drawing the thread through the leather was the opportunity he embraced lifting his eyes from his work to his book, at that portion of the time in which he was thus engaged in his humble vocation was the interval for meditating on what he had read.

Beside an innate and deep-rooted predilection for learning these languages, he possessed a strong memory and great perseverance, by which he was able to surmount those difficulties which would have confounded a common mind.

The present Bishop of Salisbury, (1852) one of the first Greek and Hebrew scholars of the day, has pronounced Purver's "Translation of the Bible" to be superior to all others for closeness to the original.

For "The Friend."

On Worldly Mindedness and Riches.

The Apostle John says—"Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." "For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever. My mind has been exercised for some time past on account of a worldly spirit prevailing too much amongst us. We profess to be "spiritually-minded people." I feel to query with us, have we not become too much worldly-minded people? striving to be rich and to make a show in the world? Let the true witness for God in our souls answer "Godliness with contentment is great gain. For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. And having food and raiment, let us be therewith content. But they that will be rich, many shall fall into temptation, and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the

of all evil; which while some coveted, they have erred from the faith, and need themselves through with many sorrows." "But thou, O man of God, (said the apostle Paul to Timothy,) flee these things; follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, patience, meekness." "Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life." Have the cares of this life, and the love of other things, choked the good seed in too many, so that but little "fruit is brought forth to perfection?" and our "brightness much eclipsed thereby?" Our forefathers in the truth were determined to sit loose to the world. William Lundson says, "Wherefore, our care was cast off this great load and burthen, viz: that and gainful ways of getting riches, and lessen our concerns therein, that we might be ready to answer Christ Jesus our Captain, who had called us to follow Him in a spiritual warfare, under the discipline of his daily cross and self-denial." "Then the things of this world were of small value with us, so that we might be near the Lord; for the Lord's truth balanced all the world, even the most precious part of it. Then great trading was then, and great concerns a great trouble; needless things, fine horses, rich furniture and gaudy apparel, were an eye-sore." "Our being singly to the Lord, and to the increasing of his light in our hearts, this gave us the sight of the glory of God, which so affected our minds that it stained the glory of all earthly things; and they bore no more with us, either in dwelling, eating, drinking, buying, selling, marrying, or giving in marriage. The Lord was the object of our love, and we were all humble and low before Him, self being of small repute." "That we might become the people that profess to be; then would we become as lights in the world, as a city set upon a hill, which cannot be hid." Then let us one and all be faithful unto Him who is calling to glory and to virtue;" and as we are faithful to Him and obedient unto all his commands, "we shall know an overcoming;" and they that overcome, shall be clothed in white robes; and Christ will not blot their names out of the book of life, but will confess them before his Father and before his angels.

Strange History of a Will.—One has heard pills written on bed-posts, concealed in hay- and flower-pots, and other possible and impossible places, but probably no will has passed through stranger vicissitudes than admitted to probate by Sir James Hannen. The testator was an engineer on board a channel steamer, and made his will, giving everything to his wife, and gave the will to her. Some time afterward they had a quarrel, during which she tore the will up, and threw the pieces into the fire. The husband picked the pieces, and put them into an envelope labeled "Poison," but said he would make a will. However, several years afterward, died of small-pox on his steamer, and on his clothes being searched before burning, the will, with the pieces of will inside it was found and given to his wife. This will, plucked from the burning has now been put together, and will be deposited at Somerset House—a lesson to all time to wives not to let their tempers too far if they do not also to lose their husband's property, or to sue it only by a lawsuit.—Pall Mall Gaz.

LINES TO A FRIEND UNDER AFFLICTION.

Christian traveller! faint and weary,
Onward tread and still be cheery,
Though the pathway may be dreary.
It will end in Heaven at last,
When the storms are overpast,
Though the sky is overcast,
If faith fail not.

Upward look, raise thine eyes
To the home beyond the skies,
Where everlasting glory lies.
A crown for thee is there uplaid,
A crown of life that ne'er will fade,
A crown that Christ himself has made,
For thee to wear.

What more would'st ask? To thee is given
A passport safe to enter Heaven,
When every earthly tie is riven.
"Thy life is granted for a prey,"—
"No mean spoil," didst thou not say,
While journeying on thy Zion-bound way,
Face thitherward?

Onward press through life's great din,
Conquer every secret sin,
Fight in faith and victory win.
When that victory be won,
Labor finished, work all done,
A glorious Light beyond the sun
Will shine on thee.

No one numbers there by days,
But a song of ceaseless praise,
Ransomed souls forever raise,
To the Lord of life and light,
Who guides us here by day and night,
And blesses those with endless Light,
Who will obedient be.

THE YEAR OF RELEASE.

BY MARIANNE FARNINGHAM.

When the bells rang their peal through the wintry air,
And startled the worshippers hushed as in prayer,
When the people turned gladly to friends who were near

And whispered: "God give you a happy new year,"
A fiat went forth from God's chamber of peace,
"To some there is dawning the year of release."

They know not the sign that was put on their brow—
These happy ones soon in his presence to bow;
When the late light came in and began a new day,
They saw not the messenger placed in the way;
They said: "Will the toil and the sorrow increase?"
Nor dreamed they had entered their year of release.

With courage they patiently turned to their task,
For strength, not deliverance, dared they to ask;
They sighed as they took up their burdens again
Of sorrow and weariness, sickness and pain,
Nor ventured to hope that their troubles would cease,
Nor joy become theirs in this year of release.

Oh, could they but know what the new year will bring;
What glad songs of freedom and hope they would sing!
How willingly suffer and toil for a while,
Thinking aye of their Lord and his welcoming smile;
And "the patience of hope" would grow strong and increase,
As they counted the days of their year of release.

For, ere it has passed, the King's face they shall see,
And ever from sorrow and sighing be free;
The things that perplex them shall all be made plain,
And the evil of sin never touch them again:
They will gain the bright country of pleasure and peace,
Thrice happy ones living their year of release.

Who are they, thus near to the end of their way,
With sad faces meeting that wonderful day?
We know not, they know not, the Master alone
Sees who shall have rest in the joy of his throne:
We may say while our spirits grow strong in his peace,
"It may be—it may be—my year of release."

Let us live with that hope in our hearts day by day,
We can bear that which passes so swiftly away;
There is work yet unfinished, tasks yet to fulfil,
And lessons to learn of our Father's good will.
Let us spend, as for Him, the time shortly to cease,
And God make us meet for our year of release.

Westtown Boarding School.

At a meeting of the committee held 4th mo. 9th, 1858, a communication was received from Jos. and Hannah Snowden, requesting to be released from the stations of Superintendent and Matron at the close of the next session. "The following named Friends are appointed to look out for suitable Friends to succeed them in that important department, viz: Nathan Sharpless, Thos. Evans, Henry Cope, Beulah H. Nicholson, Hannah Rhoads, Elizabeth Pierson," and others.

At a special meeting, 9th mo. 17th, 1858, Thomas Evans, on behalf of the above committee, reported "that they had received a communication from David and Rachel H. Roberts, (which was read) informing that they believed it would be right for them to offer themselves for those stations, and which they were united in laying before the committee. Upon consideration it was concluded to accept the offer of those Friends, and they were accordingly appointed to the respective stations. Thomas Evans, Nathan Sharpless, James Emlen, Beulah H. Nicholson and Sidney Coates, were appointed to inform David and Rachel H. Roberts of this conclusion, and introduce them into the school."

At this meeting an extract from the will of our late friend Jane Clark, was produced and read, as follows: "Item, I give and bequeath unto my executors, herein after named, and the survivors of them, &c., the sum of $1000, lawful money of the United States, in trust to pay over the same without any deduction, into the hands of the treasurer for the time being of the Institution established at Westtown, Chester Co., Pa., under the care and patronage of the Yearly Meeting of the religious Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, &c., for the school education and religious instruction of youth, &c., to be applied to the general use of that valuable Institution."

SAMUEL RANDOLPH,

On behalf of the Executors.

10th mo. 8th, 1858. In the will of our late friend Josiah Dawson, which since his decease has been duly proven, is contained the following bequest, viz: "I give and bequeath to my executors, and the survivor or survivors of them, four hundred (400) of my shares of the Mine Hill and Schuylkill Haven Railroad Company stock. In trust nevertheless to assign and transfer the same to such person or persons as the committee for the time being, having charge of Friends' Boarding School at Westtown by any minute of their proceedings, attested by the signature of their clerk, shall direct and appoint." This legacy, it was afterwards stated, was to be paid clear of deduction for collateral inheritance tax.

THOS. WILLIAMSON,

In behalf of Executors.

Thomas Evans and Jos. Snowden were appointed trustees to receive it.

Repairs and alterations being needed in the bath houses, cooking apparatus, and in the ventilation of the boys' chambers, Thomas Evans, Horatio C. Wood, Aaron Sharpless and Jos. Scattergood were appointed to have them attended to.

Information was received by the committee in 1859 of a legacy of $500 from Ann Mifflin, and in 1860 of $200 from Catharine W. Morris, deceased.

4th mo. 5th, 1861. "The committee to whom was referred the resignation of our friends David and Rachel H. Roberts, proposed Dubree and Jane Knight to succeed them as Superintendent and Matron of the Institution, which on consideration was agreed to, and they are accordingly appointed to the respective stations, and are expected to enter upon the duties thereof, when David and Rachel H. Roberts leave the school. Jas. Emlen, Beulah H. Nicholson and other Friends, were appointed to inform them of this conclusion; introduce them into the school, and render them such assistance in the performance of the important duties which will devolve upon them as may appear necessary.

The preparation of the several articles, historical and otherwise relating to Westtown Boarding School, which have from time to time appeared in "The Friend," having been designed to bring to renewed notice the many advantages there offered for the education of the rising generation of Friends, as well as to enlist the continued interest of our members in its welfare every way, and finding on the Minute Book, under date of 1861, an interesting address on this subject, it has been thought they might with propriety be concluded by its publication—asking for it an attentive perusal by the members of our Yearly Meeting as well as others who may be concerned for the best welfare of the youth of our Society. This it is proposed to publish in the next and final number of this series.

Whoever passes away, the Lord will abide with his people, and the church will be secure. The grand old cause does not depend on one or two of us. God forbid! The truth was mighty in the land before the best man living was born, and when he is carried with funeral procession, sad and slow, to his resting-place, the truth will not be buried with him, but in its own immortal youth will still be powerful; yes, and fresh advocates will arise more full of life and vigor than we are, and greater victories will be won. If you cut down yonder noble oak which now covers so wide an area with its shade, there may spring up a dozen trees which else had been overshadowed by the giant and checked in their growth: the removal of one man is often the opportunity for the springing up of scores of others to do equal service. It is grand to say with Jacob, "Now I die, but God will be with you." Such language honors God and bespeaks a mind greatly trustful, and completely delivered from the self-conceit which dreams itself important, if not necessary, to the cause of God: So may we die trusting in the Lord, and meanwhile so may we live, reliant upon the divine power.—Spurgeon.

Religious Items, &c.

The American Bible Society.—This organization has been engaged for 66 years in circulating the Holy Scriptures without note or comment.

It has distributed above 40,000,000 of copies in more than 80 languages or dialects; thus reaching by its ministrations every quarter of the globe.

It has prepared at great expense the entire Bible in raised letters for the blind.

It has supplied hundreds of thousands of volumes to immigrants landing upon our shores, and hundreds of thousands more to the freedmen, and has paid special attention to the spiritual wants of the North American Indians.

Its publications are furnished to those who wish to purchase them at the mere cost of manufacture, and at ten per cent. below cost to auxiliary societies and dealers in book. Thus the benevolent features of the Society's work are manifest, not in its grants only, but also in its sales.

It conducts an extensive system of colportage, not less than 170 persons being at present employed in this service in our own country, and 214 in foreign lands.

The Society is now engaged for the fourth time in the general supply of the United States with the Scriptures.

A Turkish Minister.—M. M. Mangasain by birth a Turk, has accepted "a call" to a Presbyterian congregation in Philadelphia.

The Church of Humanity, in London, it is said, is probably the smallest religious body in the world. According to count, there are just sixty members in the little dingy hall in Fetter-lane, where they meet to worship an ideal humanity. Though they are avowed agnostics, they aim at a ritual worship, and make an attempt to perpetuate the memory of saintly characters. Recently the "Festival of Holy Women" was celebrated, Dr. Conquer, the high priest of humanity, officiating. He read George Eliot's famous Postivist hymn: "O might I join the Choir invisible," and recited passages from "The Imitation of Christ." A prayer was offered to the "Great Power whom we here acknowledge as the Highest Humanity, the Love of Humanity, the Hope of Humanity, bring you comfort, and teach you sympathy; give you peace in yourselves and peace with others, now and ever. Amen."

A Finland Sect.—A new sect is gaining ground in Finland, having for its fundamental principle, the reversal of all ordinary ideas of government, and establishing all or more than the most enthusiastic advocates of women's rights ever pleaded for. With them the woman is the first of the family, and the husband undertakes to confess to her once a week. A similar sect called Purists is said to exist in Siberia.

Natural History, Science, &c.

White-Water.—The phenomenon known as the white-water of the Arabian Sea, is principally confined to a narrow belt to the eastward of the island of Socotra.

On a clear star-light night, a light here is suddenly discovered in the water as the ship moves rapidly along. In a short time this assumes a snow-white aspect, and in the course of a quarter of an hour extends to the horizon in all directions. The usually green color of the sea is replaced by a whiteness like that of milk. On drawing a bucket of the water, it is found to be beautifully clear, and not a vestige of anything white is visible.

This phenomenon has been attributed to reflection of color from the water, caused by a thin mist in the atmosphere. It probably arises from different causes, for in Kingsley's Letters from the Tropics, he mentions that one of his fellow-passengers who had witnessed it in the Indian Ocean, between Ceylon and Singapore, said that a bucket of water taken up was filled with the same half-luminous whiteness, which stuck to its sides when the water was drawn off.

Mouth-Breathing as a Disease Producer.—

Dr. Carl Seiler addressed the Philadelphia Pharmaceutical Association, at the College Pharmacy on the subject of "Month Breathing." He said that many ills that are ascribed to other causes are in reality due to the effect of this habit. Nature intended the nose to be used for inhaling and exhaling the atmosphere and fitted it up for that purpose. The mucous membrane contains glands, which give moisture to the air as it is inhaled, which is warmed and purified by its passage through the nose. When taken direct through the mouth into the lungs, the air apt, by reason of its lack of moisture, impurity or improper temperature, or all three to act as an irritant, especially in the larynx and in the air cells of the lungs.

Remedy for Chapped-hands.—Take from a teaspoonful to a tablespoonful of cider vinegar, and pour it into a quart of water, after using soap in washing your hands, give them thorough washing in this mixture, being careful to thoroughly apply it to the affected parts which is most always the back part of the hands and wrists. In a day's time almost the soreness will have left and the hands will soon become smooth. In order that the cure may be permanent, this mixture should be used every morning, especially during cold and windy weather.—Marysville Bulletin, Ky.

New Material for Paper.—A new branch industry has sprung up in Sweden lately, the fabrication of paper from moss, not from the living plant, but from the bleached and blanched remains of mosses that lived centuries ago, and of which enormous masses have accumulated in most parts of Sweden. A manufactory of paper from this material has begun operations near Joenkaeping, and is turning out paper in all degrees of excellence, from tissue to sheets three-quarters of an inch in thickness. These latter are harder than wood.

Monkeys.—Sir J. Bowring, in his admirable work on Siam, relates, that during a journey one of his suite fired at a monkey, wishing to secure the young one which she held in her arms. He did not kill her, and the wound mother retreated into the jungle, carrying her child with her. The rest must be told in Sir John's own words:

"Five men immediately followed her; but ere they had been out of sight five minutes we saw them hurrying towards us shouting Ling, ling, ling, ling! (i. e., monkey). As I could see nothing, I asked Hunter if they were after the monkeys.

"'Oh, no,' he replied; 'the monkeys are after them.'

"And so they were; thousands upon thousands coming down in the most unpleasant manner. As the tide was out, there was a great quantity of soft mud to cross before they could gain the boat. Here the monkeys gained very rapidly upon the men; and when at length the boat was reached, their savagery pursuers were not twenty yards behind the boat.

"The whole scene was ludicrous in the extreme, and I really think that, if my life had depended upon it, I could not have fired a shot. To see the men making the most strenuous exertions to get through the deep mud, breathless with their run and fire combined, and the army of little wretches drawn up in line within twenty yards of screaming! Besides there was the feeling that they had the right side of the question.—J. G. Wood.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 27, 1883.

We have received a communication from an unnamed friend in Ohio, commenting on some remarks of Dr. John Fothergill, on Education, published in No. 20 of our present volume. The writer is evidently fearful lest the recommendation of family worship, as therein expressed, may be construed by some into an approval of stated prayers and similar formal practices which have ever been regarded as variance with the principles of our Society. Our views on these points are sound and good; we believe are the same as those held by Fothergill himself. In examining the article prior to publication, the same question presented,—as to the danger of the expression family Worship," being misunderstood; but accompanying remarks seemed clearly to show that it was not intended to recommend anything "inconsistent," as the article says, with our religious principles and practices. With our belief, that we cannot approach Almighty acceptably without a preparation from Him."

The concern of Dr. Fothergill is in accordance with the advices which have often been given by the Society of Friends to its members; i. e.—To read the Scriptures in their homes, "and to sit in reverent silence before Him in whom we live and move and have our being," and that heads of families in this land, reverential silence should seek for a qualification rightly to discharge their duties so dependent upon them. It is in accordance also with the views of our Ohio correspondent, who says he can fully unite in the practice, which he himself has followed for many years, "of having our families domestics collected daily, to have read to us a portion of Holy Scripture with our hearts turned to Him who gave them forth, and living desires after the true bread of life, whereby our souls might be nourished, and He might be pleased to enable us to offer acceptable incense unto Him, and to perform worship which is alone acceptable in his sight."

Any religiously disposed people, who do not hold the views of Friends as to the necessity of a fresh qualification for every exercise of worship, are in the practice of praying, exhorting, or exhorting in their families at stated times; and such labors are often spoken of as "family worship." In reference to such formal services, our correspondent makes the following judicious remarks.

I apprehend that if such a system were adopted it would be dangerous of our settling into a form of life, and although good as to form or words, might be at all acceptable to the Father. For 'they worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth.' Many of our worthy early Friends recommended the practice of reading the Holy Scriptures privately and were faithful in the performance of it, and no doubt such opportunities were often blessed in, in which they were at seasons enabled to be living high praises to the Lord. And I believe many times the dear children are made partakers of the same, and words of counsel and instruction are handed forth by parents or such as may be prepared and qualified by the ever blessed and true Head of the church.

True and acceptable worship is not confined to any place according to the declaration of our Redeemer to the women of Samaria, and I fully believe, that when our hands are engaged in the performance of our lawful business, or we may be reclining on our beds in the darkness of the night when no mortal eye sees us; our hearts may be turned to the Lord with fervent desires that He may be pleased to enable us to walk acceptably before Him, and to perform acceptable worship in his sight. As parents and heads of families are thus engaged, I fully believe they will be enabled, both by example and precept, to instruct their beloved children in the way to the kingdom; in stillness and in patient waiting upon their Father who is in heaven. And as they may be brought by the instrumentality of rightly exercised parents, and the visitations of Divine love in their souls, to submit to the cross of Christ, they will see the necessity of denying themselves of the vain fashions of the world. My great desire is that there may be a more earnest exercise of spirit before the Holy One to be redeemed from all improper engagement in worldly things and to be more entirely devoted to the service of our Creator, from whom we receive all our blessings, both spiritual and temporal, and thus we might be favored to experience more fully a partaking of that river the streams whereof make glad the whole heritage of God."

We value such comments and criticisms, written in a friendly spirit, both because they furnish opportunities for correcting mistakes we may have made and removing apprehensions which may exist; and also because they tend to increase that necessary care to avoid expressions which are liable to convey a wrong impression.

In reading the articles forwarded by Charles Shieldstream, of Nebraska; and remembering that he was born and educated in Sweden among those of the Lutheran profession, and that since his removal to this country he has very rarely met with any one under our name; we have been much interested in observing the strong testimony that has been raised in his heart against the system of Will-worship, of which he constantly speaks as Babylon, the term very frequently applied to it by our early Friends.

The writings of William Penn furnish frequent references to this subject. In a Tender Visitation to the people of Holland, he says: "Babylon lives too much yet in every one, of all sorts of people or professors, by whom the truth is held in unrighteousness. When they see not through the Light of the Spirit of Christ, and when their knowledge and worship of God, is not received and performed by that same blessed Spirit; there I say is Babylon,—that is, confusion; oh, come out of her my people! saith the Lord, and I will receive you."

In a Call to Christendom, this passage occurs: "All that pray, preach, sing, worship, &c., and not by the Light and Spirit of Jesus, they go before Christ, before Christ cometh, before He prepareth their hearts, and toucheth their lips with a coal from his Heavenly altar; and perform worship in their own will, time and power, and stay not for his leadings. And therefore all such rob Christ of his office, who is the Leader of the true Christians; their Heavenly High-Priest to anoint them, and offer up their sacrifice to God for them."

In one of his epistles, William Penn remarks: "Will-worship is the offspring of the serpent and of the will of man; and it can never please God." It was this conviction that led him so earnestly to exhort others to avoid, what he terms this dangerous device of the enemy of their souls: "Are ye followers of the Lamb, that hath visited you, the Captain of your salvation? Run not in your own wills, wait for his word of command, do nothing of your own heads and contrivings, yet do all with diligence that He requireth. Remember what became of them of old that offered false fire."

"Touch not with man-made ministers, nor man-made worships, let their words be never so true. 'Tis but man, 'tis but flesh, 'tis but the will; and it shall have no acceptance with God."

"Remember that nothing bringeth to Christ, that cometh not from Christ. Wherefore all ministry that cometh not from Christ, God's great Prophet and High-Priest to all true-born Christians, cannot bring people to Christ. Man only gathereth to man, to hear and believe in man, and depend on man."

"True silence before the Lord is better abundantly than forward prayers and self-willed offers, or any traditional and formal performances. For, consider, that it is life eternal to know God. Now, no man can know Him, who has not heard his voice. And no man can hear his voice, who is not silent in himself, and waits not patiently for Him, that he may hear what God will speak to his soul."

There is scarcely anything in the political aspect of the affairs of this country that has been more satisfactory of latter times, than the general interest that has been awakened in Civil Service Reform, both as to the National Government and the municipal administration; and the practical advance that has been made in carrying that reform into operation.

We seldom refer in these columns to matters purely political, but this subject has important moral bearings also. The general tendency of the system which regards positions in the administrative employment of the country as the reward of efforts to secure the political success of certain parties or persons, is so thoroughly demoralizing in its character to all concerned, that we can but rejoice in the success of every proper effort to introduce purer methods of administration.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Five of the fourteen regular appropriation bills have passed both Houses, but of these the Agricultural bill is the only one which has yet been sent to the President for his signature. Three others, viz: The Indian, the Consular and Diplomatic, and the Military Academy bills, are in the hands of Conference Committees. The more important amendments to the Post-office Appropriation bill passed by the Senate on Seventh-day the 20th inst., are the following: Fixing Seventh mo. 1st, 1883, as the date on which the reduction of letter postage to 2 cents shall take effect, instead of First mo. 1st, 1884; striking out the House provision in regard to compensation of subsidized railroads for carrying the mails, and inserting an appropriation of $185,000 for continuance of the existing "fast mail service."

On the 16th instant, Senator Dawes, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to the Ottawas in the Indian Territory, "and for other purposes."

The Census Office has just issued a special bulletin showing the consumption of forest products as fuel in the United States during the census year. It appears that the number of persons using wood for domestic fuel was 32,375,074. The amount of wood so consumed was 140,537,439 cords, valued at $306,950,040. The amount of wood consumed by railroads and steamboats, in mining operations and in manufacturing, was 5,240,698 cords, valued at $15,012,333. In addition to this there were consumed 74,008,972 bushels of charcoal valued at $5,276,736.

The Prohibitory amendment to the Constitution of Iowa, adopted by the people of that State last Sixth month, was on the 18th inst. declared invalid by the Supreme Court, on technical grounds.

The total exports of breadstuffs from the United States during the year 1882, amounted in value to $182,682,734, against $224,124,832 during 1881.

The "blizzard" which prevailed in the Northwest during Sixth-day of last week, was the worst storm of the winter. It extended from Nebraska north to Manitoba, and from Wisconsin west to the Missouri river. Many railroad trains were abandoned on different roads, and the blockade continued on Seventh-day, the wind blowing the snow into the cuts and filling them up. The temperature in Minnesota was about 20 degrees below zero; in Dakota and Montana, 30 to 35 below, and in Manitoba, 40 to 45 below.

By an explosion of "giant powder," at Berkley, near San Francisco, on First-day last, 22 Chinamen and one white man were killed, and thirteen Chinese and one white man were injured, some of them fatally. Eight tons of powder blew up, leaving 200 tons intact. The cause of the explosion is not known.

A Southern Pacific express train, which left San Francisco on Sixth-day morning, was wrecked near Tehicapa Station, and 21 persons were killed and 13 injured. The train had stopped to detach an engine which assisted in pulling it up the grade. The air-brake had been taken off, and the men who tended the hand brakes "were away from their posts, one attending to switching the engine, and the other relighting his lamp." The cars ran down the grade at a fearful speed for four miles, when the hindmost sleeper left the track and went over a fifteen-foot embankment. The other sleeper and the mail, baggage and express cars followed, and were piled in a shattered heap, the wreck catching fire. Many of the victims were burned to death before the eyes of those who were unable to save them. Of the injured, nine were badly burned and one was not expected to survive.

It is now known that of 177 people said to be in the Newhall House, Milwaukie, at the time of the fire, 102 were saved, leaving the number lost at 75.

The gorge below the ice bridge at Niagara Falls is reported to be "almost completely filled" with ice. The cakes of ice thrown up along the shore have caused much destruction to property.

The Hamburg-American Line steamer Cimbria, which left Hamburg on the 17th inst. for New York, came in collision with the British steamer Sultan on Sixth-day, the 19th, off Borkum, an island of Prussia, in the North Sea, twenty-six miles northwest of Emden. The Cimbria quickly sank. At the time of making this Summary, 410 persons it was feared were lost, and 55 were known to have been saved.

Gov. Ordway, of Dakota, says in his Message to the Legislature, that the population of the Territory has doubled in two years, and now reaches 300,000, and that the amount of taxable property is $50,000,000.

At a sale of Jersey cows and calves in this city on the 19th inst., fifteen of them sold for between $600 and $925 a-piece. Eighteen others brought between $400 and $545 each.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 407, which was 17 more than for the previous week, and 43 less than for the same period last year. Of the foregoing, 203 were males and 204 females; 66 died of consumption; 42 of pneumonia; 28 of diphtheria; 17 of bronchitis; 17 of old age; 13 of croup; 12 of typhoid fever, and 8 of small-pox.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 104; 3½'s 103½; 4½'s, 113½; 4's, 119½; currency 6's, 129 a 132.

Cotton.—There was no material change to notice in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 10¾ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ a 7¾ cts. for export, and 8½ a 8¾ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in good request and firm. Sales of 3200 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.37½ a $6; Pennsylvania family at $4.75; western do. at $5 a $5.60, and patents at $6 a $7.50. Rye flour is quiet but steady at $3.62½ a $3.75 per barrel.

Grain.—In wheat there was very little movement, but prices were firmer. Sales of 4000 bushels red in ear lots at $1.08 a $1.18. Rye is firm at 65 cts. for No. 2 Pennsylvania. Corn is firm in the local market, with eight offerings. Sales of 8000 bushels at 65 a 69½ cts. Oats are in fair request and firm. Sales of 9000 bushels, in ear lots at 45 a 52 cts.

Beef cattle were rather dull this week and prices were a fraction higher: 3300 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4½ a 7 cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were dull and lower: 13,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3½ a 6½ cts., and lambs at 4 a 7½ cts. per pound, as to condition.

Hogs were in demand: 5000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 8¼ a 9½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—A number of the persons recently arrested in Ireland under the Crimes act, were examined on Seventh-day last. The Times, in a leading editorial, says: "It is evident that Saturday's proceedings in Dublin unveiled a conspiracy to murder executive officials. Although the secrets of the prosecution thus far have been kept with praiseworthy discretion, it is not believed that the counsel for the crown has begun with the strongest part of the case. The inquiry will probably be protracted for several weeks."

A cable despatch received in Boston recently from Dublin says: "The whole north of Ireland is in a most wretched condition, owing to the complete destruction of grain crops in September by a terrible tornado and the rotting of the entire potato crops, owing to constant rains. In one place such general destitution prevails that twenty tons of Indian meal per week are required to keep the people barely alive. Relief is coming slowly, and despair is universal."

Policemen sent to Glendale, Isle of Skye, to serve a process and arrest Crofters, were forcibly driven back.

The Times says: The scheme formulated by the Egyptian Government, approved by Lord Dufferin, and transmitted to the Foreign Office, proposes that the Khedive of Egypt shall have a Council of twelve responsible Ministers, and that a legislative Council of fourteen members shall be formed, half of whom shall be nominated by the Khedive and half chosen by the system of double election, such as that for which abundant precedents exist in the American Constitution and others. An elective Assembly of forty-four members is also proposed, to be convened to occasionally discuss special subjects.

The latter will not participate in legislation, but will assist legislation by giving voice to the classes hitherto inarticulate. The initiation of legislation rests wholly with the Council of Ministers; but its projects must be submitted to the Legislative Council before becoming law. In the event of irreconcilable differences between these two bodies, the decision will probably be left to the Khedive.

Prince Napoleon (Plon Plon), has issued a manifesto criticizing the present situation, and claiming the Napoleonic inheritance. The manifesto was also found placarded in several quarters of Paris. The Prince dwells on the impotence and incapacity of the Government, the disunion of Parliament, and the decadence of the army, and of the finances. He declares that religion is attacked, and that the observance of the Concordat can alone establish religious peace. The Prince rejects any compromise with Royalists. He adverts to the plebiscites by which the Empire was sanctioned. The manifesto was torn down by the police. Having appeared in the Figaro, that paper was seized. Prince Napoleon was arrested and imprisoned in the Conciergerie.

At the recent trial of the anarchists at Lyons, Emile Gautier, Bernard Bordat, of the Lyons Socialistic journal, Etendard Revolutionnaire, and Prince Krapotkine were found guilty and sentenced each to five years' imprisonment and to pay 2000 francs fine, to ten years' police supervision and to five years' deprivation of civil rights. Sentences varying in terms were passed in the cases of other persons convicted, and also several sentences in default of the appearance of the accused.

Four of the accused were acquitted; ten, including the printer Vaillat, were sentenced to pay 50 francs fine and to five years' deprivation of civil rights; nine to pay 100 francs fine, to a similar deprivation of civil rights, and one year's imprisonment; eleven, including Regis Faure, to be deprived of civil rights, to pay a fine of 200 francs, and to fifteen months' imprisonment; three to be deprived of civil rights, to pay a fine of 300 francs, and to two years' imprisonment; three to ten years' police supervision, to pay a fine of 500 francs, and to three years' imprisonment, and three were sentenced to four years' imprisonment, to pay a fine of 1000 francs, and to similar police supervision.

The following sentences were passed in default of the appearance of the accused to answer: Two were sentenced to two years' imprisonment, to pay 1000 francs fine and to five years' police supervision, and ten to five years' imprisonment, to pay 2000 francs fine, and to ten years' police supervision. There was a great tumult on the delivery of the sentences, and the court-room was cleared. It is believed that the condemned will appeal.

Three terrific explosions took place on the 19th in a gunpowder manufactory in the town of Muiden, in Holland, where nearly all the houses were unroofed by the concussion. The neighboring towns and villages are much damaged. The loss of life is unknown, but feared that forty persons perished. The explosion heard in this city, which is eight miles distant from Muiden. Windows in the eastern suburb of Amsterdam were broken. Twelve bodies, victims of the explosion have been discovered. It appears that two workmen were in the building at the time of the explosion. The town is greatly damaged. The inhabitants are leaving their homes.

A despatch from Vienna says: A letter has been received here from Odessa, reporting the occurrence of a fire at Kherson, South Russia, on the 16th instant, which destroyed a great part of the city. It is supposed to have been of incendiary origin.

The Government of India did an admirable stroke of business when it established chinchona plantations. The cash profit on the Bengal plantations alone last year was $40,700, besides $16,500 saved on quinine furnished to the troops—that sum represents the difference between the cost of production and market price.

Lima, 1st mo. 22d.—It is authentically stated this soon as the Cajamarca Assembly names the officers of the Northern Departments, the Chilians will evacuate them, leaving the Government to Gen. Iglesias; that the Diplomatic Representatives desirous of peace have agreed to write to their respective Governments that the only hope of securing peace is by a joint representation at Santiago on a basis of the cession of Tacapa, leaving all other questions for the present.

NOTICE.

A meeting of the Teachers' Association of Friends of Philadelphia, will be held on Seventh-day, Second 3d, at 2.30 p. m., at the Boys' Select School, 820 Chestnut St. The subjects to be discussed are Written Examinations and Methods of Teaching Geography; and other time permit.

The attendance of Friends interested, is invited.

CORRECTION.—In the last No. of "The Friend" on page 188, middle column, in the 3rd line of the stanza, for angles read angels.

DIED, on the 27th of 9th month, 1882, MARIA, of Wm. P. Dewees, in the 58th year of her age, a member of Springville Monthly Meeting, Iowa. She was a useful member of our Society, filling acceptably several years, the stations of elder and overseer. She bore a lingering illness with remarkable patience and resignation, leaving to survivors the consoling evidence that her end was peace.

—, on the 5th of 11th mo. 1882, at the residence of his son-in-law, William P. Dewees, Linn Co., Ia. JOSEPH EMBREE, in the 84th year of his age, a member and elder of Springville Monthly Meeting of Friends. This dear Friend possessed great meekness and humility which attended him through life, ever bearing a faithful testimony against innovations upon the principles of our Society, and when laid upon a sick bed, was able to endure a protracted illness with patience leaving a well-grounded hope that his end was peace.

—, at his home in Pennsville, Morgan Co., Ohio, on the 20th of 12th mo. 1882, WILLIAM LLEWELYN, son of Thomas and Martha Llewellyn in the 15th year of his age, a member of Pennsville Monthly and Particular Meeting. His afflictions were many weeks of great suffering, which he was enabled to bear with a good degree of Christian patience and resignation. On one occasion he interceded for help to enable him to bear his sufferings with patience. A short time before his close he seemed sensible his end was near at which he did not seem alarmed. His family friends feel a comfortable hope that his end was peace.

For "The Friend,"

Pennsylvania History.

What a theme so lofty as the History of Pennsylvania, and demanding for its proper treatment a combination of qualities rarely covered should have found no worthy pen dared to essay it, is not surprising. When we remember how few who have aspired to become historians have deserved the name, and how many have fallen short of their promise, we have proved but partisan advocates, spelepleaders, or writers of "romance founded on fact," we may persuade ourselves that the work of the historian has not been properly cultivated, or that philosophy has not yet prepared the way for the full comprehension of the principles upon which it should be founded. "Those who regard the histories of societies as the history of their great men, and think that these great men shape the fate of their societies, overlook the truth that such great men are the products of their societies. Without certain antecedents—without a certain average national character, they could never have been generated nor could have they formed the culture which formed them. If their society is to some extent remolded by them, they were, both before and after birth, molded by their society—were the results of all those influences which fostered the ancestral character they inherited, and gave their own early life, their creed, morals, knowledge and aspirations."

The experience gained by Penn in his earlier attempts at colonization in New Jersey is doubtless of essential value, and any attempts to describe the origin of Pennsylvania's liberties would but imperfectly present the history, were the story of the birth of her Commonwealth ignored.

In his "Concessions, &c., to the settlers of New Jersey," which was colonized by leading friends of the period, he proved his attachment to the principles of civil and religious liberty which he afterwards displayed upon a more extended scale in Pennsylvania, where his genuine Christian spirit led him to improve his opportunity for the exhibition of philanthropy and lofty sense of justice in true liberty. The "Charter of Liberties" granted his new Commonwealth, was an outgrowth of the "Concessions" to the New Jersey colonists; and in New Jersey and Pennsylvania was the example earliest set for imitation by sister States, showing how it is possible to enjoy one's own religious convictions without disturbing the peace and conscience of one's fellow-citizens. Thus were erected on the opposite banks of the Delaware, two Christian Commonwealths, similar in spirit and design, and unlike any other compacts or attempts to form a government that had proceeded wholly from the will and skill of man. The superiority of Penn's legislation arose from the fact that "his jurisprudence was not drawn from the Old Testament" but from the New. "He had made religion the business of his life, and the world is more indebted to his religion than to his talents, great as they no doubt were, for the excellence of his institutions." "The policy of his government grew out of his religious principles." "Greater than the divinity that doth hedge a king, is the divinity that encompasses the righteous man and the righteous people," says Charles Sumner, and "the flowers of prosperity smiled in the blessed footprints of William Penn." "This pattern of a Christian Commonwealth never fails to arrest the admiration of all who contemplate its beauties." * * "Every ingenuous soul in our day," says the same just and eloquent writer, "offers his willing tribute to those celestial graces of justice and humanity, by the side of which the flinty hardness of the Pilgrim of Plymouth Rock seems earthly and coarse." "Penn," says Upham, "was a man not only of deep religious sensibility, but of vast grasp of intellect. * * * he had a soul of great dimensions, which took in the past, the present and the future, and which, moved as it were, by Divine inspiration, foresaw, anticipated, and in part regulated the destinies of humanity." Drawn from the source of pure wisdom—the immediate revelation of the Divine mind—we need not wonder that "in the early constitution of Pennsylvania are to be found the distinct annunciation of every great principle; the germ if not the development of every valuable improvement in government or legislation which has been introduced into the political systems of modern epochs." (T. I. Wharton's Discourse before the Penn Society, 1826.) It was from the Constitution of Pennsylvania, and not from that of any New England colony, that the noblest features of our National Constitution were drawn,* features which have elicited the enthusiastic admiration of the ablest and wisest who had made legislation and statesmanship the theme of study or discourse. "The American Constitution," says Gladstone, "is the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man."

* To Penn, we believe, belongs the merit of having been the first to propose a union of the separate settlements which were to become States. As early as 1697, he appeared before the Board of Trade, of which John Locke was a member, to advise an annual congress of two delegates from each American province, to determine the ways and means for supporting their union, providing for their safety, and regulating their commerce.

The biographers of William Penn have cursorily treated of his connection with New Jersey, and have permitted his successful efforts to establish a colony of his own, and to found a city, to overshadow the part he took in influencing the legislation of the minor and more agricultural province, of which, though not the founder, he was the master spirit of its fundamental law.

An important addition to our knowledge of his connection with the efforts to relieve from their difficulties the colonists who had followed Fenwick and his unstable fortunes, has recently been given us by Judge John Clement, of Haddonfield, N. J. More than seven years before he received the grant of his Sylvania, Penn became interested in the efforts to establish this colony of Friends in New Jersey. He was early called upon to act as an arbitrator between John Fenwick and the creditors of Edward Byllynge, who believed that the latter had employed their funds in improperly aiding Fenwick in his purchase. A decision was reached and Fenwick was obliged to be satisfied with ten parts, while to Byllynge's creditors, who were mostly Friends, were awarded ninety parts of the one hundred into which the lands had been divided; and Penn was pressed to continue to act and become the trustee of the latter party. A controversy fierce and unrelenting arose and continued a long time, and has been involved in mystery, but the arrangement of facts in chronological order by Judge Clement, has thrown some light upon it.

To aid the settlement of diverse claims, William Penn became the purchaser of certain rights, and through his wise and conciliatory course, litigation was brought to a close, but not until he had become governor of his new State. It was while thus engaged, in 1676, he assisted in framing a government acceptable to the adventurers and to the proprietors of the soil. This is known as "The Concessions and Agreement of the proprietors, freeholders and inhabitants of the Province of West New Jersey;" and therein is exhibited the breadth and Christian spirit of Penn and his associates, who thus became the pioneers in efforts to establish the true basis of representative government, by placing "the power in the people." The valuable paper by Judge Clement has been published by the Pennsylvania Historical Society, in the Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography—1881. Vol. v., pp. 313-333.

In 1877, there appeared by the same antiquarian author, "Sketches of the first emigrant settlers in Newton township, old Gloucester county, West New Jersey." This is an interesting body of information respecting many of the English pioneers of one of the important centres of early settlement, with notice of many of their descendants, giving an outline sketch of two hundred years. Many familiar names of residents of West New Jersey and Philadelphia appear therein, whose representatives would do both themselves and their posterity a favor by procuring copies of it while it is in their power to do so. A century hence Judge Clement's work will be very highly valued by the grand-children of the living named therein. Another work of similar intent, and very interesting to the families of those named and described in its pages, is a "History and Genealogy of Fenwick's Colony," by Thomas Shourds, of Hancock's Bridge, Salem Co., New Jersey, 1876; and is a timely effort to trace the descent of many of the early adventurers of that unhappy pioneer colonist.

"A sketch of the life and character of John Fenwick," the founder of Salem, N. J., the earliest successful English colony, in which we have for the first time a clear account of the career of this remarkable man, has appeared from the pen of Judge Clement, and was published by "Friends [Hicksite] Historical Association of Philadelphia," in 1875: a pamphlet of 95 octavo pages. This is a very interesting contribution to New Jersey history, and is the result of research among the original records of courts, Friends' Meetings and elsewhere. Previous to the effort of Fenwick, a colony of English from New Haven, Connecticut, had, in 1634, settled on Salem creek, but finding that the territory was claimed by the English Earl, Sir Edmund Plowden, under grants from King Charles I., they swore fealty to Sir Edmund, as the "Palatine of Albion," though the country was claimed by the Dutch and possessed by the Swedes. This earliest English colony was much annoyed, their houses burnt and goods confiscated and themselves made prisoners; but they were finally permitted to remain and build and continue in their chosen field until the arrival of Fenwick in 1675.

Thoughts about the Eternal Gospels and the Falling Babylon.

TRUE MINISTRY.

The 4th chapter of Paul's letter to the Ephesians reads: "I, therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you to walk worthily of the calling with which you are called, with all lowliness and meekness, with long suffering, forbearing one another in love, giving diligence to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of grace. There is one body, and one spirit, also even ye were called in one hope of your calling—one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is over all and through all, and in all. But unto each one of us was the grace given according to the measure of the gift of Christ, wherefore He saith: When He ascended on high, He led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men. (Now this, that He ascended, what is that but He also descended first unto the lower part of the earth? He that descended is the same also that ascended, far above all heavens, that He might fill all things), and He gave some to be apostles, and some prophets, and some evangelists, and some pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, unto the work of ministering unto the building up of the body of Christ, till we all attain unto the unity of the faith, and the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a full-grown man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ, that we may be no longer children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and in craftiness after the will of error, but speaking truth in love, may grow in all things unto Him, which is the Head, even Christ, from whom all the body fitly framed and knit together through that which every joint supplieth, according to the working in due measure of each several part, maketh the increase in the body unto the building up of itself in love."

Now, impartial reader, I ask thee, how can any one, no matter what organization of men calling itself the church, he belongs to, unless he is called and qualified by Christ himself, be an apostle, prophet, evangelist, pastor or preacher, or aid his brethren in attaining unto the unity of faith and knowledge of the Son of God, unto a full grown man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ?

The true ministers who are sent by Christ, they turn the people to Christ, the true Light; and when they follow the manifestation of the Light, Spirit and Grace in their own hearts, then they own Christ to be their free Teacher, Prophet, High Priest and King, and they sit down in heavenly places in Christ Jesus.

Now when ministers undertake to represent divine things by their imagination and notions, which they never have witnessed or handled, are they not like actors on a stage representing events they have never seen? It has not been uncommon to hear a revivalist say, "I imagine that I am seeing men, women and children go right into hell;" and so describe hell as if he had been there; and tell the people, "come just now, just as you are, willing or not—come to the mourning-seat and be prayed for," &c. It is awful to think how many scare-crows such blind leaders of the blind have put before the excited imagination of their hearers. But the gospel, the true Gospel, is not imaginary, but stands in the Light and power of Christ, and is reality. The Spirit of God is the Spirit of full assurance, and in a child of Light there is no imaginary or uncertain sound.

It is a most affecting consideration, that when men live and move and have their being in God, who sent his beloved Son into the world for a Light and a Teacher, near all and in all, then men reject Him, their Saviour, and will not have Him to rule over them; but still claim to be a Christian people, and build temples of wood and stone to God, to whom no such a house can be built; and hire preachers to preach about God and Christ in their houses. Yes, they hire preachers taught by men, who keep up will-worship, and keep their hearers depending on their words; though some of them never have attained to the knowledge of the Truth; but led by their own will and imagination, run out farther and farther from the truth. Oh how infinitely good and wise is God! and has he not made men right—but they seek many inventions? Such preachers sometimes have no more true knowledge of divine things than their hearers, not having listened to the voice of God in their own hearts, but making up a way of salvation according to texts expounded in their own carnal wisdom.

How can a child of man dare to steal the words of holy men, and make a trade of them? How do people dare to hire a carnally minded man, how learned soever according to human wisdom, to be their instructor in divine dom, when they have the true Light which enlightens every man who cometh into world?

There is nothing more true, good, sub and perfect on the earth, than man brought into unity with his God, Creator and deemer; walking in the Light, and worshipping God in spirit and in truth. In silence and reverence he hears the voice of God, but indeed the temple of God. And there is nothing more imperfect on the earth than a man who professes God according to his own natural notion, and resists and rebels against Light; and honors an unknown God with will-worship; yet pretends himself to be a teacher of others, and talks about himself as God's minister.

Rabbits in New Zealand.

BY A RUN-HOLDER.

About a score of years ago an immigrant to Invercargil, a town in the south of New Zealand, brought with him from England seven rabbits. He offered them for sale to the authorities of the former province of Southland; and they, thinking it would be a good thing to have some furred game on the sandhills which abound on the coast, gave him a small sum of money to turn them there. I believe that rabbits were also turned out further north in Otago; but those were the progenitors of the mighty swarm which has infested the country.

For some years the rabbits seemed to be about the sandhills, where there was good shooting, and little was thought of them. When they got very thick, they fed so close to the ground that the covering sward which held the sandhills together was destroyed, and the sand began to be blown inland, stealing a good deal of ground. The rabbits themselves also become a nuisance to the farmer near the coast; but these holdings are small, and by trapping and shooting, the farms can be kept moderately clear. The country looking from the coast is a plain for twenty or thirty miles. Then come rolling grassy hills, which begin the sheep-runs. Further back are mountains of about five thousand feet, fit for sheep and farther still is the great backbone of New Zealand, so high and rough as not to be fit for any stock but rabbits. Among the hills and smaller mountains are many plains of considerable extent. The rivers Oreti and Aparima have exceedingly wide and shifty beds, and flow through flats for almost their courses. The sandhills where the rabbits were turned out are between the mouths of those two rivers.

In 1876 the evil had grown to such an extent that the colonial government appointed a Commission to inquire and report on the state of the rabbit nuisance, and to suggest remedies. The Commissioners travelled through the country, and made many inquiries. Their Report said what every one knew ready—that matters were very bad, and likely to be much worse. An Act was then passed by the legislature which gave a bonus of halfpenny for every rabbit-skin exported, and empowered the inhabitants of any district badly overrun with rabbits to elect a Board, whose duty it was to see that all hold of land destroyed their rabbits. In case a holder failed to do so, the Board was to do it done at his expense.

It is hard for any one not acquainted

For "The Friend."

Gleanings from Quaker Annals.

Daniel Wheeler experienced some remarkable preservations, to which he often referred as the merciful interpositions of an overruling providence on his behalf; of these, one in particular appears to have arrested his attention. A vessel in which he was appointed to sail, and which was considered a remarkably fine one, was exceedingly crowded, from the preference given to her by many of the officers. One morning after they had been some weeks at sea, a collier (being one of the vessels hired as transports,) coming along side, he proposed to one of his friends, that they should go on board of her. His fellow-officers ridiculed the idea of preferring an old collier to the noble ship in which they then were; but he and his friend persisted and transferred themselves to her. The same evening a hurricane arose, and the vessel they had quitted was never heard of afterwards. In connection with this period he once remarked to a friend, on being questioned as to the means made use of in the divine hand for effecting 'a new birth unto righteousness' in his heart,—that he could not remember any outward means having been employed, unless indeed, he might except a storm at sea, during which his mind was deeply affected; and when, under a feeling of his own lost condition by nature, he was mercifully enabled also to see the remedy, and the entire spirituality of the Gospel dispensation. In accordance with this feeling, he remarked, "I was at this time convinced of Friends' principles, they being neither more nor less in my estimation, than pure Christianity. I remember when the Friends visited me on my application for membership, I told them I was convinced at sea; for I verily believed in looking back, that this had been the case; no human means were made use of; it was altogether the immediate work of the Holy Spirit upon my heart." Under these feelings he became dissatisfied with the military profession, and resolved that if permitted again to reach the shore, he would endeavor to lead a life of more circumspection, and which should tend to the glory of that Being, who had thus mercifully visited him by his free grace. To this resolution he adhered:—he quitted the army in the early part of the year 1796.

For some time subsequently, to this event, he became an inmate in the family of his eldest sister, Barbara Hoyland; who was settled in the neighborhood of Sheffield in Yorkshire. She had married a member of the Society of Friends; and before the period of Daniel Wheeler's joining them, had herself become convinced of their principles, and united to them. While residing with these near relatives, his mind became renewedly impressed with the importance of Divine truth; and in the course of a few months, he was led openly to espouse those views of it, of which, in after years he was an unflinching advocate. The little meeting which he attended in the early part of his religious course, that of Handsworth Woodhouse, was usually held in silence; and he has been often known to refer to some of these solemn seasons, as seasons of peculiar instruction to his mind; in which the power of the Lord was sensibly felt, and his Truth revealed.

Being made a partaker of the great privilege enjoyed by those who are of the flock of Christ, in being able to distinguish between subject to understand the desolation wrought by apparently so small a plague. It is to be remembered that the population in the greater part of the interior of Otago is very sparse—houses being seldom less than seven miles apart—that a run of fifty thousand sheep is often worked by half-a-dozen men, and that rabbits breed once a month for eight months of the year, having from four to eight young ones at a time. The surest test of the plague is the decrease of sheep, and there are several runs where the decrease is three-fourths of the former stock. One run I know where the stock has diminished from twenty-five thousand. A sheep-run is generally a tract of country belonging to the Crown, and the owner, the run holder, for a yearly rent or assessment, has the sole right of rearing stock. In the last year or so, the rabbit-plague has grown to such an extent that many runs have been utterly abandoned as worthless by the holders, who of course have ceased to pay rents to the Crown. All sheep-farmers have been much impoverished, and many ruined. The license to occupy runs are generally for a period of ten years; and as these runs have only, in many cases, a short time to run, it does not pay the tenants to go to the expense in killing rabbits.

The run-holders, as a rule, have done their best to keep down the rabbits, and have tried many different plans. The principal one has been to employ men with large packs of dogs to kill at so much a skin—the skins being properly stretched and dried. These men are generally from twelve to twenty dogs each, and of course cause incessant disturbance to sheep. The dogs, too, often get away from their masters, and worry the stock. Sometimes men are employed to shoot, ferret, or trap. The cost of killing has generally been about twopence a head, and the produce of the sale of skins a good deal less.

Various other plans have been tried for getting rid of the nuisance, and ingenious inventors have devised many traps of the most absurd and fantastic description. It was proposed to introduce weasels and other vermin, and one gentleman brought some mongooses from India. The worst of this plan was that while the vermin were getting numerous enough to keep down the rabbits, we were all very certain to be ruined.

Various chemical means have been proposed for smothering the rabbits in their holes. The first plan was suggested by Dr. Black, Professor of Chemistry in Dunedin College, to use bisulphide of carbon. This chemical is exceedingly volatile; and if some cotton-waste, sheep-skin saturated with it, is placed in a hole, and the outlets are carefully stopped, the rabbits inside will be certainly killed. And many people used this plan to a considerable extent; but it was too expensive to attempt by its means to exterminate rabbits, or to keep them in check over large blocks of hilly country.

The last plan, and that which we all hope is the salvation of the country, has been in use for upwards of a year. It is to sprinkle the ground with phosphorus wherever there are rabbits. At first, crushed wheat was used, and a certain quantity of oil of rhodium and sugar was added, to make the bait attractive. On experience, however, it has been found that oats—about one-third of the price of wheat—are better, and that the use of rhodium and sugar are not necessary.

The process of mixing is now simple and safe. At first, people used to stir the mixture over an open boiler, and so ran great risks from the fumes of phosphorus. A better way is to put the oats into a barrel with a close-fitting lid, saturate them with boiling water, pour in the phosphorus—which has been fused in a small pan of hot water—and then roll the barrel backwards and forwards for a quarter of an hour. The poisoned grain will be fit to lay out when cold. It is usual to sell the poison to men who lay it out on the runs. They collect the skins of the rabbits, and are paid, generally, twopence apiece for them properly stretched and dried.

The cure is certainly wonderful. Wherever the poison has been properly laid, the rabbits have well nigh disappeared, and the nuisance has become a perfectly manageable one. The skins at present prices bring more than it costs to obtain and prepare them, so that any one can afford to clear his run, however short his lease may be. All this good is worked without disturbance to the sheep, and the packs of hideous mongrels which have for years infested the country may at last be done away with.

The objections to the cure are of course obvious. All imported and native game will suffer severely where poison is laid. The rabbits must, however, be put down, or else the greater part of the South Island will be made useless. Better import game at some future time, than be driven out of the country. The native birds will not be exterminated. There is too much wild country which is not occupied, and is not likely to be occupied for many years. There they will be left in peace; and when the rabbits are no longer a curse, the birds will return to the occupied country. As far as I can judge by experience, even where poison is thickly laid, birds do not take it very freely. I hear English larks singing over it every day, and I have never seen a poisoned native titlark, a bird which abounds everywhere. None of the wood-birds are likely to suffer much. Paradise ducks, wekas, and pukekas will feel it most. The pukeka is a kind of land-rail, very numerous and destructive to grain, both when growing and in the stack. The weka is a curious rail which cannot fly, and has already suffered much from rabbiters' dogs. I am sorry for the weka and the Paradise duck—the latter a beautiful bird. But the destruction will not be so great as some people fear. Ever since the poison has been laid, I have seen or heard of very few poisoned birds. We must accordingly hope for the best. People are certain to continue laying the poisoned grain till some one invents a better remedy.—Chambers' Journal.

"No human beings can be placed closely together without at times mutually and severely jarring against each other." One of the most holy and universally beloved persons I ever knew, once said to me in her old age, "My child, seek faith with your whole heart, and obedience to God; for however amiable and devoted those around you may be, there is much need of forbearance with the innocent infirmities of human nature, fully enough to try that faith and love at times to the utmost."—M. A. Shimmelpennick.

Prayer is the vital breath of faith.

the voice of the good Shepherd and that of the stranger, he was earnestly desirous that obedience should keep pace with knowledge. He waited patiently on the Lord for instruction in his various steppings; and being brought into a state of deep humility and prostration of spirit, he was made sensible, that the only path in which he could walk with safety, was that of self-denial. Much mental conflict was at this time his portion; but peace was only to be obtained by an entire surrender of the will; and in conformity with what he believed required of him, he adopted the plain dress. He once recounted to a friend in lively terms, the trial it was to him to put on a different hat to that which he had been accustomed to wear; especially as in going to the meeting at Woodhouse, he generally met a number of his former gay acquaintances, whom he crossed on their way to a place of worship, which he had previously been in the practice of attending. In this instance it was hard to appear openly as a fool before men; he thought that if his natural life might have been accepted as a substitute, he would gladly have laid it down; but this was not the thing required. He diligently examined his heart, and believed he clearly saw the Master's will in the requisition; and that it was a discipline designed to bring him into a state of child-like obedience and dependence. In great distress he called unto the Lord for help; and a passage of Scripture was powerfully applied to his mind,—“Whosoever shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven; but whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven.” His resolution was immediately taken:—he put on the hat, and with his mind stayed upon the Lord, set out to join his friends at meeting. His difficulties vanished,—sweet peace was his covering; and he was enabled experimentally to know the fulfilment of that declaration,—“greater is He that is in you, than he that is in the world.”

In the course of the year 1797, he was received into membership into the Society of Friends; and about the same time he entered into business in Sheffield in the seed trade. To this novel occupation he applied himself with that energy and assiduity, which characterized all his pursuits; and by the divine blessing on his exertions, he soon succeeded in obtaining a business fully adequate to his very moderate desires. It was striking to some of those around him, to observe how readily he adapted himself to this total change of habits; and with what true content and cheerfulness he engaged in the drudgery and toil of a retail shop; the daily attendance in which, rested for some years exclusively on himself. He has been frequently heard to refer to this period of his life, as one of great peace and comfort, and it appears to have been a time, in which his experience of the reality and power of divine grace was deepened and enlarged. It was his daily practice, at those intervals when the attendance in his shop could be dispensed with, if but for a few minutes at a time, to retire to a small apartment behind it, and in a prayerful spirit to explore the contents of the sacred volume; the light which shone upon the many passages as he read, and the clear and strong views of religious truth which were then unfolded to his seeking soul, were such, as greatly to confirm his faith, and strengthen him to persevere in that strait and narrow path, into which his feet had been so mercifully turned. The perusal of many of the prophetic books of holy writ, was at this time the means of great comfort and encouragement to him; and the extensive and accurate knowledge of these parts of Scripture, for which he was afterwards conspicuous, was then chiefly acquired.

It was his uniform practice, from his first commencement in trade, to close his shop during the hours of worship on week days; and though this must have required a strong exercise of faith; at a time when his future support seemed to depend on his assiduity and exertion, he was never satisfied to neglect the worship of Almighty God, from the prospect of any outward advantage; and he has often expressed his belief, that a blessing had rested on this sacrifice of apparent interest to duty.

“Rejoice, oh young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes.”

Whatever difficulty the learning of the schools may find in arriving at the meaning of these words, is immaterial, for the “wisdom of this world is foolishness,” &c.; but he who is tempted to walk in the ways of his heart, and in the sight of his eyes, need have no difficulty in understanding the meaning of the succeeding words: “But know thou, that for all these things, God will bring thee into judgment.”

AT THE BEAUTIFUL GATE.

Lord open the door for I falter,
I faint in this stifled air,
In dust and straitness I lose my breath;
This life of self is a living death,
Let me into thy pastures broad and fair.
To the sun and the wind from the mountains free;
Lord, open the door to me!

There is holier life, and truer,
Than ever my heart has found;
There is nobler work than is wrought within
These walls so charred by the fires of sin—
Where I toil like a captive blind and bound;
An open door to a freer task
In thy nearer smile I ask.

Yet the world is thy field, thy garden;
On earth art Thou still at home.
When Thou bendest hither thy hallowing eye
My narrow work-room seems vast and high,
Its dingy ceiling a rainbow dome.
Stand ever thus at my wide-swing door,
And toil will be toil no more.

Through the rosy portals of morning
Now the tides of sunshine flow,
O'er the blossoming earth and the glistening sea,
The praise Thou inspirest rolls back to thee.
Its tones through the infinite arches go;
Yet crippled and dumb, behold we wait,
Dear Lord, at the Beautiful Gate.

I wait for thy hand of healing,
For vigor and hope in thee.
Open wide the door, let me feel the sun,
Let me touch thy robe—I shall rise and run
Through thy happy universe, safe and free,
Where in and out thy beloved go,
Nor want nor wandering know.

Thyself art the Door, Most Holy!
By thee let me enter in,
I press towards thee with my failing strength,
Unfold thy love in its breadth and length!
True life from thine let my spirit win!
To the saints' fair city, the Father's throne,
Thou, Lord, art the way alone.

To be made with thee one spirit,
Is the boon that I lingering ask—
To have no bar 'twixt my soul and thine;
My thoughts to echo thy will divine;
Myself thy servant for any task.
Life! life! I may enter through thee, the Door,
Saved, sheltered forevermore!

HE LEADETH US.

AN UNPUBLISHED POEM BY ALICE CARY.

“Shall I be prophet, Human Heart?
Shall I tell thee sorrow stands
Ready, with cold and cruel hands,
Thee from thy chiefest loved to part?”
My soul was chilled with sudden pain;
Yet thus I made reply:
“My Chiefest Loved can never die!
And even earth's friends shall live again.”

Old Time smiled sternly: “Thou art young
And hopeful. What if sickness pale
Makes nerve to bend and heart to fail,
Which now with buoyant life are strong?”
“My strength lies not in hope or youth;
The childhood of immortal years
Cannot be struck with mortal fears;
Even Death hut rends the veil of Truth.”

“‘Death,’ thou presumptuous one! perchance
Within those dooms of gloom
He waits, dread shadow, till thou come;
Watches thy heedless steps advance
Even to the open tomb!”

“I will not tremble! I will trust!
My days are thine, O Saviour dear!
Thou seest all this coming year,
Thou lovest me and thou art just;
Thy poor child will not fear.”

Time touched; the massy gates swung wide;
I paused—a voice not all unknown
Spoke to my heart in sweetest tone:
“Child, I will be thy guide;
Fear not to travel on.”

A Story of Four Boys.—The Constitution printed many a story of denial, energy, heroism, but none more deserving than story of the Green boys.

These four boys started a few years selling newspapers. They made ten a piece the first morning they went to work and for two winters thereafter they went footed through the snow and sleet in the fringing dawn on their morning rounds. From very first they saved a certain percentage their earnings, which they wisely invested Atlanta real estate. The oldest of them now eighteen years of age, and the youngest twelve. They have supported an invalid father and their mother all the time, and have property worth considerably over $50,000, houses from which the rent is $20 a month and $200 stock in a Building and Loan Association. They have educated themselves meanwhile, remaining from school this in order that they might work the harder to build a home for their parents, that is to say a front parlor and a bay window in it. The little fellows have been carriers, new errand boys, and apprentices about the Constitution office, and one of them is now assistant mailing clerk. Their net savings from their sales and salaries, exclusive of rents, has been $20 a week for this year. Next year they can do better, and by the time the oldest of the brothers is of age they ought to have a comfortable little fortune.

What these boys have done other boys do. The whole secret is steadiness, sobriety, industry, and economy. There are few sons more important for boys than the smallest income—no matter how small—make a man independent if he will only de of it, and compound his surplus. It had been discouraging to these young men when it took them a month to lay up a dollar, and it was heroic in them when they laid this dollar up and went barefooted on frozen ground rather than use it to buy shoes with. It is easy now, when they are comfortably clad and housed, and everybody about them is comfortable, and their savings amount to twenty times a week more than they were formerly able to save in a month. They have conquered life almost before they entered it, and if they will only keep only hearts and genial souls, and broad, hearty impulses, they will be not only rich, but useful men.—The Atlanta Constitution.

Faith the Basis of Knowledge.

It has been claimed, and it is claimed anew every day, that in the natural sciences, for instance, men are dealing with hard facts, and that knowledge so gained springs directly from contact with nature, with no intervening element of faith. We are pointed to the mathematics as to a province of investigation in which no room is left for conjecture, but in which every process leads to a definite result, which is to be accepted as certain and infallible knowledge. In the sphere of religion, however, we are told that all this is changed; that we have no facts on which to build; that the domain of faith, and faith is—what any man chooses to believe. And Christian people accept this distinction as real, and allow every other system of knowledge a degree of certainty which is denied to religious knowledge.

But does this distinction really exist in fact? Is it true that we have a clear line of certainty to guide us in secular matters, but only a wavering, marsh-light as our guide in the journey of the soul? No, the distinction is unreal. The culties which lie at the base of religious knowledge are common to all knowledge. The facts which are claimed in justification of religious skepticism, if their force is admitted in this sphere, lead logically to universal skepticism. The mathematical reasoner may endeavor to demonstrate the immortality of the soul; but so long as the keenest mathematical intellect is unable to prove a single axiom of mathematics,—so long, for instance, as the sole truth that “two straight lines cannot enclose a space” actually stands logically unshakable,—we shall not be hasty to conclude that what is unprovable must be false. The naturalist may point to his chemicals, and ask for a tangible proof of the existence of God; so that as he himself cannot vindicate the bare pretence of matter before the subtle dialectic of Berkeley, we need not be confounded because God is greater than our logic,—because, searching, science cannot find Him out to detection.

Perhaps the greatest need alike of believers and skeptics, at the present day, is some sane conception of just what reason can do, and of what it cannot do. Reason has been exalted to the discoverer and test of all truth; and in many minds it has become a vague unknown entity, omnipotent to wreck or to build up the truth is, that reason is nothing more than a kind of higher arithmetic. It is useless in arranging knowledge, in detecting contradictions in apparent knowledge, and in bringing forth all that is necessarily implied in its premises. But that is all. It cannot discover any independent truth; it has absolutely no function until truth, derived from some other source, is given for it to work upon. You can never get out of it what you did not first put into it. If man is to know anything at all, that knowledge must come from some other source than reason.

Let the dogmatist in morals or in science strive to conceal it as he may, no system of knowledge can be established on a purely rational basis. Let the first principles of mathematics or of science or of metaphysics be granted, or let their truth be intuitively perceived and accepted, and it is easy to demonstrate that, since these first principles are true, certain consequences follow. But these first principles are incapable of proof, and who is to certify them? If nothing is knowledge except what is capable of logical demonstration at every stage of its genesis, then it is time that we all—religionists, philosophers, and scientists alike—give up all pretensions to knowledge, and confess that nothing which is in the heaven above or in the earth beneath, is capable of being known. There is no use attempting to build a house if we cannot even lay a foundation. If we must have proof, who is to demonstrate to us that the operations of our senses and the processes of our minds are trustworthy? If we are dependent upon reason for our knowledge, we may as well give ourselves up at once to the dreariest skepticism in regard to earthly as well as heavenly affairs; we must say with the old Greek skeptic: “I know nothing, and I do not even know that I know nothing.” The so-called Agnosticism of the day would be a system of reverent and childlike faith in contrast with that self-destructive skepticism which would be the inevitable outcome of any consistent attempt to find a purely rational basis for knowledge.

The fact is that the principles of all knowledge are seen and received by faith alone. In a sense, they are the revelation of God. They are not established by any formal demonstration; they need none. And this is as true of the every-day facts and principles which we handle in ordinary life,—as true of the scientific systems which the wit of man has built up, as it is of the truths of religion. The scientist justly refuses to permit the natural sciences to be destroyed by skepticism because the first principles on which they are founded are incapable of demonstration; and the believer in revealed religion can also afford to smile when he is met with the puerile demand for an infinite chain of proof which never existed and never can exist. If the apostle finds comfort in the thought that God is greater than our heart, why should we not find equal comfort in the knowledge that God is greater than human logic and the human brain?

Only the eye can catch the thousand varying pictures which the light paints for us; only the ear is sensible of the harmony of sweet sounds. The eye cannot fulfil the office of the ear, nor the ear that of the eye. So is it with faith and reason. Faith is the revealer of knowledge; it is the office of reason to defend that knowledge and to preserve it pure. Independent knowledge—the knowledge that comes not through faith—whether it be of things earthly or things heavenly, never can be ours.

“We have but faith; we cannot know,
For knowledge is of things we see.”

Yet if we will, the living knowledge—the knowledge which comes of faith—may be ours in religious things also, as it is already in earthly things. The light of God is falling around us; and all we have to do is to open our eyes and see. And of that knowledge and of that light we can pray;

“Let knowledge grow from more to more,
But more of reverence in us dwell;
That mind and soul, according well,
May make one music as before,

“But vaster. We are fools and slight;
We mock Thee when we do not fear;
But help thy foolish ones to bear;
Help thy vain worlds to bear thy light.”

Long before Anselm of Canterbury had uttered the watchword, “I believe, in order that I may understand,” inspiration had written, “The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge.” And after centuries of conflict between faith and unbelief, the words of the Hebrew sage stand seathless as the clear affirmation of an everlasting truth. Only as we trust in the bodily perceptions which God has given us, do we have any knowledge of the material world. Only as we come to God in quiet waiting trust, content to see in the light of the Spirit, willing to receive through faith the message of God, can we attain to any spiritual knowledge. And the assurance granted to us regarding spiritual things is firmer and more definite than that regarding material things. For though by faith we understand that the heavens and the earth were framed by the word of God, by faith we also know that while these shall pass away the word of the Lord will endure forever.—*S. For “The Friend.”

A Remarkable Awakening.

An extract of a letter from Jacob Grave, in the State of Indiana, to his uncle Jonathan Grave, in the State of Delaware:

“On Fifth-day, 10th of Tenth month, 1822, on my return home from the Yearly Meeting, I fell in company with Moses Hockett, from Wabash, a member of Blue River Quarterly Meeting. In the course of conversation, he gave me the following relation of a man that had been a confirmed deist, (his name I have forgotten.) One morning he said, I am sixty years old to-day, I will go to Quaker meeting. He accordingly went to the meeting. After the meeting was gathered and still, [a woman minister] arose and spoke as follows: “I am sixty years old to-day, I will go to Quaker meeting.” These words were spoken this morning (I believe) by one that is now present, whose mind is in a dreadful situation. I know not who it is. She then described his situation; and as arguments would arise in his mind, she would refute them as pointedly as if she had heard him speak them (as he afterward said), until he was entirely disarmed of them all. She then sat down and after a few minutes arose again, and stated that she had gained her point; that he or they were disarmed of the false arguments wherewith they had fortified themselves, and unless they again solicited a revival of them, they might live in the way that leads to peace and salvation.”

“On the next meeting-day he attended, and when [the same Friend] knelt in supplication he also knelt: which very much astonished the audience to see the old deist join in supplication. After meeting he made known the situation of his mind, and soon requested to be joined in membership with Friends. Since which time he has continued a sober religious Friend.

I thought the above worth penning down, which I have endeavored to do as correctly and concisely as I was capable of.

Religious Items, &c.

Presbyterians in Greece.—The Southern Presbyterians have decided to build a house of worship at Salonica, Greece, the ancient Thessalonica, for their mission.

Chinamen.—The Central Presbyterian congregation Denver, Colorado, has sixty Chinamen in its First-day school.

A Theatre-going Christian an Absurdity.—The Christian Advocate, (Methodist,) has the following item:

"Some Munchausen started a story that a play, the composition of John G. Whittier, would soon be put on the stage in Boston. The venerable poet says that 'it is a foolish lie,' and adds a very suggestive phrase, 'A Quaker playwright is an unspeakable absurdity.' A Quaker, Baptist, Methodist, or Presbyterian theatre-goer, is an unspeakable absurdity, but they can be found. Some years since a Methodist from the country visited a relative by marriage who lived in great style in the city. On his return he said to a friend, 'I think John — isn't much of a Methodist nowadays, is he?' 'Why not?' 'O, he doesn't have family prayer, ridicules class-meeting, plays cards, and goes to the theatre.' We may quote from Whittier, and say that such a Methodist is an unspeakable absurdity."

Light Reading.—The epidemic of light reading is spreading very rapidly. A friend who has hung around the cheap book-stalls, and asked questions of the venders of novels at prices ranging from five to twenty-five cents each, tells us that from two to four novels a week are bought by a number of persons large enough to insure the sale of from twenty thousand upward of any cheap reprint of an English story. Ladies and servant-girls and small boys and girls are the chief purchasers. This reading is a vice like the use of opium and its effects on the mind are hurtful.—Selected.

The Established Church in England.—R. S. Foster, a Methodist Bishop who has been travelling in Europe, publishes his impressions of the religious condition of the English Established Church, and of the hurtful effects of its ceremonial observances. A part of his remarks are reproduced here as a testimony against formalism and ritualism; though we hope the spiritual condition of the members of that Society is better than the remarks would indicate.

"The least profitable service I attended was in the great Cathedral—empty, pompous, spiritless—a form without the essence, in which most that appeared was art, without heart. The sermon did not rise above the ritualistic show; altogether it was a spectacle to make one sad. Sir Christopher Wren has left a lasting memorial of his great skill, which must continue to be the admiration of ages; but, judging by all that was visible on the [day] I attended service within its majestic walls, it may be doubted whether it has not been perverted from any valuable Christian use. England of the nineteenth century, the foremost of the Christian powers, needs something better and more worthy than a parade Christianity—a ceremonial show.

The Established Church has many noble Christians, but it has such entangling alliances as to leave it uncertain whether, on the whole, at home and abroad alike, its influence is favorable or detrimental. This may seem a hard judgment, but no one can study the whole bearings of the problem without reaching some such conclusion. This does not deny that many are benefitted even by its ritualism; but where it benefits in one direction, it harms in ten. It substitutes form for power; it nourishes pride and exclusiveness; it puts baptism for regeneration; it engenders neglect and contempt of spirituality; it harbors immorality and infidelity."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Spider-webs.—The material of which the web is made is a glutinous fluid secreted by certain glands in the body of the spider as the silk of the silk-worm is in its body. On being exposed to the air this fluid hardens. On the under side of the abdomen of the spider, near its hinder end, may be seen several small protuberances called spinnerets. Each of these is pierced with a multitude of minute openings, out of which the spider can force the glutinous fluid at its pleasure; and this hardens as it comes into the air and forms a thread from each opening. These very fine fibres unite with each other to form the spider's lines, which we see, somewhat as the separate fibres of flax or cotton unite in the formation of a rope. Thus the very finest thread of the smallest spider, is composed of numerous finer ones collected into one strand.

The strength obtained by this form of structure of the web is very great.

At this time of year the spiders are generally safely concealed, but in warm weather one can readily find plenty of living specimens, and can examine for himself the spinnerets from which the thread issues, especially with the aid of a pocket microscope; but the small openings are so minute that it requires a high magnifying power to make them visible.

Those who deal in microscopes and microscopical preparations, keep for sale among their slides specimens of the spiders' spinnerets mounted on glass. These are beautiful objects when examined with a magnifying power of 100 diameters. From each of the many small openings of the spinneret of the garden spider arises a spine-shaped hair which is really a tube, ending in a point so fine that the opening at its end is too small to be seen. From the extremities of these hair-like tubes the glutinous material of the web issues, forming the threads of which we have spoken.

African Coast Surf.—One of the peculiar dangers in landing at any place on the Gold Coast is caused by the heavy, raging surf. It is ever a wonder and a danger as it rolls in from the South Atlantic, and breaks on a thousand miles of coast without leaving a single cove or harbor where a ship could find refuge in a storm. Right along the whole line of the coast the foaming surf waves roar and bellow as they sweep toward the shore in unbroken lines of furious grandeur. On they roll with resistless swell until they reach the shore, and there they lash themselves into a maddening foam as they dash upon the unyielding, immovable rocks, and retire disbanded and broken, with scattering spray and fallen dignity, bearing their unconscious testimony to the unchangeableness of the declaration, 'gave to the sea his decree, that the waves should not pass His commandment.'

Discovery of Potatoes in Arizona.—Among the discoveries made during the botanical tour of John G. Lemmon in the mountain ranges along the Mexican frontier of Arizona were two or three varieties of indigenous potatoes. They were found in abundance in very elevated meadows, walled round by peaks 10 feet above the level of the sea. In size they did not exceed that of walnuts.

Scientific Progress in Japan.—Japan is keeping fully abreast of Western nations in the introduction of new inventions. One of the latest signs of this is the extensive use of electric light in several of the Government establishments at Yokohama.

The enthusiasm of a Naturalist.—During my very first walk into the forest at Batchelor had seen sitting on a leaf out of reach, a immense butterfly of a dark color marked with white and yellow spots. I could not capture it as it flew away high up into the forest. I at once saw that it was a female of a species of "bird-winged butterfly," the people of the Eastern tropics. I was very anxious to get it and to find the male, which in my genus is always of extreme beauty. During the two succeeding months I only saw it again, and shortly afterward I saw the male flying high in the air. I had begun to despair of ever getting a specimen, as it seemed so rare and wild; till one day, I found a beautiful shrub with large white leafy bracts and yellow flowers, and saw one of these noble insects hovering over it, but it was too good for me, and flew away. The next day I went again to the same shrub and succeeded in catching a female, and the day after a male. I found it to be as I had expected, perfectly new and most magnificent specimen, and one of the most gorgeously colored butterflies in the world. Fine specimens of the male are more than seven inches across the wings, which are velvety black and fiery orange. The beauty and brilliancy of this insect is indescribable, and none but a naturalist can understand the intense excitement I experienced when I at length captured it. Taking it out of my net and opening the iridescent wings, my heart began to beat violently, the blood rushed to my head, and I felt more like fainting than I have done with apprehension of immediate death. I had a headache the rest of the day, so great was the excitement produced by what will appear to most people a very inadequate cause.—Malay Archipelago.

A Kind Redbreast.—A little redbreast came to our doors all through the winter for his meals, and a most friendly welcome he has been. One spring morning when a robin did a deed of charity that more than ever endeared the little bird to our hearts. It had been a bitterly cold night, and our servant going down stairs to fetch some wood to light the fires, she found a poor little bird, shivering and frightened in the eaves. She called me to see the bird; it had only just left the nest, and it was so weak that it could not fly. I tried to coax it to eat, took it into the fire, offered it bread crumbs, seeds, &c., but no! the starling would not be tempted.

Breakfast time came, and with it the robin. We thought that if we put the bird out of doors its mother might con-for her lost child; then came the fear of n—he was so very pugnacious. Well, we ed it, keeping a very strict watch over the ing's safety. Robin eyed it for a moment then flew away; still the little baby-bird d on one leg shivering, and no mother ed. Presently robin came flying back, with something in his beak too. Hop, he came to where the baby-starling was ering, and popped a worm in its beak, h it opened, just as if robin had said, open mouth, here is some breakfast; and away ew, and again returned with some food e young bird, and then they both flew y. We never saw the starling again, but little robin's deed made him more loved ver in the house.—Hardwicke's Science ip.

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 3, 1883.

"The Friend" for 12th mo. 16th of last , were printed some comments on a pro- tion to employ a minister of cultivated lect to officiate in a Friends' Meeting at n, Massachusetts, with the hope that such ep would have the effect of attracting ners, and thus increase the number of bers. Believing that such a proposal ld not have been made, if there had been l appreciation of the nature and objects ospel ministry, and of the power and in- ace which leads man to seek for and ob- salvation, and which alone can build up ing Church, we think it may be profit- to some to revive at this time the account Isaac Penington gives of the early sters in our Society, and of the secret of r marvellous success in turning thousands a darkness to light, and from the power atan unto God. It must be borne in mind, Isaac Penington was a man of learning, moved in refined society, and who was and critical even in such minor points as of correct pronunciation. After speaking of the formality and dead as to the life of religion, which preceded ise of our Society, he commemorates "the ous breaking forth of the Lord" to some hom He opened the state of the people, gave them "the everlasting gospel to eh to the inhabitants of the earth, promis- them that his Spirit and power should go y with them." Those who were thus com- ioned and endowed, were not in a general persons of culture and intellect whose ts, eloquence or learning would make attractive as religious lecturers. Isaac nton says of them:— They were for the most part mean, as to outward; young country lads, of no deep rstanding or ready expression, but very e despised everywhere by the wisdom an, and only to be owned in the power of life wherein they came forth." "Their preaching was repentance, and about a t within, and of turning to that, and pro- ing the great and terrible day of the to be at hand. Wherein I confess my exceedingly despised them." "Yea, they selves were very sensible of their own ness and unfitness for that great work service wherewith the Lord had honored , and of their inability to reason with ; and so (in the fear and in the watch of their spirits) kept close to their testimony, and to the movings of his power, not matter- ing to answer or satisfy the reasoning part of man."

Very beautiful is the description which fol- lows, of the effect produced by the ministry of these poor, illiterate men, contemptible in the eyes of the wise and learned professors of that day.

"Oh, how did the Lord prosper them in gathering his scattered, wandering sheep into his fold of rest! How did their words drop down like dew, and refresh the hungry, thirsty souls! How did they reach to the life in those to whom they ministered, raising up that which lay dead in the grave, to give a living testimony to the living voice of God in them! How did they batter the wisdom and reasonings of man; making the loftiness thereof stoop and bow to the weak and foolish babe of the begettings of life! Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive, what the power of life hath wrought through them, in the hearts and consciences of those who have longed after and waited for, the Lord. Oh! the breathings and meltings of soul, the sense of the living presence of God, the subject- ing of the heart unto the Lord, the awaken- ing of and giving strength unto his witness, the falling down and weakening of the powers of darkness, the clear shining of the light of life in the heart, and the sweet running of the pure streams thereof into the enlivened souls, which hath often been known and sealed to from the powerful appearance of God in their ministry! Indeed when I have considered these and such like things in my heart, and narrowly marked them in my con- verse with them, I have been often forced to cry out concerning them, Truly here is man very weak and contemptible; but God very glorious and powerful."

As the dependence of these ministers was placed in the Lord, He was not wanting to give them all that was needful to enable them to perform the service that He required. So that the time came in which I. P. could say of the same men he had once despised, "They now abound with strength, and abundantly surpass the knowledge and wisdom both of the world, and of other professors of religion. The Lord indeed hath adorned them, putting his beauty upon them, and causing them to grow up in his strength, and in his wisdom * * making them mighty and honorable with his gifts and abilities."

It is the Light of Christ revealed in the heart of man which shows him his sins, leads him to repent and forsake them, gives him power to walk in the way of holiness, and enables him to experience the forgiveness of sins that are past through the mercy of God in Christ Jesus, our Lord. The ability of a minister to turn the attention of his hearers to this Light, to awaken them to a sense of their condition, to arouse, to encourage, to comfort and instruct in the way of righteous- ness, depends on the holy anointing, the Di- vine power which accompanies his ministry; and not on the beauty of language, grace of delivery, richness of thought, or any other of the accompaniments of culture and intellect.

We much desire that the concern expressed by the apostle Paul should ever prevail among us—that our faith should not stand in the wisdom of men but in the power of God.

We do not undervalue the proper cultivation of the intellect, or the refinement result- ing therefrom; believing them to be of great value in the transaction of our outward busi- ness, in our intercourse with others, and, when sanctified by Grace, in the performance of various religious duties. But we regard it as a serious mistake to think them essential to the exercise of a living and powerful ministry. To place our reliance on them in that work is a fatal error. Therefore, it has at times been felt to be a cause of thankfulness, that the Lord is still pleased to bestow the gift of a baptizing ministry on weak and unpolished instruments.

One of our readers, who was interested in the article on Spider Showers, in No. 22, asks, from what part of the body of the spider its threads are emitted—whether "from its mouth, or from some other factory, where the spinning, reeling, and expulsion must have been both curiously and admirably per- formed."

He may find an answer to his inquiries, under the heading "Spiders' webs," in the Natural History column of the present num- ber of "The Friend."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Both Houses of Congress have devoted considerable time in considering the Tariff bill. No vote has been taken as yet in either house.

Secretary Folger has written a letter to Speaker Keifer calling attention to the necessity for either providing more vault room in the Treasury Department for the storage of silver or else discontinuing the coin- age of the standard dollars.

Thomazin, a priest of the Chippewa Indians in Min- nesota, has been in Washington to protest against a bill introduced by Representative Washburn, of that State, for the consolidation of several tribes and their removal to the White Earth Reservation. Thomazin says the object of the bill is to enable speculators to obtain con- trol of 1,000,000 acres of pine land.

During 12th mo. 1882, the value of the exports of merchandise from the United States amounted to $92,- 960,433, or within a small fraction of $3,000,000 a day. This was exceeded but once before, viz: 12th mo. 1880. The excess of the value of exports over imports during the six months ended 12th mo. 31st, 1882, amounted to $54,572,222, as against an excess of $25,902,683 during the fiscal year ended 6th mo. 30th, 1882.

A joint resolution, submitting a Constitutional amend- ment forbidding the payment of the State Railroad Aid, Levee and Hatford bonds, has passed the Arkansas Legislature and gone to the Governor. The amount repudiated by the resolution is about $11,000,000.

Twenty-six men were killed by the powder explosion at Berkely, near San Francisco. All the bodies have been taken from the ruins. The coroner's inquest has thrown no light upon the cause of the explosion.

The Chinese companies of San Francisco, Cal., intend to test the constitutionality of the ordinance which pro- hibits the maintenance of laundries within certain limits, and the performance of labor in such places during certain hours. The intent of the ordinance seems to be to harass the Chinamen.

The Augusta Chronicle published on the 26th ultimo, gives official statistics showing the agricultural growth of Georgia, and contrasting her products of 1870 with those of 1882. According to these figures, the State shows an increase of over 200 per cent. in corn, 600 per cent. in oats, 200 in wheat, 75 in rye, 100 in Irish po- tatoes, 800 in cane and sorghum, 400 in sweet potatoes, and a similar increase in the yield of other farm and garden products. In 1870 Georgia raised 473,934 bales of cotton. In 1880 the State raised 814,441 bales of cotton, nearly 100 per cent. increase in ten years, ranking as the second producing State. "In 1882 the cotton production grew to 925,443 bales, the increase being accomplished with diminished acreage. The crop of 1880 was raised on 2,617,138 acres, while that of 1882 was raised on 2,365,425 acres. Horses have in- creased 20 per cent., mules 51 per cent., milch cows 36, other cattle 32, sheep 26 and swine 49 per cent. In 1870 Georgia had 70,000 farms in 1880 she had 139,-

000. The estimated value of farm products in 1870 was $80,000,000, in 1880 it swelled to $125,000,000.

The Albany Evening Journal estimates the present season's yield of ice on the Hudson river at 3,000,000 tons, "one of the largest harvests, if not the largest, ever taken from the Hudson."

A telegram from Lynchburg, Virginia, says the unprecedented cold weather has produced widespread destitution among the poorer classes there, "and especially among the negroes, hundreds of whom are out of employment, owing to suspension of work in tobacco factories on account of tax agitation and unfavorable weather."

On the morning of the 24th ult., an extensive "cave in" occurred in the Delaware and Hudson mine, situated in the Second Ward of Wilkesbarre. About forty acres of the mine beneath the surface went down, and on the surface cracks appeared for several acres in every direction. A number of houses settled down from six inches to two feet, causing the inmates to flee from fear of danger. No person was injured. Most of the caved in space is covered with dwellings and other buildings. The disaster is accounted for by the "robbing" of the pillars supporting the mine. It is said on the other hand that the props put in the mine several years ago to sustain the roof have rotted away. The damage to the property of private individuals is estimated at $30,000.

An advance in the prices of nearly every kind and grade of dried fruit in this market has occurred within the past few days, although the prices had been in many instances 100 per cent. higher than at this time last year. The cause is attributed to a scarcity due to short crops, and dealers expect that prices will keep moving upward until spring. The exception is peeled peaches, of which the supply seems to meet the demand at present, though a movement in this fruit is anticipated; they are now quoted at from 20 to 25 cents. For unpeeled peaches, which were abundant this time a year ago at 3 a 3½ cents for quarters, 7 a 8 cents is the price now asked, with a corresponding advance in rates for choice Georgia and North Carolina grades. The same remarks apply to dried apples, which quoted but a few days ago at 6½ a 7 cents for four quarters, and were obtainable at half those prices this time a year ago, and are stiff at 8 a 8½ to 12 for fancy sliced apples. Blackberries and raspberries are exceedingly scarce and high, and pitted cherries are almost a blank. Large dealers express the opinion that the advance is not an artificial or speculative one, but due to the scarcity of dried fruits. The market for green fruits, such as oranges, bananas, &c., is without special feature, the supply and prices being about ordinary.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 398, which is 9 less than for the previous week, and 36 less than for the same period last year. Of the whole number 206 were males and 192 females: 63 died of consumption; 35 of pneumonia; 30 of diphtheria; 16 of old age; 14 of debility; 14 of apoplexy; 10 of typhoid fever; 10 of Bright's disease and 8 of scarlet fever.

Cotton.—There was no essential change to notice in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 10¾ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ a 7¾ cts. for export, and 8½ a 8¾ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in fair demand and firm. Sales of 2300 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.50 a $6; Pennsylvania family at $5; western do. at $5.25 a $6, and patents at $6 a $7.50. Rye flour is quiet but firm at $3.87½ per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was dull and rather lower. Sales of 3900 bushels red in car lots at $1.08 a $1.16½. Rye is nominal. Corn is in moderate request and firmer. Sales of 8500 bushels, in car lots, at 62 a 70 cts. Oats are quiet and weak. Sales of 9000 bushels, in car lots, at 46 a 51 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 1st mo. 27th, 1883.—Loads of hay, 302; loads of straw, 48. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1 to $1.10 per 100 pounds; mixed, 90 cts. to $1 per 100 pounds; straw, 65 to 75 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in fair demand and prices were rather higher: 2500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4½ a 7 cts. per lb., as to quality.

Sheep were a fraction higher: 10,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 6½ cts., and lambs at 4 a 7½ cts. per pound, as to condition.

Hogs were in demand, and 25 cts. per 100 pounds higher: 4300 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 8½ a 10 cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

FOREIGN.—A steamer reported wrecked near Swansea on the 27th of 1st month, proved to be the Agnes Jack, bound for Sardinia, with lead. The witnesses of the disaster, who were unable to render any assistance, saw the crew, numbering 12 men, swept one by one from the mast. The steamer was out of the reach of rockets and unapproachable by boats. All hands perished, including the captain, who, it is believed, stripped for the purpose of swimming ashore.

The trial of twenty-one persons charged with a conspiracy to murder Government officers, is in progress at Kilmainham, Ireland.

Reports have reached Sligo, Ireland, of deaths by starvation in the island of Innismurray, off the coast of the County Sligo. A gunboat has been sent with provisions for the inhabitants.

Crofters on the Island of Barra, Scotland, have seized upon grazing land belonging to other persons, and are in communication with the crofters on the Isle of Skye. A settlement of the question between the land-owners and the crofters at Glendale, Isle of Skye, is expected, as arbitration has been decided upon, and thus there will be no necessity of sending another expedition of police to serve processes—such as was recently repulsed.

The heaviest floods that have occurred in the British lake district for twenty years now prevail. Lakes Derwentwater and Bassenwaite are joined, and a portion of Keswick is submerged.

An order has been made for the voluntary winding up of the Honduras Inter-Oceanic Railway Company.

Paris, 1st mo. 27th.—At a Cabinet council to-day the Ministers decided to accept the compromise between the Government and the Committee of the Chamber of Deputies on the question of excluding pretenders, based upon M. Fabre's proposal, which prohibits pretenders from exercising the elective function. Admiral Jaureguiberry then resigned. General Billot, Minister of War, announced that he should oppose the measure, but consented to remain in office provisionally, in order to avoid a Ministerial crisis. The committee, on being informed of the resolution of the Cabinet, agreed by a vote of 6 to 5 to support Fabre's proposal. Marcotte then resigned the post of reporter of the committee. Fabre, who was chosen in his place, was instructed to submit the report to the Chamber of Deputies before the close of to-day's sitting.

Fabre's proposal is a reproduction of the Government bill, with the additional clause prohibiting pretenders from exercising the elective function.

Paris, 1st mo. 27th.—Midnight.—Duclerc declines to accept Fabre's compromise, and insists upon the retention of the Government's proposals in their original form. He communicated his decision to-night to President Grevy and Ministers Fallieres and Deves. It is asserted that Gen. Billot shares Duclerc's views.

Paris, 1st mo. 28th.—The Ministers met at the Elysee this morning and tendered their resignations, which have been accepted by President Grevy.

London, 1st mo. 29th.—The Times, in a leading article this morning commenting on the resignation of the French Ministry, says the news is of a most momentous character. Even its immediate consequences cannot at once be divined. The resignation of the Cabinet exhibits a catastrophe which threatens the political arrangements of the country and renders the substitution of a more powerful Ministry a matter of exceeding difficulty.

The Berlin correspondent of the Morning Post states that the cost of realizing the proposal of the Bi-Metalists to recoin the silver of Germany is estimated at 20,000,000 marks.

The Berlin correspondent of the Morning Post says the visit of De Giers to Vienna has resulted in a complete understanding between Russia and Austria on the leading political questions, and also in the arrangement of the differences regarding the navigation of the Danube.

Some miles south of Rome has been discovered an ancient aqueduct six feet high, and varying in width from one and a half to two and a half feet. Its line has been followed for several hundred metres from north to south, and then eastward along the side of an ancient grotto, until a point was reached where it divided into two branches. The earth having fallen in at that point it could be followed no longer. Scratched inscriptions were found upon it, one of which mentioned a year and Consul corresponding to the end of the second century of our era.

A letter from Manila states that a disease which is not contagious, has broken out in the Philippine Islands, but that all who are attacked with it succumb in a few hours.

The Government organ of the Mexican State of Chiapas publishes a long article on the choleraic disease which has ravaged that State, and has not yet disappeared. The General Government is asked for assistance, want and misery being prevalent where the disease raged. Sanitary cordons confined the disease to the hot region. It is said that "whole families died a single night. On some plantations there are three or four people left alive. The town of Tuxtla has 8000 inhabitants, 600 of whom are dead. Of the 100 in Tonola, upwards of 1000 are dead. The town of Chiapas suffered most severely, twenty to thirty perishing daily."

NOTICE.

A meeting of the Teachers' Association of Friends Philadelphia, will be held on Seventh-day, Second 3d, at 2.30 P. M., at the Boys' Select School, 820 Chestnut St. The subjects to be discussed are Written Examinations and Methods of Teaching Geography; and other time permit.

The attendance of Friends interested, is invited.

The claims of Sir Edmund Plowden to be regarded as an historical personage have been tested, and his work and character understood. "As late as 1784—5," says Judge Kent, "a person named Charles Varlo came to Philadelphia claiming to have an interest in the Palatinate, and enlisted that able jurist James Rawle in his behalf, making some among the holders of lands once claimed by Plowden by reason thereof. One faithful and industrious antiquarian of that day, John H. Johnson of the city just named, made the matter a specialty, bringing his knowledge and experience to the purpose to accomplish what so many others had failed in; but at last despairing of success he pronounced the whole matter a fabrication, and Sir Edmund Plowden an imaginary being." This was the day of "Notes and Queries," and the publication of the results of delving among ancient records of the mother country and sister colonies. Recent research has resulted in bringing to light much information respecting this hitherto by some esteemed historical personage, and his existence and claims are found upon record, the authenticity of which is unquestionable.

In 1632, before the grant of Maryland to Lord Baltimore, Plowden and others petitioned for a grant of Long Island and thirty square miles, to be called Syon. In another petition this is called Isle Plowden, and designated as "near the continent of Virginia, at sixty leagues northward from James River, without the Bay of Chesapeake," and at thirty leagues square of adjoining continent as the nature of a county Palatine, by the name of New Albion, to be held of his majesty's crown of Ireland, &c. One month after the grant of Maryland was given to Cecil, the Lord Baltimore, King Charles I. ordered that the request of the petitioners be denied.

For Leonard Calvert and his "overwhelmingly Protestant colony," as the Jesuits accompanied it declared it to be, sailed for the Chesapeake, captain Thomas Young received a special (dated 23 Sept. 1633) commission from the king to fit out armed vessels on voyage to Virginia, and take possession, in the king's name, of all territory discovered, not yet inhabited by any Christian people, establish trading posts, with sole right of trade, and to make such regulations as were necessary to establish civil government. In the spring of 1634 this exploring expedition departed, having as lieutenant Robert Evelyn, a nephew of Captain Young. Their object was to explore the Delaware or Charles river, as it was called, out of compliment to the king, and to ascend it until they should reach the great lake which was said to be its source, and to find the Mediterranean sea, which the Indians reported to lie four days' journey beyond the mountains. Captain Young found obstructions to his explorations in the Falls of Delaware, near Trenton, on 1st of Sept. 1634. He remained in the Delaware river until the fall of 1636, having sent Evelyn with despatches to England. Evelyn returned to Virginia next year, and became one of the councillors and surveyors of that colony. At this time his brother George Evelyn came to Kent island, Maryland, as the agent of the London partners of William Clayborne, and produced no little stir in this settlement, which was a rival of that of Lord Baltimore. He seemed to have visited Kent to sow discord, impoverish the people, and blast the prospects of those who had befriended him. Having succeeded in placing Kent island in the hands of the Marylanders, his mission appears to have ended.

When Robert Evelyn was in England, in 1635, Edmund Plowden was disquieted through family quarrels, and persisting in denying his wife her alimony, was thrown into Fleet prison, where he lay in May, 1640, and was in no condition to advance his interests in New Albion, hence Evelyn's desertion of his cause. About the close of 1641 Plowden came to America, and after remaining seven years returned to England. He is described as harsh and of ungovernable temper, and a pest to his neighborhood. About this time he left the Church of Rome and conformed to the Church of England. This act destroys the historic accuracy of the late attempt to show that New Jersey was colonized by Catholics,—a fiction set forth by a writer in The Catholic World, of Nov. 1881. A previous attempt had been made to show that Maryland was settled by a colony of two hundred persons, chiefly Roman Catholics, but the publication of the records of the English Jesuits proves that they themselves declared the colony to have been "overwhelmingly Protestant."

Robert Evelyn again returned to England, and in 1641 wrote "Directions for adventurers and true description of the plantation of New Albion, in North Virginia," &c. This he addressed to Plowden's wife, and therein states that, "Sir Edmund, our noble governor and Lord Palatine, persists still in his noble purpose to go to his plantation on Delaware or Charles river, just midway between New England and Virginia, where my uncle Young and I several years resided." He describes Sir Edmund's patent as extending "from the north side of Delaware unto Hudson's river, just between New England and Maryland and that ocean sea, I take to be about 160 miles." In 1637, and again in 1642, "A Description of Albion," appeared by one styling himself Beauchamp Plantaganet, who, revising his former work and adding the later results of his extensive travels, came again before the public in 1648. In this last edition he reprints Evelyn's letter, and sets forth the wonderful qualities of the region he desired to render attractive to the adventurers he hoped to draw to the colony of New Albion. A unique copy of this work is in the Philadelphia Library, and has elicited so much interest that it has been reprinted by Peter Force, at Washington, in 1837, and again in the "Evelyns in America," Oxford, 1881.*

In chapter III. of this curious book may be found a detailed description of New Albion, which the author calls part of "North Virginia lying between about 39 degrees at Delaware Bay, and situate in the best and same temper, and as Italy, between too cold Germany, and too hot Barbary; so this lying just midway between New England, 200 miles north, and Virginia 150 miles south, * * * is freed from the extrem cold and barrenness of the one, and heat and aguish marshes of the other, and is like Lombardy, and a rich fat soil, plain, and having 34 rivers on the

* "The Evelyns in America," lately printed but not published, contains a reprint of Plantaganet's New Albion, and also presents us with a new issue of the Memoirs and Letters of Capt. W. G. Evelyn, and accounts of Capt. George and Robert Evelyn, who were prominent in the early days of Maryland and Virginia. The extensive appendix, beside other matter, contains valuable documents preserved in the Evelyn, Montresor and Harcourt families, to which the editor and annotator has had access through the liberal kindness of their representatives. This beautiful work so highly creditable to its projector, our former townsman, G. D. Scull, now resident at Oxford, England, is adorned by autotype illustrations of Wotton House, once the residence of the excellent John Evelyn, who by his "Sylva, or a Discourse on Forest Trees and the Propagation of Timber," "did more than any earlier writers to promote and strengthen that taste for rural occupation among the enlightened classes which has happily become a national characteristic."

The "Evelyns in America" was privately printed, 250 copies only have been issued, but is accessible at some of our public libraries.

It is gratifying to observe that one American gentleman, resident abroad, has employed his leisure and talents in the services of his country, instead of dancing attendance at operas and theatres, or pursuing a round of dissipation and empty and unsatisfying amusements, falsely called pleasures. "The most common error of men and women is that of looking for happiness somewhere outside of useful work. It has never yet been found when thus sought, and never will be while the world stands; and the sooner this truth is learned the better for every one. If you doubt this proposition, glance around among your friends and acquaintances, and mark those who appear to have the most enjoyment in life. Are they idlers and pleasure-seekers or earnest workers?"

main land, and 17 great isles, and partaketh of the healthiest aire and most excellent commodities of Europe, and replenished with the goodliest oaks, and all timber for ships and masts * * after 17 years trading and discovery there and trial made, is begun to be planted and stored by the Governour and Company of New Albion." In chapter iv. follows a detailed description of the New Albion Patent, which seems to grow as it is again and again described. It now appears "the bounds is a thousand miles compasse of this most temperate rich province, for our south bound is Maryland north bounds, and beginneth at Aquats, or the southernmost or first cape of Delaware Bay, in 38 and 40 minutes,* and so runneth by, or through, or including Kent Isle, through Chisapeack Bay to Pascataway, and including the falls of Pawtomecke river to the head or northernmost branch of that river, being 300 miles due west, and thence southward to the head of Hudson's river fifty leagues, and so down Hudson's river to the ocean sixty leagues; and thence by the ocean and Isles across Delaware Bay to the south cape fifty leagues; in all seven hundred and eighty miles." A very vague description of an estate, the reader may remark, but he will remember that the entire region was a wilderness of forests, swamps, mountains and valleys impenetrable, and that the great rivers and the ocean could alone be made available as land-marks, as they remain to be the best to this day. When we consider the difficulties under which he labored, we may esteem Plantaganet's outline description and characterization of the country and its climate worthy of commendation. We know that he had found the choicest lands on the Atlantic coast, and a climate that we would not exchange for that on either our northern or southern borders. That the explorers remained long enough in New Albion to become well acquainted with the character of the climate and its healthiness is apparent, since the description conforms so accurately with what we know at this distant day must have been their experience.

Gleanings from Quaker Annals.

In the year 1723, died Alexander Seaton, who was born in the shire of Aberdeen, about the year 1652. He was one of those students of the University of Aberdeen, who joined the Society in consequence of being convinced of the scriptural rectitude of their principles, when they were publicly advocated by Robert

* E. F. Slafter has recently shown that the early latitudes of places on the Atlantic coast are generally untrustworthy to within a single degree; that anterior to the middle of the 18th century the minutes or fractions of a degree are never to be relied upon. The sources of the errors of latitude are to be found in the rudeness and coarseness of the instruments then in use, which were graduated to degrees only; one degree occupying about one-tenth of an inch of space, which was not subdivided into sixty parts or minutes, and necessitating a dependence for minor divisions of the degree should be upon an absolute and sheer guess. The zodiacal ephemeris, moreover, was not graduated in minutes, and consequently the exact point of the sun in the zodiac could not be determined. The tables in connexion with this instrument, moreover, were not calculated oftener than once in thirty years, so that they became obsolete long before they were put by reason of the precession of the equinoxes. These sources of inaccuracy have led to several interesting geographical and historical questions which early accuracy would have wholly prevented.

Barclay and George Keith, against the sophistry of his fellow-collegians. The candid confession which he published under his own signature, at the end of the account of this controversy, is not unworthy of perusal: it is as follows: "I also declare, (who, being a student at that time in the Old Town College, was present at the dispute, and heard the same with attention,) that the students, in their account, have grossly belied the Quakers in many things. And although since that, it hath pleased God to join me unto that people, yet at that time I had no mind to be of their way. However, when I saw their account, I did approve it, as ingenuous as now also I do; and disapprove the students', as false in many things.—Alexander Seaton." While we are given to understand, that the bright example set before him in his relations, Alexander Forbes and wife, under whose roof he lodged while attending college, had previously had some favorable effect on his mind; yet, it is clear by the above language, he was by no means prepared to acknowledge the religious views of Friends, until after this public exposition of them had taken place.

Thus nobly beginning to confess Christ, the Truth, before men, while yet about 23 years of age, he grew and became established in Him, so that, cleaving to His all-sufficient grace, the persecution and close imprisonment, which shortly after became his portion, only served to enlarge his experience of the power and goodness of God towards him. Being thrust into Aberdeen jail, he was soon called upon, it is said, in rather a remarkable manner, publicly to give testimony by the word of exhortation, to that which had wrought so effectually in him. He is represented to have been a sincere and weighty man, of good understanding and solid judgment; a faithful, zealous, and sound minister of Jesus Christ; especially exemplary in humility and lowliness of mind, living in peace and unity with his friends, well esteemed likewise among his neighbors. He used daily to devote some part of his time to religious retirement; and, although a scholar, was not much known to be such in his public ministrations, valuing that learning but little in comparison of the cross of Christ and the operation of his Holy Spirit. After his marriage, from a sense of duty, he removed to Glasgow, where the few Friends in that city were undergoing some sharp trial, as well by abuses from the magistrates, as from the rude rabble. Here his faithfulness and constancy were further put to the test, and proved of considerable use, both in comforting and strengthening his friends, and overcoming the malice of their enemies. At length, in 1699, he settled with his family in Ireland; and it appears that his character and services were, in several respects, much appreciated by the Society in that land.

In the latter part of his life, after various exercises and labors in the gospel of his Redeemer, he was visited with much bodily affliction. He bore all with remarkable patience, and before he left the world uttered these comfortable expressions. On one occasion, his family being about him, he said, "Do not put off repentance and amendment of life until the time of a dying bed; for, commonly, it hath enough to do for itself. The Lord hath been very good to me, even from my youth, and hath followed me with his goodness, and never left me in the time of difficulties:—his presence is near; and is manifested to me, that when my departure comes, it shall be in peace. The Comfort is near, and will endure, while these afflictions will have an end." To some Friend who came to see him—"I have partaken the earnest of that joy, which will never have an end: my Rock, my Fortress, my strong Tower, dwelleth with me, and does not let me nor forsake me; blessed be his name, hope to be with Him forever,—and that more than a thousand worlds. There is a mansion of glory prepared in my Father's house; said Christ, 'There are many mansions; if it had not been so, I would have you'—there has been a discovery of a mansion of glory!" Some Friends coming to meet him, he observed, "Job hardly put to it, and his friends were all taken, in that they did not believe, that the Lord did afflict man without a sinful cause."

Sometimes being much pained with his order, he would say, "Lord! give me strength, or take me to thyself! O Lord! patience; sustain and support me under thy sharp afflictions: let the lifting up of my hands be as the evening sacrifice, accept unto thee! O Lord! thou art my Rock—shadow of a mighty rock in a weary land. The Lord hath promised to be with his children through the region of the shadow of death, and to bring them to a lasting eternity where there is joy for evermore." Again addressed those about him—"The Lord has been good to me from my childhood: He bore to place his fear in my heart very early. The Lord never fails those who trust in Him: He will be with them to death, and through death unto eternity. Fear God, and serve Him; prefer his fear above all things, and he will provide for you." Some little time before his decease, several Friends who had been at meeting, coming in to see him, after a season of silence, and one present had spoken a few words, Alexander, being very much broken into tears, said, "It is the invisible power that supports under affliction: Men endure, as seeing Him that is invisible."

His distemper was tedious, and at times exceedingly painful, but he was preserved to the last, and in great peace and quietness, yielded up his earthly being, concluded in exchange for an endless inheritance, on the 23rd of the 1st month, about 71 years of age.

The Queen and Governess.—The following anecdote of Queen Victoria is from the pen of Grace Greenwood: When in England I have heard several pleasant anecdotes of the queen, and her family from a lady who had received them from her friend, the governess of the queen's children. This governess, a very interesting young lady, was the orphan daughter of a Scottish clergyman. During the first year of her residence at Windsor her mother died. When she first received the news of her mother's serious illness, she applied to the queen to be allowed to resign her situation, feeling that to her mother she owed even more sacred duty than to her sovereign. The queen, who had been much pleased with her, would not hear of her making this sacrifice, but said, in a tone of most gentle sympathy, "Go at once to your mother, child; stay with her as long as she needs you, and then come back to us. Prince Albert and I will hear ren's lessons; so in any event let your be at rest in regard to your pupils." The rness went, and had several weeks of t, mournful communion with her dying er. Then, when she had seen that dear laid to sleep under the daises in the kirk-, she returned to the palace, where the iness of royal grandeur would have oped her sorrowing heart beyond endur- had it not been for the gracious woman-mpathy of the queen—who came every to her school-room—and the considerate ness of her young pupils.

Seeking Out Inventions.

o learn from Wisdom "that God hath o man upright; but they have sought out y inventions." The lesson here taught at human inventions sometimes lead from and uprightness. Man was created in image of God, holy and upright, but he fallen from his original state of purity holiness into the ways of darkness and n. Alas, for the inventions that have devised to improve upon the perfect physically, intellectually, morally, as me from the hands of his Creator! As ere were many mistakes made in the ion of the "human form divine." The ead Indians compress the forehead in ey; the Chinese women compress the while even in enlightened and Chris- zed nations, some are unwise enough to press the vital organs by tight lacing. o would fail me to tell of the precious ls, the paints and cosmetics and other les employed in beautifying (?) and other- adorning (?) the human form: with refer- to which we may again quote from lom: "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity." e great plan of salvation has been instil- and given to man in all its simplicity purity, sufficient for every son and daugh- f Adam, so plain that the wayfaring man, gh a fool, need not err therein; and yet ns have been the inventions sought out n man to devise and climb up some other until religion has lost much of its power, worldliness has prevailed over many;— gh pure religion changeth not, neither s with the world.

hile we live in an age of progress and ovement, adding much to the happiness prosperity of man, yet many inventions een sought out that do not add to the n's welfare. Adulterations have been ed in nearly every article of merchandise, lothing, food, &c. Railroad and other polies have been planned. Fraudulent rpeities under the cover of the law have contrived, and thousands of other in- pus and deep-laid plots to rob and defraud ty, until honesty and integrity have been ight of by many, in the grand march of ress and improvement.

ith this introduction, dear Friends, I now e the subject home to you. You are a and peculiar people; among the foremost e varied sects in upholding the principles ace, friendship, plainness, integrity, tem- ee, charity and truth; and in advocating licity and purity in worship, doing away all needless forms and ceremonies, wor- ing God in spirit and in truth, and pro- ing "Holiness to the Lord." With all the s that may have been put forth in the

"seeking out inventions" to improve upon the principles of Quakerism, as laid down by Fox, Barclay, Penn and other of its noble founders, I ask, what has been gained there- by? Has the denomination improved in its power for good? Has any attempt to add a little here and take away a little there, or in any way to change or alter or find some easier way, been productive of any real benefit? True, it may not be necessary in this latter day to follow the early Quakers in all the non-essentials which belonged to the customs of ancient times and localities, and did not arise from their religious principles; but we must be firm in retaining all the real essentials, as plainness of dress and speech, worshipping the Lord as the Holy Spirit may direct, and observing a straightforward, honest, consistent Christian life, in word, thought and deed.

A tree is known by its fruits, and we know the fruits of old-fashioned Quakerism by the way men lived, and by the way they died. If its principles are founded upon the Truth, any inventions and additions will be like adding dross to pure gold. If the religion of the founders of Quakerism has so gloriously saved them, it will save us and gain for us as for them, a ready passport to the skies; for thus saith the Lord: "Stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls."

Greene, N. Y., 1st mo. 18th, 1883.

Making a Show Falsely.

While it is true that one's real character is liable to be disclosed by a single glimpse of his face, of his conduct, or of his possessions, there are very few who are willing to be known just as they are; who do not want to appear to somewhat better advantage than the bald reality would justify.

Only a Cromwellian vigor of independent manhood makes one ready to stand out on the canvas in his rugged naturalness, and be judged by his face, with its blemishes and defects—"great wart" and all—truthfully exposed to view.

"Paint me as I am," said Cromwell—
Rough with age, and gashed with wars—
Show my visage as you find it;
Less than truth my soul abhors."

The commoner wish was satirically suggested by Fitz Greene Halleck, in a conversation with the writer concerning a well-known engraving of famous American authors, when that was in course of preparation. "They wrote to me from New York, a few days ago," said Mr. Halleck, "asking what picture of myself I would prefer to have copied for that engraving. I wrote back to them to pick out the best-looking picture of me they could find, and improve on that. I am not desirous of a good likeness; but I do want to be shown as a good-looking man. Fifty years hence it will make very little difference with those who look at that picture whether my portrait looks like me; but it will make a great deal of difference to my reputation whether I appear there to advantage." That is the way that most men feel about their pictures, whether they say so or not. The more an artist flatters them in their portrait, the more they think of his skill.

And what are all the cosmetics used for, if not to make claim to another face than one's own? Enamel and rouge and hair-dyes are designed to deceive as to one's expression and age. They are not like replaced teeth, or a mechanical substitute for a lost limb—a matter of usefulness as well as of restoration; nor are they like added hair in the dressing and adorning of the head. They are specifically designed to remove, or to conceal, the lines of character and the traces of experience in one's face; or to give the appearance of other years than one's own. And for this very reason it is that these appliances have always the show of deception. A whitened forehead or a painted cheek is never natural or pleasing. The more refined and delicate the face, the greater the harm to its expression from anything that covers or conceals its natural complexion; or that suggests the thought of an acted anachronism.

Even in church-building, this striving after a reputation above one's deserts shows itself in the planning and finishing of houses of worship far beyond the ability or the readiness of the congregation to make payment. Every church mortgage or church debt is an evidence of the builders' purpose of making more of a display of devotion and generosity than their contributions would justify. For their own satisfaction, or for the deception of other people, they have insisted on putting up and furnishing a building which they do not pay for, but which—with its frescoing and its mortgage—is to honor the Lord, and reflect credit upon their large-heartedness. To have a less imposing sanctuary would humble their pride. To lift a mortgage would cost too much. The alternative is a church debt, and a fresh lesson in deceitful appearances.

It is a good sign that all want to appear well. There is an element of hopefulness in the very proneness of men to crave a good reputation even while they lack a good character. As Rochefoucauld puts it: "Hypocrisy is a sort of homage that vice pays to virtue." A professional thief prefers to be called a "kleptomaniast"—as the amateurs are. He doesn't like the old Saxon term "stealing" for his business. And the average liar in the community wants to be spoken of as a man with an active imagination, who is not always exact in his statements. But, after all, it is a great deal better to seek to deserve well, than to strive to appear well. And it is a great deal safer also; for in the long run men and women are rated at what they are worth. Their manipulated photographs do not make them any better looking. Their cosmetics and dyes offend more eyes than they deceive. Their sanctuary pretences blind neither God nor man. Their church mortgage harms their good name more than it helps. Their conduct is judged by its nature, rather than by any name which is given to its most objectionable features. God has so ordered it that men are constantly stepping into testing scales in the presence of the public, and showing just how far they fall short of the standard of absolute right.

"If there is anything bad about you, tell it yourself," is a pungent saying of the Talmud, in suggestion of the folly of attempting to conceal your true character from your fellows. Or, as our Lord gave the warning: "Beware ye of the heaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy; for there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed; neither hid that shall not be known."—S. S. Times.

Religious Views and Tenets.

I believe that the same God that said in the beginning, "Let there be light and there was light," has made ample provision through the light of the glorious gospel of his dear Son, for the restoration and redemption from the effects of the fall, of all mankind. His love is unbounded. God so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son, &c. And He now shines in our hearts, in the new creation, to give us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face, or appearance of Jesus Christ. He is now the life and the light of men. But the darkness does not comprehend it. But "while we have the light, we must believe in the light, that we may be the children of light." For it is "the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." "Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart." For "in thy light shall we see light." And this same Jesus, who once spoke to the outward ear, while on earth, now speaks spiritually to the inward ear. And to all who have an open ear to hear, and a willing heart to believe and obey the Word, it becomes the power of God unto their salvation. And if they escaped not who refused to hear Moses, the old lawgiver, when he "spoke on earth, much more shall not we escape if we turn away from Him that speaketh from heaven." And while I believe that this inspeaking Word of faith is, upon the broad basis of the gospel, preached to every intelligent creature under heaven; and as it is revealed from faith to faith, bringing life and immortality to light, it becomes the power of God unto salvation to all who obey it. Yet I believe it is hid from the wise and prudent of this world—from the mighty and noble; because their faith stands more in the wisdom of men than in the power of God. Therefore He leaves them to their choice, but sends spiritual leanness into the soul. The heavenly light and life that enables us to see and do heavenly things, must come from the heavenly fountain. And the spiritual man must receive his supplies from that before he can be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might. The machinery of the various churches (ours not excepted) seems to run heavily. It needs the anointing oil of divine grace to make it run smoothly. It needs the energetic power of the gospel to propel it forward through the rubbish of the world. The mere cultivated intellect of man, though he may have the tongue of an angel, and "also ordinances of divine service and a worldly sanctuary," yet without the baptizing power of Christ and his gospel, it amounts to nothing towards raising the sin-sick soul from earth to heaven. The polish of man may cause the church machinery to glitter more brightly before a deluded world, and lead its votaries onward, in a self-confidence, towards what Milton calls "the Paradise of fools." But it only leads to bewilder, and dazzles to blind. All is not gold that glitters. Every thing that is true has its counterfeit. It is said that "Babylon is built in the likeness of Zion, but by another spirit." It is said that the leaders of the people in old times, caused them to err, and destroyed the ways of the ancient paths.

There is a ministry now threatening to lay waste our goodly heritage, and which I fear is increasingly current amongst us; that if not checked, will tend to fill the minds of the hearers with things like "the abomination of desolation," spoken of by Daniel, that would fain stand in the holy place where it ought not, making it destitute of vital religion, and true spiritual Christian worship. And why? Because the living faith is too much departed from, and faith in the wisdom and worship of man substituted. A portion of the ministry which we now have palmed off upon us for the gospel, appears to be mainly from the power of man instead of the power of God.

The temple at Jerusalem had great splendor and show of "a worldly sanctuary." So it was thronged with people. But Jesus told the Jews that it was left to them desolate, or destitute, not of people, but of the living presence of the living God. The holy shechinah no longer dwelt there—the cherubim of glory had departed, "Ichabod" might have been inscribed upon it. And all because they had departed from the faith of their forefathers, "Who through faith wrought righteousness, had trial of cruel mockings and scourgings; yea, moreover, of bonds and imprisonments." Some may think these are hard sayings, who can hear them? But if they are not true, then the Lord has not spoken by me. I believe the times demand plain dealing. We need faithful watchmen on the walls of our Zion. And if they give not the alarm in times of danger, the woes of the Lord will be upon them. But if a deaf ear is turned upon the warnings, his servants will be clear. It does seem to me that the abominations which are now making so many of our meetings destitute of the presence of the Lord, are set up and standing in the place of true Christian religion and worship in many places. So that the living Word can no longer have free course and be glorified. The harps of many of the true mourners in Zion appear to be hung, as it were, upon the willows in the midst of the rivers of Babylon, or streams of confusion.

It is with the heart that man believeth unto righteousness, while it is only with the mouth that confession is made. And confession may be made with the mouth while the heart is far from the Spirit of God. The difference between a heart religion and a head religion, is as great as light is from darkness. The one is from the earth, and is earthly; the other is from heaven, and is heavenly. The one kindles up an earthly life in the earthly or impulsive man. The other fans up the heavenly flame in the heavenly minded man. Spiritual death and darkness, and the abomination that makes desolate are abroad in the land. But life and immortality are brought to light by the gospel. Christ is the resurrection and the life. He is the first resurrection by raising the soul from death to life. Blessed is he that hath part in Christ, the first resurrection. On such the second death hath no power. The first death is the separation of the soul and body. The second death is the separation of the soul from God. The first introduces the Christian into eternal life—to a joy unspeakable and full of glory. The second forever banishes the sinner from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.

After all that can be said of material and intellectual advantages, it remains true that moral causes lie at the root of the greatness of nations.—Lecky.

Balance Sheets.—An honest balance sheet consists of a true statement of assets, and liabilities, and accurate footing. It then shows what the person or firm, whose accounts represented, is actually worth. A dishonest sheet shows only what the maker of it intends that it shall show. This is the time of year when business men make an estimate of the profits or losses of the business of the year, and determine what to change in the policy, in order to make more or lose less in 1883 than in 1882. It was said of a certain merchant that he never took an account of stock, and that when asked why, he answered, "It makes no difference. I owe no debts, I own all that I have." Yet it did make a difference, for he allowed large quantities of dead stock to accumulate, and neglected through partial knowledge of what he had in hand to improve the best opportunity to dispose of many things.

Morally, a man may be very far astray; think himself in the right path. It was in prayer for which every one has a reason, when the man of God cried, "Who can understand his errors? Cleanse thou me from secret faults."

It will not do to say, "I have no debts; I own all that I have, and no examination is necessary." In a religious way, every man is an agent; he is doing business on borrowed capital. His Lord is now gone into a country, but will return and demand an account of his stewardship.

Several items should be taken into the account by Christians. A man should ask himself, Have I, during the past year, allowed an evil habit to get or keep control of me? This question, honestly answered, might terrify some of our readers, like a sharp pain at the heart. Have I been fair and just in my business transactions, or been dishonest in little or much? Have I been liberal in proportion to my prosperity, or do I give less as I get more? Have I been faithful to my family, left my children to themselves, under pressure of business engagements? Have I prayed in secret and communed with God? Has my religion been a mere Sunday parade? Have I earnestly co-operated with the Church in its efforts to save men? Are my thoughts more or less upon the world, more or less upon Christ and spiritual things than before?

Where does the Sin Commence?—To drink deeply—to be drunk—is a sin; this is not denied. At what point does the taking of strong drink become a sin? The state in which the body is when not excited by intoxicating drink is its proper and natural state; drunkenness is the state furthest removed from it. The state of drunkenness is a state of sin; at what stage does it become sin? We suppose a man perfectly sober who has not tasted a thing which can intoxicate; one glass excites him, and to some extent disturbs the state of sobriety, and so far destroys it; another glass excites him still more; a third fires his passions, loosens his tongue, inflames his passions; the fourth increases all this; a fifth makes him foolish and partially insane; a sixth makes him savage; a seventh or eighth makes him stupid—a senseless, degraded mass; his reason is quenched, his faculties are for the time destroyed. Every noble and generous and high principle within him withers, and the image of God is polluted and defiled! This is sin; "for drunkards shall not inherit the kingdom of God." But where does the sin lie? At the first glass, at the first step towards complete intoxication, or at the sixth, seventh, or eighth? Is not every step from the natural state of the system towards the state of stupid intoxication an advance in sin, a yielding to the unwearied tempter of the soul?—John Bright.

A FOGGY MORNING.

BY CLARA DOTY BATES.

Selected.

A small, close world it seems to-day,
With fog about us, chill and gray,
As if had giant spiders spun
Their webs between us and the sun;
Nor any wind had strength to stir
Their leagues on leagues of gossamer.

Dim shapes of elm and locust wait,
Like shadowy sentinels, at the gate,
They outline 'gainst the ghostly white
The utmost limit of our sight;
There is no street, no passer-by,
No spire, no mountain-peak, no sky.

And yet a strong wind rushing forth,
With cool fresh breath from out the North,
Would part this cobweb veil in twain,
And bring the sweet world back again—
The blue of sky, the fervid sun,
And all bright things he shines upon.

As these gray mists, so doubts arise,
Vague, yet with chill to blot the skies;
A power to shadow and efface,
To shut the soul in narrow space,
Impalpable, and yet so vast,
That all the world is overcast.

But let the word of truth be sent,
The dreary folds are shaken and rent;
Again beams forth the blessed sun;
Again the world's blithe work goes on;
Hope brightens as the barriers fall,
And God's blue sky bends over all.

MAD RIVER, IN THE WHITE MOUNTAIN.

BY HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW.

TRAVELLER.

Why dost thou wildly rush and roar,
Mad River, O Mad River?
Wilt thou not pause and cease to pour
Thy hurrying, headlong waters o'er
This rocky shelf forever?

What secret trouble stirs thy breast?
Why all this fret and flurry?
Dost thou not know that what is best
In this too restless world, is rest
From over-work and worry?

THE RIVER.

What would'st thou in these mountains seek,
O stranger from the city?
Is it perhaps some foolish freak
Of thine, to put the words I speak
Into a plaintive ditty?

TRAVELLER.

Yes; I would learn of thee thy song,
With all its flowing numbers,
And in a voice as fresh and strong
As thine is, sing it all day long,
And hear it in my slumbers.

THE RIVER.

A brooklet nameless and unknown
Was I at first, resembling
A little child, that all alone
Comes venturing down the stairs of stone, Irresolute and trembling.

Later, by wayward fancies led,
For the wide world I panted;
Out of the forest dark and dread
Across the open fields I fled,
Like one pursued and haunted.

I tossed my arms, I sang aloud,
My voice exultant blending
With thunder from the passing cloud,
The wind, the forest bent and bowed,
The rush of rain descending.

I heard the distant ocean call,
Implying and entreating;
Drawn onward, o'er this rocky wall
I plunged, and the loud waterfall
Made answer to the greeting.

And now, beset with many ills,
A toilsome life I follow;
Compelled to carry from the hills
These logs to the impatient mills
Below there in the hollow.

Yet something ever cheers and charms
The rudeness of my labors;
Daily I water with these arms
The cattle of a hundred farms,
And have the birds for neighbors.

Men call me Mad, and well they may,
When, full of rage and trouble,
I burst my banks of sand and clay,
And sweep their wooden bridge away,
Like withered reeds or stubble.

Now go and write thy little rhyme,
As of thine own creating,
Thou seest the day is past its prime;
I can no longer waste my time;
The mills are tired of waiting.

For "The Friend."

A Contrast.

"Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding."—Prov. iii. 13.

In the summer of 1876, a friend at whose house I was visiting said to me, "Do you ever visit the sick who are sick in soul as well as in body?" "O yes," I replied, "when I feel that I am sent." "Then," she said, "while you are here I would like you to go with me to see one who will never rise from her bed." The matter was not mentioned again, but it so remained with me that, two days later, I alluded to it myself, and in the long twilight of a hot day we went. A walk of three or four blocks brought us to the spacious dwelling, the luxury of which impressed you ere you had entered it. The bell was answered by a servant, whose soft tread and hushed voice indicated the presence of suffering in the house. We ascended the stairs and were shown into the apartment where the sufferer lay. I cast my eyes casually about as I entered. Nothing seemed wanting to complete the rich appointments of the room.

But, in the midst of this abundance, what a sight met my eyes! Partly reclining on the bed was the panting, bloated, dropsical one whom we had come to visit. As we entered she turned her white face and extended her hot waxen hand toward us, saying, "I am so glad you have come again Mrs. R., and who is this you have brought to see me?" "Some one who, I thought, might help explain some of those things of which we were talking when I was here last," explained my friend. Her remark at once introduced the theme of greatest moment to us all. But how can I give my readers any idea of the frame of mind in which we found the sufferer? It seemed simply negative, blank darkness. She "was not sure there was a God, because if there was, why did He permit such disorder as was seen all around us?" She had "little idea there was a future," and "could not see how we were so satisfied that there was a soul to live on and on forever." To her, "death seemed the end of all things." She appeared quite inclined to talk, and was courteously kind, showing in every thing the world's culture and polish. She was very willing to listen, too, and asked a great many questions. Still, I could see that while she listened courteously, she yet steeled herself against the replies, and was really easting about for an argument to overthrow what was said to her.

O, how my heart yearned that she might see light in his light! and to Him I silently sent up this cry which He answered by appointing me with the spirit of prayer. I rose and stepped to her bed-side, and taking her hand in mine said, "I believe there is a God who is a dear, kind Father to all who will come to Him and permit Him to adopt them into his own royal family, that thereby He may bestow upon them eternal riches and an inheritance that fadeth not away. And I believe that God and Father loves you and is now yearning over you with a tenderness of which you have no conception, longing to fold you in his tender embrace and bear you close to his heart across the cold stream, that its waves may not chill you, and into an eternal and beautiful city, where you will know neither pain nor sorrow nor sighing, I shall have to go now soon, and I cannot talk longer to you, but I want to kneel just here by your side and speak to Him before I go. She made no resistance, and still holding her by the hand I knelt and poured out my desire to Him who, in his own way can make darkness light. Presently her hand began to tremble, and a low sob attested that she was hearing the voice of the Spirit as it talked with her own soul. When I rose from my knees I stooped over and pressed a kiss on her brow. Her eyes were still closed, but I saw the tears coursing down her cheeks. I beckoned my friend to be silent, and we slipped away without a word, leaving her in communion with One who, if she would but commune with Him of "all that was in her heart," could answer all her hard questions for her, and speak peace to her soul. Three weeks later she cast off the earthly house of her tabernacle, and with the words, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," departed to abide in that "building of God, a house not made with hands." But O, what a short space she had left in which to learn the many lessons that every soul needs to know! But we turn to another picture.

A few months later in the same year, when the snow lay on the earth, I was among the mountains, and at the close of a meeting a young girl said to me, "I would be so glad if you would come and see my grandmother; she is very ill." "O, yes, I said, "I will go;" and so I asked the friend who had taken me to the meeting to drive that way. And how shall I describe the contrast between this and the former picture? We stopped before an humble little dwelling of but three or four rooms and were ushered into a plain, low room, on the floor of which was a well worn rag carpet, and scattered about were a few chairs, while a table stood near the wall. In a corner of the meagre room stood a bed on which lay an aged one, but as her grand-daughter brought me to her bed-side she turned her soft eyes upon me with a look of such melting tenderness as I shall never forget. I smiled and said, "well, you are almost home." "O, yes; and what a beautiful home it is!" and her face shone with the glorious light of its Sun. "I cannot read now, but as I lie awake in the night I recall the descriptions given us of the home prepared for them that love Him, and it seems so real." As we talked on I quoted to her the promise, "The Lord will strengthen him upon a bed of languishing; thou wilt make all his bed in sickness." "O yes," she said; "how beautiful that is! and what a soft, tender hand is his, and his touch so gentle, as He soothes and comforts in the time of pain and suffering!"

I never was so struck with the bright, beautiful, cheerful, child-like simplicity of a christian life as while by that bed-side, where one seemed to breathe the very air of a heavenly presence. And I thought, ah, this is as it should be. He is not an "austere man," a "hard task-master," binding upon us burdens grievous to be borne. It is our own wilfulness binds the burdens upon us, and one of its worst burdens is the burden of fear. But this yoke had been taken from off her neck, and she was free in Christ, and I felt as one who might sit at her feet and learn. As I look back at it now it seems to me the most cheerful room I ever entered. There was no fear of death, for death had "lost its sting"—death was "swallowed up in victory."

I read a portion of Scripture to her at her request, she making comments now and then, and when I had finished she said, "it has been a good while since I have been able to read much myself, but I read the Bible much when young, and committed much of it, and now it comes to mind in the nights when I can't sleep, and I see so much new meaning in it that I am constantly refreshed and strengthened."

I could go on and write much of her conversation, if it would not occupy too much space; but before I close I want to say a word to the young, in love to whom I have chiefly written this. I wish they might be helped to see, by the contrast of the two pictures given, that a Christian life is not the dark, sombre thing they have been so wont to picture it. Which of these two was in the dark, and consequently in unrest? Ah, in that humble home soon to be exchanged for a glorious mansion, there was a light and joy that far outweighed in value any home of luxury that earth can give, for there comes a time when the trappings of earth fail to satisfy. It is written, "As ye sow, so shall ye reap," and how it was exemplified in the two cases! One had sown the seed of doubt and unbelief, and the harvesting left her garners bare of light. The other had, in the morning of life, "ere the evil days come," begun to sow in confidence and trust the seed of truth, and now her harvest was so full of peace and joy that all who came in her presence felt the exaltation and triumph of its influence. May I entreat you, seek the same "Wisdom." "She is more precious than rubies; and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her." W.

Philadelphia, 1st mo. 19th, 1833.

I have thought that true religion consists more in the condition of the soul than in devoted Christian labor. It is true that from a heavenly condition of soul good works must flow, but good works [in the common acceptance of the term] may be performed without this heavenly condition; so we have to pray for the fresh and repeated anointing of the Holy Spirit, that by his grace we may be enabled to use all the gifts bestowed, in a manner which may be pleasing to our dear Lord, and promotive of his glory. I am persuaded that it is when actions have become the outflow of the new nature, that they have a leavening influence on those around,—an influence which is real, though often unperceived by those who exert it." Hence the necessity of what, alas, in a long life of much activity, I have been deficient in, of seeking more earnestly to be rather than to do. I write this, fully believing that the doing will follow the being, and the most effectively; and in a deep sense we are indeed unprofitable servants, if servants at all, and that our only rest is in the mercy of our God in Christ Jesus.—Christine M. Alsop.

Religious Items, &c.

Religious Condition of Germany.—Berlin is a great city, the proud and beautiful capital of a great empire. It has grown immensely in beauty and importance under the empire, and takes rank with the first capitals of the world; but brings to view, in a concentrated form, the great evils which inhere in the civil and religious fabric of the empire itself, which are portentous and alarming, and which may culminate disastrously in possible contingencies which may arise suddenly. Take a fact which is just now attracting the attention of thoughtful statesmen. There are about 1,300,000 in the capital of this great Christian power. To meet the religious wants of this vast mass of population, there are but forty-nine places of worship, with a sitting capacity of not more than 75,000; and in a public meeting to consider the religious wants—broadly the religious problem of to-day—no less an authority than Christlieb declared that probably not more than 50,000 attended divine service, and not more than 10,000 children were gathered in [First-day] schools; that is, not more than one in 20 comes under any proper church care.

I asked several thoughtful gentlemen, some of them well-known beyond Germany, and occupying positions which enable them to speak understandingly, to give me their view, both of the significance and course of this sad state of things, and of its inevitable outcome if not soon remedied. I asked, specifically, was it indicative of prevailing infidelity? The answer in each case was prompt and confident, "No." There are violent infidels, but the masses are not so; it is mere indifference. I asked, then, what is the explanation of such wide-spread indifference? Here the answer was confused. That the educated mind of Germany has been saturated with doubt cannot be disputed; that it has debauched the masses to a greater or less extent is equally certain; but I do not believe that real infidelity is widely diffused. The present condition of things can be fully explained without that supposition. There is doubt and indifference, of which the Church is itself possibly, the chief and direct source. There is disaffection and actual infidelity, traceable, probably, to the same cause. Neither the doubt and indifference, nor the infidelity and disaffection, are to be attributed to convictions resulting from investigation. The debate has not gone against Christianity. Nothing is more certain than this, and hence there is no occasion for fear of the issue.

The Church, by being the creature of the State, has bartered away or neutralized all her spiritual power, so that it is no longer in the proper sense a Church, and, by usurping the place of a Church, leaves the nation without one. Any faith that survives is despite the enslaved Church, and any hope for a reform must spring from without the Church. I will name the reasons for this view.

1. The State undertakes to provide for the spiritual care of the nation, (1) by providing for the place of worship, (2) by indirectly regulating the instruction, (3) by procuring the instructors, (4) by determining the times and seasons, and all this by sanction of law and taxation.

2. The theory is established, that baptism administered to the infant, initiates him in the Church, and the sacraments are saving.

3. The people are left to feel that they are not responsible for what is done or left undone and that in any event their salvation is secured by the magic of their connection with the Church.

4. The support of the Church, being by taxation, awakens opposition, and creates a sense of personal obligation in the premises.

Given these data, it is not difficult to show a nation nominally Christian may be practically pagan; how doubt and disaffection should inoculate the best mind, and indifference and neglect seize all the rest. When religion degenerates into a form, and sacraments become magical, common sense revolts against it, and educated mind repudiates. When it becomes the creature of the State, it sinks both into a superstition and contempt. Taxation for such an ecclesiasticism becomes oppression, and awakens hate. The priests of such a system become creatures of hire. The ignorant will retain faith in the magic, but cease to have an interest in the meaningless farce, and look on as indifferent spectators. No Church has a right to exist and call itself Christian under such conditions.

The State machine that has brought about the sad state of the nation will never, except by revolution, remedy it. To make the Church alive, it must be composed of living members; to awaken an interest in it, it must cause the individual to feel some personal relation to it, and some personal responsibility with regard to its work. It must be a community of real believers and partakers of the divine life before it can propagate the divine life.—Bishop Foster in Chris. Age.

The Reformed Episcopalian Synod at Chicago adopted a resolution in reference to the First-day of the week, in which they speak of rest from labor, and the cultivation of the spiritual faculties as a protection against materialism and degradation; and recommend their members an avoidance of all unnecessary labor and a rigorous exclusion from the houses of what are called "Sunday papers."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Flowers Changing Position with the Sun. While the fact that sunflowers turn their faces towards the sun in its course during the day is as old as our knowledge of the plant, I am not aware that any record has been made to the time of night that they turn to the east again after their obeisance to the setting sun.

One evening during a short stay at a villa in Colorado, in the summer of 1881, I took a walk along the banks of a large irrigation ditch just as the sun was setting. The variety [of sunflower], Helianthus annuus, grew abundantly there, and I observed that the broad faces of all the flowers were, as al in the clear sunset, turned to the west. turning by the same path less than an hour onwards, and immediately after the day gone, I found to my surprise, that much greater part of those flowers had already shed their faces to the east, in anticipation of the sun's rising.—C. A. White in Nature.

Infection from Funerals.—Where funeral services are held in private houses, it is a common thing for the undertaker to provide chairs or camp-stools. These are carried from house to house, and are liable to become carriers of infection.

The ice boxes in which the dead are laid until the time of burial comes, are still more liable to carry the germs of disease.

Where death has resulted from infectious diseases, whatever has been used at the funeral should be carefully disinfected before being again used.

Marine Roots.—The most extraordinary trees of the Batchian forests are a kind of fig, the aerial roots of which form a pyramid near a hundred feet high, terminating just where the branches out above, so that there is no trunk. This pyramid or cone is formed of roots of every size, mostly descending in straight lines, but more or less obliquely—and crossing each other and connected by cross branches, which grow from one to another, as to form a dense and complicated net-work.—Wallace's Malay Archipelago.

Language in Wasps.—At breakfast time, the pieces of the white of egg were left on the plate. A wasp came in at the window, after flying about for a while, alighted on the plate, went to the piece of egg, and tried to carry it off. Wishing to see what the insect would do, I would not allow it to be disturbed. After several unavailing attempts to lift the piece of egg, the wasp laid it down and flew out of the window. Presently another wasp came in, flew direct to the plate, picked up the piece of egg, and in some way either contrived to get it out of the window. These were evidently the first wasp and a companion whom it had fetched to help it. I had a kind of suspicion that when the wasps reached their home they would tell their companions of their good fortune, and I put some more egg on the plate and waited. In a very short time wasp after wasp came in, went to the plate without hesitation, and carried off a piece of egg. The number of wasps was so regular that I was able to trace them to their nest, which was in the ground about half a mile from my house.—J. Wood.

Submarine Life.—Passing up the harbor of Amboyna, the clearness of the water afforded one of the most astonishing and beautiful sights I have ever beheld. The bottom was lately hidden by a continuous series of corals, sponges, actiniae, and other marine productions, of magnificent dimensions, varied colors, and brilliant colors. The depth varied from about 25 to 50 feet, and the bottom was uneven, rocks and chasms and little hills and valleys, affording a variety of stations for the growth of these animal forests. In and among them moved numbers of blue and red and yellow fishes, spotted and banded and striped in the most striking manner, while at orange or rosy transparent Medusae floated along the surface. It was a sight to be at for hours, and no description can do justice to its surpassing beauty and interest. Once the reality exceeded the most glowing accounts I had ever read of the wonders of a coral sea.

The fishes of Amboyna are perhaps unrivalled for variety and beauty by those of any one spot on the earth. Dr. Bleeker has given a catalogue of 780 species found at Amboyna, a number almost equal to those of all the seas and rivers of Europe.—Wallace's Malay Archipelago.

The Great Comet of 1882.—The comet is about disappearing from the gaze of the unaided eye. It will yet be followed for months by the telescope, for the sake of the accurate determination of its orbit. It is rather disappointing to know, after the dire predictions concerning it, not only that it did us no harm, but that it is certain not to return for hundreds, perhaps thousands of years. It has given us much new data, from which some of the mysterious questions of the physics of comets may be settled; but at present these seem only to deepen the mystery. That it passed unusually close to the sun, and swept around it with great rapidity, requiring but about three hours to pass through 180 degrees of its orbit; that it followed closely in the tracks of the comets of 1843 and 1880; that its orbit is an immense ellipse, very much flattened with the sun close to one end, and the other end billions of miles beyond the orbit of distant Neptune; that when near the sun its active gases contained sodium in a glowing state, but that latterly the active constituents are carbon and hydrogen united as in the blue inner part of the flame of a candle, are the facts which have been learned concerning it. That it is not a return of the comets of 1843 and 1880, and that it will, therefore, not come again in a few months and plunge into the sun, causing unimaginable trouble; that the atmosphere of the sun did not delay its velocity appreciably, also now seem to be certain. The computation of its orbit, based on observations since perihelion and applied to positions previous to that time, do not show that it was moving in one orbit before, and another after, passage through the solar atmosphere. There is, doubtless, some reason why the three comets follow each other in the same track. That reason may be found in the fact that they are portions of one great comet, shattered in past ages by an internal explosion, as Biela's was, and scattered along its track.

One interesting and unique observation comes to us from Cape of Good Hope. Late in the afternoon of 9th month, 16th, two observers were watching the comet close to the sun's limb, at about the time of its greatest intrinsic brightness. They found it was approaching the sun's limb with considerable rapidity, and that, even when in the same field of view as the sun, it could be distinctly seen. One of the observers says: "By keeping the sun's limb at the edge of the field, I was able to follow the comet right into the boiling at the limb. I lost sight of it suddenly at 4h., 50m., 58 sec., Cape mean time, when the sun's limb was boiling all about it." The observers did not know at the time whether the comet was passing behind or in front of the sun, but they scanned his face carefully to see any traces either as a dark or a light spot. We now know that the comet passed in front of the sun, and the failure of the observers to see anything proves either that it was equally bright with the sun's disk, or that its solid matter was so slight as not to intercept any appreciable amount of light.—I. S. in Ledger.

Our Reserved Forces.—The human heart beats about seventy times in a minute. When any great effort is required, it may run up to more than one hundred beats without any injury, if a person is in good health. Here is a reserved force of one-third.

In ordinary respiration, only about one-third of the lungs is required. The other two-thirds are reserved for speaking, running or any great exertion.

Without these reserved forces, we could accomplish nothing beyond the daily routine of life. With these forces properly applied, what mighty results have been acquired!

There is nothing that destroys the reserved forces of man more generally than the use of intoxicating beverages. These increase the frequency of the pulse so that the man who drinks a pint of whisky or other strong alcoholic beverage will have his heart beating 125,000 pulsations in twenty-four hours, instead of 100,000 which is the healthy standard, and in this one item he loses almost all his reserved force.

The use of tobacco also exhausts the reserve forces and leaves man less able to accomplish the work that he ought to do and could do if he maintained the highest standard of health.—Ledger.

Artificial Fruit.—The London Times says that it is a mistake to suppose that fruit is absolutely necessary to the manufacture of preserves. A visit to a large jam-producing factory, showed that the work was being carried on without the aid of fruit at all. Jams of various kinds were being produced—currant, plum, strawberry, apricot, raspberry and gooseberry. Yet neither currant, plum, strawberry, apricot, raspberry or gooseberry was in the building. Turnips served the purposes of the fruit. The flavoring matter was extracted from coal-tar, and the resemblance to raspberry and strawberry jam was further produced by mixing the boiling compound with small seeds of some cheap innocuous herb. A common cheap sugar is used, and this is the only honest ingredient of the mess. These preserves are offered as made from "this season's fruit."

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 10, 1883.

In the article on Pennsylvania History in No. 25 of "The Friend," there is printed what purports to be a letter from Cotton Mather, recommending the interception of William Penn and his company on their way to this country.

When this pretended letter was first made public some years ago, we rejected it as a fabrication, because it did not seem to us to carry on its face the evidence of being genuine. Our impression of its character has always remained about the same. But as the article in which it appeared in our columns was written by one whose literary and historical knowledge far surpasses our own, we did not like to cut it out without communication with the author, which, at the time, we had no opportunity of having. We therefore simply appended a note expressive of our doubt.

Since then we have received information from one of the officers of the Pennsylvania Historical Society, which satisfies us that our doubts were well-founded, and that the letter was really written, within a few years. Reference hereupon may be had to the printed Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society for Sixth month, 1870, in which evidence as to the non-authenticity of the paper is given.

We make this correction, because we are very desirous that the columns of "The Friend" may ever continue to be a reliable source of information to its readers.

The receipt of an obituary notice of a Friend who deceased about 18 months ago, leads to the expression of the desire that, in such cases, the relatives or friends would promptly forward to the Editor the requisite information.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement shows a decrease of $13,636,883 in the First month. The Secretary of the Treasury has issued a call for fifteen millions of extended fives.

The Post-office Appropriation bill, on the 30th ult., was reported back with the Senate amendments, and some of them were concurred in, others being rejected. Among those rejected were the amendments appropriating $185,000 for the continuance of the special mail service, and designating the 1st of 7th month next as the date when the reduction of letter postage to 2 cents shall go into effect.

Major Dewees has been ordered to Fort Reno by General Pope, to prevent intruders from settling on the ceded lands in Oklahoma. The "Walden Colony" left Oklahoma on Sixth-day last week, for the ceded lands, and Captain Payne, with 400 followers, was to start from Arkansas City on Seventh-day.

A mass meeting, under the auspices of the National Indian Association, was held in this city last week. Herbert Welsh and others made addresses, and a petition asking Congress to grant to the Indians the same rights of property and education now enjoyed by the white race was adopted.

Professor Hilgard, of the Coast Survey, is going to the South Sea Islands to observe the eclipse of the sun.

The Board of Education of New York city have finally decided to close the colored schools after the 1st of Fifth month next. They say these institutions have been maintained at a heavy expense, and, as the colored people do not avail themselves of their advantages as freely as was expected, it would be worse than useless to continue them. The question now arises, what is to be done with the colored children who will thus be turned adrift? The preponderant popular feeling here has always been against mixed schools, but now that the feeling, or prejudice, is confronted with a question of dollars and cents, it may possibly think better of it.

There is much excitement at Warsaw and Leroy, New York, over the large salt productions developed in that region. A telegram from Rochester says: "Hundreds of barrels are daily being manufactured from two wells at Warsaw. Agents of Syracuse, Auburn and Canadian syndicates are on the ground to make large purchases of land and sink wells. Over 1000 barrels of salt have already been shipped from Warsaw to Buffalo, and hundreds of barrels to other points east of here."

Destructive floods have occurred in Pennsylvania and Ohio, caused by the melting of ice-gorges and recent rains.

The Wytheville (Va.) Dispatch says that the extent to which the scarlet fever is spreading throughout the Valley of Virginia is appalling. About a month ago it broke out near Staunton, and has since reached that city, and spread to such an extent that many of the schools have been forced to close.

A disease among horses, ending in pleuro-pneumonia, and frequently resulting fatally, is reported to prevail in Rochester, New York.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 417, which was 19 more than during the previous week, and 16 less than for the same period last year. The number of males was 216, of females 201: 72 died of consumption; 36 of pneumonia; 24 of old age; 19 of diphtheria; 15 of small pox; 13 of typhoid fever, and 9 of scarlet fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 104½; 3½'s 104; 4½'s, registered, 112½; coupon, 113½; 4's, 119½; currency 6's, 132.

Cotton.—There was no material change to notice in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 10¾ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ a 7¾ cts. for export, and 8½ a 8¾ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in fair demand and firmly held. Sales of 2200 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.50 a $6.50; Pennsylvania family at $4.75 a $5; western do. at $5 a $5.75, and patents at $6.25 a $7.50. Rye flour is firm at $3.90 a $4 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is in better demand and a fraction higher. Sales of 4000 bushels red in ear lots at $1.08 a $1.18. Rye is nominal. Corn is in fair request and stronger. Sales of 8500 bushels, in ear lots, at 57 a 68 cts. Oats are quiet but firmer. Sales of 9000 bushels, in ear lots, at 46 a 51 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 2d mo. 3rd, 1883.—Loads of hay, 362; loads of straw, 73. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 95 cts. to $1.05 per 100 pounds; mixed, 90 to 95 cts. per 100 pounds; straw, 60 to 70 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle continue in fair demand at about last week's prices: 3000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4½ a 7 cts. per lb., as to quality.

Sheep were dull, owing to the large receipts: 13,000 head arrived and sold at 3 a 6¾ cts., and lambs at 4½ a 7½ cts. per pound, as to condition.

Hogs were dull and unsettled: 4000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 8 a 10 cts. per lb., according to quality.

FOREIGN.—The trials of the Irish prisoners at the Kilmahnam court house has not yet been concluded. The Times, reviewing the circumstances of the agrarian difficulty in the Isle of Skye, says an accident at any time may open up a new and more bitter phase of the controversy. The Government has refused the request of the authorities of Inverness for military aid to execute legal processes in the Isle of Skye.

A meeting of the Channel Tunnel Railway Company on the 31st ult. approved the bill and instructed the directors to proceed and endeavor to obtain the consent of Parliament to the enterprise. This is a rival scheme to that of Sir Edward Watkin, and provides that the exit of the tunnel shall be three and a half miles inland from Dover.

During the excavations in connection with the construction of the new drainage system, at Brentford, in England, a large number of antiquated horse shoes of various shapes were found embedded in the gravel at a depth of eight feet. Antiquarians in the district suppose that they are the shoes of the cavalry horses which took part in the battle fought at Brentford in the year 1642, during the war with Charles I. and the Parliamentary party.

Still another important Canal is talked of in Europe. By it is contemplated nothing less than the separation of England and Scotland by a waterway from the Solway Firth to the River Tyne. An engineer is at present working on the surveys, and estimates are promised for early publication. This canal would have a length of only eighty miles, or twenty miles less than the Suez. It would, of course afford a very convenient short cut across the country for ocean steamers. Some forty years ago a scheme of the same kind was talked of.

The preliminary investigation in Prince Jerome's case has been concluded. The Court of Indictments will probably decide by the end of the week whether or not the case should be proceeded with, and in what manner. The printer of Prince Jerome's manifesto has been fined 400 francs. During the removal of Prince Jerome to Auteuil a strong guard was placed to prevent his escape. No visitors are allowed to enter the asylum where he is placed. It is stated that the Prince has become very much dejected.

A Paris despatch to the Exchange Telegraph Company says a report is current that the Orleans Princes have drawn up a manifesto in which they protest against the charges made against them, and declare their readiness to sacrifice their personal interests for France. It is stated that, should a necessity arise, they will publish the manifesto, and at the same moment quit the country.

In the French Chamber of Deputies, on the 1st inst., Fabre's compromise bill was passed by a vote of 343 to 163. The bill prohibits the Princes from filling any civil or military post; empowers the President to expel them; and imposes a penalty of one to five years imprisonment for the violation of a decree of expulsion. The Soir anticipates that there will be a majority of fifteen votes against the bill in the Senate. Public uneasiness is increasing. The impression prevails that the army does not like the expulsion bill. An intimation to this effect has been conveyed to President Grévy.

Switzerland has rejected the Naturalization Treaty proposed by the United States, according to which nationality is forfeited by residing for a certain period abroad, on the ground that this clause of the treaty is contrary to Swiss law.

The Danes are conducting a vigorous war against drunkenness in their capital, Copenhagen. The number of public-houses are to be reduced from 1350 to 70. No showily dressed girl is to be allowed to stand behind a drinking bar. Landlords are forbidden to sell out drink to any person under eighteen years of age, male or female, or to any one already under the influence of drink. A drunken person is to be conveyed to his own dwelling in a cab or covered carriage at the expense of the landlord in whose house he took the glass.

A Berlin despatch says the Emperor William is suffering from a severe cold, and will be obliged to remain indoors for several days. His condition creates considerable anxiety. A later despatch reports the Emperor considerably improved.

Prince Bismarck's illness, although not dangerous, attended with much pain, and will confine him to room for several weeks. He is subject to fits of depression, when he declares that his life has been a failure, that he has never made any one happy, neither himself, his family or the nation at large. "If it were not me," he once said, when in a despondent mood, "the world would have seen three great wars less, and eight thousand who died in their bloom might have lived, and how many parents, brothers, sisters and wives would have been spared their grief and tears!"

A serious railway accident has occurred in Hung Six cars fell down a steep mountain. Seven women and some men were killed, and many persons were injured. The accident happened on a railway running up hill to the Salgo and Tarjanato coal mines. The line is constructed on a principle similar to that of the Rigi railway. Some of the teeth of the engine wheel broke, and the train, which contained a number of miners and women, began to recede, gaining a fearful velocity. Most of the miners jumped out in time to save their lives. The seven women who were killed remained on the train.

The Ansonia, a large Italian steamer, has been wrecked on the coast of Tripoli. Twenty of the crew perished. The rest of the crew and the passengers were saved.

A Berlin despatch to the St. James' Gazette says: "Gierns, on resuming the direction of the Foreign Office, issued a circular to the Russian Representatives explaining that the result of his personal exchange of opinion with the German, Austrian and Italian Foreign Ministers was satisfactory, and tends to the preservation of peace. The Vestnik (newspaper) says a famine exists in the Government of Kherson, Russia.

Cetewayo has been reinstated as King of Zulul. About 5000 Zulus were present at the ceremony. Most of the Chiefs expressed great dissatisfaction at the conditions on which he was restored.

the Projected Palatinate of Sir E. Plowden.

the author or assumed author of the "Debation of New Albion," has been ridiculed revealed as a landless adventurer, an idle re-vate and pennyless tramp, and some have scrupled to add a reckless romancer; but ingenuous reader of his book will, I believe, that the story of Sir Edmund Plowden's has been made known, unite with us in rding to Plantaganet the merit of sincere entions and fair statement. That he had a great traveller appears from his pre-also a diligent student of all books on English colonies, and an enquirer among my seven knights and gentlemen employed me, the oldest and boldest traveller, to see all English Plantations, by warrant to buy in the healthiest and best for us eight and for a hun-water, but there * * and chiefly in New England they related of the excellent temper

sheltered off the North-west winds and blasts, vallies of grapes, rich mines and millions of Elks, Stags, Deer, Turkeys, Fowl, Fish, Cotton, rare fruits, Timber and fair plains, and clear fields, which other Plantations want, thus excelling all others; and finding it lay just midway between Virginia, too hot and aguish in the blasted plains, on one side, and the cold New England on the other, and in the same situation of Naples, the Garden of Europe; after one hunting voiage and  60 miles on one side of Albion, and 310 miles on the other side, and Long Isle, finding the countries better and pleasanter than related,
I made my addresses to the Lord Governour of Albion, and having obtained under the Province Seal my grant of my Manor of Belvill, containing 10,000 acres, * * * I resolved to return to Holland, and to transport my friends, where went happily the second time meeting his Lordship and perusing by his noble favor all his cards and seaman's draughts, huntings, tradings, &c. * * In fourteen days having, with the two former books printed of Albion, 1637 and 1642, made a full abstract and collection agreeing with my own view and in the Depositions and M. Evelins and other voiajers of Virginia and New England, I thought it most necessary for the good of all the company and many volunteers in Holland, distressed in England * * to publish this my labor, &c."

Plantaganet had evidently travelled in the region afterwards known as Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and was thus the earliest eulogist of

"That delightful land which is washed by the Delaware's waters,
Guarding in sylvan shades the name of Penn the apostle."

His outlines of New Albion include all of

New Jersey, three-fourths of Delaware, half of the eastern shore of Maryland, nearly all the remainder of that State, all of Pennsylvania east of the Laurel Hills and a line drawn north-eastward to the head of the Mohawk and Hudson river proper, which would include most of the State of New York, a right royal domain, and the choicest territory on the Atlantic border.

It is interesting to observe the liberal views professed by Plantaganet and those who fostered the undertaking to plant New Albion.
His language is of the Protestant stamp and not of the Roman Catholic, and is said to correspond to that held by the Virginia Puritans who, with their leader, Thomas Harrison, settled in the Valley of James River, but afterwards agreed with Lord Baltimore to move to the shores of the Chesapeak Bay, on condition that they should enjoy the free exercise of their non-conformist religion. Similar language was afterwards embodied in the oath of office of 1648, and the act of 1649 of the Maryland Legislature. In his garrulous and we may say sprawling English, he writes:
"But it is material to give a touch of Religion and Government to satisfy the curious and well-minded Adventurer. For Religion is being in England yet unsettled, several Translations of Bibles, and those expounded to each man's fancy, breed new sects. I conceive the Holland way, now practised, best to content all parties; first by Act of Parliament or Grand Assembly, to settle and establish all the Fundamentals necessary to salvation—as the three Creeds, the Ten Commandments, Preaching on the Lord's day, and great days,
and Catechising in the afternoon, the Sacrament of the Altar and Baptism. But no persecution to any dissenting, and all such as to the Walloons free chapels; and to punish all as seditious, and for contempt as Bitter, rail and condemn others of the contrary; for this argument or persuasion all Religion, ceremonies or Church-Discipline, should be acted in mildness, love and charity, and gentle language, not to disturb the peace or quiet of the Inhabitants, but therein to obey the Civil Magistrate."

That Sir Edmund projected a colony on the banks of the Delaware is plainly apparent from many existing documents, English, Dutch and Swedish. In 1642 he appears to have sailed up the Delaware and visited the Fort given over by Captain Young and Robert Evelyn.
His claims to sovereignty were resisted by John Printz, who arrived the following year at Fort Christina (Wilmington). In the Colonial Records of New York it is stated that in the time of Director Kieft and General Stuyvesant, a certain Englishman calling himself Sir Edmund Plowden, pretended that the country on the west side of the North river, as far as Virginia, was his property under a grant of King James of England, and that he, Plowden, having been offended by John Printz on the South river, "he would take an opportunity of resenting and possessing himself of the South river." [Delaware.]

Governor Winthrop records in his journal, 1648: "Here arrived one Sir Edmund Plowden, who had been in Virginia about seven years. He came first with a patent of a County Palatine for Delaware Bay, but wanting a pilot for that place, he went to Virginia, and there having lost the estate he brought over, and all his people scattered from him, he came hither [Boston] to return to England for supply, intending to return and plant Delaware if he could get sufficient strength to dispossess the Swedes." To further his cause he probably employed a fellow-adventurer who styled himself Beauchamp Plantaganet, to write and publish the "Description of New Albion." This name a writer in the Gentleman's Magazine of Aug. 1840, admits to be fictitious.

The settlement made by the pioneers of Plowden's colony was at Fort Eriwomeck, which is recognized as situated at the mouth of the Penshaukin. This fort was so named from an Indian Sachem, Chief of the Amarrongs settled thereby. Here, as early as 1633, with thirteen others, they traded with the Indians, and are said to have worked an unprofitable gold mine. For four years a trading post was kept up here by the English, until 1637, when it was occupied by a Swede. After the expulsion of the New Albion subjects in 1642, the lands embraced in their claim in New Jersey were cause of controversy between the Dutch governors of New Amsterdam and the Commissioners of the United Colonies of New England.

In 1634, and again in 1640, a colony from New Haven, Connecticut, attempted to settle in Salem county. "Now for choice seats for English," says Plantaganet, "Wahessit [Salem] first, where were seventy English, as Master Miles deposeth, he swearing the officers there to his Majesties allegiance and to obedience to your Lordship as Governour, being twenty-one leagues up Delaware Bay in Charles river." This was undoubtedly the New England settlement at Salem already referred to under notice of the predecessors of John Fenwick. Perhaps the acknowledgment of Earl Plowden incensed the Dutch, who appear to have driven the colonists away. Encouraged by the terms of a subsequent treaty between Governor Stuyvesant and the Connecticut authorities, the New Haven adventurers again, in 1651, attempted to settle on the Delaware, but stopping at New Amsterdam (New York) they were arrested by the treacherous Stuyvesant and compelled to promise to return home. The Dutch threatened to resist any English encroachments upon the South river, even to the shedding of blood. It must be borne in mind that the Dutch were then and had long been masters of the sea.

(To be concluded.)

Zion's Herald furnishes us the following beautiful memorial incident of the home of one of New England's gifted writers: "The relation between Lydia Maria Child and her husband was very tender. For twenty-two years they lived alone, without a servant, in their humble but pleasant home in Wayland, Mass. Once, when he said to her, 'I wish for your sake, dear, I was as rich as Cræsus,' she responded, 'You are Cræsus, for you are king of Lydia.'

For "The Friend."

Gleanings from Quaker Annals.

About this time, (1668), Lilius Skene, wife of Alexander Skene, one of the magistrates of Aberdeen, a woman held in high estimation there for her religious attainments, and especially by George Meldrum the minister,* was brought under a great concern of mind to join herself in society with the despised Quakers. A material circumstance attending her conviction merits observation. While her mind was deeply exercised in a serious inquiry after the way of Truth, she found her progress impeded by notions and prepossessions against that people, industriously instilled by the preachers into her mind, and into the minds of others of their hearers; as, that they denied the Scriptures, and did not pray in the name of Jesus. This impediment was removed in the following manner. She happened to be taken ill, and kept her chamber, in an apartment under the same room where Barbara Forbes dwelt. Barbara Forbes, was an individual particularly favored of the Lord, endeavoring to live in communion with Him. She had found her way into fellowship with the Friends, having measurably arrived at that difficult attainment, which Alexander Jaffray desired for her—namely, that she might behave and quiet herself as a child that is weaned of its mother. At her house, the Friends were accustomed occasionally to meet, so near to the apartment of Lilius Skene, that she could distinctly hear what passed. Attentively listening on one occasion, she plainly heard two English women exercised both in preaching and prayer, whose lively testimonies she observed to be full of Scripture expressions, and their petitions put up in the name of Christ, as well as accompanied by his life and power. Thenceforward, she was effectually reached by the Truth, and brought under subjection to it; being also thoroughly convinced of the falsehood of those slanderous accusations, with which the preachers whom she formerly admired, had been accustomed to calumniate the Friends.

This valuable woman had not long entertained and adopted such a change in religious views, when her husband, Alexander Skene, from a zealous opposer of this people, became a sincere convert to their Christian principles; as did also Thomas Mercer, "late dean of guild," about the same time. The civil stations occupied by these individuals in Aberdeen, and the general repute in which they stood, appeared only to add to the alarm and indignation evinced by the ministers, on occasion of such persons withdrawing from their communion. Alexander Skene, in particular; he being one of those who were sent for to

The numerous calumnies, represented to have been vented forth by some in that day, who stood in the character of spiritual watchmen, seem to have been for the purpose of detaining the Truth of God in unrighteousness, and keeping those who embraced it in disgust among the people—a practice which, it is to be feared, has not altogether ceased to exist in less flagrant forms, even among some who name the name of Christ; however lamented and abhorred such conduct must be, by all his true followers.

Edinburgh, by a religious assembly held there in 1651, that he might be present at certain conferences on the important inquiry, as "the causes of the Lord's controversy with the land:" we may therefore assume, that was considered to possess some solid qualifications as a Christian professor; and yet it is hardly to be in any wise traced or discerned in the account he gave of his own conduct, on one particular occasion. For, after he had joined the Society, he related the following singular circumstance, that befell him in the time of his ignorance and height of unsanctified zeal against Friends; and which he desired might be remembered, as a warning instance of the providential hand of the Almighty against a bitter, railing spirit, which he acknowledged then ruled in him. Being in company, at his own house, with one Alexander Gordon, a nonconformist preacher, he said, It were well to take that villain, (one of the early Friends), and hang him up at the cross in Aberdeen. Within a very few hours after he had uttered these words, he was smitten on his cheek and mouth with that complaint called cynicus spasms or snarling spasm, which his mouth continually turned about in this condition he remained for some weeks so that the witness for God in his conscience convinced him of the justice of this visitation for his hasty, furious speeches against the innocent person, and against Friends.

Notwithstanding this sad specimen of the outbreaking of the unregenerate nature, aggravated, as it certainly was, in one who had laid high claims to the religion of Jesus; it is still very possible, in the face of his own self-loathing, that the case, so far as regards the bitterness of the intention, might admit of some modification. For, independent of the general estimate of his character, we find in acquaintance, Robert Barclay, thus testifying of him, "Alexander Skene was a man very modest, and very averse to giving offence to others." The same author further intimates respecting him, that being overcome by the power of Truth, in regard to the subject of spiritual worship, he found it incumbent on him to refrain from all other public modes of performing this great duty, and to join himself to us: that he also gave the reason of this change, comprehending his views in the following short questions, which he offered to the public preachers of the city." These questions are inserted here because of their close application and instruction to some of the members of our Society in the present day, as well as to others: "Queries on Worship by Alexander Skene. 1st.—Should any act of God-worship be gone about, without the motion of leadings, and actings of the Holy Spirit? 2nd.—If the motions of the Spirit be necessary to every particular duty, whether should we be waited upon, that all our acts and words may be according as He gives utterance to assistance? 3rd.—Whether every one that bears the name of a Christian, or professes to be a Protestant, hath such an uninterrupted measure thereof, that he may, without waiting go immediately about the duty? 4th.—There be an indisposition and unfitness at some times for such exercises, at least as to spiritual and lively performance of the ought they to be performed in that case at that time? 5th.—If any such duty be gone about, under pretence that it is in obedience to the external command, without the spirit of life and motion necessary, whether such ity, thus performed, can in faith be expected be accepted of God, and not rather reckoned a bringing of 'strange fire' before the Lord? Being it is performed, at best, by the strength of natural and acquired parts, and not by the strength and assistance of the Holy Ghost, which was typified by the fire, that came down from heaven, which alone behoved to consume the sacrifice, and no other. 6th.—Whether such duties, gone about in the mere strength of natural and acquired parts, either public or in private, be not as really, upon the gross matter, an image of man's invention, the Popish worship, though not so gross in its outward appearance? And, therefore, whether it be not as real superstition to coun-tenance any worship of that nature, as it is to coun-tenance Popish worship, though there be a difference in the degree? 7th.—Whether there be a ground of offence or just scandal, to coun-tenance the worship of those, whose professed principle it is, neither to speak for edification nor to pray, but as the Holy Ghost shall pleased to assist them, in some measure, less or more; without which, they rather choose to be silent, than to speak without this influence?

The generosity of the Bedouins is worth noticing. It was a common thing when entering the territory of any tribe to receive from them an immediate visit, usually by the Sheikh of the tribe, who would extend to us a welcome necessary to make us feel easy in their realm, and would offer us coffee and tobacco, and sometimes be very prompt in bringing along with him a sheep or a goat for our acceptance "as a present." When it could be afforded, we were not only invited to accept their "hospitality," but we were almost forced to do so. This was a corner which we always tried to escape from if we possibly could. But there were two or three times when the matter was insisted upon, and where an excuse of fatigue, sickness, or indisposition could be accepted.

Well do I remember how, one afternoon, we were caught in this way by a tribe who would not take "no" for an answer. We were pressed to their "hospitality tent," and retained by them for nearly four hours, until they had satisfied their desire for extending "hospitality" to us. The cloth was spread upon the tent floor, and we were seated alternately with the natives upon it. Coffee was then made close by over a good warm fire of turfa bushes, and served in china cups, first the "father" of the family, then to the rest. After going the rounds of the host's family it then came to us, the operation being repeated three or six times. Then a large bowl of sour goat's milk was brought in, and made a common vessel for the whole of us to drink from. The dose was not an agreeable one by any means, and sometimes I fear there was some offense made as to the quantity that was taken in at each round of the bowl. Fortunately, our Akabah Sheikh, Sehlami, who was chronically hungry, came into the tent while the thing was going on, and giving myself credit for more than usual quickwittedness passed the bowl to him. To my great satisfaction he absorbed nearly its entire contents. You can imagine what a relief this was when I tell you that our dragoman assured us that no further dish would be served until this one was all taken care of. Coffee was now again served, and then long discussions followed upon subjects which we could not understand, during the interlude.

Several times our hosts seemed to quarrel violently among each other, and rising would draw their swords and blunderbusses upon one another. Just at the point, when the thing became interesting, and we really felt we should be treated to a show of Bedouin blood, two or three of the brethren would seize the combatants by the shoulders, separate them, and, taking their weapons away, compel them to become "sahib," (friendly,) and fall upon one another's necks, and kiss and hug until the evil spirit had departed from them.

After the second serving of the coffee the old Sheikh came into the tent leading a lamb, which, with patriarchal fondness, he patted upon the head, and then by his demonstrations gave us to understand that it was to be "sacrificed" for our hospitality. We grew faint at the thought that we must still wait until the lamb was killed and cooked before we could finish the process we were undergoing; but there was no help for it. So, declaring that every thing was "tayib," (good,) we tried to be patient. The old man then departed, with a grim smile upon his face and the lamb under his arm, and we proceeded to enjoy the entertainment which was going on before us.

In due season a large wooden bowl of Bedouin manufacture was brought in, steaming with the contents, which was prepared for our hospitality. The bowl was lined with Egyptian bread cakes. Then the lamb was put in the centre. So long had we been waiting that we were thoroughly hungry, and the offering not only smelled good, but we soon proved that it tasted good. No plate, or fork, or knife, or ought to handle the savory mess was provided, and therefore as the bowl was passed around we were compelled to help ourselves to one of the cakes of bread. Then with the fingers we reached such portions of meat as we thought would suit us, dexterously dipping from it upon the cake so much of the delectable juice of the meat as we thought would serve us. Then with the help of our fingers we proceeded to eat—dipping again in the dish from time to time as we desired further portions, sharing its contents with the twelve or thirteen dusky men who sat about the bowl with us. Glad were we indeed when this operation was over, and we could leave for our tent. We tried to appear "satisfied," and our entertainers seemed more than "satisfied."—Correspondent of the Presbyterian.

Maternal Affection.

Among the letters of the late Rebecca De-wees, some extracts from whose diary have appeared in "The Friend," is the following which expresses the feelings of a Christian mother, whose heart yearns over her children with longing desires for their eternal welfare. Its reading may prove a help and comfort to others who are similarly exercised.

"My Very Dear Son —"

As the anniversary of thy birth approaches, my thoughts naturally turn towards a period of intense anxiety, when I watched thy tiny form, and with all a mother's tenderness craved that my little treasure might be spared me; and though I earnestly sought resignation, I have often feared that it was not fully attained. But although I love my children none the less, so deep has been my sense of the dangers that surround them, so fearful the weight of the responsibility attached to those unto whom is committed the training of immortal spirits, the dread consequences of failing to attain to life's great end,—that I have long since more deeply felt the force of the language, 'Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord.' And instead of coveting for them riches or length of days, the one great request of my life has been, that they might be preserved from evil—no exemption from trials or afflictions that the unerring Hand might see meet to dispense—every wish or desire centering in this alone, that the work of grace might be accomplished, the soul's salvation wrought out, the great Creator glorified, and everlasting rest attained.

I know that youthful hopes and prospects are bright and buoyant. And I would not spread a gloomy picture of dreary life before thee, 'for wisdom's ways are pleasantness and all her paths are peace.' There is no joy like the joy of God's salvation, no peace like the peace which He gives. But this joy and this peace are the result of obedience to that inspeaking word of life and grace which is heard in the secret of the soul, saying, 'this is the way, walk thou in it.' My dear boy is not a stranger to the whispers of this voice, and obedience to it is the only way to peace and reconciliation with God. Let all thy actions be tried by the test, 'Are they such as will bring peace in a dying hour?' 'Are they such as will bring no condemnation when called to answer for every idle word?'

I write in no spirit of judging or accusation, but with a desire for thy preservation and perfect redemption, as well as all the rest of my dear children, which words must fail to express. Often have I felt that I would freely give my life a sacrifice—that I would be willing to do or to suffer anything that unerring Goodness might appoint—if only my own soul's salvation, with that of those who are bone of my bone, might but be wrought out; the great end of life attained; and, when the solemn hour arrives when inquisition for blood shall be made, when the heart-searching language shall go forth 'What hast thou done with the lambs I committed to thy care in the wilderness? the humble response may be, 'Behold I and the children which thou hast given me,' and the family compact once enjoyed on earth may be unbroken through an endless eternity, united in singing the song which is ever new, even glory to God and to the Lamb. So desires, so prays, thy truly affectionate mother."

The chemist and physiologist have wondrous books to open and to read, on the powers of the soil and the bursting of the seed and the blooming of the tiny flower. What does the child know of all these sciences? Their very names it cannot spell; and yet the little one may plant the seed, and watch the opening bud, and gather a fair nosegay, and bring it as an offering of affection to a loving parent. So, simple-hearted child of God, thou mayest tend thy plot of life in God's great garden! The mysteries of the science of God and his life, his dealings with thyself, thou canst not fathom; but thou mayest bring thy offerings of prayer and praise; thou canst grow the flowers of piety and sweet service.—L. D. Bevan.

Testimony Concerning Robert Pleasants.

Our beloved friend and elder, Robert Pleasants, having past from works to rewards, and closed the labors of a long and useful life, we feel our minds engaged in love to his memory, to give a testimony concerning him.

He was born at Curles, on James river in Virginia, his parents, John and Margaret Pleasants, being reputable members of our religious Society. We have reason to believe that by yielding obedience to the manifestations of Divine grace, he learned betimes to practise those Christian virtues, by which he was qualified for service in the Church, and which in an eminent degree accompanied the discharge of his domestic and social duties. He was an affectionate and tender husband, a kind father, an indulgent and prudent master,—in his family and neighborhood beloved and respected.

His anxious and continued concern for the future welfare of his children, appears not only from the general tenor of his conduct, but also from various letters addressed to them at different periods, wherein the language of counsel and persuasion, mingled with expressions of a parent's feelings, conveys in a very impressive manner his earnest solicitude for their prosperity.

In the exercise of the Discipline and his various services in religious Society, he was a faithful laborer, and we believe the instrument of much good; his circumspect and self-denying conduct, keeping pace with the advancing testimony; being an example to others; and his labors for the help and restoration of those who departed from good order, or failed to comply with the salutary rules of our Discipline, were bestowed in the spirit of love and forbearance.

He was a diligent attender of meetings for worship and discipline, in which (especially in the latter part of his life) he was often engaged in acceptable and lively exhortations, and in laboring for the promotion of peace, order, and unity among Friends.

Being deeply impressed with the iniquity and injustice of holding the African race in bondage, he zealously espoused their cause, and became an earnest advocate for their just claim to liberty and the rights of humanity. He emancipated upwards of eighty which he possessed, and through his patronage and interposition in their favor in courts of law, several hundreds have had their claims to liberty established. His services on their account were various and extensive—in laboring to promote among Friends a due discharge of their incumbent duties towards them—in uniting with other Friends in soliciting the legislature for a mitigation of the laws in their behalf—in affording the benefit of the law to those who were held in bondage with a legal title to freedom, and in holding up to the world a testimony against the principles and practice of slavery. Many of his letters upon this subject are preserved, some of them addressed to persons high in office, and of extensive influence in the State, with whom in the language of Truth and Christian simplicity he plead the cause of the oppressed.

He was also much concerned for the education of those minors who remained under Friends' care, and the descendants of those who had obtained their freedom, and appropriated the rents of 350 acres of land, and £10 per annum towards the support of a free school under the care of Friends for that purpose.

As we mean not to enter into a particular account of all the occasions in which our beloved friend devoted his time and labor to the cause of Truth, and the good of others, we deem it sufficient to add that he obtained a good report, and his memory is respected.

He departed this life, after a short illness, 3d mo. 4th, 1801, in the 79th year of his age; and was buried in Friends' burying ground at Curles, the 6th of the same month.

Signed on behalf of a Monthly Meeting held at Whiteoak Swamp, in Henrico county, the 1st of the 5th mo. 1802, by ROBERT CREW, Clerk.

DAILY STRENGTH.

"As thy day thy strength shall be;"
This should be enough for thee;
He who knows thy frame will spare
Burdens more than thou canst bear.

When thy days are veiled in night,
Christ shall give thee heavenly light;
Seem they wearisome and long?
Yet in Him thou shalt be strong.

Cold and wintry though they prove,
Thine the sunshine of his love;
Or, with fervid heat oppressed,
In his shadow thou shalt rest.

When thy days on earth are past,
Christ shall call thee home at last,
His redeeming love to praise,
Who hath strengthened all thy days.

THE DREAMER.

All day the white-haired woman sits
Beside the open door, and knits;
No living thing her dim eye sees,
As busy with old memories,
She dreams her dreams of what has been,
And knits her old-time fancies in.

She thinks of those who long ago
Went out across the threshold low.
How many times her listening ear
Has thought familiar footsteps near,
And she has started up to find
A dead leaf rustling in the wind.

But never, as of those who lie
Beneath the wide and tender sky,
With folded hands on quiet breast,
All wrapped about with peace and rest,
She thinks of them. For her they tread
The green earth with her. None are dead.

Though years have fallen like the leaves
Above the graves where summer weaves
Her grass-fringed coverlet, to keep Safe hid from us the ones asleep,
She sees them all. No grass nor mold
Can hide the ones she loved of old.

She talks with them. When brown-winged bees
Make merry in the locust trees,
She thinks he comes and sits with her
Whose voice was love's interpreter.
O dreamer! young again to-day,
What matter if thy hair is gray?

Sometimes she thinks that round her knee
Her children play in happy glee,
And when they tired and sleepy grow
She sings some song of long ago,
And on her loving mother-breast,
She rocks her little ones to rest.

O dreamer, knitting all the day
Thy dreams in with thy stitches gray,
Thine is a happy, happy heart,
A haunted world from ours apart.
The years that turned thy tresses gray
Have given thee back thy youth to-day.

ALWAYS A RIVER TO CROSS.

There's always a river to cross;
Always an effort to make
If there's anything good to win,
Any rich prize to take.
Yonder's the fruit we crave,
Yonder the charming scene;
But deep and wide, with a troubled tide,
Is the river that lies between.

For the treasures of precious worth
We must patiently dig and dive;
For the places we long to fill
We must push and struggle and strive;
And always and everywhere
We'll find in our onward course
Thorns for the feet, and trials to meet,
And a difficult river to cross.

The rougher the way that we take,
The stouter the heart and the nerve;
The stones in our path we break,
Nor e'er from our impulse swerve;
For the glory we hope to win,
Our labors we count no loss;
'Tis folly to pause and murmur because
Of the river we have to cross.

So, ready to do and to dare,
Should we in our places stand,
Fulfilling the Master's will,
Fulfilling the soul's demand;
For though as the mountains high
The billows may rear and toss,
They'll not overwhelm if the Lord's at the helm
When the difficult river we cross.

For "The Friend

Whilst considering the present condition the Society of Friends, there remains a caution upon my mind that whilst we continue for the faith once delivered to the saints, and so diligently taught by our worthy fathers in the truth, of a Divine and universal Light for the conviction and restoration of poor fallen mankind, that we ourselves not forget to pay strict attention to the admonitions: That we may exemplify a consistent life by its teachings. May we not to mind seasons of anguish and distress which we have had to call upon God to be merciful to us for our unrighteous deeds, and through his forbearance and mercy, we have been privileged to rejoice with joy unspeakable for his pardoning love and mercy; so that through unwatchfulness we sin, we have advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ, righteous, whose atoning blood alone cleanses from all sin those of every nation, kind, tongue and people, if this Divine Light Spirit is obeyed. So we see that this grace favor is on condition of our acceptance and being taught by it. We have no privilege sin granted us.

I am now a member of Upper Springfield Monthly Meeting of Friends, Salem Quarter, whose annual meetings are held at Barrville, Ohio, and feel myself to be within circle of my birthright membership. Although I am subjected to many inconveniences, yet remote from the meetings of my choice there is a peace of mind attending it that I would not exchange for convenience. From my earliest thoughtfulness on religious matters, worship, doctrines and practices, those Friends have always met my approbation fully, and have stood the test for more than two centuries; and now these, by some who claim the same name, are held up to public ridicule and contempt. I have no disposition to worship those devoted servants of the Lord, William Penn, George Fox and Robert Barclay; or those that suffered martyrdom on Commons; or that died in loathsome prisons, and through cruel treatment in public prisons, for the testimony of a good conscience to God—who labored not for notoriety (as hath been said by some); but I do greatly prize their constancy and willingness to suffer for our blessed Lord's sake; and as to experience in religious life, from youth to advanced age, I must pay deep veneration to the inward teaching and Light of Christ, which is now repudiated by very many calling themselves Friends, who also have adopted practices at variance with the long-established usages of the Society. I never claimed the use of much account, nor need I, but I feel it to be a monument of our Lord's pardoning forbearance and love, and cannot now lay my back upon a life of his mercies. We looked upon by professing Christians generally with an eye of sympathy and pity, such loose reins have been held whilst variations have been made, and the present disturbing element suffered to predominate, which reason I have, with many others, disconnected myself from this great department.

JOSEPH MORRIS.

Washington, Ohio, 1st mo. 1833.

The writer of the above testimony is an old Friend, who was formerly a member of an organization, known as the Binns' Body (Ohio); but who became so uneasy with the strictures from the principles of Friends that he permitted among those with whom he was connected, that he believed it right to disconnect himself from that society, and apply for admission into membership with one of the branches of Ohio Yearly Meeting. He was in attendance at the last annual assembly of that body, and was much comforted in mingling with those who were endeavoring to walk in the same path, which he believed it right for him to tread.—Ed.]

Running a muck.—One morning, as we were sitting at breakfast (in the island of Lombok) a servant informed us that there was an "amok" in the village—in other words, that there was "running a muck," orders were immediately given to shut and fasten the gates of the inclosure; but hearing nothing for some time, we went out and found there had been no alarm, owing to a slave having run away, declaring he would "amok," because his master wanted to sell him. A short time after a man had been killed at a gaming-house because, having lost half a dollar more than he possessed, he was going to "amok." Another had killed or wounded seventeen people before he could be destroyed. In their country a whole regiment of these people will sometimes agree to "amok," and then rush on with such energetic desperation as to be very formidable to men not so excited as themselves. Among the ancients these would have been looked upon as heroes or demi-gods who sacrificed themselves for their country. Here, simply said, they made "amok."

Caesar is the most celebrated place in the island for "running a muck." There are said to be one or two a month on the average, and ten or twenty persons are sometimes killed or wounded at one of them. It is the principal mode of committing suicide among natives of Celebes, and is the fashionable mode of escaping from their difficulties. A man, when desperate, grasps his kris-handle, and the next moment draws out the weapon and stabs a man to the heart. He runs on, with bloody kris in his hand, stabbing at every one he meets. "Amok! amok! then resounds through the streets. Spears, krisses, knives and guns are brought out against him. He rushes madly forward, kills all he can—men, women and children—and dies overwhelmed by numbers, amid all the excitement of a battle. And what that excitement is those who have been in one best know, but all who have ever given way to violent passions, or even indulged in violent and exciting exercises, may form a very good idea. It is a delirious intoxication, a temporary madness that absorbs every thought and every energy.—Wallace's Malay Archipelago.

It is always to the credit of a man to show kindness to a child. If you see a man on the street, or in a railway car, taking pains to help or gratify a child, it gives you at once a better estimate of him. A man with a somewhat coarse expression of face, and of unprepossessing appearance generally, was walking along a street in the suburbs of Philadelphia. He was noticed by two persons approaching him, and his unattractive manner and bearing were commented on as he drew near. But just before he reached these passers, the man stopped and turned aside to help a poor street boy struggling under a heavy load of refuse firewood. The man lifted the load from the boy's head, balanced it anew, steadied it until the boy was fairly started with it, and then spoke a cheery word to the little fellow. In that simple, kindly act the man himself was transfigured. There was now a winsome look about him. He had shown himself another person from his outer appearance. Nor was this an overestimate of the meaning of such an action as viewed by these chance passers. Four thousand years ago, at least, in the funeral ritual of the ancient Egyptians, one of the tests of the soul before the final judge was the treatment of little children. The soul that would pass unscathed must be able to say it had never refused help to a helpless child. And our Lord and Master himself, as he set a little child before his disciples as their example and their charge, said emphatically: "Whoso shall receive one such little child in my name receiveth me. But whoso shall offend one of these little ones which believe in me, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea." It makes a good deal of difference whether a church or an individual is faithful or not in loving ministry to children. It makes some difference to the children; but not so much as to those who care for or who neglect them.—Selected.

Selling by the Candle.—A curious custom obtained in this reign [that of Queen Anne of England]—that of selling goods, notably wines, by "the Candle." Pepys notes it in his diary as being new to him, so that it had not been long in vogue. Lloyd's and the Marine Coffee Houses were the principal places where these singular auctions were held.

When the custom died out I cannot learn, but probably it was during the first quarter of this century. The latest account I can find of its being practised is in The Saturday Bristol Times and Mirror of [Third Month] 29th, 1873. "Sale by Candle. The practice of letting by inch of Candle still prevails in the County of Dorset. At the annual letting of the parish meadow of Broadway, near Weymouth, which occurred a few weeks ago, an inch of candle was placed on a piece of board nine inches square, and lighted by one of the parish officers. The biddings were taken down by one of the parish officers, and the chance of taking the meadow was open to all while the candle was burning. The last bidder before the candle went out was the incoming tenant. This year the candle was extinguished suddenly."—Social Life in the reign of Queen Anne.

An Epistle of Caution and Advice to Parents, recommending a godly care for the educating their children in a Christian conversation.

Dear Friends,—It having pleased the Lord in his great mercy, to visit a people in this latter age with the knowledge of the truth; and having brought us to a certain understanding, that the blessings thereof are only enjoyed in following the Lord in the strait and narrow way that leads to life; wherein, by the daily bearing the holy cross, it hath, in a good degree, crucified us to the world, and the world unto us; whereby the temptations of it become daily more and more weakened, and our souls set free to serve the Lord in righteousness and holiness. And for as much as next to our own souls, our offspring are, or ought to be, the most immediate objects of our care and concern, being a peculiar blessing from God; so we ought to be thankful to Him for them, and wait upon Him for wisdom from above, thereby to be enabled, rightly to discharge our duties towards them, and then we shall be eminently careful to be good examples to our children, as well as diligently exercised in a conscientious care and concern for them.

And in order to make this the more easy to us, and effectual to them, parents should begin with their children betimes, and endeavor to teach them, as soon as they are capable of instruction, that their wills ought to be entirely subject to the will of God, and to the good advice of their parents. And we desire particular care may be taken, to require nothing of them that is unreasonable, or unbecoming religious and tender parents; for where a due care hath been neglected and put off, until they are grown up pretty far in years, it hath been often seen by woeful experience, that it is then too late to bring them into that subjection which is their incumbent duty.

Dear friends, be early careful to keep them out of the vain fashions, and evil ways of the world, and bring them up from the first, in plainness of language, apparel and behavior, which may be a means to prevent their being drawn therefrom, by the practice of others, when they are grown up.

Be careful to bring your children, in their young years, to meetings, not only on the first day of the week, but on other days also; which has been of great advantage to many; and instruct them to sit sober when there, and to have an awful sense of God upon their minds, and to be diligent in attending the testimonies of truth, when testimonies are borne, that they may feel the love of God to season their spirits.

And we entreat and exhort friends, to labor with their minds stayed in the gift of God, to bring their children to a sense of the same gift in themselves, impressing on their minds an awe and fear towards Him, which is the beginning of wisdom. And as they advance in years cause them frequently and reverently to read the Holy Scriptures, and endeavor to make them sensible of the great love of God in sending his Son Christ Jesus into the world; as also, of the great benefit of his sufferings, death, resurrection, ascension and mediation, in order to the great work of salvation; instructing them in the work of sanctification, through his blessed Spirit, that they may know the operation thereof, against every thing that is wrong, and thereby may come to distinguish between good and evil in themselves, and see the great benefit there is in a sober, virtuous, and religious life, and the many mischiefs and ill consequences that attend the contrary, that so they may embrace the one and avoid the other; for as they learn to make a godly conversation their choice in their young and tender years, the cross of Christ will become easy unto them.

And as the minds of children are early busied about something or other, and apt to receive any impressions, we advise, that beside the reading the Holy Scriptures, they may have the advantage of reading other good books, tending to promote the true principles of the Christian religion.

And we earnestly exhort and entreat all Friends, as much as in them lies, to keep their children from reading profane books, romances and pamphlets, which tend to infect the minds of youth, and which children are too apt to please themselves with.

And Friends are desired to remember, that indulging them in pride, idleness and luxury, is a great fault in parents, as well as of dangerous consequence to children, according to the testimony of Ezekiel, chap. xvi. 49, 50. "Behold this was the iniquity of Sodom, pride, fullness of bread, and abundance of idleness was in her, and in her daughters, neither did she strengthen the hand of the poor and needy; and they were haughty, and committed abomination before me, therefore I took them away as I saw good." Wherefore parents ought to be very careful to restrain their children from those things which lay a foundation for very great evils. And when they perceive an inclination in them to pride, to take care no ways to promote or encourage it, but on the contrary, as much as may be, restrain it. And an especial concern should be early taken, to prevent a habit of idleness, and therefore some employment, suitable to their circumstances, ought to be provided for them.

For those who are bred up in pride and idleness, do often, if their circumstances permit it, live in luxury, and spend their thoughts (that might be better employed) in contriving what they shall eat and drink, and clothe themselves withal; and sometimes can hardly invent any thing delicate enough for them; so that it is no wonder that many, whose education has been after this manner, spend their precious time and substance about things which are prejudicial to the health and welfare both of body and soul, and reproachful to our holy profession. And to the end that the labors and good advice of parents may take the better effect, great care should be taken to keep children out of bad company, and to have such servants as are religiously inclined, sober, discreet, and orderly; for it hath been found by experience, that such servants who are strangers to the cross of Christ, have been a means to turn many of our Friends' children from the plainness and simplicity of the truth, and lead them into vain and vicious company, whereby they have been greatly corrupted in

And we believe Friends might find it profitable, as they feel the Lord seasoning their spirits thereunto, to wait upon Him with their children in their families for the manifestation of his blessed power, that they may witness his seed of life and grace in their hearts, to beget in them a living knowledge, and love of truth in themselves, that they may come to know the work of sanctification and regeneration; the consequence of which will be, that virtuous, holy, and religious conversation, which we desire they may grow up in, and then they will be an ornament to our holy profession, and be preserved from the sorrowful effect of a loose and vicious conduct; and we question not, but as Friends are duly exercised herein, the Lord will of his mercy open in them suitable counsel and advice to their children and families, and will give a blessing to their sincere endeavors.

And let it be also the care of Friends, at proper seasons, to tell their children their own experience, and what God hath done for their souls; for it is very often seen, that the good impressions that children receive in their tender years from their parents are not easily worn out. As the Psalmist says, "We have heard with our ears, O God, our fathers have told us, what works thou didst in their days, in the times of old." Psalm 44.

And as there is an incumbent duty on parents in the education of their children; so the same lies on school-masters, and therefore what is herein recommended to parents, ought to be put in practice (as much as may be) by masters, mistresses and tutors of children; and those school-masters that teach the Latin and Greek tongues should be careful not to make use (in their several schools) of any heathen authors, that tend to profaneness, lasciviousness, or immorality.

So, dear Friends, we having an earnest desire that truth may prosper, and that Zion may become an eternal excellency, and Jerusalem the praise of the whole earth, and your children may follow the steps of our worthy ancestors; and, that the name of the Lord may be magnified from generation to generation, do in a Christian concern of mind recommend these things to you, heartily desiring, that you may find the same concern to put them in practice, as have been on Friends' minds in this meeting to recommend them to you.

By direction of the Yearly Meeting.

The Bank of England.—The Bank of England covers nearly five acres, and includes most of a parish; with the church-yard now known in bank parlance as "the Garden," and a very neat little garden it is. Long after it had ceased to be a burial ground, an ancient servant of the bank, of amazing stature, was buried there for safe keeping by request of his friends, who feared that some enterprising museum would get his skeleton. The bank occupies the site also of the house and garden of Honblon, its first Governor, a Huguenot, of exemplary character, whose very wealthy descendants hold the estates he bought near London. The bank is guarded by a detachment of the Foot Guards, who take possession about five o'clock every evening. The officer on guard is allowed a handsome dinner for himself and two friends, but the friends have to depart at eleven o'clock. The men do not know who will be on the bank guard, so collusion is impossible. The building has no eternal windows, and contains acres of vaults. In the day-time it is guarded by its own terrors, and by policemen, many of them in plain clothes, who are always on the watch.—

Misunderstanding.—Misunderstanding is a respectable family, and has a half sister distinguished for her good sense and solidity she herself, though not a little fond of railing, always takes the perverse side of any question; she is often seen with one of her intimates, Misrepresentation, who is a great bearer, and goes about from house to house telling people what such a one says of them behind their backs. Misrepresentation is a notable story-teller, and can so change, enlarge, and dress up an anecdote, that the person whom it happened shall not know it again. How many friendships have been broken by her, or turned into bitter enmities! She does a great deal of varnish work, which wonderfully sets off her paintings, for she pretends to use the pencil; but her productions are most miserable daubings, and it is the varnish alone which makes them pass to the common eye. Though she has colors of all sorts, black varnish is what she uses most. As I wish you to be very much on your guard against this personage whenever you meet her in company, I tell you she is to be distinguished by a very ugly leer; it is quite contrary to her power to look straight at any object. Barbauld's Letters, &c.

Sago.—The sago-tree is a palm, thicker and larger than the cocoa-nut tree, and has immense pinnate spiny leaves, which completely cover the trunk till it is many yards old. It has a creeping root-stem, and in about 10 or 15 years of age sends up a immense terminal spike of flowers, after which the tree dies. It grows in swamps and swampy hollows on the rocky slopes of the mountains. The mid-ribs of the immense leaves form the most useful articles in these lands, supplanting the place of bamboo. They are 15 feet long, and when very fine, as they are in the lower part as a man's leg. They are light, consisting entirely of a firm pith covered with a hard thin rind or bark. Houses are built of these; they form excellent roofing poles for thatch; split and supported, they do for flooring; and chosen of equal size, and pegged together by side, they have a very neat appearance and make better walls and partitions than boards, as they do not shrink, require no paint or varnish, and are not a quarter the expense.

When sago is to be made, a full-grown tree is selected just before it is going to flower. It is cut down close to the ground, the leaves and leaf-stalks cleared away, and a long strip of the bark taken off the upper side of the trunk. This exposes the pithy matter which is of a rusty color near the bottom of the tree, but higher up pure white, about as hard as a dry apple, but with woody running through it about a quarter of an inch apart. This pith is cut or broken down into a coarse powder by a club of hard and heavy wood, having a piece of sharp quartz firmly embedded into its blunt end and projecting about half an inch. By success-

s of this, narrow strips are cut away, and down into the cylinder formed by the is truly an extraordinary sight to witness ole tree-trunk, perhaps 20 feet long, and 5 in circumference, converted into food so little labor and preparation. A good tree will produce 30 bundles of 30 pounds enough to supply a man with food for ole year. The labor to produce this is moderate. Two men will finish a tree

Ocelot.—Some years ago, I was a constant or to the Zoological Gardens, and used to e acquaintance with the various animals, as they would allow me to do so.

One day I was struck with the beauty of a large and beautiful ocelot, or tiger-cat;
he animal seemed to be a new comer, and very wary and fierce, declining to rel to any overtures that were made. At hen standing by the cage on a hot sum-day, I thought that I saw a mode of ng at the animal's feelings. The place swarmed with flies, mostly blue-bottles, w of which occasionally got inside the of the cages. Seeing the ocelot try to one of the flies, I captured a fine large bottle, and held it close to the bars, so make it buzz, and waited quietly. After while, the ocelot came cautiously up, and one or two feints, took the insect and
t. I immediately caught another, and ed it in the same way, giving a low le at the time. This time the ocelot it without much difficulty, and in half our or so he came at once to the whistle, ook the fly.

At the next visit, I repeated the proceed-the ocelot perfectly recognizing me; and one or two visits, the beautiful creature d press itself against the bars to be cad, and to have its nose and chin rubbed, as does a favorite cat.—J. G. Wood.

Cave.—Dr. Lund in his essay on the a of Brazil, states, that in a cavern which entered in Brazil, and which is 120 feet from 6 to 9 feet wide, and from 30 to 40 high; about 20 feet from the entrance et with a layer of brownish earth, very and about a foot in thickness. On ex-ation this mould proved to be full of small
s. He filled a box containing about half ie foot with it, and counted in this quanabout 2000 separate rami of the under of a species of rat, besides the jaws of animals. All the skulls were fractured; was evidence of a violent death; and in ave were found numbers of owls, which Lund believes to have been, during suc-e ages, the murderers of the countless ads of the rodent animals whose remains ed the floor of the cavern.

Stinging tree of Queensland, Austra luxuriant shrub, pleasing to the eye, dangerous to the touch. It grows from or three inches to ten or fifteen feet in t, and emits a disagreeable odor. A traveller says: "Sometimes, while shooting turkeys in the shrubs, I have entirely forgotten the stinging tree till I was warned of its close proximity by its smell, and have often found myself in a little forest of them. I was only once stung, and that very lightly. Its effects are curious. It leaves no mark, but the pain is maddening, and for months afterwards the part, when touched, is tender in rainy weather, or when it gets wet in washing, &c. I have seen a man who treats ordinary pain lightly, roll on the ground in agony after being stung, and I have known a horse so completely mad after getting into a grove of the trees, that he rushed open-mouthed at every one who approached him, and had to be shot. Dogs, when stung, will rush about whining piteously, biting pieces from the affected part."

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 17, 1883.

A circular letter has come to our hands, which invites our women Friends to join in supporting an organization to be called the "Women's Foreign Missionary Association of Friends." The object of the Association is stated in the letter to be, to convey to their sisters among the heathen, "the glad tidings of salvation through Jesus Christ."

The letter is headed by two texts of Scripture containing the command which our Saviour, after his resurrection, gave to his eleven disciples, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature."—Mark
xvi. 15; and "As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you."—John xx. 21.

There are many professing Christians who appear to regard these texts as sufficient authority for any member of the Church to engage in ministerial labor. But our Society has ever believed, that no one can rightly enter upon such service, unless he or she has individually received as distinct a call and command as was given to the eleven apostles by their blessed Lord; and that such an one must first receive the gift, as John records, when the above command was given, that the Saviour breathed on the disciples, and said to them, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost."

It is this view of the necessity of knowing the Divine call and gift, and the fresh renewal of the command on every occasion of its exercise, that makes the chief distinction between our Society and other bodies of professing Christians in matters of worship;
so that while exercising Christian charity towards all, our consistent members have ever felt that they could not unite in outward acts of worship with such, nor take part in those missionary schemes which are conducted on the same general principles—because in so doing they would not be maintaining one of the most important of the testimonies which our Society has been called upon to bear.

Associations similar to the one now inaugurated, have been introduced among Friends in other places—but we believe their effect has been to weaken the attachment of those engaged in them to the spirituality of our profession, and to prepare the way for greater departures from our principles and practices.
We do not question the sincerity of the motives which have actuated those who have commenced this movement, and we can heartily sympathize with rightly directed efforts to spread the kingdom of the dear Redeemer among men; yet this project has given us much uneasiness; and we have believed it right thus to call the attention of our readers to the subject, so that they may not unadvisedly enter into a course, the effect of which will probably be, ultimately to make them participants in proceedings which involve a departure from our principles.

We have received a communication from some one in Canada with no name attached to the article. The writer had accidentally met with a copy of "The Friend" of 12th mo.
16th last, containing the remarks on the proposition made to hire a regular preacher for the Friends' Meeting at Lynn. Against this proposal he very properly remonstrates, as a departure from the principle of a free gospel ministry, and as showing that the authors of it do not understand the spiritual doctrines of our Society.

As the subject has recently been treated of in our paper, and as the name of the writer is unknown, we forbear to publish the communication.

The Annual Report of the Trustees of the Astor Library at New York, shows that it now contains 200,819 volumes.

The additions for the year 1882 were 5725 volumes—principally in the departments of Science, History and General Literature. The Library appears to be especially adapted to the wants of students, and to be largely used by that class of readers. The Patent Office department was consulted by 4380 readers.
The total number of readers during the year was 51,856.

The money value of the buildings, books,
&c., and of the funds belonging to the Library, is $1,345,816.

We have received a copy of "Wayside Thoughts," a volume of poems written by the late Phebe Haines. It is a collection of pieces composed at intervals during a period of more than forty years. The general tone of the book is spiritual, and it contains many beautiful and true sentiments that will find an answering chord in the heart of the religiously minded reader. It may be procured of Jacob Smedley at 304 Arch St., Philadelphia.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Tariff bill continues to occupy much time in each of the Houses of Congress. In the House of Representatives, the proceedings during the remainder of the term will depend largely upon the action taken in regard to Representative Kasson's amendment to the rules, which, if adopted, will enable a simple majority during the remainder of the session to suspend the rules and take up for immediate action any revenue or annual appropriation bill which may be on the Speaker's table or pending in Committee of the Whole.

During the twelve months which ended on 12th mo.
31st, 1882, the excess of our exports of merchandise over our imports was $15,135,192, against an excess of $163,339,679 during 1881. During 1882, our exports of coin exceeded our imports $33,537,221. In 1881 we imported in coin $49,327,448 more than we sent abroad.
The value of the imports of merchandise into the United States during 1882 was $752,841,145, and for the preceding year $670,209,448. The value of the exports of domestic and foreign merchandise from the United States during 1882 was $767,976,337, and for 1881, $833,549,127.

The War Department has been advised of the capture of the notorious Captain Payne and his gang. A majority of the raiders into the Indian Territory have withdrawn "of their own accord." It is believed they were induced to join the expedition upon false representations of the leaders, several of whom have been arrested, and will be turned over to the civil authorities for trial.

It is said at the Indian Bureau that Captain Payne's raids upon the Indian Territory have already cost the Government about $200,000, and that this expenditure might have been saved if Congress had adopted repeated recommendations of the Commissioner for the punishment of such marauders.

A telegram from Boston says that two different companies have applied for charters to build a ship canal across Cape Cod, and that they are ready to deposit, as a guarantee of good faith, from $100,000 to $200,000 before commencing operations.

The nickel five cent pieces, issued by the Mint since the 1st inst., cause much dissatisfaction. The designs appear to have been copied from those on a Portuguese silver piece of about the same size. The word "cents" being omitted on the reverse side, facilitates the danger of unscrupulous persons gilding and passing them for five dollar gold pieces. No order has yet been received for discontinuing the coinage.

A census of Providence, Rhode Island, just completed, gives that city a population of 116,765, a gain of 11,878 since 1880.

In the Senate of New Jersey on the 6th inst., a concurrent resolution providing for a Prohibitory amendment to the State Constitution was passed by a vote of 11 to 10. Bills were introduced reducing the legal rate of interest to 5 per cent., and prohibiting the sale of cigarettes and tobacco in any form to youths under 16 years of age.

In the House, a committee appointed to inquire into the matter of bribery at elections submitted a report. The report says "that bribery is universally prevalent in local, State and National elections in this State; that it has been condoned to such an extent that the senses of the people have become blunted to the enormity of its effects; that a large proportion of the voting population depend upon election day as a regular source of income; that it is constantly reaching out after new victims; that it is totally subversive of popular government and free institutions; that in this connection, in view of the concentration of capital by individuals and corporations, the liberties of the people are entirely in the hands of the mercenary, and must in the near future, of necessity, lead to anarchy and revolution, and finally that both the great political parties are equally guilty of its pernicious practices." The committee reported two bills on the subject, one repealing the present law and the other embodying new provisions. The latter bill prescribes a punishment not exceeding $1000 fine and one year's imprisonment in the State Prison for each case of bribery; requests for votes at any election or convention are also prohibited. The bill was referred to the Committee on Elections, who have reported it back favorably, and it has passed a first reading.

A great bridge is now under construction for the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad, across the Missouri river, twenty miles north of Council Bluffs, Iowa. The piers are of iron, filled with concrete masonry, and the superstructure is also of iron. The bridge will be 1000 feet in length and cost nearly $1,000,000.

The Legislature of Colorado has passed a bill to tax the net output of the mines.

"For the first time within the memory of the oldest inhabitant" navigation on Lake Michigan is reported to be entirely closed. In many places the lake is covered with ice several feet thick for a distance of 25 miles from shore.

The State of Indiana has a permanent school fund of $9,175,933.92, which is equal to $12.84 per capita for each child of school age in the State. The fund cannot be reduced in any way, as the counties are only allowed to use the interest thereon, and are held responsible for any losses.

The floods in the Ohio river and its tributaries are doing enormous damage and causing wide distress. At Cincinnati on the night of the 12th, the flood of 1832 was exceeded, the river reaching a height of more than sixty-four feet, and continuing to rise. Thousands of people have been driven from their homes in Cincinnati, Newport, Kentucky, New Albany, Indiana, and other cities and towns. Measures have been taken in Cincinnati for the relief of the sufferers. Extra police precautions have also been taken, the city being left without gas.

An unknown disease is reported to be causing great havoc among the horses in the Indian Territory. The affected animals "fall dead without warning."

An epidemic of "winter cholera" is reported in Waterbury, Connecticut, about 250 persons being sick. The disease is attributed to snow water in the reservoirs.

The deaths in Philadelphia last week numbered 371, which was 46 less than for the previous week, and 72 less than for the same period last year. Of the whole number 183 were males, and 188 females; 52 died of consumption; 37 of pneumonia; 16 of bronchitis; 13 of convulsions; 13 of diphtheria; 10 of old age; 8 of typhoid fever, and 8 of scarlet fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 104; 3½'s 103½; 4's, registered, 112½; coupon, 113½; 4's, 119½; currency 6's, 129 a 132.

Cotton.—There was no material change to notice in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 10¾ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans. Petroleum.—Standard white, 7¾ a 7½ cts. for export, and 8½ a 8¼ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in moderate request and firm. Sales of 3000 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.75 a $6.75; Pennsylvania family at $5 a $5.25; western do. at $5.25 a $6, and patents at $6.25 a $7.75. Rye flour is steady at $3.90 a $4 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was in better demand and a fraction higher. Sales of 5200 bushels red in ear lots at $1.10 a $1.20. Rye is nominal. Corn—Local lots are quiet, but firm. Sales of 10,000 bushels, in lots, at 60 a 74 cts. Oats are quiet, but prices are firmly maintained.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 2d mo. 10th, 1883.—Loads of hay, 252; loads of straw, 58. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 95 cts. to $1.05 per 100 pounds; mixed, 85 to 95 cts. per 100 pounds; straw, 60 to 70 cts. per 100 pounds.

Philadelphia Freight Market.—Steam grain to Liverpool quoted at 7d. per bushel; for Hull and London at 7½ cts.

Sail grain to Cork, for orders, quoted at 5s. 6d. per quarter. Direct port in the United Kingdom or on the Continent, 5s.

Petroleum for a Continental port by sail quoted at 3s. 6d. per barrel.

The absence of tonnage retards business; the market otherwise is firm.

Beef cattle were a fraction higher this week, owing to the light receipts: 2300 head arrived and sold at 5 a 7½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

Sheep.—Good sheep were in demand at full prices: 10,000 head arrived and sold at 3½ a 6¾ cts. per pound, as to condition, and lambs at 4½ a 7½ cts. per pound.

Hogs were a fraction higher: 3800 head arrived and sold at 8½ a 10½ cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

FOREIGN.—A man named Micheal Kavanagh, having been identified by a little girl, as the driver of the car containing the assassins of Cavendish and Burke, he has turned States evidence, and at the trial of the 13 prisoners at the Kilmainham court house, has identified several of them as participants or accessories to that crime. Trevelyan, Chief Secretary for Ireland, in a speech at Hawick on the 9th instant, denied the statements made that the diminution of agrarian crime in Ireland was more apparent than real. He referred to the rapidity with which murderous crimes had diminished when it became apparent that the murderers would be executed. He denied that the Government had suppressed freedom of speech or liberty of the press. The Government was ready to work with the Irish members of Parliament in advocating legitimate schemes of reform. Trevelyan also stated that 90,000 farmers in Ireland had taken advantage of the Arrears of Rent act.

The agitation among the Crofters of the Barra Islands has been settled, the landlords having made concessions.

Michael Davitt, who with T. M. Healy, M. P., and Quinn, was arrested some time ago for making inflammatory speeches, and required by the Court of Queen's Bench to give bail for good behavior, or go to prison for six months, was arrested at the Imperial Hotel at 9.45 o'clock on the morning of the 8th inst., for refusing to give bail, and conveyed to Kilmainham Jail. At ten o'clock Healy and Quinn, who also refused to give bail, were arrested and conveyed to the same jail.

The Times, says: "Lord Dufferin, who is now in Egypt representing the British Government, has drafted a despatch enforcing the necessity of protecting the Government of Egypt against external intrigue and internal weakness until it is able to stand alone. He condemns alike the premature abandonment of responsibility and annexation."

In the French Senate on the 12th inst., Admiral Jaureguiberry opposed the Expulsion bill on the ground that it made martyrs of the Orleans Princes, who were never hostile to republics. He advocated the enactment of a law not aimed at persons. The Senate vote of 170 to 115, decided to discuss the clauses of the bill. Devez, Minister of Justice, announced that the Government had agreed to abandon the Expulsion bill and accept the proposal of Barbey rendering the principle liable to expulsion by the decree of the President of the Republic, if their acts should compromise the safety of the State. This proposal was rejected by a vote of 148 to 132. The first article of the Ministerial bill then negated by a vote of 172 to 89. The Senate, a vote of 165 to 127, adopted a proposal submitted by Waddington, Republican, that any prince found guilty of furthering pretensions endangering the State be banished, his trial to take place before a Court of Assizes or before the Senate sitting as a High Court.

The Tribunal has quashed the indictment against Prince Napoleon. He was released from custody on the 9th and returned to his residence on the Rue de Chausée d'Antin.

The Czar, in his manifesto giving notice of his approaching coronation, says: "We determined in our heart not to perform this sacred rite until the feelings excited by the crime to which the benefactor of the people fell a victim had time to calm."

The Times, in a leader commenting on the Emperor of Russia's coronation manifesto, says: "Much too much attention is attracted by the subsidence of the reactionary storm and the reassertion of ascendancy by permanent forces of Russian society. The events of the last few weeks indicate the break up, at any rate for the present, of the wicked and sterile conspiracy. St. Petersburg has resumed its normal appearance. The Palace is open to guests and the programme of the Czar's movements is announced for the next few months."

General Tcherniaeff, commander in Turkestan, telegraphed to the Government, urging the necessity of Russia occupying and finally annexing Merv, but the Turcomans there have given offence by inviting Khan of Bokhara to form a treaty of alliance with them.

The Vedomosti says that the conduct of the Czar is such that apparently the time is approaching when Russia must reoccupy the whole of Kuldja.

The Montenegrin Government has issued a circular note to the Powers announcing a rupture of the relations between Montenegro and Turkey, because the latter has failed to agree to the cessions of territory on the frontier.

Three battles with Indians are reported to have been fought by the Mexicans in Chihuahua, in which more than 116 Indians were killed and nearly 100 captured with many horses and a large quantity of supplies.

The capital invested in all the railways of the world has been estimated at twenty billion dollars. The mileage is reported as two hundred thousand in length. The locomotives of the world are numbered at six thousand, the passenger cars at one hundred and ten thousand, and the freight cars one million five hundred thousand.

Pennsylvania History.

An interesting episode in the history of New England attempts at planting New England may be read in Hubbard's N. E., and Massachusetts Hist. Collections, and is quoted in Hazard's "Annals of Pennsylvania," 1609-1612, and is reported as follows:

"Righteousness exalteth a nation and loveth honorable even in the sight of the very then, as was manifest at this time amongst the Indians, in the observation of the proceedings of the English, for in this year those of the Haven intending a plantation at Delaware, sent some men to purchase a large portion of land from the Indians there, but they refused to deal with them; it so fell out that Sequoy Sachem, who had fled his country the time of the wars with them, and seated himself there upon that river, was accidentally present at that time, and taking notice of the English and their desire, persuaded the Sequoy Sachem to deal with them, and told them that however they had killed his countrymen and driven them out, yet they were best men and had just cause to do what they did, for the Pequots, he owned, had done wrong and refused to give them the reasonable satisfaction which was demanded; whereupon the sachem entertained them and they have what land they desired."

"This New England company it is believed attempted to settle upon the Schuylkill river, opposite Fort Nassau, (at or near Gloucester) in 1642, but great sickness and mortality prevailed in the autumn of that year and dissolved the plantation" forty years before the arrival of William Penn. As early as 1683, William Warner, an Englishman, was located on what is now the Lancaster road, at Low Grove, two miles from the Schuylkill bridge, having bought 100 acres of the Indians. He may have been a remnant of this attempted New England attempt at settlement. "To return to Sir Edmund, whose scheme of colonization had 'fallen on evil days.' Perhaps his failure to erect his Palatinate and settle the Delaware with manors, is due to causes deeper than the persistent opposition of the Dutch and Swedes. The Puritans of New England had left their native land to escape the tyranny of a king who attempted to rule without Parliaments, and "turned to the new world to redress the balance of the old." "Out of the failure of their great constitutional struggle, and the pressing danger to 'godliness' in England, rose the dream of a land in the West where religion and liberty could find a safe and lasting home." Twenty years later (1640) "the summons of a Parliament woke the kingdom to a fresh life, and the Puritan emigration at once suddenly and utterly suspended; 'the change,' said Winthrop, 'made all men stay in England in expectation of a new world.'" This apathy continued to affect the Puritan mind for several years, but the success of the parliamentary armies induced among many royalists an ardent desire for expatriation. To take advantage of this appears to have been the animus of the issue of Plantaganet's latest 'Description of New Albion,' and renewed efforts to plant the Delaware. The year that followed the issue of this book (1649) saw the beginning of the end of the Commonwealth, since the execution of the king gave fresh vigor to the royalist cause, and those who had hoped to retrieve their fortunes abroad, now decided to remain at home in hopes of regaining their estates. There appears to be but meagre evidence to prove that further attempts were made to colonize New Albion under the Patent of Sir Edmund. In June, 1650, a pass was granted for about "seven score persons, men, woman and children, to sail to New Albion," but it is said that there is no evidence to show that they ever sailed. A map of Virginia was published in 1651, upon which appears a note on the Delaware river. "This river Lord Plowden hath a patten of, and calls it New Albion, but the Swedes are planted on it and have a great trade in furs." In the same year Plowden appears to have been in England. He had disinherited his eldest son who had abused his confidence and caused him heavy losses; another son and nephew and his wife and family, had been killed by the Indians in attacks instigated by the Dutch and Swedes, and finally Sir Edmund died in 1659, possessed of large estates in eleven parishes in England, but with no planted Barony in New Albion.

Most of our information respecting the life of Sir Edmund Plowden has but recently been made public. The only question of moment from a historical point of view that remained unsettled was, whether the grants had ever passed the great seal, and had thus become legalized. To the researches of the contributor to the London "Notes and Queries," and those of G. D. Scull, we are indebted for the information that there exists a copy of Plowden's charter in Dublin, and another in Latin in Oxford. Accompanying the former are found opinions as to its validity, and the conclusions reached by the ablest legal counsel that said New Albion is by his Majesty erected into a Province and County Palatine or Palatinate, and Sir Edmund Plowden, rightly, legally and fully created and made a Count or Earl Palatine, with all titles of honor and dignities belonging thereto, &c. * * and thus the Province of New Albion, "by the king as king of Ireland and under the great seal of Ireland, is annexed to the crown of Ireland." This charter does not appear to have passed the Great Seal of England, but to have stood the test of a suit in England satisfactorily.

The Swedes held possession of New Albion for thirteen years, though the Dutch claimed sovereignty. At the end of this term (1664) Charles II., privately and without sanction of Parliament, and without even alluding to his father's charter to Sir E. Plowden, gave a charter for the Province to his brother James, at the time of creating him Duke of York. This act of the unscrupulous Charles was done, it is said, with the intention of provoking a war with the States of Holland. The Duke of York early sold a large portion of one of the grants, which extended from the west side of Connecticut to the eastern shore of the Delaware river, to Lord Berkley and Sir George Carteret. In March 1673, Lord Berkley conveyed his undivided half part of New Jersey to John Fenwick. This was afterwards declared to be in trust, excepting ten parts, to Edward Byllinge's creditors. John Fenwick conveyed the remaining ninety parts to William Penn, Gawen Laurie and Nicholas Lucas, in trust, Feb. 10, 1674, and a division was agreed upon July 1, 1676.

The Duke's title was disputed and many suits were instituted in consequence. The claims of Plowden and his heirs were disregarded, and family dissensions rendered them less able to prosecute therefor. Plowden, we have seen, had disinherited his first born; another son had followed the fortunes of the deposed King James II., and had probably lost on the continent the documents necessary to substantiate his claims. This loss of the charter and the ignorance on the part of the representatives of the family that it had been enrolled (since found), prevented their heirs from claiming compensation for the illegal alienation of New Albion from the Plowden family.

Thus two and a half centuries after the application of Plowden for the charter of New Albion, and his subsequent sinking into the limbo of forgetfulness until he became a myth and his story a romance, we find that he was a man of like fashion with many in our day, a scheming projector or ambitious adventurer; but who, from excessive exhibition of temper and intolerant overbearing, combined with political causes over which he had no control, lost his princely estate and procured immediate and prospective damage to his family and heirs.

Happy has it been for those who eventually found homes within the borders of "New Albion," that the feudal schemes of Plowden did not succeed, and that peaceful Christian Friends there found a rest and a refuge free from the domination of aristocracy of rank or of title and manorial claims. "There's a Divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them how we will;" and the thought will arise that an all-wise and beneficent Providence had reserved these choice lands for the heritage of his chosen people.

Gleanings from Quaker Annals.

The following is an abridgment of some of the early experiences of Samuel Neale, taken from his life.

"In my early years, though deprived of my parents, the Lord my God was near, and took me up, and at times moved upon my spirit and melted my heart, before I well knew what it was that affected me. When very young and capable of reading the Scriptures, and other writings tending to instruct me in that which was good and profitable, I felt my spirit tendered; and I enjoyed a sweetness of mind that made me very sedate and grave, and often the tears would run down my cheeks. In these seasons I felt myself very comfortable; and had a belief I was seen by the all-wise Creator, who knew all things; but such impressions soon wore off, and the levity of my natural disposition got into dominion, when amongst my playfellows.

Thus I went on for some time; when I was attacked by the small-pox; it reduced me very low, and few thought I should recover. In this disorder, I thought I was not fit to die, and therefore entered into covenant, that if the Lord would bring me through, I would be more careful of my words and actions than ever I had been before. I still remember some of the prospects I had when lying on that sick bed; but it pleased Infinite Goodness to raise me up. I was then about my twelfth year; and after this, though I often remembered my covenant, yet my natural propensity to youthful follies and amusements prevailed much, and stifled the good resolutions I had formed; so that, not keeping to the sense that was awakened in my mind, I too much forgot the visitations with which I had been favored from the gracious Hand of merciful help; and not being enough restrained, I took liberties in hunting, coursing, and shooting, whereby I was introduced into unprofitable company, which often lays a foundation for repentance. As I grew in years my passion for these amusements increased, so that I was hurried on, as with a torrent, into irregularities that lead to the chambers of death.

Thus I continued till about my seventeenth year; near which time I had a dawn of sense given me, that my life was very unprofitably spent. I got intimate with several young men at the college in Dublin, I believe some of the most moral that were there; and I took liberties inconsistent with the principles in which I was educated. We sometimes frequented the play-house, and after these amusements, when on my return home, oh! the anxiety and remorse that covered my mind and overwhelmed my spirit!

I was then willing to covenant to be more careful in future, and avoid what now seemed so distressing; but when those seasons of diversion approached, I felt my inclination to arise with redoubled strength, and my passion for gratifying it, like an irresistible torrent, insurmountable: so I went, like a man bereft of understanding. When all was over, I was ready to accuse myself as one of the weakest of mortals, and to deplore my unsteadiness and want of resolution.

Thus I continued for a considerable part of the three years I spent in Dublin, sinning and deploring my weakness and the commission of those things that afterwards stung like a serpent and bit like an adder. At particular times when sitting in meetings, I was sensible of the virtue of Truth, and was very much brought down and humbled in my mind; but my associates would cry out, 'This is a religious fit,—come let us take a coach and go to the Park, or some such place, and drive it away.' Thus the convictions of the good Spirit were counteracted by those who were not subject to its government, but were agents to him, who rules in the children of disobedience, and keeps in bondage and darkness.

I remember in a meeting a valuable Friend was concerned to speak in a prophetic line,—that the Lord would visit the youth, and pour forth of his Spirit upon them, and raise up Samuels for Himself. I thought she looked steadily toward me, and her words made a deep impression on me. But endeavors were used the same evening to eradicate these impressions, which through weakness and frailty were but too successful; so that I feared I should never be able to stand my ground, and was almost persuaded to give over striving. But my gracious and good Lord still followed me with his loving-kindness, and at times created a hope that I might overcome the enemies of my own house; and in time, blessed be his holy name, I felt strength to resist their wiles and insinuations; though alas! I had many combats. And but for the interposition of the Lord's mercies, I should have been long since overthrown and become a cast-away;—great are his mercies,—He still continues to be long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth to poor rebellious man; striving by his good Spirit to draw him from sin and iniquity, and calling him as out of Egyptian darkness and bondage; to whom the call is, by the Spirit of our Lord Jesus, to come out of this sinful state, witness the new birth, and be baptized by his pure spiritual baptism, that of the Holy Ghost and fire; which purges the floor of the heart, brings into newness of life, and makes it a temple where acceptable prayer is offered up, by the power and excellent working of the pure Truth, which prepares every acceptable sacrifice in our devotion and religious exercises during our pilgrimage through this world.

Thus I went on, between hope and fear; my frailties often precipitating me to the verge of ruin.

During this time I had a visitation from the Most High, by a fever and ague, which brought me very low; my former covenant appeared fresh in my remembrance, and I was now afraid to ask, because before I did not perform. I continued for some time in a low condition, until infinite Goodness restored me once more to health, to try my fidelity; but, to my shame and confusion, I ran into greater evils than ever: thus ungrateful and hard-hearted, I could fully subscribe to that declaration, 'The heart of man is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked.' I seemed running the full length of my chain.

My conviction and remorse were at times strong; but company and the levity of my temper quenched these convictions, and I went on towards destruction, in rebel and disobedience against the divine Monitor, which, in boundless mercy, still followed

First-day Travelling.

The Albany Evening Journal prints a letter from William E. Dodge to a minister of bany, detailing some personal experience of the former relative to railway traffic on first day of the week. These experiences tend over nearly half a century. W. E. Dodge states that he was twelve years a director of the Erie railroad, but upon the completion of the line to Dunkirk, on Lake Erie, and running of First-day trains, he at once left direction. In 1843, he was present at opening of the New Jersey Central road, remained a director of that line until 1851. The running of First-day trains being proposed and approved of, he left the management, and sold out his stock which amounted to many thousand dollars. Similar was his experience with the Houston and Texas road, of which he was for seven years the president. Although one of the first to become interested in the elevated railroads of New York, his connection with them was severed when they decided not to observe a day of rest. The project of opening the Delaware, Lackawanna, and Western road, was, he continued, started in his office in 1851. Since which time he has remained a director. He says: "I have grown into vast proportions, but have a strictly Sabbath-keeping road, and grow prosperous. I was pleased some years ago, when in the office, to see a telegram reply, made by the President, Mr. Sloan, to a letter from a Methodist minister, asking that trains might be run on Sunday to a camp-meeting, some fifteen miles from Scranton. The reply was short, but to the point: our trains do not run on Sunday."

"Many roads," says W. E. Dodge, in the foregoing letter, "now use the Sabbath for making up their freight trains with the cumulated freight of the week, thus running more trains (freight) on Sunday than on any other day in the week. Also, this day is special day for repairs to cars and engines, the shops of many roads are more busy than on other days. I contend that by this policy the roads are driving from them the best and most reliable men, and making bulk of their employees men who have the fear of God, and hence are not to be trusted. He concludes by expressing the belief that "it is entirely within the power of the Christian stock and bond-holders to stop the running of trains on the Sabbath."*

The whole subject, however, has been frequently and lengthily discussed, and there are honest differences of sentiment as to whether or not the running of First-day trains, the use of horse railways, are conducive to the best interests of the community. It is the opinion of the writer that what is seemingly gained is much more than counterbalanced by the moral loss. In theory, there seems advantage in the possession of a ready method of getting the people of a great city to fresh air of the park, but when we are have unity with the concern shown by a end residing in a suburb, who, being de- us during several months, of spending the er part of each First-day under the pa- al roof in the city, regularly walked the ance of six miles thereto, having found r a trial of the train that he could not out uneasiness of mind make use of it. ilar was my own experience in hiring n First-day at a livery stable, a horse and iage to take me at stated periods to a dis- t meeting. Minute of 10th mo. 4th, 1861. The subject preparing an Address to the members of Yearly Meeting, bringing into view the antages offered by the School at West- n for acquiring a substantial and guarded eation, having been referred to the Com- tee on Instruction at our meeting in the month, the following essay was now re- ved from that committee, and being read considered, was united with and directed e signed by the clerk on behalf of the com- tee, and circulated among our members. ratio C. Wood and Samuel Bettle were ap- nted to have a suitable number of copies ated and distributed.

Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting— Dear Friends,—The religious training and rary education of the children of Friends long been a subject of much concern and ly interest in our Yearly Meeting. Many its members early saw and lamented the rious consequences which often result to the youth from exposure to the indiscri- nate associations of mixed public schools, pre- sided over by teachers indifferent or inimical to our Christian principles and testimonies; where children attend over whose moral and religious education little or no care has been exercised at home, and whose conduct and language have a corrupting tendency, and Friends felt it to be a religious duty to en- deavor to provide means of literary instruc- tion where these disadvantages should, as far as possible, be obviated.

One of the first objects which called forth the advice of the Yearly Meeting, was the establishment and support of schools to be taught by members, and under the care of Monthly and Preparative Meetings.

In recommending this important subject to the attention of the subordinate meetings and members, the following language is used, viz: 'The education of our youth in piety and virtue, and giving them useful learning under the tuition of religions, prudent persons, having for a great number of years engaged the solid attention of this meeting; advices thereon having been from time to time issued to the several subordinate meet- ings; it is renewedly desired that Quarterly, Monthly and Preparative Meetings may be incited to proper exertions for instruction and support of such schools, there being but little doubt that as Friends are united and cherish a disposition of liberality for the assistance of each other in this important work, they will be enabled to make such provision for the accommodation and residence of a teacher with a family, as would be an encouragement to well-qualified persons to engage in this arduous employment; for want of which it has been observed, that children have been committed to the care of transient persons of doubtful character and sometimes very corrupt minds,—by whose bad example and influence they have been betrayed into princi- ples and habits which have had an injurious effect on them in more advanced life. It is therefore indispensably incumbent on us to guard them against this danger, and to procure such tutors of our own religious persna- sion, as are not only capable of instructing them in useful learning, to fit them for the business of this life, but to train them in the knowledge of their duty to God, and one towards another.'

In the exercise of its tender supervisory care for the best welfare and preservation of its youthful members, the Yearly Meeting subsequently enjoined the daily reading of the Holy Scriptures in all these schools, and that where it was practicable, the scholars should regularly attend a meeting for Divine worship near the middle of the week. The advice thus given was followed by strenuous efforts on the part of concerned Friends to procure for their offspring the benefits of the guarded religious education consistent with our Christian principles and testimonies thus contemplated by the Yearly Meeting. Large sums of money were subscribed, liberal dona- tions and bequests made, school-houses were erected, suitable teachers employed, and in many places permanent funds created, the interest of which was devoted to the support of these schools, or for paying for the educa- tion in them of the children of Friends in in- digent circumstances. These schools con- tinued in operation for many years, confer- ring important benefits on the Society, and a few are still sustained. But the separation of 1827 took many of them out of the control of Friends; and the effect of the present public school system has closed others, so that the Society in most parts of our Yearly Meeting is probably more destitute of such schools than at any time since the year 1790, and its children exposed to the temptations and in- jurious influences from which the Yearly Meeting was so zealously engaged in endeavoring to shelter them. In the year 1792, the establishment of a Boarding School for the children of Friends, to be under the care of the Yearly Meeting, was proposed to that meeting by Philadelphia Quarter as a further important means of promoting the right train- ing and education of the youth. After ma- ture and solid deliberation the proposal was adopted in 1794, and a committee appointed to receive subscriptions and digest a plan, rules, &c. In alluding to this important con- clusion the Yearly Meeting states, that it originated in a concern on account of the ex- posure of the rising generation in common modes of education, the vitiating examples, corrupting customs and opinions, which was an occasion of solicitude, and excited earnest desires in many minds that the benefits ac- cruing to society, both religious and civil, from well ordered establishments for the more select and guarded tuition and instruction in piety and virtue of our offspring should under its watchful care be extended to its members. Our predecessors entered with lively zeal and industry upon the prosecution of this work, and subscriptions were made with a liberality which showed that they viewed the right education of their offspring as of more value than any pecuniary con- sideration. In 1796, the amount of funds raised to that time was reported to be £12,000 ($32,000), which was afterwards largely in- creased. The farm was purchased in 1796, the building soon after begun, and in the 5th mo. 1799, the school was opened. From that time it has been sustained, sometimes with a small number of pupils, at other times full, but generally with an average number sufficient to defray its current expenses. Extensive ad- ditions have since been made to the buildings, many valuable improvements promoting the health and comfort of the family introduced, the course of instruction has been enlarged and systematized, and the number of teachers increased, by all which its advantages as a seminary of useful learning and the oppor- tunities of improvement offered to the pu- pils are much enhanced, while a concern is maintained to endeavor to shield them from injurious influences, and to promote their moral and religious culture in accordance with the principles and testimonies of Friends. The large and valuable Library comprising a variety of works in the different departments of History, Biography, Science and General Literature, the extensive philosophical and chemical apparatus adding greatly to the interest and instruction of the lectures; the regular course of studies judiciously selected and arranged so as to confer the greatest amount of benefit on the students, and carried on by competent and conscientious teachers, all combine to render Westtown School a very efficient and desirable place for the thorough education of Friends' children in the various branches of useful and valuable knowledge. In contemplating the great benefits it has already conferred on many of our members, and which it still offers, the comparatively small charge—much below the actual cost—the long-continued religious concern of the Yearly Meeting in which it originated and under which it has been sustained to the present time; the noble generosity which has furnished abundant means for the very large outlay incurred, and also the serious objections which exist to educating the children of Friends at the mixed public schools, it is cause of regret to the committee that more children do not partake of the advantages Westtown confers.

They have therefore deemed it due from them to bring the matter to the serious notice of Friends throughout the Yearly Meeting, and to invite them to unite more generally in sustaining an institution which originated and has been continued under a feeling of religious concern for the welfare of the rising generation, and to encourage such as have children to educate, to use every reasonable effort and to make every proper sacrifice in order to give them the benefits of an education at this valuable Seminary."

Signed on behalf and by direction of the committee.

Thoughts about the Eternal Gospels and the Falling Babylon.

BY CHARLES SHIELDSTREAM.

REMARKS ON C. H. SPURGEON'S LECTURE ON GEORGE FOX.

Fifteen years ago I heard a friend read a few pages of "George Fox," a lecture by "C. H. Spurgeon." It sounded eloquent and curious to me. I would have read and considered the whole of it; but the friend who had it was to leave and I could not have it. I have not read this lecture before this year (1882). It was often on my mind, but as no serious concern was on my mind about it, the time passed on, till I was more concerned about it, when I wrote to a friend who kindly procured it for me.

Spurgeon praises George Fox, but seems ignorant of what kind of a man he was. When he talks about G. F.'s conversion, he seems to mean the many fiery baptisms which the Lord let G. F. go through in order to try the faith which He had given him; letting him see the depths of Satan on one hand, and the mysteries of God's everlasting kingdom on the other hand—letting him see the corruption and depravity among priests and professors, and the falsehood and vanity of all the world's religions; for when he was in that condition he had a sense and discerning given him by the Lord, by which he saw that when many people spake of God and Christ, the serpent spake in them. G. F. found that none but Christ could speak to his condition,—for the Light showed him that all men were concluded under sin, and shut up in unbelief—as he had been when he expected that some of the priests could speak to his condition. But as he heard the voice of God, and was obedient to it, he came up through the flaming sword into God's paradise: as all have to do before they can fully understand the divine mysteries, and be true prophets of the Most High. He saw what entered God's paradise, and what was cast out of it, and how all the world's religions were vain.

Spurgeon talks about the wrath of God. But from the Divine love to man come the tremblings, grief and afflictions in him when disobedient to the Light of Christ; and when the Light shows man his alienations from God the most good, wise and almighty; or when the most High prepares and fits his servants for his own service. George Fox had heard the voice of God saying in himself, "Thou art in my love, and my love was always with thee."

Let us consider what C. H. Spurgeon says of the youth George Fox! He says: "G. F. was an excellent lad, naturally disposed to every thing that was serious, not at all joined to the usual vanity of youth, not undutiful, not likely to run into vice or even into ordinary folly,* and yet the truth was applicable to him, 'you must be born again!'"

Let us now read what George Fox says about himself: "When I came to eleven years of age I knew pureness and righteousness, for when a child I was taught how to walk to keep pure. The Lord taught me to be faithful in all things, and to act faithfully two ways, viz., inwardly to God and outwardly to man, and to keep to yea and nay in all things, and that my words should be few and savory, seasoned with grace; and that I might not eat and drink to make myself wanton, but for health, using the creatures in their service as servants in their places to the glory of Him who created them, they being in the covenant and I being brought up into the covenant and sanctified with the Word which was in the beginning by which all things are upheld, in which is unity with the creation."

Spurgeon seems to ignore that George Fox was born again at eleven years of age. He had already then the law of God written in his heart, which is the characteristic of the new covenant. He was taught by the Lord and had power to do right. The seed of sin had not taken root in him, but the Light of Christ, God's gift for man's salvation, the antidote against the seed of sin, kept him pure and undefiled. He was in the fear of God, which is the beginning of wisdom.

When G. F. was towards nineteen years of age it grieved him to hear his cousin (a professor) and another professor drink healths, and say that he that would not drink should pay for them all. G. F. says: "So I went away, and when I had done with the business I had to do, I returned home, but did not go to bed that night, nor could I sleep, but sometimes walked up and down, and cried to the Lord, who said unto me: 'Thou seest how young people go together into vanity, and old people into the earth; thou must forsake all and be a stranger to all, both young and old.' Then, at command of God, on the ninth day of Seventh month, 1643, I left my relations and broke of all familiarity with both old and young."

It was after the Lord prepared and fitted him for his service, and let him experience all conditions of men, so he should be able to speak to all conditions and be fully qualified for the great work he had to do in the world, viz., to proclaim the day of the Lord after a long night of apostasy.

Spurgeon says that a man shall make no

* That seems to have been the effects of "the grace of God which has appeared unto all men and teaches us to deny all ungodliness and so forth;" but not of the nature.

sect but join that he is most like. A man like G. F. knows where he belongs, & to the New Jerusalem, where nothing defile can enter; and G. F. had learned from the Lord that the world's religions are vain, & that he was to gather a people in white garments to sit down in heavenly places in Christ.

Spurgeon praises George Fox and he praises John Bunyan. Does not Spurgeon know that John Bunyan was an enemy to the Light of Christ in man; that John Bunyan was against the Friends and went into a controversy with Edward Burrough, that valiant champion of the Most High, and how Bunyan did not mind the truth or the clearest arguments, but tried to vindicate his misrepresentations?

In the year 1670, before his going America, George Fox writes: "I was under great sufferings at that time, beyond what I have words to declare, for I was brought into the deep and 'saw all the religions of the world, and people that lived in them, and priests who held them up, who were as a company of man-eaters eating up the people's bread." George Fox was sent to turn the people to the Light of Christ in themselves, who would lead them to the Morning Star, the true teacher of his people, who renews up into the image of God, and makes them to appreciate the Scriptures when they are in the same Spirit which gave them forth. But the Babylonians are fed by priestcraft on outward knowledge which is the serpent's way and the sin of Egypt, and if Spurgeon would fully appreciate spiritual worship which he praises George Fox for having bequeathed* to the world, then he would seek communion with the Father, the spirits, and never more preach with feeling the Divine anointing, nor try to feed his hearers on words, but show them the Light of Christ in themselves, and tell them to live by the inward word, to which things are possible, and come down on the same level with other people that now called laymen, and not to try to keep his position as a master in Israel.

The Door-step of Nebuchadnezzar.—"In the Egyptian and Assyrian gallery at the British Museum, and in close contiguity to the Egyptian monuments and the bronze gates of Solomon's temple, there has just been placed an object of considerable interest—a bronze door-step from the great temple of E-Saggil at Borsippa, a suburb or division of Babylon. The door-step not only has inscribed on it the name of Nebuchadnezzar, but also mentions his restoration to health. The door-step thus has been a votive offering. The inscription may suggest itself whether the inscription on the door-step has any relation to the name of Nebuchadnezzar spoken of in the well-known words of the 4th chapter of Daniel which record how the renowned monarch after looking with pride on the great Babylon which he had built, was in the same hour driven from among men, and did eat grass like an ox, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till his hairs were grown like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws." would not, however, be easy to make such identification. The temple of E-Saggil, which the door-step pertained, was a famous TRIP LIGHTLY.

Trip lightly over trouble,
Trip lightly over wrong;
We only make grief double
By dwelling on it long.
Why clasp woe's hand so tightly?
Why sigh o'er blossoms dead?
Why cling to forms unsightly?
Why not seek joy instead?

Trip lightly over sorrow,
Though all the days be dark;
The sun may shine to-morrow,
And gaily sing the lark.
Whilst stars are brightly shining,
And heaven is overhead,
Encourage not repining,
But look for joy instead.

THE SAFE REFUGE.—Ps. XLVI.

BY ANNIE WITTENMYER.

The Lord is my refuge and strength,
A present and infinite Friend,
I've learned the sweet lesson at length;
My soul on his love may depend.

In seasons of sorrow, and doubt,
When friendless I journey alone,
His mercies encompass about;
His presence and love are made known.

When storms fill the earth with alarms,
And mountains are rocked by the tide;
He gathers me safe in his arms,
And under his feathers I hide.

The earth may remove from its place,
The mountains sink into the sea;
No change, while beholding his face,
Can trouble, or terrify me.

A city I soon shall behold,
Where He is the centre and light;
And walk on its pavement of gold,
And know no more sorrow nor night.

Here, safe from temptation and strife,
I'll dwell in that blissful abode,
Beside the pure river of life,
That gladdens the city of God.

THE AGE OF INNOCENCE.

Drear were the world without a child,
Where happy infant never smiled,
Nor stirr'd a mother's love;
We sooner could the flowrets spare,
The tender bud and blossom fair,
Or breath of spring-time in the air,
Or light of dawn above!

No monarch rules with lordlier grace
Than helpless infancy its place
Soon narrowed to a span;
Outstretching hands that claim as right
All things that loom upon the sight
And recking nought of greater might
That will discern the man.

O, little king, O, little queen,
You rule not with the golden sheen
And pomp of larger courts,
But sovereign is your gentle sway,
Strong hearts and willing, homage pay,
Love scatters garlands on your way
Where your young life disports.

No poet utters daintier word
Than oft from lisping lip is heard,
No wit moves purer mirth;
In mimic satire babes grow bold
And quaint surprises they unfold,
As first their untaught eyes behold
The wondrous shows of earth.

Religious Views and Tenets.

Daniel, in looking forward in prophetic vision towards "the time of the end," says "many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." But he does not tell whether it is the heavenly knowledge or the earthly that shall increase. Perhaps he meant both. As we see they are both in the world—"The wisdom that is from above," and the "wisdom which descendeth not from above." By the heavenly wisdom we know heavenly things, and by the earthly wisdom we know earthly things. And while we see that the worldly wisdom so largely prevails, and that perhaps it is on the increase, yet Daniel gives us the comforting assurance that "many shall be purified, and made white, and tried; but the wicked shall do wickedly; and none of the wicked shall understand." Because by earthly wisdom they cannot understand the deep things of God. But he says: "the wise shall understand. And that they shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever." But if any of the servants of the Lord, in doing this work, of turning many to righteousness, should feel that they lack divine wisdom "let them ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given them. But let them ask in faith, nothing wavering." And let them ask of God; and not look too much to man, or books, or any outward thing for that which alone may be found within. "Why seek ye the living among the dead? He is not here, but is risen." Yes risen, far above the sepulchres of the dead. He is not to be found there; although they be ever so beautifully garnished. We see that while the servants of the Most High are at his command, travelling abroad, to spread the light of the knowledge of the glory of God; the servants of anti-Christ are also, "going to and fro in the earth, and walking up and down in it," or often riding in splendor; but under a different leader, even one who is transformed into an angel of light. So "be ware of false prophets which come to you in sheep's clothing." Sin abounded unto death in Adam and Eve. So it does in all their posterity. That is, it abounds unto the death of that spiritual life which has been again begotten in the soul, unless it is resisted and overcome by "the free gift which has come upon all men into justification of life." "For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." And eternal life is what we want, and what we may have even here on earth, as a blessed foretaste of that which we hope for in more full fruition beyond the grave.

Spiritual death was the wages that our first parents received after the transgression, and this death has past upon all their posterity. For all have sinned. And as sin hath abounded and reigned under the law of sin and death, even so might grace, now, where it is received, much more abound, through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord. And it will much more abound in all who, like Paul, have witnessed the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, to set them free from the law of sin and death. It appears that it was only temporal life that Adam and Eve had lengthened out to them for a season, after their fall, and in which they brought forth children, in their own fallen likeness, but it is an eternal life that the Christian longs for, and which perhaps Adam and Eve had renewed to them. And which we may all have, if we will comply with the terms, by and through faith in Him who is the life and light of men. The teachings of the Scriptures are from the Holy Spirit. And it is alone through the Spirit that they are understood. And the teachings of man must be through the same Spirit before they can be successful in teaching transgressors the way to holiness, or converting sinners unto God. For "the Scriptures are only a declaration of the fountain, and not the fountain itself." Some are almost looking for eternal life in the Scriptures; making them their idol. And so fail to come to Him of whom they testify. Some are saying in effect, "lo here is Christ, others, lo He is there." But the command of the Saviour was, "go ye not after them, nor follow them, for behold the kingdom of God is within you."

By looking too much to that which is outward, and listening to the teachings of those who darken counsel by a multitude of words without divine knowledge, we may find ourselves on no better or safer ground than blind followers of the blind. "Wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat: Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." By this we see that godliness, righteousness and holiness do not go with the multitude in the broad way, as it leads to destruction. But they do go with the humble few in the straight and narrow way of self-denial which our forefathers trod. They denied themselves of all cumbering things which obstructed their entrance in at the strait gate. But now, in this age of liberty, how is it? There appears to be room enough for us, their professed followers, to walk hand in hand with the world and its accomplishments. We can adopt the manners, the ways and customs of the formal professors around us. We can in this new and easy way, conform to the world in dress and language, and still be of increased esteem and respectability as useful and consistent "workers" in the cause of Him who was "meek and lowly in heart." We may willingly lay aside all of our distinguishing views and practices, and yet wish to "be called by our name to take away our reproach." "Brethren, these things ought not to be." As to the number that is spoken of, who go in the broad way to destruction, I know that many, or a great multitude, is also spoken of, who are the redeemed children of the Lord. John, in the Revelations, speaks of a great multitude, which no man could number, "which came out of great tribulation, and had washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." Though the number here spoken of is called a great multitude, yet it may be small in comparison with the countless thousands who have gone in the broad way to destruction. For the number of Gog and Magog "is as the sand of the sea."

If we, with the multitude ever so great, worship in the will of man, instead of in the will of God, what is it but will-worship? Do we glorify the Lord, or do we glorify self? Such popular worship may receive the applause of men; but "that which is highly esteemed among men, may be abomination in the sight of the Lord." The will of the creature must be slain before the will of the Lord can be done.

It is not the acknowledgment of sound doctrine, nor bearing it oft repeated, or by having good rules, but it is the walking by them, that secures our acceptance with God; or our happiness as individuals, or as a Society. And sinners in all ages, are saved by the grace of God and not by the will of man. Now "whosoever is wise, and will observe these things, even they shall understand the loving kindness of the Lord."

For "The Friend."

It is well perhaps for all, at their plentiful tables, to remember, and especially those who indulge in excesses and superfluities, that many here and there—and particularly now from freshets and floods—are at the same time suffering for want of the necessities of life. Can we, though, through the blessing of Divine Providence, placed at a distance from these calamities, any more than the Emperor of Germany, partake with impunity and complacency of our festive fulness, when the over-abundance of our tables and our houses would help and comfort so many; yea, in some cases might preserve from starvation itself?

Who, but can say, "Not more than others I deserve," &c., and would not a true Christian fellow-feeling in the suffering sorrows of others lead us on all occasions to observe the "moderation" which the apostle enjoins unto and before all? and, whatever be our circumstances or favored lot in life, to regard simplicity and economy as becoming, practical virtues?

The pious Hannah More, in an allusion to the schools under her and her sister's care, speaks of feasting at a dinner five hundred and seventeen children, and three hundred others, for the sum of £15—"less," she adds, "than a fine dinner for twenty would cost."

Another record worthy our consideration is the following: "The prophets of Israel were a very remarkable and peculiar race of men; living, generally, in poor and mean habitations; contented with a bare sufficiency to supply their daily wants; rejecting cheerfully an abundance of this world's goods, and yet standing before kings and princes as the accredited ambassadors of the Most High, declaring unhesitatingly His counsels, and denouncing unshrinkingly his judgments and his woes."

Religious Items, &c.

Lay-preachers.—The Bishop of Durham proposes the introduction into the system of the Established Church of England of a class of lay-preachers, who shall be at liberty to maintain themselves by their own exertions in the ordinary branches of business. If the proposition should include the additional features, that these preachers shall be divinely called to enter on this service, and that they shall wait on every occasion for a renewal of heavenly help and power before undertaking to preach, it would bring them quite near to the standard of true Gospel ministry.

Buddhism.—A large convocation of Buddhist priests has been called for the purpose of abolishing the ancient rules forbidding the clergy to marry or to eat flesh meat. In contrast with this news is an item in the Japan Mail, announcing that in the Province of Noto, Christianity is considered as an infectious epidemic by the fanatical Japanese Buddhists, who firmly believe that any one, even treading in the footsteps of a missionary, will be tainted with the foreign belief. Thus when a French missionary recently visited the district every body refused to give him food or lodging, and he was obliged to apply to the police for help. So the priests called their followers together, and agreed that they would kill the obnoxious foreigner if he stayed. The missionary left.

Immoral Theologians.—Joseph Cook in one of his "Boston Lectures" says: "Walking along the banks of the Rhine with a German professor, whose name is known throughout Christendom, and not seeking nor expecting any such disclosure, I was told that it is believed that more than a few theological pupils in Holland are immoral men. Nobody pretends to doubt that, in some of the theological schools of the Netherlands, morality is not indispensable to membership of a theological class. I said to my informant: 'If the facts were known in the United States that theological students in certain schools are believed on credible evidence to be immoral men, we should no more take our theology from that style of schools than we should take our drinking waters from these gutters.' There is not a little of theological discussion in Europe conducted by immoral men."

Boat and Ball Clubs.—In an address before the Phi Beta Kappa alumni of New York, Dr. Crosby stated that the formation in colleges of boat clubs and ball clubs, with public contests which attract professional roughs, and introduce their habits of betting and drinking, is an abomination of the first order. As is well known, the plea for these recreations is that they are promotive of physical health and strength. If they were practised merely as a relief from the effects of confinement and severe mental application, then they would be beneficial. But when the students put themselves into special courses of diet and training; when the interest is intense for months before the day of contest arrives; when the excitement is so great as to equal that which prevails on the eve of a battle that is to decide the fate of nations, the students participating must be drawn away from their studies, and the presence of professional gamblers, as trainers, and of sporting men as witnesses of the contests, and participants of the wagers that are secretly being made, must produce a damaging effect upon the principles and character of all concerned.

Natural History, Science, &c.

The Mystery of Gravitation.—"Do not understand me at all as saying that there is no mystery about the planets' motions. There is just the one single mystery—gravitation—and it is a very profound one. How it is that an atom of matter can attract another atom, no matter how great the distance, no matter what intervening substances there may be; how it will act upon it; or at least behave as if it acted upon it, I do not know; I cannot tell. Whether they are pushed together by means of an intervening ether, or what is the action, I cannot understand. It stands with me along with the fact that when

I will that my arm shall rise it rises. I inscrutable. All the explanations that have been given of it seem to me merely to darken counsel with words and no understanding. They do not remove the difficulty at all. I were to say what I really believe, it would be that the motions of the spheres of material universe stand in some such relation to Him in whom all things exist, the ever present and omnipotent God, as the motion of my body do to my will—I do not know, and never expect to know."—Prof. A. Young, of Princeton.

Water Mills on the Danube.—One object immediately attracts the attention of western traveller—the mills of the Danube. The grotesque wind-mill which he sees in other European countries disappears, and floating water-mill takes its place. The mill consists of a floating house, a kind of Noah's Ark, say 30 feet long and 20 broad, built of water-tight hull or keel, and anchored either at the shore or out in the current of the river. This is framed to another keel about 12 feet at one side. A beam projects from the first keel, and rests on the adjacent keel about five feet above the water, and the beam is the axle of a great wheel like the side-wheel of a steamship, which the current turns, so the mill is put in motion. These mills are anchored in flats at distances of from two to five miles, and on the shore are the curious-looking wagons which bring the grain from the surrounding region. It is safe to say that within 300 or 400 miles below Vienna, there are thousands of these grotesque and primitive-looking contrivances. They seem to be the centre of all the industry of the region along the river.—Correspondence of Chr. A.

Pulex Irritans.—The Flea.—When I was a boy we were rather interested about fleas, and so put two or three or four into a glass tube with a little cotton wool at one end, and they fixed their eggs singly to the wool. We used to feed them by taking the cork out and putting the open end on the back of our hand, when the fleas would come down to feed. In some parts, where fleas abound, it is not pleasant, but not uncommon to find the grain in the blankets. From specimens I have mounted for the microscope each flea will lay five eggs at a time. Their apparatus for piercing and sucking is well worth notice, but requires rather a high power to see well.—E. T. Scott in Science Gossip.

The Pear Tree.—Some of the finest varieties of the European pears were produced in Belgium, through the labors of Professor Van Mons, of Brussels, who raised 80,000 seedlings. In some parts of England it is extensively cultivated for making perry. It seems to be a very long-lived tree. There is a pear orchard at Newland, near Malvern, which is known to have existed over 400 years. Loudon mentions these fruit trees growing in the neighborhood of Jedburgh Abbey in good health and abundant bearings, said to be from 500 to 600 years old. He also mentions a very extraordinary pear-tree in the parish of Hom-Lacey, whose branches, when they came long and heavy, touched the ground and took root like the Banyan of India. The coarser varieties of the pear, whose fruit has an austere taste, are used for perry, which is made much in the same way as cider.

The pear, in America, is an introduced fruit; and many varieties adapted to our climate and soil have been produced—some are probably superior to the European ud Springs in the Island of Celebes.—On a tract of ground in a slight hollow is all lake of liquid mud, in patches of blue, or white, and in many places boiling and boiling most furiously. All around on the rated clay are small wells and craters, of boiling mud. These seem to be form-continually, a small hole appearing first,

 which emits jets of steam and boiling mud, which, on hardening, forms a little cone, with water in the middle. The ground for some distance is very unsafe, as it is evidently and at a small depth, and bends with pressure like thin ice. At one of the smaller jets which I managed to approach,
 I put my hand to see if it was really as hot as it looked, when a little drop of mud that fell on to my finger scalded like boiling water. A short distance off there was a flat surface of rock, as smooth and hot as an iron floor, which was evidently an old mud dried up and hardened. For hundreds of yards round, where there were banks of blue and white clay used for whitewash, which was still so hot close to the surface that a hand could hardly bear to be held in it a few inches deep, and from which came a strong sulphurous vapor. I was indeed that some years back a French general who visited these springs ventured near the liquid mud, when the crust gave way and he was engulfed in the horrible

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 24, 1883.

the unsettlement and disintegration which has been progressing in our Society for its past is cause of mourning and searching heart to those who love its principles, and who esteem the fruits which have flowed from them.

William Penn says of Friends in the beginning, that the Light of Christ within, as God's for man's salvation, was the corner-stone of their fabric, the root of the goodly tree of life that grew and branched out from it.
 They fully believed in the Divinity and element of our Saviour; that He came into the world, in accordance with the Divine will,
 for man's salvation—but not as a substitute for sin, or that his righteousness might be imputed to us, and we accepted of God, while in a state of sin—but that He came to deliver us from our sins.

That this redemption from the dominion of sin is effected by his Spirit, which He has sent as a Light into the hearts of all mankind, which is a swift witness against evil, which leads to repentance, and gives power to forget all unrighteousness, to those who yield themselves to its guidance.

That the discoveries of this Light in the heart are accompanied with a sense of their own authority, and as the will of man is brought into subjection thereto a living faith is gotten, and that no other faith is saving in a nature.

That those only who are made willing to be in obedience to the Light, and submit to the cleansing operations of the Holy Spirit, be purified from sin, and come to partake of eternal salvation through Christ; and that one of these cannot be enjoyed without the other.

But of latter years a different doctrinal system has been accepted by many under our name. This system also asserts the Divinity and atonement of our Saviour, but it teaches that when He said on the cross "it is finished," and gave up his life, his part in the work of man's salvation was completed, and that all that now remains to be done is for man to accept that salvation by believing on and openly confessing Christ, and that this belief it is in man's power to exercise when he pleases. In this system, the doctrine of the Light of Christ as ever held by Friends, has no necessary place, and is therefore rejected by those who fully adopt the new system.

From the fundamental principle of Quakerism sprang, not only "the goodly tree of doctrines that grew and branched out from it," but also the characteristic testimonies and practices of its professors; especially their sitting together in silence before the Lord in their meetings for worship, and their dependence on the fresh openings and assistance of the Spirit of truth for every exercise of Gospel ministry. Having clearly seen, as George Fox says, that all was to be done in and by Christ, they waited in holy reverence and attention for the arising of his light and power, and ventured to go no further than they felt
 Him to be their Leader.

From the new system has sprung corresponding fruits. Silent waiting on the Lord is held in less esteem, a desire for the good of others is considered as a sufficient warrant for entering on public ministry, the belief that man may secure salvation by such a belief in Christ as is in his own control, naturally stimulates zealous people to persuade others to make profession of faith in the Saviour, and induces them to use various means of producing an excitement in an audience, such as singing, calling upon the people to testify to their salvation, to rise, to kneel, to go to the mourners' bench, &c. These things are the natural outgrowth of the doctrinal root from which they spring.

It is impossible that the two systems should be harmoniously developed in the same religious body. He that preaches and practises one, endeavors to root out the other. They cannot be reconciled. The more earnest and zealous persons become in their advocacy of what they believe to be right and true, the more marked will be the difference between them, if they are travelling in diverging paths.

Those who adhere to the original principles of our Society have just ground for complaint, when the honored name of "Friend" is made to sanction doctrines and practices, which in its earlier days would have excluded their promoters from membership therein, and against which its original members earnestly contended.

Before this paper reaches our readers, we suppose nearly all of them will have seen the accounts of the suffering and destruction of property caused by the very unusual floods in the Ohio River and its tributaries. Such calamities call for the sympathy and help of those who are more favorably situated, and we hope and believe that these will be freely administered. In those who are in the midst of the distresses, an active, self-denying energy is often developed, which is truly admirable;

and such appears to have been the case at Cincinnati, and probably at other places.

The following extracts from an article in the Ledger of this city showing the condition of things a week ago, will give some idea of the trials which the inhabitants of Cincinnati and cities similarly situated have been enduring.

"Darkness, cold and hunger are added to the portion of desolate Cincinnati, even beyond the thousands in the inundated districts who still contrive to cling to the upper stories of their homes.
 With the water rising thirty feet in some of the river streets, there is a regular conveyance by boats and rafts, at charges fixed by the mayor for ferriage.
 In the work of rescue many hundreds were removed from upper windows, and taken to places of safety, under circumstances of great pathos, carrying with them in some instances the unbaptized dead and the newly born. With gas works, warehouses, wholesale stores, railroad stations, under water, with sewers underground beginning to give away, &c., so that there can be no estimating what building stands safe on its foundations, there are other dangers still.
 Except by telegraph wires and country roads, Cincinnati ceased to have direct communication with the outside world. Steamboat communication was cut off, for they cannot get past the bridges. Railroad tracks are submerged. The water basins have but a scant supply, which may soon be exhausted, and were a fire to occur in the midst of floods, the city would be at the mercy of the flames. The gas lamps, which were totally dark for a whole night, are lighted with a flicker of coal oil lamps set inside their lanterns. Homeless families are sheltered in schoolhouses and churches and in a theatre; and the relief societies are hard at work to supply the immediate necessities of starving and destitute families.
 For even those who have remained safely in the upper floors of their dwellings have lost their supply of coal and food stores.

The food supply of large cities in case of blockade by floods or snows is a serious matter. For its milk, meats and perishable provisions a city lives from day to day on constant deliveries. It was quite urgently brought to the notice of the people in London a winter back, when the heavy snows impeded the daily trains, that there were not provisions enough in all London to feed the people over the snow-siege if this had lasted even less than a week. The quarter of a million people in Cincinnati have come to a practical stand-still except for the work of relief. There has been but small loss of life reported, but the rescued people have passed through imminent peril and untold distress.

In the great belt of manufacturing industry which is represented by the map of the inundation the number of unemployed workmen from submerged and closed factories, foundries, furnaces, &c., will reach far into the tens of thousands.

The situation is repeated from point to point along the river. The same distressful story of hundreds of families driven from their homes, of the means of living cut off; of workshops, mills, furnaces, railways and steamers brought to a standstill —come from Newport, Covington, Louisville, New Albany, Jeffersonville, Lawrenceburg—everywhere
 —some of them having every dwelling house overflowed, as is the case at Lawrenceburg, making it impossible to even light a fire for warmth or food."

The Sidereal Messenger for the present month, published by Wm. W. Payne, of Carleton College Observatory, Northfield, Minn., has been received.

It contains an illustrated article on the bright comet of 1882, showing the nucleus divided into three masses. But, as might have been anticipated, most of its pages are occupied with observations and discussions of the recent transit of Venus. One of the most noteworthy of these is the statement prepared by Professor Young of Princeton, of the work done during the transit at different observatories throughout the world.

One series of observations consisted of noting the exact time of the external and internal contact of Venus with the edges of the sun, measurements of its diameter, and of its position on the sun's disk at various parts of its passage. From these observations compared with each other, the distance of the sun can be calculated.

Series of photographs and some spectroscopic observations were also obtained.

Observing parties were stationed at more than fifty places in the United States and Canada, and many good observations were obtained, though there was some interference by clouds.

At most of the stations in Europe clouds obstructed the view; but excellent results were obtained at Chili, Cape of Good Hope, New Zealand, Australia and Tasmania. The observers at the Straits of Magellan had not yet been heard from.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In the House of Representatives the Legislative Appropriation bill was passed after being amended so as to reduce the number of internal revenue collection districts to 82, and increases the hours of clerical labor in the departments. The House Committee on Foreign Affairs has agreed to report favorably the joint resolution giving notice of the termination of the fishing clause of the Treaty of Washington. The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations agreed to recommend the ratification of the Reciprocity Treaty with Mexico. Much time has been spent on the Tariff bill, which has had so many amendments and changes as to render it unsatisfactory to various interests. Very little expectation is felt that it will pass finally.

The Secretary of the Interior on the 14th inst. sent to Congress a request for an appropriation of $348,400 to supply with oxen and cows 2680 families of Sioux Indians who have gone to farming at different agencies, in accordance with the stipulations of the Sioux treaty of 1868.

The Legislature of Arkansas has passed an act prohibiting for two years the sale of intoxicating liquors within three miles of any place of public worship or school house, upon petition of a majority of the adult inhabitants, male or female.

In the New Jersey House of Representatives, on the 19th instant, a majority report in favor of a Prohibitory Constitutional Amendment was accepted, a motion to substitute the minority report in opposition to the Amendment was rejected by a vote of 35 to 24. The Amendment is yet to go through the various stages of legislation.

It is reported that the Attorney General of Iowa will soon petition the Supreme Court of that State for a rehearing of the case on which the Prohibitory Constitutional amendment was recently declared to be invalid.

The Diamond mine at Braidwood, twenty miles south of Joliet, Illinois, caved in on the 18th inst., imprisoning 77 miners, who were all drowned. It appears that the thaw and the floods had loosened the earth around the mouth of the pit, and a land-slide followed, carrying down nearly 90 feet square of the surface.

The Ohio river at Cincinnati reached its highest stage on the 15th inst., at 4 o'clock, when it stood at 66 feet 4 inches. Reports from the flooded districts in the Ohio Valley show that the waters were subsiding, but the cold weather was greatly increasing the sufferings of the thousands of homeless and destitute people. At Toledo, Ohio, the breaking of an ice gorge had caused the river to recede ten feet. Trains are again running on time from the suburban stations. An evidence of the prevailing distress is given in a telegram from Cincinnati, which reports 1350 families in New Albany, Indiana, and its immediate vicinity, to be without homes, while by the stoppage of the factories 1000 families are made dependent upon public charity. Similar reports come from other points. Contributions for the relief of the distress have been started on a large scale in various portions of the Union. Cincinnati is devoting to the small towns all such receipts, and relieving her own people by local contributions.

The Owen farm of fifty acres, at Warsaw, New York, was purchased last week by English capitalists, who will erect a soda ash manufactory thereon, with an employing capacity of 1000 hands. It will be the only factory of the kind in the United States.

Heavy rain is reported in Kansas, and a large wheat crop is indicated. The loss of stock this winter has been less than 2 per cent.

Some very fine specimens of asbestos are being found in Nevada. The fibre of the specimens shown is from four to six inches in length, and is soft and silky. A strand of it can be tied into a knot the same as flax fibre. It is found in what, from the description given, appears to be serpentine rock, and not very far from the crater of an extinct volcano.

The Board of Aldermen of Boston has passed an order for the lighting of the whole of that city by the electric light.

A communication from the Chief of Police to the County Commissioners of Philadelphia relative to the withholding of liquor licenses for certain places, was accompanied by a note from the District Attorney, in which he said: "I respectfully suggest that, under the law, licenses ought to be refused, so as to give effect to the earnest endeavor of the police authorities to break up these objectionable places."

The deaths in Philadelphia last week numbered 367, which is four less than for the previous week, and 86 less than for the corresponding week last year. Of the whole number, 206 were males, and 161 females; 51 died of consumption; 35 of pneumonia; 18 of convulsions; 15 of old age; 14 of marasmus; 18 of diphtheria; 11 of typhoid fever; 10 of croup, and 10 of apoplexy.

Ninety-one deaths from small-pox were reported in New Orleans last week.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 104½; 3½'s 104; 4½'s, registered, 113; coupon, 114; 4's, 120; currency 6's, 129 a 132.

Cotton continues dull, but price were unchanged. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 10¾ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ a 7¾ cts. for export, and 8½ a 8¾ cts. per gallon for home use. Our total exports of petroleum and petroleum products during 1882 were valued at $44,623,074, against $48,556,103.

Flour was in better demand and prices were firmer. Sales of 3200 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.75 a $7; Pennsylvania family at $5 a $5.25; western do. at $5.50 a $6.40, and patents at $6.25 a $8. Rye flour is firm at $4 a $4.12½ per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was in demand at a further advance. Sales of 6600 bushels red in car lots at $1.20 a $1.25. Rye is entirely nominal. Corn is in fair request and steady. Sales of 9500 bushels, in lots, at 62 a 74 cts. Oats are fairly active and higher. Sales of 10,000 bushels, in car lots, at 51½ a 57 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 2d mo. 17th, 1883.—Loads of hay, 200; loads of straw, 40. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 95 cts. to $1.05 per 100 pounds; mixed, 85 to 95 cts. per 100 pounds; straw, 60 to 70 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in fair demand at full prices: 2300 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5 a 7 cts. per lb., as to quality.

Sheep were a fraction higher: 8000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 6½ cts. per pound, and lambs at 5 a 7½ cts. per pound as to condition.

Hogs were firmly held: 3500 head sold at the different yards at 9½ a 10½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

The total exports of domestic breadstuffs from the United States during 1st month last amounted in value to $15,874,286, against $11,977,524 during 1st month 1882. During the seven months, which ended on 1st mo. 31st last, these exports were valued at $133,696,842, against $124,121,439 during the corresponding period of the preceding year.

FOREIGN.—Parliament reassembled on the 15th. The Queen's speech refers to the reorganization of affairs in Egypt, and the desire to observe international obligations; efforts to secure the stability of the Khedive, the security of the canal and the peace of Europe: the reinstatement of Cetewayo in the government of Zululand; the diminution of agrarian crimes in Ireland and the need of legislation for all parts of the Kingdom, especially the agricultural population.

Leave has been granted in the House of Commons for the introduction of an Affirmation bill, the vote thereon being 184 to 53.

James Carey, a member of the Town Council, one of the Irish prisoners has turned States evidence, and given a detailed statement of the plot which resulted in the murder of Cavendish and Burke. He has been corroborated by other witnesses, and twenty-one persons have been committed for trial to answer the charge of murdering these men. One of the chief conspirators has not yet been arrested, but his whereabouts is believed to be known.

The Times, in an editorial article bewails the farming prospects. It says: "A crisis in field-work exists. It is water everywhere. A good sowing time is wanted. It is surmised that much of the autumn sowing is late, and that all Europe is in a similar condition."

A third tunnel under the Thames river is projected at Tillbury and Gravesend. The river at this point in breadth about the width of the Delaware river Philadelphia. A bill asking the privilege in the House of Commons before Parliament. The prospectus urges as a reason the granting of the right to construct the tunnel to increase of dock buildings at Tillbury by the East India docks, from which it is expected ocean steamers will sail. The transfer of freight from London point to London is also proposed, and that the will also be of strategic importance in making a communication between the camps and arsenals north and south of the Thames.

In the French Senate on the 17th inst., Leon St. Waddington, Republicans, opposed the Barbey bill on the reason that they did not desire the Republic to take an arbitrary course like an Empire. The Senate much excitement, decided, by a vote of 160 to 100, to discuss the clauses of the bill separately. The bill was rejected by a vote of 142 to 137. The clause also was rejected. The President then proposed to submit the entire bill, but the Senate rose without further vote.

At a meeting of the Cabinet on the 18th, President Grevy accepted the resignation of the Ministers.

It is officially announced that Jules Ferry has entrusted with the formation of the Ministry. He stated that Jules Ferry will assume the post of Minister of Foreign Affairs, Martin Feuille, Minister of the Interior; Waldeck Rosseau, Minister of Justice; T. Minister of Finance; General Thibaudin, Minister of War; Raynal, Minister of Public Works, and Com. Minister of Posts and Telegraphs.

The Gambettist journals are favorable to the Ministry. The Left, the Extreme Left, the Radicals and the Bonapartists have decided to demand a revision of the Constitution.

King Alfonso of Spain has signed an appendix to an American extradition treaty.

At a recent agricultural exhibition at Lede, Germany, a threshing machine was exhibited which was driven by electricity at the rate of 1400 revolutions a minute, and which at the same time illuminated the enclosure in which it worked.

Word comes from abroad that the Naples coral-reef has been very plentiful, although the quality is not very high, and over a million and a quarter pounds have been fished up, worth about $1,000,000 in rough state. There is a goodly quantity of the pink coral, which is highly valued by some countries such as England, Germany, Russia, and the United States; but, while fair beauties prefer this more delicate, pink coral is despised by their brunette sisters, Spain, India and China, who favor the deep red. This fishery is of immense importance to Naples, during the past year 600 vessels and 5766 men were employed from February to September dredging off the coasts of Sardinia, Corsica and Sicily, or mainland of Southern Italy and on the Barbary.

The Suez Canal is to be enlarged and improved at an expense of $4,000,000. The work will occupy several years.

DIED, on the 24th of First month last, at the residence of her son-in-law, Jesse K. Livezey, near Belleville, Ohio, ANNE KING, relict of the late Joseph King, aged nearly 82 years, a member of Somerset Meeting of Friends. Being unable for several years to meet with her friends in their assembling for worship she spent the meeting hours in retirement and was on the Lord at her own home. Her friends have consoling belief that her end was crowned with peace.

continued in this state until, intending to make a visit into Munster, to form acquaintances and follow some business, I prepared my journey, equipped like a young man for the world, had a livery servant, and set out in good spirits on my expedition. As I passed along, I called at Paddock, where Mary Peisly lived, to inquire after her health and that of the family. Making some little conversation there, I found myself delighted with her instructive conversation; and upon leaving the place, I remarked how pleasing such company and conversation were, compared with what was generally to be met with.* I pursued my journey to Limerick, where I stayed some days; here I fell into very distant company, old acquaintances that I had in Dublin. From thence I proceeded to Cork, and on the road felt my mind impressed with solid reflections, which I have since thought preparatory to what soon followed; I was conscious that my weakness and frailties were great, my time running swiftly away, and I was irresolute with respect to standing against temptation and the allurements of sin, and sin-pleasing pleasures. In this disposition I reached Cork, and there I mingled with my old acquaintances, and got on ones.

I remember at a play one evening being up late; and lying pretty long next morning, when it was First day, an acquaintance asked me to go to meeting, and at the same time informed me there were strangers to be there, and inquired of me who they were; I said I would, for in my worst state I generally attended meetings. So to meeting I went, and it was a remarkable one to me; for in it my state was so changed to that highly favored instrument in

This goes to prove how important it is for Friends to be watchful and guarded in their life and conversation, even when, as in the present instance, there did seem to be outward view, any great prospect of favor, or of influencing a mind so apparently open and settled in the ways of the world. The testimony of Truth in every one testifies for Christ, and the duty of every professor of the name and religion of Jesus, should answer to this faithful and true Witness with every heart. Thus should there be maintained a close conversation coupled with fear; a showing of a good conversation our works with meekness and lowliness. This, with the Lord's blessing, might produce similar good fruits now as in the case of S. Neale.

the Lord's hand, Catharine Payton (who with my beloved friend Mary Peisly were visiting the churches,) that all I had done seemed to be unfolded to her in a wonderful manner. I was as one smitten to the ground, dissolved in tears, and without spirit. This was a visitation from the Most High, beyond all others that I had as yet witnessed: I was so wrought upon by the power and Spirit of the holy Jesus, that like Saul, I was ready to cry out: 'Lord, what wouldst thou have me to do?' I was almost ashamed to be seen, being so bedewed with tears, and slunk away from the meeting, to get into a private place. I joined company with a religious young man, and forsook my gay companions and associates, who beheld me with astonishment. The change was very rapid, and my doubts and fears respecting myself were very great, so that I could not trust myself in my former company, lest my innumerable frailties should prove too powerful for all my good resolutions. So I abode still and quiet, and kept near those messengers of glad tidings to me. I went with them to Bandon and Kinsale; and the same powerful dispensation of Divine virtue followed me, breaking in upon me, and tendering my spirit in a wonderful manner, in public meetings as well as in private opportunities; which drew the attention and observation of many. When I returned to Cork, I kept as private as I well could, and resolved to quit all my worldly pursuits, and follow the gentle leadings of that heavenly Light, which showed me the vanity of worldly glory, and that the pleasures of sin are but for a moment.

Our beloved friends' company was precious to me, their conduct and conversation strengthening; and the inward manifestations of heavenly goodness vouchsafed, were my crown and rejoicing. My eyes were measurably opened to behold my insignificance, rebellion and backsliding. I saw the perverseness of my nature, and that in me, as man, there dwelt no good thing. I thought I saw that if I missed the present opportunity of coming out of Babylon, I was lost forever: I was come to the length of my chain, my measure was full, and if I did not embrace the present offer, ruin and destruction would be my portion. These sights of my condition stimulated me to exert myself in watchfulness and care, to pursue with ardency the sense that opened in my own mind, and to feel after the spring and virtue that I witnessed there, which far exceeded every gratification that I knew before in this life. My hunger and thirst after righteousness were great: I delighted much in reading and retirement; worldly things had no charms for me at this season, when the new creation began to dawn: although, at times, I felt the mount of Esau was on fire, and the consuming thereof hard to bear, yet it was necessary, in order that I might witness a new heaven and a new earth, wherein alone righteousness can dwell.

This was when I was in the twenty-second year of my age. I journeyed homeward toward Dublin in great heaviness; fear seized on me, lest I should not be able to stand my ground amongst my intimates and acquaintances, professors and profane; being well known in that great and populous city, and having had many proofs of my own unsteadiness and forgetfulness, when heretofore favored with the tendering convictions of Truth on my mind. At times, I so reasoned with flesh and blood, as to have thoughts of going somewhere else to reside; but I was instructed to see, that He who visited me, was able to preserve me, if I would but be subject and obedient to his wholesome instruction; and that where I had dishonored Him by my inconsistencies, there, by my fidelity to the law He writes in the heart, I might honor and confess Him before men. These intimations quieted my mind, and I resolved to meet ridicule, reviling, and even persecution itself, for the sake of Him, whom I was resolved to follow, as I felt strength.

During this time I was often refreshed and comforted; the Lord was pleased to be with me, contriving my spirit and humbling me under his mighty hand. The mount of Esau was still on fire, which at times was very affecting and hard to be borne; and were it not for the Divine hand that sustained, I could not have abode the fierceness of the furnace; but it is a gradual work and must be accomplished; the kingdom of sin and Satan must be destroyed, before the kingdom of the holy Jesus becomes established in the hearts of men. The house of Saul grew weaker and weaker, and the house of David stronger and stronger, until it became established: so, in a religious sense, conversion is a gradual work; the sinful nature declines through the efficacy of the baptism of the Holy Ghost and fire, which purges the floor of the heart, and makes it a fit temple for the Spirit of the Son of God to dwell in. This causes a strong combat, a severe conflict, in which the poor creature suffers deep probation and tribulation; but it is the way to virtue and to glory, and is the heavenly preparer of paths to walk in acceptably to God: who, gradually carrying on his own work in the midst of suffering, visits by his life-giving presence to animate, cheer, and enable the drooping soul to hold on its way; and so by this invisible and glorious work the day of redemption draws nigh; and the poor pilgrim goes on from strength to strength, and from one degree of experience to another, rejoicing in the Lord Jehovah, the God of the spirits of all flesh, until the work be completed: then the poor traveller can say,—'It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy;' it is He that works, both to will and to do of his good pleasure, by his Holy Spirit, as the temple is clean and is kept in that state, which is only to be done, as we take heed to the power and Spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Captain of our salvation, watching and praying that we enter not into temptation: then, and not till then, will the temple of our heart be clean.

By what Sense does the Vulture Discern its Prey?

Whilst digging sweet-potatoes on my employer's farm, I noticed a very luxuriant growth of the vines covering a small mound in the field, and inquiry revealed that a horse and cow had been buried there some years before. Just then nothing impressed me in that connection save the immensity of the potatoes we found overlying these two graves; but in the afternoon and during the following day, "buzzards" shadowed the farm by scores, seeming to obey from all quarters of the heavens a mysterious summons to convocation. I soon perceived the sweet-potato field was the "radiant point" of each speeding shadow. Buzzard after buzzard I traced as they appeared in various portions of the sky with half folded wings, reminding me of mute aerial hounds "coming down the scent," their course as swift, silent and undeviating as an arrow. 'Twas a strangely interesting spectacle to behold them swoop within a few feet of the horse-hades, and rise again with slow, reluctant flaps indicative of disappointment, then return to deliberately "beat" and "quarter" the ground (aerially speaking), with all the tact and persevering sagacity of their canine compeers; in fact the performance was suggestive of a fox-hunt in which Reynard's place was represented by the dead bodies, "earthed" in this case, however, for other than Reynard reasons.

One of the vultures in particular showed an extreme faith in the guidance of its smelling powers by alighting without demur on the fence half a dozen paces from the centre of attraction, where, after some time of manifest uneasiness and uneouth posturing, it was joined by a few of its more dubious companions.

This visitation of unanny birds continued long after, though I never saw so many as at the time when the erop was ploughed out,—this disturbance probably releasing for a time the pent up odors. I could detect no taint in the atmosphere of the place, even whilst working in the freshly ploughed ground, yet hundreds of buzzards assembled from far and near, and with unerring accuracy pointed out the place of burial with overshadowing wings.

In consequence of these observations, the theory that the vulture family are enabled to detect the existence of a dead body by scent, unassisted by any of the remaining senses, and this, too, at great distances and when such carcass had lain deep under ground for several years, was to me satisfactorily proven.

Under the snow, the wheat is silently awaiting the coming of the harvest. And the hyacinth and the lily, the crocus, the snow-drop, and the Narcissus, are preparing for the resurrection of the coming spring. The storm of to-day will not be lost. It will come back in the early bloom and delicious perfume of the spring, and the golden grain of the harvest.

"So shall My word be!" That Word will win its triumphs, as surely as the spring will greet its flowers.

For "The Friend."

"My Father is the Husbandman."

It would seem that the wonderful and beautiful lesson of the vine and the branches, used by our Saviour for the instruction of his disciples, contains within its small compass all of the most important considerations necessary to our salvation. The engrafting of the branches; the abiding of the same; the influential Word of Life which forms our nutriment, our strength, our light and our wisdom; the unity which exists among the branches as a result of this indwelling; the bearing of fruit; the keeping of his commandments through the ability given by the inflowing Life, and the joy and love that well up as sweet waters from a pure fountain,—all these are lessons to be learned through that beautiful chapter.

But among these none is more important than the one contained in the words, "My Father is the husbandman;" and it might aid us in our submission to the Divine will, if we would more frequently consider what is the office and work of the husbandman. As it is his work to dig about the roots and prepare the soil, so it is our Father's work, as the Divine husbandman, to go through the hard soil of our fallen nature, and, with the plow-share of truth turn up deep furrows and prepare there a way for the result He designs to bring about. And what a work this often is! It may be the ground has lain fallow till it is so infested with weeds, and brambles, and briars, in the form of evil habits and unholy tempers and impure desires, that the work of the Spirit within us seems, as it were, uprooting and overturning the very foundations of our being. And so it is, for a new growth of his own right hand's planting is to be brought about, to his glory and our lasting benefit. The divine vine of life under whose shadow we may sit down and find its fruit sweet to our taste, is to be planted in our hearts, and the soil of our nature must be stirred to its deepest depths in order that this vine may take deep root and grow to the praise of Him who hath loved us, and given himself for us, to be our life evermore. In order to this the stones of all forms of wilfulness that originate in self must be gathered out of the way, and the roots of all brambles of unholy tempers and desires must be torn out of the soil where they have grown and become entangled and interlocked as a net-work, it may be. And while going through the experience of the progress of this work in our natures, how much more we are disposed to think of our own sufferings than of the patient, loving toil of our husbandman! May his patience and careful toil help us the better to understand that "He hath so loved us!"

But when the vine of the Christ-life has been planted in our hearts, and we have become living branches, engrafted into that vine, it then becomes the work of the husbandman to use the pruning-knife for the removal of all rank or improper development in the branch, which, having a new source of life, is yet a branch with tendencies which must be carefully watched and guarded, that symmetry and healthfulness may be secured. So our Father, by the "sword of the Spirit, which is quick and powerful, even to the dividing of joints and marrow," is the husbandman whose work it is to remove from us all those unhealthy spiritual excrescences which would mar the beauty, usefulness and consistency of the Christian character He wishes to develop. And this may not always seem pleasant, but, the rather, grievous for a time because we are so apt to forget that "things work out for us a far more exceed and eternal weight of glory;" so apt to forget that He "chasteneth every son and daughter whom He receiveth." And then we are quick, in our short-sighted haste, to think work complete, when perhaps this very haste is the occasion for several improper growths cropping out, rank and green, in the place where one was removed. After such lessons of bitter experience, how often do we become, in looking back, to exclaim "So foolish was I, and ignorant!"

This disposition to think the work done assumes a bad growth through a wily temptation to look too much to the experience of the past as things completed rather than beginnings that are to keep our eye fixed on the mark of the prize of our high calling Christ Jesus. Through this temptation we want to live on the manna of yesterday instead of that "daily bread" which our Father knows best how, from his divine store, to supply to each day's need. And through this same tendency to self-complacency, how often comes out the bad growth of creaturely activity through which we work with a "zeal not according to knowledge," and look to our own "oblations" and "incense," and to the altar that are the work of our own hands! Our tender husbandman finds busy work with his pruning-knife! Alas, that we in our blind zeal are so ready to put forth our hands and begin the work of pruning, either in our own case, or in regard to others, as we fancy it should be done! If in our own case, self-inflicted penance soon inflates us with the idea that we are becoming and so must appear very pious, and we proceed to make brooms of our phylacteries, to sound our trumpet before us, and disfigure our faces to be seen of men. It will not do to "prophecy smooth things to such, even if we find ourselves among the number. The Lord loveth 'merey and sacrifice,' and just as soon as any of us begin to look to things such as these as meritorious we prove at once that we are seeking to purchase our salvation with the filthy rags of our own righteousness.

But, as we allow our husbandman to see from us all considerations of self, and follow him in a willing, self-forgetful, loving obedience that goes out in desire of good to others, then, unconsciously to us, will our lives speak forth his praise and not our own merit. I not only do we with confident hand grasp the pruning-knife in our own case; we are ready to use it on others, forgetful of inquiry, "Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? To his own master he standeth or falleth;" forgetful that the exact line of discipline needed by one may not be the exact line needed by another; forgetful that the "unity of the Spirit" permits the "diversity of gifts."

But, time and space would fail me to count all the ways in which busy self deludes us into a blind zeal or false life. If we could but remember that our Father is the husbandman, leave ourselves and others in his hands and in willing obedience to his requirements go forward in what He gives us to do, rather than in ways of our own devising, and confidently trust all to his wisdom, surely ld less often mar the beauty of his work. ll we not with renewed earnestness, cease ook to the altars our own hands have e,—cease to look at self,—cease to look others, but set us upon our watch, and our eyes directed to Him, see what He say unto us and what we shall answer n we are reproved? made in that interesting and instructive me to his concern for the right manage-t of Westtown, on pages 223, 319, and aps in other places, and under date 12th 6th, 1853, he writes: "Went to Westtown a right exercise that the institution may be conducted in such manner as to support the primitive doctrines and testimonies of Friends and educate the children in them. This was the original concern, and it had been blessed;

and he believed, as Friends kept to this ground, a blessing would continue to rest on the school.' He spoke in a feeling manner, and being now in the 80th year of his age, it seemed like a legacy left to the younger members, who might survive him, to bear in mind in the future management of the seminary.
It was responded to and had a good effect on the feelings of many."

Samuel Hilles, late of Wilmington, Del., was for quite a number of years an interested member of the Westtown Committee. In the obituary notice of this dear friend it is stated,
"On the day before he died, he had a conversation with a friend, in which he seemed constrained to relate his own experience in a way very unlike his usual reticent habit. In this interview he spoke of some of these early visitations, and in particular of a spot among the woods at Westtown to which he used to retire to 'prostrate himself in the presence of his Heavenly Father,' where His presence had been especially manifested to him. And in his later life in the silent meetings of the Society of Friends, he had the same experience renewed, the sense of the love of his Heavenly Father so overpowering him at times that he was fain to ask that the tide might be stayed." Oh! this precious silence, how much it will do for us if rightly dwelt under. It seems at times to draw down the blessing of the Most High, as if we might feel the wing of ancient Goodness to over-spread us.

Our late beloved friend, Hannah Gibbons,*
thus alludes to it in her journal, under date of 4th month 19th, 1857: "On hearing of a Friend being exercised in the Select Yearly Meeting on the subject of silent reverential waiting, and recommending it as one of our peculiar privileges, she said: 'It did me good to hear it. Oh! this is what we want as a Society, even silent waiting before the Most High.
This wordy spirit which is among us I don't know what it will come to; and yet I would not check the lisping of a babe in Christ Jesus. A few words fitly spoken are compared to apples of gold in pictures of silver.'"

A Dream or Vision of Hester Moxie, a Friend in England.

[This dream was printed in "The Friend," in a series of articles by the late Nathan Kite, more than 30 years ago. It is now republished at the request of a correspondent.—Ed.]

I thought I was dead; and behold my body lay like a corpse! There seemed to be a person of the appearance of a man, his raiment being somewhat of sheepskin, of a bright fawn color, who said "Follow me." He ascended a hill, on the top of which was a large building. The out-side appeared strongly built of large rough stones. I followed my guide into the house, but did not at first perceive the beauty of it to the full. It seemed white and bright, and a large company sitting; such a number as I never had beheld.

The further I went in, the brighter it ap-and after her marriage.

peared, and more like the reflection of the sun.
The first stop my guide made seemed to be half way of the house, by what I judged from its appearance on the out-side. While my guide stopped, I looked at the countenances of those I could see, which were many, but I could not see to the far end of the room for the reflection of the light, which appeared brighter than when the sun shines in its greatest lustre on a summer day. There appeared a sweetness and composure in every countenance, far beyond what I had ever seen in any person while in the body. The lustre reflected from the light extended even to the skirts of their garments, which appeared like a plain robe or covering in one piece. Now I was filled with admiration, and looked to see if I could distinguish men from women, but I could not. At my first entrance into the house, I thought I had been at a meeting of solid Friends. I looked to see from whence the light came, but could not perceive either window or opening. I then asked my guide,
"What is this place?" He answered "Heaven."
I then looked to see what they sat on, but could not discover either bench or seat. The more I looked, the more I admired; and wanted to sit with them; but did not know how. My guide turned about to go out, and looked at me to follow him; but I was so much delighted, that I was unwilling. He then beckoned and said, "come." We had not gone far before I stopped again. He stopped for me and said, "come!" I then followed, often halting and admiring the inexpressible pleasure and content I saw in every countenance, till we got out; my guide then turned on the left hand, and seemed to go down. I did not perceive the road we went, but could see my guide. We soon came where I beheld a lofty dome of great wealth. We entered a large room, which we could not see the end of till we passed through. The room appeared grandly wainscoted, and beautifully painted with different colors. The first sight of this beautiful room abated my sorrow at leaving the other, which was very great while we came down the descent. I had but just time to take a view of this fine place, before a number of persons, richly dressed, passed us, who smelt so strong of brimstone, that I seemed almost suffocated; all of them were talking to themselves, and before they came to us looked well, but when near there appeared a blackness in every face; those who did not talk loud, moved their lips and seemed to mutter, which was also the manner of some who walked along alone. I was seized with horror, and asked my guide, "What is this place? and what are these?" He answered, "These are miserable forever. They were in the body in tumults, and will be so everlastingly. At some distance sat an old woman in a chair, like a bath chair, a fine person, very white or powdered, and grandly dressed.
I made up to her, to see if there was appearance of misery on her, and was more shocked than before. Her lips were moving; and from her eye-lids came small flames of fire. Immediately after this, as I looked around, there appeared in my view a woman Friend, plainly dressed, in a green apron, whom I remembered well when I was young; often taking notice of her for the solidity of her deportment in meeting. I eagerly made up to her, and said, "What! art thou among the miserable? tell me, what brought thee hither?"
She looked very sorrowful, wept, and said,

"No wrong I have ever done any man; but unfaithfulness and disobedience to my God, brought me hither!" I thought I wept much, as well as she. I then turned to my guide, "tell me, am I to remain here forever? I thought a little time past, had I died, I secured to myself an inheritance among the happy whom we first saw." My guide looking steadfastly at me, said, "Thou art not to remain here, but to return to the world again. If thou art faithful to thy God, thou mayest have an inheritance among the first thou saw. But I have something else to show thee."

Then he went a little further and under an arch appeared something which divided the place from a large chapel, where abundance of people were assembled to worship, and saying, "Amen, Lord have mercy upon us! Christ have mercy upon us!" These appeared more plain in their dress, and looked more white. I said to my guide, "These are not miserable too." "These," he said, "are they, who thought to be saved by a profession of religion, but have not the white robe of righteousness; they all came by the way of the room; some stopped among the worshippers, others went on to those who smell of brimstone." My distress was now greater than before, for I knew many of these, who looked at me as if they knew me; and I thought they appeared as if they worshipped.

They looked to and fro, and seemed much discomposed. I again entreated my guide to let me go. He walked gently out of this place, and came again into the entrance of the house, which was large, with a wide gate. There stood a number in black or dark clothes, who did not seem to move forwards towards the others. When we came to the outside of the gate, I met an intimate friend (the friend died about a month after,) coming towards the gate, two persons conducting him. I asked him if he was going among the miserable? "What is thy offence? What hast thou done? tell me?" He answered, "Beware of covetousness and the love of money! That brought me here." We both wept much, and were greatly troubled,—but I wanted to be gone, and followed my guide, but looking back I saw some pushing, others pulling him. We were now in a large inclosed field, where I saw many persons, some of whom are since dead. Out of it I could see no road, but my guide led me to a place where was but just room to pass out. He stood still, and looking earnestly at me said, "Thou art going into the world; remember what thou hast seen! 'Tis not enough to be honest to men, thou must be honest and faithful to thy God also! On this, the thought of returning to the world again affected me much; for it seemed a doubt whether I should be able to steer my course so as to be deemed worthy an admittance among the first I had sight of. But standing speechless, and my guide standing still, faith suddenly sprang up in my mind, and seemed to say these words, "Lord, thou canst, if thou wilt, preserve me through all?"

When I awoke the horror and distress I felt on my mind, I am not able to describe. I seemed as if I drew my breath where sulphur was burning, and often said to my nurse, and those about me, it seemed as if the smell of brimstone was in my stomach, and I thought I could not live many hours. Nor do I believe I should, if the Almighty, in the extending of his goodness, had not had compassion on me, a poor unworthy creature, and caused that suffocating smell to pass from me; and gave me to trust in his name. This melted my spirit in contrition before Him, and caused me to vent my sorrow in many tears; after which my tossed mind was favored with a calm."

IN MEMORIAM.

His sun went down at noonday. In his prime
He lay his armor off,—resting from toil
While yet the battle raged; and while his strength
Was scarcely tried, the bugle blew retreat.*
Thy warfare now is over! never more
Thy voice for truth, in modulated tones,
Shall eloquently plead; and never more
Thy faithful Christian walk—following Him
Who died on Calvary, shall louder preach.
Soldier of Christ, farewell! Thou wert to us
Almost a stranger; yet thy courage cheered,
And had our sympathy in thy attacks
On Satan's citadel. True to thyself,—
True to convictions! None has ever thought
To call thee insincere; and o'er thy grave,
(The wintry winds chanting a requiem,)
Let not a breath unkind be ever breathed.

SLEEP.

"So, He giveth His beloved sleep."

He sees when their footsteps falter, when their heart grows weak and faint,
He marks when their strength is failing, and listens to each complaint,
He bids them rest for a season, for the pathway has grown too steep,
And folded in fair, green pastures, He giveth His loved ones sleep.

Like weary and worn-out children that sigh for the daylight's close,
He knows that they oft are longing for home and its sweet repose,
So he calls them in from their labors, ere the shadows around them creep;
And silently watching o'er them, He giveth His loved ones sleep.

He giveth it, oh, so gently! as a mother will hush to rest
The babe that she softly pillows, so tenderly on her breast;
Forgotten are now the trials and sorrows that made them weep,
For with many a soothing promise, He giveth His loved ones sleep.

He giveth it! Friends the dearest can never this boon bestow;
But He touches the drooping eyelids, and placid the features grow,
Their foes may gather around them, and storms may round them sweep,
But, guarding them safe from danger, He giveth His loved ones sleep.

All dread of the distant future, all fears that oppressed to-day,—
Like mists that clear in the sunshine, have noiselessly passed away,
Nor call, nor clamor, can rouse them from slumber so pure and deep—
For only His voice can reach them, who giveth His loved ones sleep.

Weep not that their toils are over, weep not that their race is run;
God grant we may rest as calmly when our work like theirs, is done!
Till then we would yield with gladness, our treasures to Him to keep,
And rejoice in the sweet assurance, He giveth His loved ones sleep.

"Open the door for the children,
Tenderly gather them in—
In from the highways and hedges,
In from the places of sin.
Some are so young and so helpless!
Some are so hungry and cold!
Open the door for the children,
Gather them into the fold."

Two years o'er this orb have passed away;
Two years of sorrow and sadness,
Since thy spirit fled from its home of clay
To a home of joy and gladness.

Two years! how slowly have they passed
Over this aching heart of mine,
Since on thy brow I gazed my last,
Striving my treasure to resign.

I strove, and not in vain the strife,
To meet the blow in mercy given,
And bless the hand that into life
Ushered thy soul prepared for Heaven;

Prepared, through mercy, for that hour
Awful? which all on earth must meet,
When clothed with majesty and power,
God cites before his judgment-seat.

With trusting heart, and willing ear,
Thou heardest the summons unappalled;
His spirit with thine own did bear
Witness, that thou his child wast called.

*Hope unto thee was lost in sight,
And death in victory was swallowed;
Celestial glories opened bright,
With visions pure and hallowed.

Oh! may not then this heart of mine,
So graceless and rebellious prove,
As at God's mandate to repine
When summoning to a home above,
A spirit purified as thine,
To rest within his arm of love.

Nay, rather let it aid divine,
In cheerful thankfulness implore,
To see through all, his wisdom shine,
And crave High aid strength to adore

That Power which from all earthly care,
Sufferings and trials, called thee home,
Received thy ransomed spirit where Sickness and sorrow never come.

And when the high behest is given,
To my tried sorrowing soul, "go free,"
Oh! may eternal rest in Heaven
With Christ, my guerdon be.

Integrity in Business.—As we rode out one day with one of the members of the church in which we were then preaching, we had long conversation on the subject of honesty in business. He was a merchant in the village where we dwelt, and was very frank as to sentiments on the subject. He maintained stoutly that a man could not keep a store successful unless, in various small ways, he defrauded his customers. He did not say that he committed such frauds himself, but the inference was pretty strong that he did so. He contended just as earnestly that it was not necessary thus to make cheating a part of business; that a man who was upright and honest in dealing was most likely to succeed, and, supposing the principle he advocated to be correct, then no Christian man should keep a store, because it was a sin to rob our neighbors.

It is long ago now, that we met this brother and his remarks made us very sad. He was a fellow Christian, or professed to be. Though we talked long on the occasion which we allude, he urged no less strongly than at first, at the close of our interview, the necessity of dishonesty as a means of success. Only a few months passed and he failed in business, and left the village. We have never seen or heard of him since. We think his case is an illustration of the usual result of principles—that if a man wants to be a commercially, a very easy way to do it be smart enough to cheat his customers selling things, under the impression that not found out.

the same village, at the same time, there an unassuming man, a member of the church, who kept another store of the nature, where dry goods and groceries sold. We asked him what he thought of a principle as that for which his neighbor contended. He said he did not believe in it did not practise it. This brother continued year after year in the village, his business increasing until he enlarged his store, loved and respected by all, giving regularly a proportion of money toward the support of the church, until, with a competency sufficient for the wants of his family and himself, he sold out and is still the honored resident of the beautiful village of —, an illustration of the familiar maxim that "Honesty is the policy," even in worldly matters.—*Thos. Thoughts about the Eternal Gospels and the Falling Babylon.

BY CHARLES SMIELDSTREAM.

MARKS ON C. H. SPURGEON'S LECTURE ON GEORGE FOX.

such a man as George Fox, a child of the Father and a minister made by God, did not belong to any sect, neither will any child of Light belong to any sect, for sect making is the work of carnal men and darkness. Read how dear, true and true George Fox, describes the church and Babylon:

Whilst I was under this great spiritual blessing, the state of the New Jerusalem which comes down out of heaven was opened to me, which some carnal-minded people had supposed to be like an outward city dropped out of the elements. I saw the beauty and glory of it, the length, the breadth, and height of it, all in complete proportions,—I saw all who are within the Light of Christ and the faith which He is author of, and in the Light of God the Holy Ghost, which Christ and the Holy prophets and apostles were in, and with the grace and truth and power of God which are the walls of the city; such are within the city, members of it, and have right to eat of the tree of life, which yields her fruit every month, whose leaves are for the healing of the nations.

But they that are out of the grace, the Light, Spirit and power of God; they resist the Holy Ghost, quench, grieve and blaspheme the Spirit of God; who hate the Light, the light of God into wantonness, and do violence to the spirit and grace; they who have erred from the faith and made shipwreck of it and of a good conscience; who despise the power of God and despise prophecy, revelation and inspiration, these are the dogs and unbelievers who are without the city. They make up the great city of Babylon, the vision and her cage, the power of darkness and the evil spirit of error surrounds and covers them over. Many things more I saw concerning the heavenly city the New Jerusalem, which are hard to be uttered and would be hard to be received. But, in this holy city is within the Light, and all who are within the Light are within the city, the gates whereof stand open all the day (for there is no night there) that all may come in, and the blood being shed for every man, He tasted death for every man, and enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world; and by his grace, that bringeth salvation, having appeared to all men, there is no place and no language where his voice is not heard. The Christians in the primitive times were called by Christ, a city set upon a hill; they were also called the light of the world, and the salt of the earth; but when Christians lost the Light, the salt, the power of God, then they came to be trodden under the foot like unsavory salt. Even as the Jews who, while they kept the law of God, were preserved above all nations, but when they turned their backs on God and his law, they were trodden under foot by other nations. Adam and Eve, when they obeyed God were kept in his image and in the paradise of God in dominion over all the works of his hands; but when they disobeyed God, they lost his image, the righteousness and holiness in which they were made, they lost the dominion, were driven out of Paradise, and so fell under the dark power of Satan, and came under the chains of darkness. But the promise of God was, that the seed of the woman, Christ Jesus, should bruise the serpent's head, should break his power and authority which had led into captivity and held men therein. So Christ, who is the first and the last, sets man free, and is the resurrection of the just and unjust, the judge of the quick and the dead, and they that are in Him are invested with everlasting rest and peace, out of all the labors and travails and miseries of Adam in the fall. So He is sufficient and of ability to restore man into the state he was before he fell; and not into that state only, but into that also that never fell, even to himself.

What is out of the light is in darkness! Without walking in the Light the blood of Christ has no effect! But how many have said and will say, that there is no such a thing as a divine Light in man sufficient to work out the obedient man's salvation!

God had sent George Fox to turn the people to the Light of Christ in themselves; and he said so himself. Can preachers say that God has sent them to baptize in water and to turn the people to the outward history of Christ, or to the Christ after the flesh, or to the outward blood of Christ, or to hearing preachers who divine for money? Or can any preacher, who practises will-worship, say that God sent him to do so? Or can any pastor or bishop of any so-called church say, that his church is in the same power and spirit as the primitive church?

Spurgeon says: "Satan's servants serve him well, but the servants of Christ are often half-hearted." Who has more power, Satan or Christ? Those that receive Christ in his Light, to them He gives power to become children of God (not by name but by virtue, efficacy and power.) They are not half-hearted; they cannot become tired of doing their master's will—for his will is their meat and delight. They cannot run in their own wills, time and imagination, but as their Redeemer prepares them. Those who work in their own time, will and imagination, they get tired. God has his valiants in all generations. But those that have defiled their garments or put on borrowed garments, they can not walk perfect before the Lord; but the willing, the obedient, the perfect ones, to whom He gives his commandments to serve Him, they serve Him well; and it is their greatest delight to do the will of their Master. There are children of the Light scattered here and there over the surface of the earth, that have no outward name or organization seen by men, but who are in the Light, for the Light is in them, and they walk in the Light and are therefore within the walls of the New Jerusalem, eating of the tree of life. They know that their Master trod the winepress alone, and having communion with Him and his followers in Spirit; they don't feel any loneliness on account of being isolated, but are contented, and they know that the crown is reserved for them, but darkness for the half-hearted ones.

(To be concluded.)

Young Atheists.—A suggestive scene took place lately in a railroad car that was crossing the Rocky Mountains. A quiet business man, who had been slowly watching the vast range of snow-clad peaks seen for the first time, said to his companion:

"No man, it seems to me, could look at that scene without feeling himself brought nearer to his Creator."

A dapper lad of eighteen, who had been chiefly occupied in caressing his moustache, pertly interrupted, "If you are sure there is a Creator."

"You are an atheist?" said the stranger, turning to the lad.

"I am an Agnostic," raising his voice. "I am investigating the subject. I take nothing for granted. I see the mountains, I smell the rose, I hear the wind; therefore, I believe that mountains, rose, and wind exist. But I cannot see, smell, or hear God. Therefore—"

A grizzled old cattle-raiser opposite glanced over his spectacles at the boy. "Did you ever try to smell with your eyes?" he said, quietly.

"No."

"Or to hear with your tongue, or to taste with your ears?"

"Certainly not."

"Then why do you try to apprehend God with faculties which are only meant for material things?"

"With what should I apprehend him?" said the youth.

"With your intellect and soul; but—I beg your pardon!" here he paused; "some men haven't breadth and depth enough of intellect and of soul to do this. That is probably the reason that you are an Agnostic."

The laugh in the car effectually stopped the display of any more atheism that day.

Being let go, they went to their own company.—"A man is known by the company he keeps." "Birds of a feather flock together." There are a good many restraints that hold men back from the company they would like—company of their own sort; but when those restraints are off, the men naturally go to their own company. It is Dr. Alexander Raleigh, I think, who has brought out this truth most forcefully in a sermon from this text. He pictures the restraints of the daytime to men of business, to clerks, to mechanics, to students, holding one and another to the higher or the lower associations, until the evening's freedom permits them all to seek their own company. Then being let go, some go to the theatre, some to the bar-room, some to the gambling house, some to the library, some to their own homes, some to the place of prayer. If you could pick your own company, what would it be at this hour? When death loosens the restraints of life, you will go to your own company.—Selected.

Cider and Cider Drunkards.—Many persons call themselves "total abstainers," but will not refuse "a little" or a great deal "good old cider." "Hard cider" contains from eight to ten per cent. of absolute alcohol; that is, a glass full of cider is equal to a glass of the same size one fourth full of brandy, which contains less than fifty per cent. But it is not the alcohol alone that accounts for the different sorts of drunkenness. A marked difference often exists between beer, wine, rum, gin, brandy, and whisky drunkards; in the general condition of the habitual toper; and in the actions of the drunkards when drunk.

Cider drunkards are, generally speaking, the most morose, and when drunk, they stay drunk the longest, and sober up the most slowly. One of the best farmers in New England broke his wife's heart by continued negligence and abuse, and came at last to poverty through cider. In being taken by him through his cellar, and shown seven varieties of cider, the writer said, "Just the number of evil spirits that made the last state of a certain man worse than his first." "O," said the victim, "a little good cider does nobody any harm." But in a short time it ruined him. A few years ago, when apples were unusually plenty, a farmer in Rhode Island put down for home use forty barrels of cider. Before the spring three of the six of which his family was composed had drunk themselves to death, and one of the survivors was injured in a drunken melee.

We are stirred to write on "cider and cider drunkards" just now, by the testimony recently given before Surrogate Coffin at White Plains, N. Y. Westchester County is famous for cider, and the daughter of the testator, who was a farmer, testified that her father was in the habit of drinking excessively, being frequently intoxicated with cider. On one occasion he lighted a number of candles, placed them on the table, and dared any one to blow them out. On another occasion, he filled a barrel full of hay and placed it on the floor of the barn, and then set the hay on fire. At another time he filled a stove with asbes, and then said he would like to see any of his family kindle a fire in it. Once he attempted to cut the throat of one of his daughters. He was arrested in 1868, and again in 1870, on complaint of his wife, for cruel treatment. He was sent to the county jail, and subsequently to the penitentiary.—Christian Advocate.

Art Indecency.—Schools of Art are made also schools for the eradication of modesty. If the study of Art leads to greater admiration for that which is pure, lovely, and of good report, by all means let Christian parents encourage it; but if it leads to that which is impure and sensual, rather should they let their children suffer loss in their earthly career than be contaminated by it. It appears to us that by many Art is honored as a goddess, and all that promotes or is fancied to promote her glory is considered and taught to be lawful by her votaries without regard to the law of God. Surely Christian artists should lift up their voice against such idolatry, and Christian parents should be careful not to countenance it in any way.—London Christian.

A Happy Change.

Dr. Bass describes a visit, which he received from a resident of Pennsylvania, with whom he became acquainted fourteen years before in the Kings County Penitentiary. He was of good family, well brought up, and with a liberal education. The prospect before him was bright, but he, like many young men before him and since, made the acquaintance of persons of wild, dissolute habits, and in turn became extravagant and reckless, lost his situation, and, to gratify the evil habits he had formed, became dishonest, was arrested, convicted, and sent to prison for his crime. His mother, a widow, was in a distant city. A sister in feeble health was the only one of his large circle of acquaintances and friends who showed him any sympathy or kindness, the only one who visited him during the long and dreary months of his imprisonment; all the rest upbraided him, and rather rejoiced that the fast young man had come to a stop.

He was at first indisposed to religious conversation or reading; he wanted to be let alone to abuse those who had him punished. He tried to believe that he was the victim of circumstances, a martyr for little indiscretions only. He had been a little wild and foolish, but he was good-hearted and meant no harm. Such was the sophistry with which he tried to excuse himself and to justify his conduct.

In the providence of God his sister became sick, and for months could not visit. He became alarmed, fearing her death; and he says the first real prayer he ever made was that God would spare her life. The conversations he had with his sister, in which she had used her efforts to bring him to a serious frame of mind and he had ridiculed her, came fresh to his memory. He became thoughtful, penitent, prayerful, and, after weeks of great mental agony, he found in Christ Jesus a balm for his wounded spirit. After his conversion he read "Doddridge's Rise and Progress," and in his cell on his bended knees, alone with God, he wrote out and signed a "Dedication" of himself to God.

He is now the editor and publisher of one of the ablest newspapers in our country, respected by his fellow-men, and a member of a Christian church.

Liberty and Trust.

We have become so accustomed to the idea that liberty only means an escape from personal control and authority, that we are apt to let slip by far the larger part of its true significance. The lonely inhabitant of a desert island is certainly free from all human control, yet what sort of liberty can he boast? With the natural craving for society and the needs and desires of a civilized man, he is fettered and bound on every side. What does it matter to him that no one forbids him any gratification or compels him to any action, when the one is unattainable and the other impossible? If opportunity is denied to him, his liberty is taken away as effectually as it could be by the hand of any tyrant.

Another man may be surrounded by every opportunity, and free from every control, yet his liberty is curtailed by the want of power. He is sick and feeble, and incapable of enjoyment, or he lacks the judgment, or intelligence, or force to fulfil his wishes. Everywhere he turns he sees cannot written as indelibly for him in his own want of capacity as it could be in the pages of any statute book or the edict of any master. Without the use of power and opportunity, no withdrawal of human restraint can confer any liberty worth the name.

There is yet another element in freedom equally important to all who mingle together in social relations—that of trust. When we examine human relations closely, we find all the happiness they promise, all the opportunities they offer, all the advancements to promote, are entirely dependent upon trust that is included in and inspires them. Without this, hopeless solitude were preferable. Except for our trust in one another, we could never feel the least security of life, limb, of property or reputation. All that man values, save his own honor, is at the mercy of those around him. They can take his life at any moment, and in a hundred different ways. They can steal or lay waste property, burn his dwelling, destroy his family, ruin his good name. How is it that we can enjoy a moment's peace, knowing the possibilities that surround him? Simply because he trusts. He knows that the general goodwill and right feeling of the community are sufficiently developed to prevent more than a remote possibility of such injuries. He even believes that the desire to befriend and help one another is strong enough to assure him of a certain amount of sympathy in time of need.

Just in proportion to the growth of confidence in the hearts of a people will be the liberty of each individual. Where trust is feeble, life must be largely occupied in guarding against all sorts of possible deductions and injuries. Where it is strong, time and thoughts are set free for the accomplishment of worthy objects. When we are with those whom, for any reason, we regard with suspicion and distrust, how greatly our freedom is curtailed. We immediately strain our feelings and guard our words; we do not dare to be candid and open; we imagine every possible misconception that may be put upon what we say, and instinctively we conceal our real selves, and act upon a reserve. When from such society we pass into that of tried friends, or a trusted family, what a sense of relief do we experience, and how gladly do we throw off our mask. What a feeling of freedom ensues when we can say what we utter our thoughts, and express our feelings without fear of satire, or ridicule, or misconstruction, or slander. No liberty can be greater than that which we enjoy when the presence of those we trust; we cast aside all fear, and utter ourselves unreservedly. Slavery can be greater than that of fear; chains can be heavier than those forged by distrust and suspicion. Who are the victims of this slavery, the wearers of these chains? Surely those who by injustice, oppression, by cruelty and harshness, by enmity and lack of sympathy, cause themselves to be shunned and feared. Some, whose bodies it is they are under no man's control, whose delight is to exercise authority, are tyrants, under a worse tyranny themselves than any which they can possibly inflict. He who oppresses by those whom they oppress, and dreads those whom they rule, they live under a constant fear of retaliation.

Happily the power and the disposition to extreme cruelty have both passed away. We are still a long way off from that perfect which accompanies perfect trust. Prisons, stocks, bars, and all the complicated machinery used to prevent and punish crime act just so much from the liberty we do not enjoy did trustfulness and trustworthiness prevail. Envy, jealousy, suspicion, and still act and react to deprive us of our full freedom. Nature still, with her impartial justice, grants true liberty only to those who deserve it. Those who enslave themselves enslave in their own net. The just worthy will always be distrustful; they know that they have not bestowed confidence, so they expect none; conscious of having injured others, they are ever on the watch lest injury to themselves. Even should they be spared all retaliation, the spirit of fear and distrust in which they live is of itself a penalty, destroying as it must, their peace of mind and freedom of action, and forming the very core of their social lives. Some way, we may be very sure, they must be suffering which they inflict. But the honest and sincere, whose hearts are tender and true, whose word is reliable, whose characters are transparent, whose characters are true and dependable, will naturally be unsuspecting and confiding. They do not suspect others of acts of which they could not be guilty themselves; having sown seeds of kindness and good-will, they expect to reap the harvest. They merit no ill treatment, they fear none, and know nothing of the misery in which suspicion ever dwells.

A letter of love to the young convinced, in Penn gives this advice:—

"Neither let us enter into many reasonings with opposers, for that is the life God's power is able to slay with the two-edged sword; neither is the still, the quiet, the righteous life, but must be exalted over all. And this I find in a sound understanding through the promises of the Lord, that deadness, darkness, languish of spirit, will be the end of such drifting and pragmatical Christians, whose religion consists much more in words than in acts; confessing than forsaking; and in their will-performances and external observances, than in the reformation and conversion of their souls to God. And, finally, we ourselves, who have known something more of the word, may also reduce our good conditions to utter loss, by seeking to comprehend religious matters in our understandings, and trifling about them with every opposer the while in a way of temptation, shall present to which does no way advance our growth and increase in the noble principle of Truth."

Religious Items, &c.

Reestablishment.—There is said to be growth in Germany, among the more Evangelical portion of the community, a demand for a Church—one not connected with or dependent on the civil government. This feeling is strengthened by the fact that the adherents to the different congregations are controlled by the State bureaux, and sometimes a teacher of rationalistic tendencies is sent to an evangelical congregation; which causes dissatisfaction.

On this subject Joseph Cook stated in one of his recent lectures:—"Already Australia has adopted the American precedent for her independence. She has put all connection between Church and State into process of extinction in all her colonies. I have heard Archbishop Trench say, at his own table, to his associate ecclesiastics in Dublin, that Ireland could not go back to a connection of Church and State if she would, and would not if she could, and should not if she would. Church and State have long been partially separated in Scotland, and you already begin to hear all around the horizon of that land, rising thunders on the theme of complete disestablishment. But who expects England to avoid radical discussions on this theme a century, or half a century, or a generation longer? Disestablishment is a great reform to be expected in a near British future."

Liturgical Form of Worship.—One of the New York Baptist congregations (that of Madison Avenue) has decided to make some changes in the manner of holding their evening meetings. A committee on the subject reported that they thought the reformed churches had made a mistake in rejecting liturgical services, and they proposed that more time should be given to music and other things which would be attractive to people generally. If some of the old fathers of the denomination could visit their descendants in religious profession, they might say with the apostle, "I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labor in vain."

Natural History, Science, &c.

The Lignified Snake from Brazil.—An object closely representing a small species of snake, was found within the trunk of a tree north of the Amazon river, and has excited considerable interest among naturalists. The piece of wood containing the supposed reptile was taken to France and submitted to learned men there for examination. The body has been found to consist of woody cells and fibres, yet the resemblance to a snake is wonderfully close. Professor Asa Gray suggests as the most probable hypothesis, that it is an aerial root, such as the fig family are in the habit of throwing out, which has by some means entered the body of the tree and made its way under the bark.

Annual Rainfall.—The annual rainfall varies greatly in different parts of the earth. It is less than 10 inches in the central part of British America, around Slave lake; in the district north of the Gulf of California; on the western slope of the Andes in South America; in parts of Tartary, Mongolia, Persia and Arabia, in Asia; in the desert of Sahara and a portion of South Western Africa; and in the central portions of Australia. It is over 75 inches on the eastern slope of the Andes, in the Alps, Caucasian Mountains, Bombay, in the Himalayas and many of the islands of the Indian Ocean. Some of the stations in Java and Sumatra register a downfall of about 17 feet of water annually.

Sulphur Deposits in Utah.—At Cove Creek, Southern Utah, a number of sulphur mines have been "located," and some of them slightly developed. Its origin is probably from iron pyrites or other sulphuret in the earth, from which it has been expelled by volcanic heat, and has condensed at the surface. In one place the impure sulphur forms a bed 25 feet in thickness.

The Water-clock.—This is a very ingenious contrivance, which measures time well in both rough weather and fine. It is simply a bucket half filled with water, in which floats the half of a well seraped cocoa-nut shell. In the bottom of this shell is a very small hole, so that when placed to float in the bucket a fine thread of water squirts up into it. This gradually fills the shell, and the size of the hole is so adjusted to the capacity of the vessel that exactly at the end of an hour, plump it goes to the bottom. The watch then cries out the number of hours from sunrise, and sets the shell afloat again empty. This is a very good measure of time. I tested it with my watch, and found that it hardly varied a minute from one hour to another, nor did the motion of the vessel have any effect upon it, as the water in the bucket of course kept level. —Wallace's Malay Archipelago.

A Tame Hawk.—A patient of mine possesses a hawk which is perfectly tame and harmless. He lives most harmoniously with a green linnet which was originally put in his cage for a meal; when first incarcerated with his apparent enemy, he slunk into the furthest corner, no doubt expecting instant death, but perceiving no danger was to be apprehended, he approached the woodland tyrant and very speedily both were on extremely friendly terms; and ever since, if any one goes near the cage, the hawk will open one of his wings to shield his diminutive companion in captivity. At night-time the linnet invariably goes to sleep with his head snugly ensconced under the same protecting canopy. I myself have witnessed the above several times. —E. M. Boddy in Science Gossip.

The Dancing of Gnats.—The periodical meeting of gnats, midges, &c., at certain spots for the purpose of holding their eccentric games is a curious phenomenon. How is it that the same localities are chosen not only night after night, but year after year, by these tiny revellers. On a hot evening I have seen a column of gnats hanging over a tree in a forest, so vast that they looked like the ascending smoke of a camp-fire, and so numerous that the hum of their myriad tiny wings could be heard at 30 yards like the distant sound of the sea. Night after night they came there when the sun set. —E. L. A. in Science Gossip.

THE FRIEND.

THIRD MONTH 3, 1883.

The New York correspondent of the Public Ledger of this city, says of the late William E. Dodge, that his death "occasions a profound feeling of regret throughout the whole community, as it will throughout the country. As a merchant and a citizen he exerted an influence that was felt far and near, and the influence was always on the right side." The writer also quotes the testimony of the President of one of the New York banks, who had been a life-long acquaintance of the deceased, who said he "was famous for the consistency of his religious life with his business career. He never held stock in a railroad which run its cars on the Sabbath day, and he never drank spirituous liquors, no matter what the occasion. When he was travelling in Europe he sometimes found it impossible to get good water to drink, but in that case he drank bad water. His death will be an irreparable loss to the many charitable, religious and temperance associations to which he contributed money, and advice that was quite as valuable. The amounts of his gifts for these purposes were very large; latterly, I know he had given away $100,000 a year. He had enterprise, judgment and perfect integrity, and gave a large share of his attention in helping others."

It is truly a noble testimony, when it can truthfully be said of a man that his "influence was always on the right side," and "his religious life" and "business career," were consistent with each other. We ought to be encouraged and thankful when such illustrations of the effect of religion are presented to us. Yet it must be borne in mind, that true religion always produces such fruits, for we are to know the character of people by their actions. "By their fruits shall ye know them." He who lives in obedience to the Spirit of Christ, will manifest the fruits of the Spirit in his business and his every-day life. He cannot be under the influence of a worldly-minded spirit six days of the week, and be a godly man on the seventh.

The Report of the Managers of the Adelphi School in this city shows that it has been in regular operation during the past year, with an average class-list of 84. The school is largely made up of very small children, who cannot be as regular in attendance as older scholars. From this cause, and also from the prevalence of small-pox, measles and whooping-cough in the early months of the year, the average daily attendance was reduced to 53.

Several of the more needy scholars had been supplied with shoes, through the kindness of some interested friends, and this enabled them to attend at school, when otherwise they would have been confined at home.

The Managers say. "We are encouraged to believe that the school is producing good fruit, inasmuch as it provides for a class who might otherwise receive no schooling whatever—surrounding them with good influences, and starting them in the rudiments of an education."

We believe that some of those who thus disinterestedly devote time and thought to the welfare of others, will experience the truth of the Scripture declaration, "He that watereth shall be watered also himself."

We have received the 28th Annual Report of the Howard Institution, under the care of an association of Women Friends, for the help and relief of persons of their own sex.

The building is located at 1612 Poplar St., Philadelphia. The expenses of conducting the institution during the year 1882 amounted to $3028.93, of which about one-half was received from interest on invested funds, and the balance from donations of those interested in its welfare, and from other sources.

The Report says: "Its Managers are enabled to report continued blessings upon their efforts for the welfare of the sadly interesting objects of their care, giving them renewed assurance that the work, humble as it is, has been owned by the Master to whom it has been offered."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In the U. S. Senate on the 20th ult., the House bill to extend the time for filing claims before the Alabama Claims Court was reported and passed with an amendment which provides that "Every claimant hereafter filing his claim shall state and establish to the satisfaction of the Court, a reasonable cause for his not having presented it within the time fixed by the act of June, 1882, setting forth the facts which occasioned such failure; and shall further establish to the satisfaction of the Court that he was, at the time of his loss, a citizen of the United States, or had lawfully filed a declaration of his intention to become such citizen; and that his loss was one of the first-class described by said act and was incurred while he or his property was on a ship sailing under the flag of the United States."

Several of the appropriation bills are in the hands of Conference Committees of the two Houses.

The wheat crop of 1883, on the Pacific coast, it is calculated will reach seventy million bushels. The San Francisco Journal of Commerce says, the present season bears a striking resemblance to that of 1879-80, when the yield was about 20 bushels per acre. The wheat sown covers about three and one-half million acres.

In the New Jersey House of Representatives, all the prohibition measures, including the Constitutional amendment, have been defeated successively.

In the Senate of Maine on the 19th ult., the Constitutional Prohibitory amendment was passed by a vote of 21 to 2. A bill was also passed allowing women to vote on school matters.

Chief Justice Day, of Iowa, has ordered the petition of the Attorney General of that State for a rehearing of the Prohibition Amendment case to be docketed for the term of the Court at Council Bluffs.

The British steamer Glamorgan, from Liverpool for Boston, was abandoned at sea in a sinking condition, on the 16th ult., after a fearful storm, in which her captain and five seamen were washed overboard and lost, the survivors were taken off by the steamer Republic, which arrived at New York on Seventh-day evening last. In transferring them to the Republic another seaman was drowned. The cargo of the lost steamer was valued at $200,000. There is an insurance of about $100,000 upon it in Boston companies and agencies.

On the afternoon of the 19th of last month, a panic was caused in the schoolhouse attached to a Roman Catholic chapel, in New York, by an outbreak of fire under the stairs on the second floor. Several hundred children rushed wildly down the stairs, and the railing giving way the struggling mass was thrown to the floor below. Sixteen children were killed and six injured, several dangerously.

The public schools in Leadville, Colorado, have been closed, owing to the prevalence of small-pox.

There were 358 deaths in this city last week, 9 less than the previous week, and 40 less than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number, 187 were males, and 171 females; 65 died of consumption; 25 of pneumonia; 23 of old age; 20 of diphtheria; 14 of convulsions; 12 of croup, and 9 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 104½; 3½'s 104; 4½'s, registered, 112½; coupon, 113½; 4's, 119½; currency 6's, 129 a 132.

Cotton continues dull, but prices were steady. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 10¾ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7¾ a 7½ cts. for export, and 8¾ a 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in moderate request and prices are firm. Sales of 2850 barrels, including Minnesota extras, in small lots, at $5.75 a $6.75; Pennsylvania family at $5.25; western do. at $5.75 a $6.40, and patents at $6.25 a $8. Rye flour is firm at $4 a $4.12½ per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is in better demand and a fraction higher. Sales of 5300 bushels red, in car lots at $1.18 a $1.25. Rye is firm at 70 cts. for prime Penna. Corn is dull and lower. Sales of 9000 bushels, in car lots, at 61 a 70 cts., the later for sail, yellow and track. Oats are ½c. higher. Sales of 10,000 bushels, in car lots, at 51 a 58½ cts.

Beef cattle were in good demand and prices were a fraction higher: 2900 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5½ a 7½ cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were in demand at an advance: 12,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5 a 7 cts. per pound, and lambs at 5 a 8 cts. per lb. as to condition.

Hogs were dull, but prices were unchanged; 2800 head sold at the different yards at 9½ a 10½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

FOREIGN.—Much time has been occupied during the past week in the House of Commons in debate on Gorst's amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, declaring that, in view of the confessions of the Irish assassins, no further concessions should be made to lawless agitation.

In Paris, fourteen bishops have been summoned before the Council of State, for publishing a Papal decree placing certain treatises on education in the index expurgatorius.

In the Chamber of Deputies, on the 22d ult., Prime Minister Ferry explained the programme of the Ministry and solicited the confidence of the country. He said the Government's first care would be to satisfy the wish of the Chamber by applying the law of under which the Princes would be deprived of military posts. The Government thought that no more was necessary at the present. The Republic not endangered, and in the event of a conspiracy have ample power to protect itself by rights in all governments. Without infringing upon the civil liberties of the people, the Government demands that measures be taken against the utterances of seditious cries and against the authors of seditious placards. Irritating questions and fruitless discussions, he must be set aside, leaving to the Government the initiative, which belongs to it as a right. Reforms were required in the Magistracy. A Military bill and a Habitual Criminal's bill were to be introduced. The Budget for 1884 would shortly be presented. Minister Ferry said the Government proposes to facilitate execution of public works, and to introduce measures looking to the organization of a protectorate in Tunis and the reduction of the expenses of the occupation of that country. The foreign policy of the Government, he said, will be peaceful, but not necessarily one of inaction, "Whenever our interests and honor are engaged, we must maintain France in the rank to which she is entitled. It is essential to give Europe the spectacle of a Government sure of its future and determined against factions; of an administration strong, respected, and of a parliamentary Republic resting on the French virtues of good sense, labor and progress."

About 4000 boats and 25,000 fishermen are engaged in the sardine industry on the French coast. There are about 200 factories, in which 15,000 to 17,000 workers are employed. A good catch for a boat would be 20 fish a day, for which they get about thirty-five francs thousand.

King Alfonso of Spain, it is said, will accept a proposal which has been made to him to act as an arbitrator between Colombia and Venezuela on the question of their respective boundaries.

The National Zeitung says the German Colonial Society intends to colonize Fernando with Germans.

Morocco has contracted with the Paris Mint for the issue of various denominations, representing a total value of about $5,000,000. On one side of the coin will be stamped a verse from the Koran, and on the other date according to the Hegira.

A telegram from St. John, New Brunswick, reports the herring fishery "never better than at present. Some of the sailing smacks make catches of as many as 50,000 fish."

The Mexican Government expenditures for the fiscal year are estimated at $27,000,000, and the revenues at 35,000,000.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE.

The Annual Meeting of the Contributors to the "Asylum for the Relief of Persons Deprived of the Use of their Reason," will be held on Fourth-day, the 14th month 14th, 1883, at 3 o'clock p. m., at the Commercial of Arch St. Meeting-house, Philadelphia.

WANTED,

By 4th month 23rd, 1883, a teacher for Bradford parative Meeting School.

Address,

LYDIA D. WORTH
Marshallton, Chester Co., Pa.

DIED, at Salem, Second month 7th, 1883, ELLIOTT NICHOLS, wife of Wm. Nichols, aged 66 years a days, an esteemed member of Salem Monthly Meeting of Friends, Iowa. This dear Friend stood firm to principles of Friends through all the trials that our society has been passing through. Her life was characterized by integrity, purity and a conscientious regard for truth; with a watchful care faithfully discharging her manifest duty, however great the cross to her will; a tender mother, an affectionate wife, and a pathizing friend; the poor and afflicted being the objects of her attention, often denying herself necessities of life that she might help others. During her illness many expressions fell from her lips to those around her that she was ready and waiting as a shock of corn fully ripe, was gathered into heavenly garner.

For "The Friend."

Susanna Wesley.

The following brief account of the life of Susanna Wesley, taken from "Consecrated Women," is submitted for publication in "The Friend," with the desire that some "weary way-worn mother" who may at times almost like fainting beneath their burdens, may be encouraged to press forward on their journey of life with renewed vigor, when remembering what this dedicated woman was enabled to accomplish in training her beloved children for a life of usefulness here, and, we trust, happiness hereafter.

Susanna Wesley was the wife of a clergyman, whose income never exceeded £200 a year. They were married about the year 1700, and had nineteen children, of whom ten died in their infancy; yet with the nine left might be supposed the mere struggle for subsistence and the cares attending on such a family would have proved an excuse for neglect of their mental training on the part of the mother. But before we inquire whether such an excuse were needed, let us consider some of the circumstances that surrounded her.

Her husband was an excellent but eccentric man, too much engaged in the duties of his pastoral office, and in literary pursuits, to be able to give very much assistance in the early education of the children.

The parish of Epworth, where the greater part of their lives was spent, is situated in a part of Lincolnshire known as The Island; and during that period the resort of a peculiarly wild and lawless population, upon whom the learning and scholarship of Samuel Wesley produced but little effect. His parsonage was twice burnt (it was believed by incendiaries, in revenge for some difference of opinion in political matters;) and on another occasion the parson was taken off to prison, by some powerful adversary, for a small debt which a little forbearance would have enabled him to pay. These troubles, as may be supposed, fell heavily on the noble wife and mother. The great conflagration took place in the night; and the family were aroused from their slumbers by the cry of 'Fire!' but, after great exertions, it was believed all the living treasures were saved. Suddenly, however, it was found that one lovely little boy, of about six, was sleeping alone in a room which had not been entered. The father endeavored to force his way to it, but was met by volumes of smoke and hissing flames; the staircase fell, and thus all access from within was cut off, and the father, in his agony, knelt down to commend the soul of his child to God. Meanwhile, the little one had been awakened by a red gleam on the walls, and, after attempting in vain to escape by the door, he ran to the window, where the little white figure was espied by some kind people who had gathered below. 'Go for a ladder!' cried one. 'There is no time,' answered his neighbor; 'but mount on my shoulder and open the casement.' It was done, and the child borne safely from the very jaws of the fire into his parents' arms. Well might they kneel down and thank God when they saw their children all safe about them; and well might this son, in after years, when his fame as John Wesley was world-wide, describe himself as literally, as well as spiritually, 'a brand plucked from the burning.' Thus wave after wave of trouble swept over the heads of this noble pair, but the anchor of their faith held fast.

It was some time before their parsonage was rebuilt, and the family, which had been perforce dispersed, was re-collected. At length, however, this was accomplished, though it was found that some good had been lost by the children during the dispersion; and something like quiet settled down around them. Susanna Wesley was almost the sole instructress of her daughters, and of her sons also, with the exception of the classical lessons given to both by their father, until the sons were ready for college. Her methods were peculiar, and might not be necessary or possible in all instances, though eminently successful in this. Strict discipline was of course of the first importance among such a number, in so limited a space, and when so little help of any kind was to be had. For instance, no child was permitted to cry aloud after the age of one year; and strict rules as to food and sleep, &c., were enacted. Perfect honesty, uprightness, and truthfulness were enforced; reverence for their superiors, and just, as well as kindly feeling among themselves, and courtesy towards those of a humbler class of life, were strictly inculcated.

Regular school hours and lessons were observed, and, as an instance of her indefatigable zeal and industry, it is told that, not satisfied with any manual of religious instruction within her reach, she prepared one herself for the use of her children. Her own practice was to spend two hours daily in private and special prayer and communion with her God. Here we have one of the secrets of her strength, and of the calmness of soul which enabled her to accomplish her daily work. She trained her children to a similar habit suited to their years. She also made a point of having special religious conversation with them; and by this means, and afterwards through correspondence, she maintained unbroken the bonds of confidence between her children and herself, keeping open as it were the pathway between their hearts and her own, along which travelled many a loving word of counsel, of warning, or of cheer. Few things perhaps are more touchingly beautiful than to see how her sons, as young and strong men, applied to her for help and advice in their spiritual embarrassments and difficulties, how they poured out their troubles into her willing ear, and were animated by her words and the unspeakable yearnings of her soul for their welfare.

Nor was this excellent woman unmindful of the condition of her poorer neighbors. When her husband was absent on Church affairs in London, and service in the church was held only once on the First day of the week, she made it a practice to invite a few of the people about, to join in her family reading with her children in the kitchen of the parsonage. This became so popular that her room was soon crowded, and she was almost startled at her own work. She read to them the best sermons she could find in her husband's library, and at length the people begged they might remain during the family worship, which she also conducted during the absence of her husband. Some exaggerated account of all this reached the ears of the worthy man, and he wrote in great alarm; but she was so convinced that she was doing rightly and usefully that she said in reply, after explaining how simple the whole thing was, that if he still wished her to abstain he must command her to do so, and then she should think it her duty to submit.

Thus, amid labor and prayer, wifely submission and family love, life passed away in this remote parsonage among the fens of Lincolnshire; till at length, one by one, the sons left their home, some of the daughters married, and the father was laid down to rest in the quiet churchyard that surrounded the scene of his life-long labors. Then Susanna Wesley went forth, still in outward poverty, and found a home with one or other of her children, until her turn too came to 'go across the river.' She continued to be their best earthly guide and counsellor, and was soothed in return by their devoted love and filial care. She had the happiness of believing that all her children (though to them, as to herself, life had anything but a thornless path to offer) were conscious heirs of a better and more enduring inheritance. Some of them she saw prominently and extensively useful to a degree that has not often been equalled, and at her peaceful falling asleep she had the joy of believing that, through the riches of redeeming love, she would be permitted to rejoin or to welcome every one of her nineteen children in the better world to which she was hastening."

The luxury of luxuries is that of doing good.

For "The Friend."

Gleanings from Quaker Annals.

Self-denial was the practice and glory of the ancients, who were predecessors to the coming of Christ in the flesh; and shall we hope to go to heaven without it now, when our Saviour himself has become the most excellent example of it? And that, not as some would fain have it, viz., "He for us, that we need not;" but for us, that we might deny ourselves, and so be the true followers of his blessed example.

Whoever thou art, therefore, that wouldst do the will of God, but faintest in thy desires from the opposition of worldly considerations; remember I tell thee in the name of Christ, that he who prefers father or mother, sister or brother, wife or child, house or land, reputation, honor, office, liberty or life, before the testimony of the light of Jesus in his own conscience, shall be rejected of Him in the solemn and general inquest upon the world, when all shall be judged, and receive according to the deeds done, not the profession made in this life. It is the doctrine of Jesus, that if thy right hand offend thee, thou must cut it off; and if thy right eye offend thee thou must pluck it out; that is, if the most dear, the most useful and tender comforts thou enjoyest, stand in thy soul's way and interrupt thy obedience to the voice of God, and thy conformity to his holy will revealed in thy soul, thou art engaged, under the penalty of damnation, to part with them.

The way of God is a way of faith, as dark to sense as it is mortal to self. The children of obedience, with holy Paul, count all things but as dross, that they may win Christ, and know and walk in this narrow way. Speculation will not do it, nor can refined notions enter it; the obedient only eat the good of the land. They that do my Father's will, says the blessed Jesus, shall know my doctrine; them He will instruct. There is no room for instruction, where lawful self is lord and not servant. For self cannot receive it; that which should, is oppressed by self; fearful, and dares not. What will my father or mother say? How will my husband use me? Or, what will the magistrates do with me? For though I have a most powerful persuasion, and clear conviction on my soul, of this or that thing, yet considering how unmodish it is, what enemies it has, and how strange and singular I shall seem to them, I hope God will pity my weakness, if I sink; I am but flesh and blood; it may be hereafter He will better enable me; and there is time enough. Thus selfish, fearful man.

Deliberating is ever worst; for the soul loses in parley: the manifestation brings power with it. Never did God convince people, but, upon submission He empowered them. He requires nothing without ability to perform it; that were mocking, not saving men. It is enough for thee to do thy duty, that God shows thee thy duty; provided thou closest with the light and spirit, by which He gives thee that knowledge. They that want power, are such as do not receive Christ in his convictions upon the soul; and such will always want it; but such as do receive Him, receive power also, like those of old, to become the children of God, through the pure obedience of faith.

Wherefore, let me beseech you, by the love and mercy of God, by the life and death of Christ, by the power of his Spirit, and the hope of immortality, you whose hearts are established in your temporal comforts, and are lovers of self more than of these heavenly things, let the time past suffice; think it not enough to be clear of such impieties, as too many are found in, whilst your inordinate love of lawful things has defiled your enjoyment of them, and drawn your hearts from the fear, love, obedience, and self-denial of a true disciple of Jesus. Turn about then, and hearken to the still voice in thy conscience; it tells thee of thy sins, and of misery in them. It gives a lively discovery of the very vanity of the world, and opens to thy soul some prospect of eternity, and the comforts of the just who are at rest. If thou adherest to this, it will divorce thee from sin and self; thou wilt soon find, that the power of its charms exceeds that of the wealth, honor and beauty of the world, and, finally, will give thee that tranquillity, which the storms of time can never shipwreck or disorder. Here all thine enjoyments are blest; though small, yet great by that presence which is within them.

Even in this world the righteous have the better of it, for they use the world without rebuke, because they do not abuse it. They see and bless the hand that feeds and clothes, and preserves them. Beholding Him in all his gifts, they do not adore them, but Him; so the sweetness of his blessing who gives them, is an advantage such have over those who see Him not. In their increase they are not lifted up, nor in their adversities are they cast down; because they are moderated in the one, and comforted in the other, by his divine presence.

In short, heaven is the throne, and the earth but the footstool of that man, who hath self under foot. Those who know that station will not be easily moved; they learn to number their days, that they may not be surprised with their dissolution; and to "redeem their time, because the days are evil;" remembering that they are but stewards, and must deliver up their accounts to an impartial Judge. Therefore, not to self, but to Him they live, and in Him they die, and are blessed with them that die in the Lord.

Without Ballast.—One day the Escambia, a British iron steamer, loaded with wheat, weighed anchor and started down the bay of San Francisco. The pilot left her when about five miles outside the Golden Gate. Looking back from his pilot boat a short time after, he saw the vessel stop, drift into the trough of the sea, careen to port, both bulwarks going under water, then suddenly capsize and sink.

What was the cause of this sad catastrophe? A want of ballast. She came into port from China, a few weeks before, with a thousand emigrants on board. But she had in her hold immense tanks for what is called water ballast. Those tanks were full, and she battled successfully with wind and waves. But the captain, wishing to carry all the wheat he could between decks, neglected to fill those tanks. He thought the cargo would steady the ship. But it made it top-heavy, and the first rough sea capsize it.

Here, then, was a vessel tight and strong, with powerful engines, with a cargo worth $100,000, foundering as soon as she left harbor, taking down with her a crew of forty-five men, because the captain failed to have her properly ballasted. The moment she began to lurch, the wheat all tumbled over the lower side, and down into the sea went.

How this wreck of the Escambia repeat the trite lesson that so many have tried to teach, and that they who need it most are slow to learn. Young men starting on life want to carry as little ballast as possible. They are enterprising, ambitious. They are anxious to go fast and take as much cargo as they can. Old-fashioned principles are regarded as dead weight. It does not pay to keep them, and they are thrown overboard. Good home habits are abandoned in order to be popular with the gay and worldly. The Bible is not read, religious duties are neglected, and lo! some day, when all the sails are spread, a sudden temptation comes and wrecks the character and the life.

We cannot urge too strongly upon young men, in these days of intense activity, the vital importance of ballast. A conscience seems to be an incumbrance—an obstacle to prosperity. But it is a safe thing to have on board. It steadies the soul. It keeps it from careening when the winds drive it into the trough of the sea. If the Escambia had taken less wheat and more ballast, it might have been afloat to-day. And this is true of many a man now in prison or in the gutter. Haste to be rich—the impatience of restraint! how their wrecks lie just outside the world's Golden Gates.—Christian World.

For "The Friend."

Letter from Asenath Clark.

[The following letter from that worthy Friend, Asenath Clark, then of North Carolina, was written soon after the decease of her husband, and has been sent to us for insertion in "The Friend." It was directed to the Rev. Mary Kite, who at one time paid a religious visit to the meetings of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, accompanied by Pennoek Passmore and Mary Passmore. It was found among the papers of the last-named Friend.]

Although many years have passed since it was penned, the Christian encouragement which it contains may prove refreshing to some of our readers; and strengthen them still to abide "in Him who is the way, the truth and the life," believing that as they have experienced, "no weapon formed against them shall prosper."—Ed.]

11th mo. 30th, 1855.

My dear and much beloved friend and sister in the unchangeable Truth,—I have just been looking over thy truly sympathetic and evangelical letter, which has brought thee, this morning, very near and dear to my best feelings; and whilst thou seems willing in Christian love to hold out a hand of encouragement to a poor sister in tribulation, spirit seemed to salute thee, and many obligations in your Yearly Meeting, in the language of affectionate encouragement to hold fast to which you have received—let no man take your crown. Though the mountains should depart and the hills be removed, yet my kindness shall not depart from thee, sayeth the Lord who hath mercy on thee:—and as I keep in the meekness of Him who rode Jerusalem upon a colt, the foal of an ass. I was looking towards you this morning fore I rose from my bed, this language seemed to come vividly before my mind, "Rejoice atly, oh daughter of Zion, shout for joy, oh daughter of Jerusalem, for thy King cometh to thee, just, having salvation, lowly, and riding upon an ass."

I am truly sensible, my dear Mary, that you are one who servest the Son and Sent of God in this humble, self-denying way, and your bread will be given thee—thy water shall be sure; and although your Yearly Meeting seems like being yet emptied from vessel to vessel, and sifted from sieve to sieve, yet the mighty wheat will remain when the chaff is ridded away, and the fine gold will lose nothing of its brightness, worth, or weight by being melted, and passing from time to time through the fire. What I earnestly crave for myself and my dear friends is that we may keep close to Him who was led as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so He opened not his mouth; this is the safety of all in this day who are depending for those precious testimonies of truth and righteousness, and desire to preserve them in their purity as they came from the hands of those dignified sons of the morning. If these keep on the same foundation in singleness of mind, and are abiding in Him who is the Way, the Truth, and the Life, no aposton formed against them shall prosper, and every tongue which rises in judgment against them they shall condemn. I believe there are many in your Yearly Meeting who are a foundation to stand upon, and I am comforted in believing they will stand upon without being moved with evil tidings. My heart is toward you of that Yearly Meeting: though our poor Yearly Meeting has come to the conclusion to break off all correspondence with you in an epistolary way, yet I believe if you and Ohio Yearly Meeting continue still, whilst a mighty and strong wind, which the Lord is not in, is rending the mountains and parting the hills asunder, your heads I still be covered as with a mantle of love, and in due time you will be called out again to execute the command of the Most High.

I hardly know what to say about our recent Yearly Meeting. If multiplicity of words means the favor of a Yearly Meeting it certainly was a favored one, for we had abundance of them; but however nicely some may play the golden harp—however eloquently they may chant the songs of Zion when nothing crosses their path—if when the distressed state of Society is brought into view they rise up and openly become accusers of the brethren, don't want anything more from them:—but must stop lest I become like I thought some of them were.

Thou hast heard, I suppose, that in addition to our other bereavements, we have lost my brother-in-law Joshua Stanley. My dear sister sent for me, and I went directly to them. I found myself again in a house of mourning.

I was confined two weeks in close confinement with my sister—stood by him when his immortal spirit took its flight from the suffering tabernacle, and no doubt with me when it entered into everlasting rest;—when the remains were laid away, I returned home only one day and a-half before the commencement of our Yearly Meeting, of the sittings of which I attended, (with heart bleeding with these fresh wounds) one of which I thought were seasons of sorrow, and some were very painful ones, in which in thinking of my dear departed husband I was ready to say, "Blessed are the dead who have died in the Lord"—his dear redeemed spirit was delivered from being interrupted with those things which would have wounded his very heart, and caused him to go mourning on his way. I think there were very few Tennessee Friends in attendance; Aaron Hammer or wife were neither of them there. I cannot say that I came in contact with any of them, for I was weary and the sittings exceedingly long, so that I got away as soon as I could.

Thoughts about the Eternal Gospels and the Falling Babylon.

BY CHARLES SHIELDSTREAM.

Christ is the same forever, and so are his followers. The children of Light or friends of God (in scorn called Quakers), are the same in all ages. That principle, which was believed and followed in the days of the patriarchs, of Job, Elihu, and the prophets of the old covenant, of the philosophers without the covenant, (as Socrates, Plato, Seneca and others,) of Christ and his first apostles, of Jacob Boehme and George Fox, they believe in and follow to-day, viz., the Light of Christ in man, which is general and all-sufficient for man's salvation; and what they denied and rejected in former days, they reject to-day:—

1. They reject the doctrine that the Scriptures of truth are the only guide and rule for the salvation of man. For the guide and rule of man's salvation is the Light, Grace and Spirit of Christ within man. George Fox corrected the hireling who preached that the Scriptures were the rule, saying: Oh, no! it is not the Scripture, it is the Spirit of God who gave forth the Scriptures.

2. They therefore reject and have no fellowship with the making conversion (so-called) to depend on believing certain Scripture texts; and regarding those as saved who profess such belief.

3. They reject as human inventions such expressions as three different persons of the Godhead.

4. They reject all kinds of worship done in man's will; even the most eloquent and scriptural preaching, human inventions, as sacraments, so-called, and singing and music, which burthens the pure life, and feeds carnality.

5. They reject all doctrine of a substituted righteousness without sanctification. For a man is not justified before God if he is not sanctified.

Now those that reject these main points and do not believe and follow Christ as the true Light and teacher in themselves, for their salvation, and do not worship God in spirit and in truth, in inward communion with Him, are not sanctified; they are Babylonians; and if they call themselves Friends or Quakers, they are not such, but bogus Quakers and apostates from the truth. But we have not to use or recognise any nickname. Friends of God or children of Light, is what all who are partakers of the divine glory and nature in the light are.

I will most seriously turn the reader's attention to the deep perplexities and difficulties George Fox passed through, when his mind was burthened with the iniquity of the priests and professors and false religions; how he first thought that some man could tell him something, and when he sought in vain, found that only Christ could speak to his condition. Oh how many, with myself, have been grieved the same way, by seeing the inconsistency among the professors and priests, and hearing them plead for sin and imperfections; and we have almost been tempted to say, there is no God; but have been turned by God's leading from man into the wilderness, and there received the teaching of the Light within, and by the light have come off conquerors! George Fox did see that all the world's religions were Babylon; and so we see to-day. Be it therefore understood, that there is but one true religion which is spiritual; or Christ is the true Light which enlightens every man that cometh into the world, and those that obey and follow the Light become sons of God. This is the truth, which I have written.

I cannot omit to say once more, that the true servants of Christ are not half-hearted, for they know that they are not their own, for they are Christ's and partakers with their Master in his glory and power. They have been buried with their Lord through his spiritual baptism, and have risen with Him, and their minds are above self and vanities of the world, and they know indeed that they do the will of God which abideth for ever. As they possess to the full extent the real character of the new covenant—that God dwelleth in man and walketh in man—they can realize the will of God in his time, and rejoice in the Light and the power which is given to men. O, they can say that the seed of God remaineth and ruleth and is over all weakness and over death itself.

To them, Christ is the resurrection and life indeed. The second death has no power over them. The grave has no victory; death has no sting—oh no! But it is their delight to do the will of God, and the will of God is that all men shall be saved and come to the knowledge of truth by that means which is given for that purpose, viz., the Light of Christ in men, God's gift for man's salvation, and antidote against the seed of sin which the enemy sows in the heart of man. The servants of Christ will turn all men to take heed to the Light in themselves; and if they do, it is an all-sufficient teacher for man's salvation. When all things are shown in the light, and people walk in the light of the Lamb, no priestcraft is needed—Babylon is fallen. For all the true believers and followers of the Light have cut loose from all the outward and vain traditions of man, and from all vain, changeable teachers. They have built on the rock and they are immovable as rocks. But Christ is a stumbling-block and a rock of offence to all that believe not in the Light which is the Life in Christ, how much soever they may believe in his outward life, sufferings and death. The Jews believed from the Scriptures that Christ was to come, but they rejected Him when He came, because they rejected his Light. The Christians, so-called, believe from the Scripture that Christ is come; but they do not believe in the Light by which He has enlightened them, and which He has commanded, viz., believe in the Light that ye may become children of the Light; and therefore they are in the darkness, having their spiritual eyes closed. But they that are believers in the Light, and are become children of the Light, they walk in Christ, their way, life and salvation, and they have a discerning spirit and they judge a right judgment, never calling sweet bitter, or bitter sweet.

Life's Difficulties.

While spending "Christmas" at Penmaenmawr I was kept indoors for several days by exceptionally wet and boisterous weather. Having occasion one very uninviting morning to post some letters in the village, I prolonged the walk by way of variety although the snow and sleet were driving over the hills which protect this quiet and beautiful retreat from the north and east winds. Through lanes with hedgerows green with ivy, holly, and brambles, my way led up the hillside to the Green Gorge, a wild and beautiful defile between two bold hills covered with heather. The bottom of this gorge is carpeted with soft green grass, slippery enough in dry summer weather, but a thin coating of snow and the sloppy condition of the ground made climbing still more difficult now, and the driving snow meeting me full in the face made the uncertainty of the foothold still more uncertain. Onwards I pressed, however, step by step, till I stood at the top of the pass, just at the foot of the last spur of Old Moel Llys, a grand hill skirting Penmaenmawr on the east. Not a creature was to be seen save the hardy mountain sheep, and the grouse startled from their food among the heather. But I had my reward in a healthy glow, a feeling of difficulties overcome, a fine view of the gorge under uncommon conditions, and a bracing of the whole physical and moral nature.

How much, thought I, is this struggle up the pass like the life experience of most men and women! Battling at every step with difficulties, finding the wind and weather of circumstances against them, but in overcoming and surmounting these, finding just the stimulus to perseverance, determination, prudence, and forethought, which is the groundwork of all true and noble lives. For self-reliance is as necessary to the perfection of the moral, as faith and trust are to the spiritual part of our nature; and, were this remembered in our daily lives, how would it assist us to bear, with patience and a brave strong heart, the various little ills and disappointments which continually cross our path! Were it not for these very difficulties, what a feeble and emasculated race would mankind become! We have repeatedly heard it averred that the indomitable character of the English people is a consequence of the "cold grey weather," east winds, and leaden skies, which render active exertion necessary if we would keep the temperature of our bodies comfortable. Indeed, we have but to read biographies to see that the best and noblest of mankind were made what they were [in part at least] by difficulties, dangers, and trials overcome. Take a case in point. What would William Penn have been had he not taken the moral tonic of obeying conscience, instead of the desire of his father, the old admiral? Opposition, difficulties, persecutions and dangers, estrangement of friends, seemed the food on which his soul lived and thrived. He was sailing up one of the American rivers towards his newly acquired possession, and but small progress was made owing to wind and tide being against him. A friend remarking on this, William Penn replied, that was nothing new to him, as he had been sailing against wind and tide all his life. There can be little doubt that, if the law of the survival of the fittest, as seen in the extinction of races of animals, unable to hold their own against adverse conditions, is a beneficent one; so also is the law of the ultimate survival of those races and families of mankind who possess the qualities of courage, perseverance, patience, and a determination to overcome the difficulties which obstruct their path. THOUGHTS SUGGESTED BY THE DEATH OF A SISTER'S CHILD.

When a worn and weary pilgrim
Looking toward the gates of day,
Patient still, is ever longing
Unto rest to flee away,

Welcome then may be the message,
Welcome then the messenger,
As Death comes to bear him upward,
To the shining gates afar.

But unto the living ever,
Who behold the work of woe,
As some cherished life is vanquished,
He must seem a cruel foe.

Not alone the aged pilgrim,
Or the worldling bowed with years,
Or the mourner seeking respite
In the grave from woe and tears—

Not the wrecked on life's broad ocean,
Who have seen their hopes depart,
Who have tried the world and found it
Hollow, hollow to the heart;

But those full of strength and vigor,
With bright hopes and joyous heart,
Bride and bridegroom, youth and maiden,
Man and child alike depart.

Oh the flowers of spring are lovely,
Yet they early fade and fall!
And the birds of summer cheer us,
Though death may be traced on all!

So the loveliest human blossoms,
Buds of rarest promise bright,
Earthly hopes and earthly treasures,
Ever perish from the sight.

But we know, and this is healing,
That a Higher can command;
When Death stands with arm uplifted,
Bid him smite, or stay his hand.

Scarcely yet the clods are resting
O'er a bright and gentle one,
Whose pure love, like hallowed sunshine,
Sweetly on our pathway shone.

One whose feet would soon be stepping
Out of childhood into youth;
One who seemed a living lesson
Of pure innocence and truth.

One whose memory must often
Bring to mind the Father's love:
If He lends to earth such spirits,
What are those that dwell above?

Will not thoughts of her so patient,
Meek, forbearing, tender, mild,
Sometimes raise the prayer unspoken—
Make me as a little child?

There is something sweet and holy
In the yielding up of life,
While the heart is fresh and stainless,
And the spirit knows no strife.

That although the heart-strings vibrate
At the touch of grief thereon,
Are the notes all sorrow-laden,
Are they mournful sounds alone?

Sometimes in the quiet pauses,
Sometimes when the heart is calm,
In the hushed and tender silence,
Hear we not an echoing psalm?

Is there not an anthem swelling,
In a peaceful undertone,
That would lull the heart's commotion,
While it breathes of joy alone?

That the barque is safely anchored,
Ere it crossed the breakers high,
Ere the masts by storms were riven,
Ere the darkening night drew nigh;

That the journey is completed,
Ere the tender feet had pressed
O'er the rough and stony places,
That still break the travellers' rest,

Ere they wandered from the pathway
Leading upward to the sky,
Or through weariness had stumbled
On the mountains dark and high.

Joy that folded safe forever,
In that home of beauty bright,
One more in the song is joining,
One more wears the robe of white!

Oh if mourners thus might hearken
To the echo of the song;
Echo of the harp's rich music,
That the notes of joy prolong,

Would we not forget our sorrow?
While the clouds above our way
Roll afar, or grow translucent,
With Hope's sweetly beaming ray.

Though our lost have lived through cycles,
Or till age has cast its snows,
If we feel that they are resting
Where the crystal river flows,

How the heart, so torn and bleeding,
In that blest assurance given,
Finds the balm of peace and healing
Binding severed links to Heaven!

Then may we with resignation,
To the Father's will bow low,
Bless the hand that thus hath smitten,
And in wisdom deals the blow.

Till the gold from dross is severed,
Till our lives one prayer shall be,
Guide us, oh Thou Great Jehovah,
Upward to our lost and Thee!

Into whose hands are the means of usefulness most frequently placed? Who is most frequently called to witness scenes of sorrow and death? Is it not the physician?

The pious minister is occasionally seated in the languishing beds of a part of the community with messages of love; but the physician's call is to friend and stranger; to the destitute, friendless and profane, in the depth of adversity. When the mind is softened by affliction, it is the most susceptible of divine instruction; and when every token of sympathy, or consoling word, is a cordial to the soul, if received from those who are administering the cup of hopeful relief, it increases the confidence. How vastly important that they be men of God, and willing instruments in his hand; seeking his aid, and immediate direction in the treatment of each where the lives of their patients are put in their hands; and asking wisdom to administer the balm of consolation and instruction to the bleeding soul, and to bind up the broken heart.

Then would they be Samaritans indeed, whose labors would be crowned with success and whose minds would be richly rewarded with the blessing of heavenly peace.—Catherine Seely.

The Administration of the Discipline.

In conversation last evening with my beloved father, he said that in the course of experience, he had remarked, that those ends who had manifested a disposition to hate the offences of those who had broken discipline, generally lost ground in a religious sense; and those whom they were desired to screen, rarely came to anything in church; and when such fell away, they were more severe against the unfaithful ones, than against those, who, in the uprightness of their hearts, could not compromise the use of Truth, but stood steadfast in its support, against wrong things. He was not in favor of a rigid administration of the discipline; but he believed that where it was kept in a disposition to restore, and when that failed to produce the effect, to keep to the judgment of Truth; it would always be found in the end, best for the meeting and for the member."—Journal of William Evans.

How the Kitchen-boy became a Bishop.

About two hundred and eighty years ago a clerk was wanted in the parish church of Ugborough, a little village in Devonshire; and one of the candidates was a young lad about sixteen years of age, who came from a neighboring village. But he did not get the place on account of his youth. He was very much let down. He was the son of poor, but pious parents, and one of a large family of brothers and sisters. He said to his mother, with a heavy heart, "I must not be a burden longer upon father and you; I shall set out and find work of some kind or other elsewhere, and support myself."

So he bade farewell to his father and his brothers and sisters, and, with a little bundle in his hand, he left his home. His mother sat with him two or three miles of the way. When at length she was obliged to turn back, she knelt down with him at the road-side and begged God to bless him and go with him and keep him from every evil way. Then she took out some money and gave it to him for his journey. Then the two kissed each other, and, weeping, parted.

By-and-by he arrived at the city of Exeter. He went to the cathedral; he wandered about the streets; he called at the shops; but of all, whom he applied that day, no one had work for him. At last, he found himself standing at the window of a book-shop, looking at the rows of books on the shelves within. At that moment, happening to lift his eyes, he caught a glimpse of the cathedral; and the thought suddenly shot into his mind that there was a connection between these books and the cathedral. If he, poor though he was, could become learned in books, he might be worthy of a place some day in the cathedral. It was a mere thought and it soon passed away from his mind. He left Exeter and travelled on and on, till he found himself in Exeter. He knew nobody there. But, having passed through Exeter, and knowing that Exeter College was the one to which Devonshire students went, he knocked at the gates of that college and asked if they wanted a lad like him, for any work he could do. They wanted such a lad as he. And in a short time he was employed to scour pans, to clean shoes, to brush shoes, and in other ways help in the kitchen.

John was a faithful servant, and soon became a favorite with everybody about the college. And, as he had a good many hours of leisure, he set himself to learn Latin and Greek. And by-and-by the dons going past saw the kitchen boy poring over loose leaves of grammars, and would ask him jokingly if he was reading Homer or the Latin poets.

But after awhile, one and then another gave up joking at the lad and went near to him, and saw that by himself alone he had come very near to the reading both of Homer and the Latin poets. And then the dons took him away from the kitchen and made room for him in the classes of their college, and he became one of their foremost scholars, and one in whom they all felt pride.

And by-and-by John was made a "fellow," and then a professor of divinity, and for twenty-seven years he labored in that college as a professor and writer of books, where he had served as kitchen boy. And at the end of that time he was made a Bishop of Worcester, and therein proved the truth of the thought, shot through his mind, at the window of the book-shop in Exeter, that there was a way through books to a place in a cathedral.

Bishop Prideaux was never ashamed of his early trials. He kept the leathern clothes, in which he set out from his father's house, to his old age. He loved to revisit the village in which he was born. He greatly loved his parents. In his kindness he would plan surprise visits. He would bring his doctor's scarlet gown and put it on to please them. He never tired of showing them reverence. Often he would say, "If I had got the clerk's place in Ugborough, I should never have been Bishop in Worcester."—Sunday Magazine.

11th mo. 6th, 1882. Listened to the conversation of an elderly man, now in the Post-office Department at Washington, who had been in the Union army during the war of the rebellion.

When in the Wilderness, their lines were so extended, that it was fourteen miles from one extreme to the other; and fighting was of daily occurrence on some part of the line. As he stood at his post, and saw the wounded men being carried to the rear, he remembered that our Saviour was ushered into the world with the anthem: "Glory to God in the highest; on earth, peace and good-will to men;" and he asked himself, "are we men or devils?" J. W.

Kidnapping in Scotland.—Lecky states that the citizens of Aberdeen, Scotland, were noted for a scandalous system of decoying young boys from the country and selling them as slaves to the planters in Virginia. It was a trade which, in the early part of the eighteenth century, was carried on to a considerable extent through the Highlands of Scotland. In 1739, nearly 100 men, women and children, were seized in the dead of the night on the islands of Skye and Herries, pinioned, horribly beaten, and stowed away in a ship bound for America, in order to be sold to the planters. Fortunately the ship touched at Donaghadee in Ireland, and the prisoners, after undergoing the most frightful sufferings, succeeded in escaping.

In 1742, a case occurred which attracted much notice a few years later, when one of the victims having escaped from servitude, returned to Aberdeen and published a narrative of his sufferings, seriously implicating some of the magistracy of the town. He was prosecuted and condemned for libel by the local authorities, but the case was afterwards carried to Edinburgh. The iniquitous system of kidnapping was fully exposed, and the judges of the Supreme Court unanimously reversed the verdict of the Aberdeen authorities, and imposed a heavy fine upon the provost, the four bailies, and the dean of the Guild.

For "The Friend."

Dear Friends,—I feel there is too much looking back among us as a Society, not enough examination of our present state to see what the Great Master is requiring of us day by day. Oh let us sink down in deep humility of spirit low at his feet, and there remain, that we may be worthy to receive the crumbs that fall from his bountiful table. Our strength will then be made equal to all of his holy requiremings; and then there will be many springing up to carry on the work of those faithful servants of the most high God that have gone before us; yea, we shall be strengthened to leave an example worthy to be followed by those that come after us.

I have desired that every one that beareth the name of Friend may walk faithfully upon the stepping-stones that the Lord God hath cast up for them to walk upon; that our memory may live in the hearts of the faithful long after we have passed away. I would that we as a Society could show a closer walk with God. The meek and lowly Jesus has called us to be a people: Oh let us be more subject to the will of Him who hath called us to follow the guidance of his Holy Spirit, and is still calling us who are so unworthy. Sons and daughters of men, let us draw near unto God as much as within us lies, that we may be steadfast and abide under the wing of the Almighty, that nothing may harm or make us to fear in the hour of trial.

Trials will surely come to us all, sooner or later, and we should all be prepared to meet our great King Emanuel in peace. This will make all things here easy to be borne, for what are these trials when our hearts are overflowing with his holy presence. Oh what is equal or comparable thereto? Yet frail man will turn aside from all this and settle down at ease, feeding as it were on dry husks that will not give life or strength to the fainting soul; yea, my spirit is burdened for such as these, desiring that their darkness may be changed into light, even the light of Heaven; that there may be a hungering and thirsting after the true bread of life, until it is felt and received by every waiting soul. Then will the fruits and savor thereof be seen in our midst, causing us to feel a tender sympathy one for another, that will far surpass anything that the heart of unregenerate man can conceive. Thus we will appear unto God and man to be what we profess—followers of Him who is meek and lowly in spirit, and without spot in the sight of God. H. T.

Mansfield, Ohio, 2nd mo. 19th.

When Thomas Wilson was brought under divine conviction, and an inward hunger and thirst for the bread of life increased in him, it is recorded of him, that, "ere the time of singing of psalms a thoughtfulness seized him, that men should be made holy before they could sing to the praise and glory of God, and his mouth was stopped from singing with them through a godly sorrow possessing his heart, with humble prayers to God for the knowledge of the way of salvation, he being now become weary both of the heavy load of sin, and of the doctrines and worships of men's making."

Thomas Story relates that in a meeting among the Menists, in Holland, after his meeting closed, one of them read a verse of a Psalm and some of the company sang. He adds:—

"The song ended, I desired to be heard a few words, which was granted; and I spoke to this effect, 'That I had once been among a people who used to sing psalms; and it was a custom among many still: But I desired them to consider the foundation of their singing, whether it was any part of the worship of God, or that He required it of them as such; and also whether they all sung their own conditions: for things might be true in the Psalmist which were not so in them; as for instance, a high-minded, proud man's singing that he behaves himself as a weaned child in silence and rest, is not true, nor can any sing in that state; though I did not accuse them of pride, but this for instance.' I proceeded further, and said, 'That the Apostle Paul says, I will pray with the spirit, and with the understanding also, and sing also in like manner; and speaks of making melody in the heart to the Lord in hymns and spiritual songs; but nothing of singing other men's psalms without the Spirit: And that I had observed in those countries, among those who think themselves reformed, a great deal of images, pictures and outward show, and also high and lofty instruments of music; which had not been duly considered in their reformation.'—Life, p. 508.

Deacons and Deaconesses.—P. Schaff, in the S. S. Times, discusses the duties connected with these offices in the primitive Church, and recommends the revival of them at the present time. The first appointment of deacons is mentioned in the 6th chapter of Acts, and grew out of complaints among the Greek-Jews, that their widows were neglected in the daily ministration at the common love-feasts. This duty had before devolved on the apostles, who now recommended the brethren to select seven men to whose care it should be committed.

The office of deacons was the care of the poor and sick—they were alms-distributors and nurses. This care probably implied instruction and consolation as well as bodily relief, and the men selected for the office were of strong faith and exemplary piety.

There appears also at an early day to have been deaconesses, who exercised a similar care over the female portion of the congregation. In the East the sexes were much more strictly separated (as they are at this day among the Mohammedans, Jews and Gentiles) than in Christian Europe and America. Hence there was a practical necessity for a special class of female officers who had access to their own sex and could discharge such charitable duties more easily and effectually than men. Phebe is called a deaconess (diakona) of the congregation at Cenchrea, and by her Paul sent his Epistle to the Romans.—Rom. xvi. 1.

These officers of the primitive church seem to have filled the same position that is occupied among Friends by the committees of men and women who are charged with administering to the wants of the poor among us.

In the Eastern churches the office of deaconess was continued down to the end of the 12th century. In the Roman Church the congregational deaconesses were superseded by sisterhoods devoted to charitable work. The term "deacon" as used among the modern Reform churches has very different meanings. An Episcopal deacon is simply a candidate for the priesthood. A Methodist deacon is elected by the annual conference, and ordained by the bishop, to administer baptism and to solemnize marriage, and to do the duties of a travelling preacher. In the Lutheran church of Germany, a "diaconus" is an afternoon preacher, or chaplain, or assistant minister, but equal in standing with regular clergymen. A Congregational deacon is what a lay-elder is in the Presbyterian churches. In the Dutch and German Reformed churches, the deacon comes nearest the primitive functions of taking care of the poor and attending to the temporalities of the congregation.

Beer Drinking.—The President of the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company, one of the largest in the United States, recently gave the following testimony as to the effects of beer-drinking:—

"In one of our largest cities, containing a great population of beer-drinkers, I had occasion to note the deaths among a large group of persons whose habits in their own eyes and in the those of their friends and physicians were temperate; but they were habitual users of beer. When the observation began they were upon the average something under middle age, and they were, of course, selected lives. For two or three years there was nothing very remarkable to be noted among this group. Presently death began to strike it; and until it had dwindled to a fraction of its original proportions the mortality in it was astounding in extent and still more remarkable in the manifest identity of cause and mode.

"There was no mistaking it; the history was almost invariable: robust, apparent health, full muscles, a fair outside, increasing weight, florid faces; then a touch of cold or a sniff of malaria, and instantly some acute disease with, almost invariably, typhoid symptoms, was in violent action, and ten days or less ended it. It was as if the system had been kept fair outside, while within it was eaten to a shell, and at the first touch of disease there was utter collapse; every fibre was poisoned and weak.

"And this, in its main features, varying of course, in degree, has been my observation in beer-drinking everywhere. It is peculiarly deceptive at first; it is thoroughly destructive at the last."

Instinctive Actions.—In order to determine which of the motions of young animals were instinctive, and which were the result of training or imitation, D. A. Goodsell, of New Haven, obtained during last summer a young Stormy Petrel, just hatched, on a rocky island a few miles from Mt. Desert, Maine. His observations are published in the Christian Advocate.

When found, the young Petrel was, he says, "a little larger than a newly-hatched Brahi chicken, was covered with exquisitely gray down, had a long black bill hooked the end, a beautiful blue eye, the slimmest legs, and very delicately webbed feet. Its color was exactly that of the egg, dark gray with irregular brown spots. He was so much the color of the rock on which the eggs lay that I almost stepped on him without seeing him. It seems that this may be one of the protective resemblances of which nature provides a multitude. To this day, Jumbo, that is the name the children gave him, invariably sits with his breast against something gray, never against any thing of strong contrast to his own tint.

I brought him from Mt. Desert in a lit basket, which the Indians made for him. He was very quiet, but alert, on the steamer and the cars. I put him in the state-room was a bowl for a bath, which he took in the most rapturous manner. In the two days of his journey he ate three times his weight of fattening pieces of a size far beyond his parent capacity. I believe that his lower jaws, in order to accomplish his marvellous feats of deglutition. This voracity is marked now that he is grown; but for weeks it continued, to the astonishment of beholders.

He accepts and rejects various articles of food without hesitation. Of fresh fish, lobsters, clams, oysters, and fresh meat he is very fond. Tainted meat he will not touch, nor salted meat. Grasshoppers, crickets, and butterflies are especially welcome. He is most accomplished catcher of house flies. One day the children caught a live mouse which was let loose near the bird. No doubt he could have caught it more quickly. He took it by the tail, tossed it, and caught it by the head, crushed it flat, and, accidentally dropping it, took it by the tail, carried it to the pool, swung it back and forth until clean, and then swallowed it. On another occasion, he took a dry crust he could not break, and dropping it in the pool, waited until it was softened, and then ate it.

From the first he had a habit of dancing the most comical manner. He would unfold his little stumps of wings, and hop up and down for minutes together. For a long time this seemed inexplicable, but the development of his wings has solved the mystery. If a wing was not clipped, he would now fly, but when he tries to fly he invariably turns toward the wind, and leaps up to catch the current against his wings to assist the beginning of his flight. I have seen the wild duck do the same on rising from the water. This instinct of flight before the growth of the wings struck me as very remarkable.

When first caught, and for a long time thereafter, he had but one note—an exceedingly plaintive piping. He has since, with the possibility of hearing one of his kind, acquired two others. One is the laugh—which gives the name Larus Ridibundus to the species. His delight in bathing is immense. With fluttering of his wings, and bobbing his head, he wets himself thoroughly, and then goes to the sunniest spot, and, passing each feather between his mandibles, consumes an hour at his toilet. So far as I have seen this dressing of his feathers is in a definite order, and leaves him as smooth and sleek as possible. In his play the gull nature comes strongly. For a long time he has had a Jacob at one end of the yard, and a thread-lark at the other. Half-flying, half-running, strikes the cob or spool, throws it up, catches it, and then parades about, ha-ha-ing at success. Sometimes he will drop the cob in a pool, climb on a box near by, and then fly to the cob, and bear it off, as old gulls do with fish.

He placed a mirror where Jumbo could see his own image, instantly his feathers bristled and he charged furiously on the mirror. On hitting his supposed foe, he flew at him again. Meeting with no better success, he retreated behind the glass; stood with an appearance of astonishment at not finding his foe; then went back in front of the mirror, and flew at his own shadow again. Once again he went behind the mirror, this time on the other side. There he stood for a moment, and then walked away, and has not been interested in any sham gull since.

These facts are surely enough to show that in the egg, though wholly separate from the parent, and teaching, his instincts suffice to determine his proper food; to bathe and dress his feathers; to wash the dirt from his food; to secrete himself by lying near or upon an object of similar tint; to soften by water that which he cannot otherwise eat; to recognize his rivals his own kind; to acquire the art of catching and throwing objects as the wild duck does with fish; to turn toward the wind to assist his flight; to leap from the ground against the wind to assist the beginning of flight; to acquire all the characteristic gull-qualities; in short, without example or teaching, to become an independent and well-ordered bird.

East Indian Snakes.—The destruction of human life by the bites of poisonous snakes in British India (amounting to about 19,000 persons in a year) and the loss of cattle from the same cause have led to the offering of rewards for the destruction of those reptiles. In 1880, rewards were paid for the killing of 776 snakes; and in 1881, for 254,968.

Most of the loss of life is caused by four species, which are numerous and deadly. The most poisonous species are either less numerous or less aggressive. Gangs of snake hunters have been organized to destroy the pests, and it has been proposed to extend this system throughout all the districts. One difficulty has been used by the religious scruples of most Hindus, who regard it as unlawful to take the life, even of a poisonous serpent, so that only men belonging to certain castes that engage in this occupation.

Explosive Rock.—At the limestone quarry of the Glendon Iron Company, Easton, Pa., a series of tunnels were run into a steep hill, and 29,000 lbs. of powder were placed in six chambers at their termination. The blast was fired by electricity, on the 11th of First month. The amount of rock displaced was estimated at 130,000 tons.

Effects of Diet on Liability to Infection.—Professor Feser, of Munich, in experimenting on his subject inoculated rats with the poison of the distemper. He found that those fed on vegetable diet were quickly attacked with the disease, while those fed exclusively with meat resisted the effects of the inoculation.

Decay of Building-stone.—In a paper on this subject, by Prof. Julien, of Columbia College, attention is called to the effect of the weather on building-stone. Marble is gradually dissolved on the outside and washed down. It undergoes internal disintegration, and also bends and cracks. Brown stone wears away. The enemies of building-stone are of three kinds—chemical, mechanical and organic. Among the chemical agents are various acids, ammonia, &c., found in rain water. Frost is an effective means of destruction. A granite obelisk that had stood for forty centuries in Egypt, was removed to Paris, and in forty years was found to be full of cracks.—Sci. American.

Vegetable Rennet.—In endeavoring to introduce cheese-making as an additional branch of agricultural operations in India, it was essential to find some substitute for animal rennet in curdling the milk, as the natives would not touch cheese made with it. It was found that the fruit of the Puneeria coagulans, a shrub common in Afghanistan and Northern India, possessed the property of curdling milk. It belongs to the same family of plants as the Tomato.

I have myself once known some, that to get money have wearied themselves into the grave; and, to be true to their principles, when sick, would not spare a fee to a doctor, to help the poor slave to live; and so died to save charges; a constancy that canonizes them martyrs for money.—Wm. Penn.

THE FRIEND.

THIRD MONTH 10, 1883.

A living Gospel ministry is a great blessing to the Church, and was undoubtedly designed for the edifying of the body, as well as for the awakening of sinners. Yet it should ever be borne in mind that it is only as it proceeds from the Spirit of God and is accompanied with his blessing and life-giving power, that it can be of true spiritual benefit.

We think it was William Dewsbury, who in speaking of our early Friends said, that being unable to perform Divine worship of themselves, when they met together, they could do no other than wait in spirit on the Lord, and seek from Him for ability to offer up that homage which is his due.

In accordance with this is the language of Isaac Pennington: "I freely confess, all my religion stands in waiting on the Lord for the riches of his Spirit, and in returning back to the Lord (by his own Spirit, and in the virtue of his own life,) that which He pleaseth to bestow on me. And I have no faith, no love, no hope, no peace, no joy, no ability to anything, no refreshment in anything, but as I find his living breath beginning, his living breath continuing, his living breath answering, and performing what it calls for."

When prayer, praise or exhortation arises from the motion of this Spirit on the hearts of any, in a gathered assembly, it is truly refreshing to those who are prepared to receive it. But where the Spirit of the Lord is not the moving power, the preacher cannot reach the witness for God or impart true religious instruction, no matter how learnedly he may talk of the doctrines of the Gospel, or of the precepts contained in the Holy Scriptures. The benefit of a meeting is not therefore to be measured by the amount of preaching heard therein; for we sometimes experience there is that which darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge; and at other times we are favored to find in seasons of silence that renewal of strength which is promised to those who wait on the Lord.

We have been much impressed with a letter written by Robert Jordan, of North Carolina, in 1736, which shows that the Church nearly 150 years ago was troubled in some places, by a ministry which was not of Divine appointment. The letter says.

"I am often cast down at the evidence of false ministry prevailing in many places, and am weary of contending in spirit against it; though not weary of suffering for the truth. It is a clear and incontrovertible fact, that in proportion to the declension of religion in the root and life, preaching increases, to the lessening the credit and authority of the ministry, and rendering it contemptible. I am confirmed in my judgment, and have been many years, that as the ministry was, and the sincere ministry yet is, instrumental to gather the churches, it is now proceeding apace to scatter them, and this through the working of the mystery of iniquity, with the heat and forwardness of man's spirit.

"To some, yea to many, that silence and passiveness of mind, so essential to the performance of these calm, meek and deliberate acts of worship, is as strange and irksome, as it is by their conduct rendered useless to the people. But though we cannot help seeing, we are told we must say nothing; all is revelation, all is perfect, and there is great peace. To put it out of all doubt, we are often told they are under a mighty sense of life and power, are under heavy burdens, and sore exercises; but whether they lay them on themselves or not, I shall not determine. These find it easier to do than to suffer till the Master gives direction and makes way.

"Some measure their service by their noise, and would prove a Divine gift by human wit and extacy; and while they are full of peace and joy, the church mourns. Even prophesying is coming pretty much into practice, several instances of which have proved false and ridiculous.

"Some who preach up self-denial and mortification, can hardly bear contradiction, much less reproof; and though they preach up humility, they aspire to the chief seats and the uppermost rooms.

"I believe this ministry has a direct tendency to promote infidelity, by giving grounds of suspicion that the noble principle, the holy unction, the light and superadded grace that comes by Jesus Christ, is either uncertain or dangerous to follow.

"The nature of man is subject to extremes, being apt to step out of a state of superstition into that of unbelief. In short, I may conclude by saying with John Fothergill, 'that the distemper in the ministry is the greatest in the church.'

ROBERT JORDAN."

We print this letter not to discourage any humble, sincere followers of Christ, who may believe it required of them to open their mouths in the assemblies of the Lord's people; but to call attention to the evil fruits that may be expected to be produced by a ministry which has not the Divine sanction, and rests on the will and wisdom of man.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The last session of the Forty-seventh Congress expired at noon on the 4th instant.

During its closing hours, George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, was elected President pro tempore of the Senate, to succeed David Davis, resigned, Senator Bayard receiving the compliment of the Democratic nomination. The Tax-Tariff bill was passed by the House by a vote of 152 yeas to 116 nays. All the General Appropriation bills were passed, but the River and Harbor bill failed in the Senate.

Ten thousand six hundred and seventy bills and joint resolutions were introduced in the Forty-seventh Congress, $018 in the House and 2652 in the Senate. During the session just closed, besides the regular annual appropriation bills, 163 bills and joint resolutions passed both Houses. The aggregate amount appropriated by the appropriation bills is $229,327,511. The aggregate of last year's appropriations was $219,367,983.

The provisions of the Tax-Tariff bill, including the repeal of the stamp tax on bank checks, drafts, orders and vouchers will take effect on the 1st of Seventh month next. Exception, however, is made in regard to the tariff duties on sugar, which will take effect on 6th mo. 1st, and the reduction of the taxes on tobacco, snuff and cigars, and the reduction of the special license taxes which will go into effect on 5th mo. 1st.

The public debt, less cash in the Treasury, on 2d mo. 28th, was $1,892,542,863, and the reduction during last month was $7,630,678.

An election was held in San Francisco on Seventh-day on the question of adopting a new charter, 18,613 votes were polled. The official canvass of the vote shows that the charter was defeated by 32 votes. Fraud is suspected, and many protests have been filed.

Secretary Folger, on the 5th inst., ordered that the word "cents" be added to the new five-cent piece, to meet the requirements of the law.

The total coinage of the U. S. Mint during 2d month included 7,862,840 pieces of all denominations, valued at $4,548,360. The number of standard silver dollars turned out was 2,400,000.

During the twelve months which ended on 1st mo. 31st, 1883, our imports of merchandise amounted in value to $752,727,367, and our exports for the same period were $783,298,409.

A forestry bulletin just issued from the Census Bureau, relates to the forests of West Virginia. It says the forests have been largely removed from the Ohio river counties, and that the most valuable timber along the principal streams has been culled in nearly every part of the State. The area still occupied by white pine is estimated to extend over 310 square miles, and to contain 990 million feet of merchantable lumber. The lumber product of the State for the census year was 180,112,000 feet lumber, 1,207,000 laths, 3,695,000 shingles, 41,992,000 staves and 1,952,000 sets of headings, in all valued at $2,431,857.

Alexander H. Stephens, Governor of Georgia, and ex-Vice President of the Southern Confederacy, died in Atlanta on the morning of the 4th inst., at half-past three o'clock. He was in the 72d year of his age.

A very large and brilliant meteor was seen early on First-day morning at Petersburg, Virginia. It is described as "an immense ball of fire darting across the heavens, brilliantly illuminating the entire city, so that a newspaper might have been read with ease. Its course was northwest, and its explosion was heard shortly afterwards."

The total losses by the floods in the Ohio and Wabash rivers are estimated by the New York Herald at $8,048,000, of which $2,250,000 falls on Cincinnati and its suburbs, and $1,000,000 on Louisville. More than 6000 dwellings in the Ohio Valley were swept away or wrecked beyond repair. The figures given do not include the losses from a suspension of business and trade. The subsidence of the floods is taking place very slowly, and it may be a month after the waters have resumed their usual limits before the manufacturers along the river banks can get to work. The inhabitants of the inundated districts suffer terribly, the principal needs being provisions, bedding and clothing. From some of the smaller towns come appeals for medicines, and it is feared that as the waters subside there will be a prevalence of typhoid and malarial fevers. The Cincinnati Commercial Gazette prints a detailed report of the losses by the flood at Lawrenceburg, Indiana, which foots up $435,000.

Later reports from the overflowed country along the Mississippi show that the "sunk lands" in the St. Francis river region are entirely submerged. Nearly as far south as Helena there are few places above water, and the people are living in the upper stories of their houses, where there is more than one story, and when there is not, "floating around on rafts or in boats." The streets of New Madrid are submerged to the depth of two to four feet. The whole country back of that place as far as Cairo, on the Missouri side, and from Hickman south for fifty miles, is covered with water. Corn, fences and live stock have been destroyed, but there is no destitution among the people yet.

The latest reports from the Lower Mississippi show that the water at Helena is rising at the rate of an inch per hour, and it is feared the highest water mark of last year will be reached. The trestle on the Helena branch of the Iron Mountain Railroad, at Longville river, which a week before was forty feet above the river, was threatened on the 5th with total submersion. The water is also rising at Arkansas City. The levees in the districts mentioned remain intact, and the planters are putting in their crops. A later despatch reports a serious break in the Pastoria levee, in Chicot county, Arkansas, which will flood many plantations.

On the 1st instant, the Chief of Police of Philadelphia presented to the City Commissioners a list of 155 places where licences to sell liquor are recommended to be refused. The following letter accompanies the request!

"I am directed by the Mayor to forward you reports of the Police Lieutenants of the drinking houses in their respective districts that are the resorts of thieves, lewd and disorderly persons. These places are well-known to the officers of this department, as appears by the criminal record of each station-house, and therefore earnestly protest against license being granted for the sale of liquor to the proprietors of such places."

The deaths in this city last week numbered 404, which was 46 more than for the previous week, and one less than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number, 216 were males, and 188 females: 61 died of consumption; 30 of pneumonia; 20 of diphtheria; 19 of old age; 13 of typhoid fever; 12 of Bright's disease of the kidneys, and 6 of small-pox.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 104½; 3½'s 104; 4½'s, 112½; 4's, registered, 118½; coupon, 119½; currency 6's 129 a 132.

Cotton continues quiet, but prices were steady. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 10½ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ a 7½ cts. for export, and 8½ a 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in moderate demand and steady. Sales of 2900 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.75 a $6.75; Pennsylvania family at $5.12½ a $5.25; western do., at $5.50 a $6.35, and patents at $6.50 a $8. Rye flour is firm at $4 a $4.12½ per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was a fraction higher. Sales of 4700 bushels red, in car lots at $1.18 a $1.24. Rye is firm at 72 cts. Corn is in fair request and local lots are steady. Sales of 10,000 bushels, in lots, at 60 a 70½ cts. At the open board 70½ cts. was bid for futures. Oats are quiet, but steady. Sales of 9000 bushels, in car lots, at 53 a 57 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 3d mo. 3rd, 1883.—Loads of hay, 385; loads of straw, 80. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 90 cts. to $1 per 100 pounds; mixed, 80 a 90 cts. per 100 pounds; straw, 55 to 65 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were dull and prices were easier: 2300 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5½ a 7½ cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were in fair demand and firmly held: 8500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4½ a 7 cts., and lambs at 4½ a 8 cts. per lb. as to condition.

Hogs were a fraction higher; 3500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 10½ a 11 cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—The North German Lloyds Steamship Company has made a contract with John Elder & Co. for the construction of two steamers. They are to be of the same size and speed as the Fulda, and are to run between New York and Bremen. The names of the new steamers will be the Ems and the Eider.

The London Society for the Suppression of Blasphemous Literature propose to get up cases against Professors Huxley and Tyndall, Herbert Spencer, the publishers of John Stuart Mill's works, John Morley, and others, who, "by their writings, have sown widespread unbelief, and in some cases rank atheism."

Longhrea, 2nd mo. 28th.—The distress among the people here is alarming. Crowds of persons are besieging the houses of the priests, clamoring for food. The Town Commissioners have been hurriedly convened to take measures toward relieving the wants of the people.

Limerick, 3rd mo. 1st.—Three hundred women will start from here this week for New Hampshire, where they will be employed in a cotton factory. The Board of Guardians has voted £50 towards furnishing the emigrants with an outfit.

A letter from the Bishop of Rawhoe, County Donegal, is published, in which he says the only chance the destitute people have to maintain life is through charity. He says the policy of the Government is evidently of extermination.

The Standard's correspondent at Copenhagen says the Government is willing to settle the present difficulty touching the status of Dunes in Schleswig on a basis that only those living there, born before or coming the year 1864, shall be exempted from the Prussian military service.

The cost of the government of Paris is a little more than $50,000,000 annually.

It is stated that W. E. Gladstone, in his interview on the 27th ult. with President Grevy and Challer La Cour, Minister of Foreign Affairs, appeared desirous to bring about an end of the present tension between France and England. It is believed that negotiations relative to Egypt are impending—no hitherto, on the basis of a condominium, but on arrangement that will place France in a more favorable position than she now occupies.

The relations between Germany and England are reported to be better now than they have been for years. The North German Gazette expresses the high satisfaction at this state of affairs. The Emperor of Germany has given 1000 marks to the fund for the relief of sufferers by the floods in America.

The Madrid Imparcial says the Socialistic society called the "Black Hand" numbers 49,910 members and includes 990 minor societies, with Geneva as centre for Western Europe. The existence of a branch of the Black Hand Society has been discovered in Madrid. The Judges who are conducting the investigation in regard to secret societies still receive threatening letters. The trial of the Socialists at Prague been adjourned because the preliminary examination resulted in the implication of other persons in charges of high treason.

The Russian Minister of War has issued an order prohibiting all connection with the press of persons serving in the army or in its departments.

Drunkenness has been investigated by Prof. Verga, of Milan. Men or women given to intoxication, strange to say, seldom given to kleptomania suicide. A woman is less apt to take liquor than man, but when she does she can hardly be reclaimed. She becomes shameless and abominable, but self-dangerous. Cold weather seems to cause men to drink strong drink, and mild weather has the same influence upon women.

Live stock statistics for the chief producing countries of the world have been collected and compared by an English newspaper, from which it appears that the United States stands first with the two most important articles of flesh food—cattle and hogs—and that second in horses, and fourth in sheep, but that, in regard to the latter two items, she is making rapid strides to a higher position. These statistics credit the United States with 38,000,000 cattle, India with 10,000,000, and Russia with 20,000,000. Further, it shows that Russia has 20,000,000 horses, the United States 10,500,000, and Austria 3,500,000. Austria possesses 80,000,000 sheep, the Argentine Republic 68,000,000, and Russia 63,000,000. The United States—fourth in this list—has 36,000,000, but in the matter of swine she heads the world, having 48,000,000. Goats, India is credited with no less than 20,000,000, Africa with 15,000,000, and Mexico with 6,000,000.

Valuable coal discoveries continue to be made on the east coast of Vancouver's Island, British Columbia.

Matilda, Countess von der Recke Volmerstein.

BORN 1801. DIED 1867.

In my childhood a favorite book was "The Little Dove," it is a true story of a German Count. One day, when a little boy, he saw a young dove drowning in the middle of a deep pond. He did not stop to think of danger to himself, he only thought, "that poor dove will drown if I do not save it." He found by the pond a washing tub, and getting into it with a stick for an oar, paddled out to the frightened bird. He took it up tenderly, dried its wet feathers, and, unfastening his coat, placed it in his bosom. When he was on shore, the rescued dove shared the breakfast of bread and milk which he had upon the garden seat. From her castle Matilda's mother watched her boy's perilous voyage with tears of mingled joy and sorrow, and her prayer was that when her son should become a man he might be kind to his fellow men as he then was to animals; for it was not only doves that he befriended.

That prayer was answered. When grown to manhood, Adelberdt's heart went out towards the little ragged children made orphans by Napoleon's wars. Though a count he was poor, his father having had severe losses from which he did not recover for many years; but he established a Home for these poor children, and he hoped that God would help him with the means wherewith to carry it on. And God helped him, and when the purse or flour-bin was empty, always supplied the want, often giving the exact sum required, or food just suited to the needs of the large family. It was in 1819 that Count von der Recke Volmerstein opened his Home with three orphans. At the end of the year he had forty-four children to take care of, and the numbers rapidly increased; so that, between that time and the present, thousands of destitute children have been helped and sheltered in the Institution. For twenty-eight years the count presided over it himself; but in 1847, worn out by hard work, he retired to a quieter life, where he still lives, an old man of more than eighty years, surrounded by children and grandchildren. But even then he could not be idle, and for many years he has had, at his own door, on his estate of Craschewitz, a happy Home for poor imbecile chil-

While Count Adelberdt was devoting himself to the care of his large family he felt that he had no time to think of getting married. He thought too that a wife who was not entirely consecrated would only hinder his work; and that work which he was doing for God was dearer to him than any earthly happiness. God had, however, other thoughts for his servant. He knows that a true, good woman, one "who feareth the Lord," and who also "looketh well to the ways of her household," is a help and not a hindrance to her husband. And so, in a far-off home, led by God's hand, and taught by his Spirit, a young girl was being trained to become, at the age of twenty-five, the mother of this great Home.

Matilda, Countess von Pfeil, now comes before us; she was of noble birth, and fitted, both by her natural powers and by education, to shine in society; but if this had been all, thousands would not still bless her memory, as is the case now. At the age of twelve Matilda sought her Saviour. When fifteen she dedicated herself to God in writing; vowing to give up everything, that she might be a partaker of His grace. "Only strengthen me in all good resolutions which I make now, and always let me recognise thy grace, that I may turn away more and more from all that is earthly to thee alone; that to me, too, Christ my Saviour may one day say, 'Come, thou blessed of my Father, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'"

These were no mere words. At the age of twenty-three she wrote: "Living to God gives me peace in my soul, and an indifference to the outward unpleasantnesses of the present; which, indeed, cannot be made better by complaining of them. Oh, if I could only share this peace with everybody I should be quite happy."

At this time she was very busy, sharing some of their studies with her brothers and sisters, reading religious books for her own profit, helping in the kitchen, and doing all she could for her poorer neighbors, teaching the children, and visiting the sick and afflicted. Little did she foresee the life for which she was preparing. Matilda read with interest the accounts of Count von der Recke's Home, and in 1825 they met for the first time. The count felt a great interest about her, and she looked up to him with reverence and trust, as to one who was far more experienced and could help her in spiritual things. But he dared not think of marriage till he had received God's sanction, and then came the question, "Is Matilda indeed the right wife for me?" For many months he sought to know God's will touching this matter. He was afraid she had been accustomed to so many comforts that she would not like the hard life he had chosen. At last, however, it became clear to him that his adopted children needed a loving mother's care, and that Matilda could give that care. Matilda's mind was already prepared to accept as her future husband one whose judgment she had learned to lean upon; but her father decided that the count was too poor to marry. Though this disappointment was a great trial, she left herself in God's hands, and He at last opened a way for them to be united.

It was a joyful day when Count Adelberdt took home his bride. Long before they approached Düsseldorf many people came to meet them, so that they "passed through the gate with a great company." The garden in front of the house was illuminated, and they had quite a festal reception. A few days after the Countess Matilda writes: "To set before you, my dear parents, the duties of all sorts that I have would be impossible to-day. I will only say in haste that, thank God, I am getting on very well here; that I am well, and from five o'clock in the morning till half-past ten at night I am not free from work. I have to order everything, and make out bills of fare for four tables, to see after the meals every day, to give out work and superintend it, to preserve and dry fruit, to visit the sick, to cut out garments," &c.

Here is a picture of her, later on, from her daughter's pen. "While a girl watched by the cradle of her sleeping child, the young mother was to be seen, soon after five in the morning, in the dairy, busily skinning the cream; then in the store-room; later in the dairy again, washing the butter herself; then overseeing everything in the great house, giving out work, visiting the sick, and later by the child's cradle with the great account books. At mid-day again in the kitchen; and I remember that one day, about ten years later, tired out with cutting two hundred helpings of meat, she fell down faint by the kitchen table." To show how she denied herself I will mention one incident. After her marriage her mother wrote to ask her and the count to have their likenesses painted, but the Countess Matilda replied that they did not feel that it would be right to spare the money for this object, because all they had left, after their own simple living had been paid for, was generally needed for the orphans.

God gave to the count and countess ten children of their own, and she who was a good mother to the orphans was a most tender mother to them. All work that could be done in the midst of her little ones was done in their room. She often spent hours there over her accounts and other writings, the children playing around her, and she ever ready to give to them loving words and a helping hand. As they grew older she found for them teachers, whom she could trust, to give them good teaching and to lead them on in the heavenly way. Her daughter says of her: "She did not teach by many words, but she did so much the more powerfully and lastingly by her example. It was impossible to see her in her untiring, vigorous, silent activity, without learning to help with love and pleasure, and to emulate her, although we might never attain to her many-sided efficiency; for whatever she undertook she succeeded in amply for the fulfilment of her duty or for the pleasure of others; and everything which came under her observation, which went on in the world, or of which she read, awoke her lively interest." In addition to her other work she took upon her the labor of dispensing medicines to the sick, and the people came from miles round to consult her. With a few intermissions this busy, happy life went on for twenty years. The countess was the joy of her husband's heart, yet they seldom met, except at meals, from the early morning till late in the evening. But he knew that everything under her care was in order and going on well, while he was fully occupied in his own department. Was not this a rest and help to him? Of her it might be said, during the forty years of their married life, "The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her, so that he shall have no need of spoil."

After leaving Düsseldorf the countess enjoyed the opportunity of more uninterrupted association with her family and friends. Still the claims of the poor and the sick were never forgotten by her. The failing of her health was gradual, and the last illness short. Very tenderly was she watched over by her husband and children, and the thoughtfulness for all around, which had characterized her from early life, was continually apparent. The Saviour whom she trusted for her salvation in the beginning of her Christian course was her strength all through the dark as well as the bright days of her life, and her love to Him was unwavering to the end.

In 1867 she died as she had lived, resting on her Lord, "in quietness and confidence," receiving doubtless the fulfilment of her desire, uttered fifty-one years before, "That to me, too, Christ my Saviour may one day say, 'Come, thou blessed of my Father, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'"

Gleanings from Quaker Annals.

In prayer, we make the nearest approach to God, and lie open to the influences of heaven; then it is, that the Sun of righteousness doth visit us with his directest rays, and dissipateth our darkness, and imprinteth his image on our souls. As there is one sort of prayer, wherein we make use of the voice,—and another wherein, though we utter no sound, yet we conceive the expressions and form the words, as it were, in our minds; so there is a third and more sublime kind of prayer, wherein the soul takes a higher flight, and having collected all its forces by long and serious meditation, it darteth itself, (if I may so speak) toward God in sighs and groans, and thoughts too big for expression. As when, after a deep contemplation of the Divine perfections, appearing in all his works of wonder, it addresseth itself to Him in the profoundest adoration of his majesty and glory: or when, after sad reflections on its vileness and mis-carriages, it prostrates itself before Him with the greatest confusion and sorrow, not daring to lift up its eyes, or utter one word in his presence: or when, having well considered the beauty of holiness, and the unspeakable felicity of those who are truly good, it panteth after God, and sendeth up such vigorous and ardent desires, as no words can sufficiently express.

This mental prayer is, of all other, the most effectual to purify the soul, and dispose it unto a holy and religious temper, and may be termed the great secret of devotion, and one of the most powerful instruments of the divine life: and, it may be, that the apostle hath a peculiar respect unto it, when he saith, that 'the Spirit helpeth our infirmities, making intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered,' or, as the original may bear, that cannot be worded."

Let ministers be careful not to judge too highly of any of their services; for it is only when the breath of the Lord blows through the trumpet, that life and harmony are known, and the great truth is evinced, that it is only his own works that praise Him, or benefit the churches: nothing that man can do. In most places, the elders want to stand deeper in Jordan. A more unreserved, total sacrifice of the world must be made, and even the accursed thing cast out of some of their tents, before they can stand as valiants for the Lord's cause upon earth. Every shekel of pure gold in the sanctuary ever had, and still must have, the signature of HOLINESS upon it; for what is of man is but man: the Lord bloweth upon it, and lo, it is nothing, however specious in the eyes of men.

I see clearly that when the ancient simplicity and purity are known again amongst us, then the glory of the Lord will appear as in former years; and his praise sound forth through all the churches.

The salvation which the Son of God hath purchased for us, and which He offers to us by the gospel, is not to be accomplished and brought about any other way, than by forsaking our sins and reforming our lives. The grace of God, which hath appeared to all men, and brings salvation, will not make us partakers of it in any other way, or by any other means, than by teaching us to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world. God sent his Son to bless us, by turning us away every one from his iniquities; and unless this change be effectually wrought in us, we are utterly incapable of all the blessings of the gospel of Christ. All that He hath done for us, without us, will avail nothing, unless we be inwardly transformed, and renewed in the spirit of our minds, unless we become new creatures, unless we make it the continual and sincere endeavor of our lives to keep the commandments of God. The obedience and sufferings of our blessed Saviour, are indeed accounted to us for righteousness, and will most certainly redound to our unspeakable benefit upon the performance of the condition which is required on our part, namely, that every man that names the name of Christ, depart from iniquity. And the grace of God's Holy Spirit, is ready to enable us to perform this condition, if we earnestly ask it, and do sincerely co-operate with it; provided we do what we can on our part, God will not be wanting on his. But if we receive the grace of God in vain, and take no care to perform the condition, and neglect to implore the grace and assistance of God's Holy Spirit to that purpose, we have none to blame but ourselves; because it is then our own fault we fall short of that happiness which Christ hath purchased and promised to us, upon such reasonable and easy conditions as the gospel proposeth.

My fellow Christian travellers toward the land of promised rest; where human frail sickness, sorrow, and perplexing things, arising from ourselves or others, will no more offend; let us press on; not as having attained, but looking forward, with strong faith in that invincible Power, whereby our spiritual enemies may be subdued; yea Satan trodden under our feet. The more we press after the pure river of life, the more shall drink of its refreshing streams; nevertheless there is a time to be athirst, in order that we may know how to estimate that which ministers refreshment and strength. Sound faith and love, patience and perseverance, are the cardinal points of a Christian traveller, after boxing the compass from side to side!

Inundation of St. Petersburg.

[The recent floods in our western river have induced one of our friends to send an insertion in our columns, a poetical description of the Inundation of St. Petersburg 1824, brought from Russia by Thomas Shillitoe, who was there when it occurred, and by whose landlady the lines were written. T. Shillitoe presented it to the scholars of Westtown School when he was there in 1824. St. Petersburg is built on low grounds by the River Neva, and the flood occasioned great destruction. The following description of the occurrence is from T. S.'s Journal.—ED.]

"Sixth-day, 19th of eleventh month, 1824, but little sleep last night, from the most severe tempest of wind and some rain, which I ever remember. I little expected what an awful scene this city in a few hours after I left it, would exhibit. On entering the apartment of my hostess to request my breakfast to be sent into my room, she asked if there had been much rain in the night as there were much water in the street; I supposing, as afterwards proved to be the case, that this water floated up the common sewer from the swell of water in the river. After taking my breakfast, I proceeded to take my usual walk; but, to my surprise, I found I was surrounded by water that I was obliged to return home. On telling my landlady that we lived in an island, she smiled at me, not aware of the fearful consequences that very soon followed. Observing the servant of an English-woman, who lived under the same roof, unable to reach home in her return from marketing, I proceeded to go and inform her mistress of her situation, and crossed the yard to her apartment dry-shod: although five minutes had elapsed, before I attempted to return home, everything was floating in the yard. I stepped on a cellar-window, and from that into the door of a bake-house, where the water followed me in such a body, that I concluded no time must be lost in making my way home: I waded through it, and had hesitated many minutes longer, the rise of the water was so rapid, I could not have reached my home. A hole was afterwards obliged to be cut in the wall of the same bake-house, to save the life of a woman who had taken shelter there. After I left it, getting it of my wet clothes, I took my standing at the windows of our apartment: the streets very soon exhibited a scene of great distress: men wading up to their arm-pits in the water; a woman up to her neck: I watched her with no little anxiety, expecting to see her slip off the foot-path on to the road, where it would have been over her head. Horses and carriages were swimming in the streets, until they durst not venture forward, the passing being altogether dangerous. The water in a short time rose in the streets eight feet; and in twelve feet. The ground-floor of the house in which I was a resident, was occupied by a grocer; the water rose up to the ceiling of the shop and his other apartments, without giving him time to move his goods or household stuff, its progress was so sudden and rapid.

About eleven o'clock the flood reached its height; from that time until about four o'clock the afternoon, the most awful stillness I ever witnessed prevailed: as far as my eyes could see, not a person was to be observed at any window, nor anything in the streets which had life, excepting a poor horse that was fastened to a small cart, and had made his way thus far towards home, but durst not venture further; he had preserved his life by placing his fore-feet on some steps, which lay high above the foot-path, where we could observe he was only barely able to keep his head above the water. About four o'clock in the afternoon, a policeman came in a boat, and let this poor prisoner loose, when he came into a yard that was near: this policeman was the first person, except our own family, whom we had seen anywhere, from four o'clock in the morning until this time in the afternoon, when the water began to recede.

Seventh-day, 20th of eleventh month, the waters had left the streets: after breakfast I went out to view the calamity, which this extraordinary visitation to this magnificent city had occasioned. Scarcely a bridge has escaped uninjured by it, and many are carried off their bearings: part of one of the great bridge of boats across the Neva, was left leaning against the walls of the palace: rafts, all boats, with two of the large steam-boats employed in going to Cronstadt, were left in the city, on what is called the island. Here the effects were more severely felt than in the city; houses, with the people in them, were shaken off their foundation, and carried out to sea: some of these poor inhabitants were observed sitting on the roofs of their houses, to save their life as long as they were able. On the Marine Hoff road, in a row of cottages, two hundred and fifty women and children were found to have fallen victims to this awful visitation; the men being from home at their work, escaped. The number of horses, horned cattle, and pigs, that perished, was said to be very great.

According to various reports, the emperor vowed himself to be the father of his people, leaving the wants of such of his poor subjects as had suffered from the inundation, to the inspection of the police, or any other of his officers, but going himself in person, and attending to their wants; so that it was believed many were placed in a better condition than they were in before. First-day, I walked out to meeting: for two miles there was scarcely a fence standing, on one side of the road; the land was covered with glass lights from the gardeners' grounds, also temples, summer-houses, boats, timber of various descriptions, crosses out of the burial-grounds, parts of coffins, the dead bodies of some who had perished from the flood, and a variety of cattle, that had perished also. My kind friend, Daniel Wheeler, and his family, in consequence of his high situation had escaped."

Blest were the dead, who did not live to see,
That awful day to Russia; most to thee,
Queen of the North! imbmerge thy granitic walls,
Thy sons o'erwhelmed! thy steeds in splendid halls;
The Neva, rushing like a stormy sea,
Thro' every square, that was a pride to thee;
All, all is still, save when whirlwinds roar,
Or groans the drowning beast; or sounds the plashing oar.

No sound is heard, save that of screaming gulls,
Till God in mercy, the dread tempest lulls;
Sullenly slow, retreats the deep dark stream;
And when withdrawn! Oh! what a sight was seen.
Whirled in confusion o'er thy splendid quay,
Ships without masts, and human bodies lay,—
Ten thousand shapeless things confused were seen,
From temples, houses, wrecks of what had been.
Where stood a bridge, the Neva claimed her sway;
And floating hamlets, o'er her bosom lay.
But pause my muse! Thy pensive Queen to cheer,
Her woes are soothed, a sovereign* wipes her tear;
His bosom melts, tho' monarch on a throne,
And while he dries their tears, in secret sheds his own.
His generous deeds, his prudent, active zeal,
No pen can tell, but every heart can feel.
Ye holy angels! be on earth his guard,
And final bliss in Heaven, his reward.

Bismarck and Wellington on War.

The following being the fearful, yet, no doubt, truthful experience of Bismarck, is cut from one of the daily papers. Would that more of our warriors, and especially statesmen holding influential positions in the government, yea, all who are in any wise accessory to, or responsible for such national and individual evil in principle or in practice, might have like feelings of sorrow and remorse unto lifting up the heart and the voice against all wars, as ever opposed to the reign of the Prince of Peace, and to the angelic anthem: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will toward men."

How influential for good to ourselves and to others, is the power of deep conviction, when carried out into consistent living practice! "Fits of dejection" and "despondent moods" are not appropriate terms to represent the stirrings and strivings of the grace of Jesus in the heart. It is the Spirit of truth as our guide into all truth—promised before, and purchased, at least to a more full extent, by the Saviour's ever precious atoning sacrifice—which convicts for sin. It is a belief in, and an obedience to this saving power from on high that, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, redeems man from his fallen and lost condition, and enables to realize the promise: "Ye are washed, ye are sanctified, ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God." The annexed is the slip alluded to:

"Bismarck is subject to fits of dejection, when he declares that his life has been a failure; that he has never made any one happy, neither himself, his family or the nation at large. 'If it were not for me,' he once said, when in a despondent mood, 'the world would have seen three great wars less, and eighty thousand who died in their bloom might have lived, and how many parents, brothers, sisters, widows, would have been spared their grief and tears!'"

To the foregoing, we would add a testimony concerning the Duke of Wellington:—"He fought; but not without understanding and lamenting the miseries of war. After the battle of Waterloo he shed bitter tears, and made the remark, that even such a victory was no compensation to him personally for the death of his friends, whatever relation it might have in other respects. In regard to civil wars in particular, he once made the decisive declaration, which shows that in his case the spirit of war had not quelled or overruled the spirit of humanity, that such was his sense of the horrors of civil war, if he could be the means of preventing even one month of civil contest in his own country, he would sacrifice his life in order to do it."

Who cannot see that wars have thrown back civilization, humanity, and religion; as well as opened the flood-gates of vice and immorality, sad proof of one of the fruits of the evil tree? And upon whom does the responsibility rest for "the supposed necessity" of organizing armies and fitting up regiments for the untold horrors of human combat, and for the low emulation which associates fame with blood? And when shall the end be?

The Power of Kindness.

"What a dull, dreary day!" How many times these words had been spoken, and how plainly were they expressed on the faces of the dozen passengers that afternoon. We were to change cars at this place, but on our arrival found that the train was two hours late, so there was no alternative but to wait.

It was a cold, rainy day; the streets were filled with mud, and a chilliness and gloom seemed reigning everywhere, even in the hearts and actions of the waiting passengers. No one seemed inclined to talk, so there we sat, with long, sober faces, thinking what a dull, dreary day.

While we thus sat waiting, an old man entered the room, carrying in one hand a cane to support his feeble body, and in the other a basket filled with sundry articles for sale.

He approached the passengers, one by one, commending the usefulness, durability and cheapness of his goods, but no sale did he make. One said that he had no use for such things; another that she was well supplied already; another that he did not care to be bothered with such articles while travelling; and so on, until the entire circuit was made. And the manner of each one seemed to say to the old man that such an intrusion on his part was very unwelcome.

He had turned away, and was leaving the room, when a lady, almost unnoticed before, approached him from a remote corner where she had been reading, and desired to look at his goods. She first invited him to a comfortable seat, and then selected one after another of the useful little articles, until five or six had been stored away in her satchel.

In paying for her purchases the exact change could not be made, and several cents were due her, but she told him not to trouble himself to get so small an amount, the goods were cheap, and well worth the money she had paid for them. The old man's face brightened up during this transaction, and he expressed his gratitude by saying:

"I thank you, ma'am, with all my heart, for this little trade. Business don't amount to much such a day as this, but I have to keep working all the harder, for you see we get hungry this kind o' weather, as well as when the sun shines. 'Twas so wet and muddy that I didn't go home to dinner to-day, and trade was so dull I couldn't 'ford to buy any; but 'twill be all right now, for I'll go home an hour earlier to-night."

He was again about to start off, when the lady asked him if he would not remain seated by the stove a few minutes, until her return. She then repaired to a lunch room connected with the depot, and soon came back with a nice lunch and a steaming cup of coffee, and asked the old man if he would not like a little refreshment before starting out in the cold rain.

What a look of honest surprise and gratitude beamed in his face! He thanked her quietly, for he seemed too deeply touched by her kindness to say much, and ate the luncheon with a hearty relish. When he had finished he approached where the lady was sitting, and said:

"You may be sure I won't forget your kindness, ma'am. It's not often that any one takes any notice of a poor old man like me; and your kindness has warmed up the feelings of my heart as the coffee did my body. Good day; and may God bless you all the days of your life!"

The little group of passengers had been silent witnesses of the scene; and, as the old man turned to go, a gentleman stopped him, saying he would like one of his picture books for his little boy. But his purchase extended to several articles, and some of the others who had before refused to purchase, now bought quite liberally.

After thanking his customers, the old man went his way, much gratified by their liberality.

What a change had come over that room! If a sunbeam had burst through the dark, lowering clouds, the effect could not have been greater. The lady, who was plain in her dress and retired in manner, resumed her seat in the remote corner.

The gentleman who had bought the picture book approached her and said:

"We are strangers, but I want to thank you for the good your little sermon has done me."

She looked at him in surprise, as she asked: "My little sermon, did you say sir?"

"Yes. I am a minister, and have preached many years, and should be very glad to know that one of my sermons ever did the good that your act of kindness has done."

The lady modestly replied that she had done no more than obey the golden rule.

The mental clouds had dispersed by this time, and a friendly conversation sprang up among the passengers.

The time of waiting, that had commenced so gloomily, passed away in the most pleasant and cheerful manner, and we all felt that it was due to the power of one little act of kindness.—Christian at Work.

The pious John Newton says: "I was once in a large company where very severe things were spoken of an absent gentleman, when a person seasonably observed, that though the Lord was pleased to effect conversion and edification by a variety of means, he had never known anybody convinced of error by what was said behind his back."

For "The Friend."

To some of the Junior Members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

It is encouraging to observe that there are within the limits of this Yearly Meeting, not a few young people who give evidence that they are yielding to the convictions of the Holy Spirit in their hearts, and are willing to take up their daily cross because of the love they bear Him who has in mercy called them into the narrow way. The outward circumstances in life of these are varied, yet all of them, whatever may be their condition in other respects, find that they have a share of trials and temptations to encounter and overcome. I am occasionally led to sympathize with this class of my young friends, and am therefore induced to offer them a few words of encouragement.

It was written, over eighteen hundred years ago, that "they who will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution." This persecution may not come from man,—it may only consist in the continued assaults of our unwearied foe, who always struggles after that heart that has been dedicated to Christ. Trials of faith may result from youthful anticipations being spoiled and scattered, from disappointment in business, from bereavement, from disease, or even from a sense of loneliness in the way we believe ourselves called into. Discouragement may arise from finding ourselves making little headway in the effort to subdue our passions and bring every thought into proper subjection. Unless we are very careful, any one of these things may shake our confidence in Divine goodness. Satan will endeavor to persuade that if God really cared for us, our path would be much easier than it is. Each time, however, we question the correctness of God's dealings with us, or seek unduly to analyze his motives, or yield to discontent because of our lot, we lose ground in the heavenly race, and in some measure subject ourselves to the influence of our cruel enemy. Rather let us recollect, that "there hath no temptation taken us but such as is common to man," and that "in due time we shall reap if we faint not."

In the ordinary course of events the young friends whom I address, will, if faithful, be called to various stations in the Church, and consequent labor in religious Society. Some may be called to the ministry, some to the administration of the discipline; some may serve their Lord by the offering of many secret prayers, and some may glorify Him by patient suffering. In their future spheres of action they will find that present difficulties have made them more useful to the Church, and in many ways given them a practical knowledge of those things whereof they may be called upon to speak. How can we tell of the benefits of affliction if we ourselves have never been afflicted? How can we properly estimate the conflicts and temptations that beset the youthful Christian if we have not partaken of them? How can we enlarge upon the mercy and forgiveness of our Heavenly Father, if we have not known ourselves to be raised out of trouble and sin? Let us then endure all that is meted out, if by so doing our efficiency in the Divine service will be increased.

The voice of history and the experience of men and women with whom we now associate, all prove that misfortunes in early life were no disadvantage, but rather a blessing to those who had to contend with them. The vicissitudes of David's early life made him an experienced warrior, and all the more able to contend for the victory of Israel's arm. The apostles testified to the troubles they countered. Did not their steadfastness, their zeal, their disregard for the opinions of the world, all indicate the possibility of living life devoted to Christ in the midst of very favorable surroundings and the most cruel sufferings? Were they not examples to us of the truth, that it is only through faithful patience that we can expect to inherit promises? We of this day may not have same experiences that they had, and our trials may be of a different character from the but the result will be the same, and God's glory will be increased and our own salvation secured by patiently yielding to them. Whatever He may take away from us He can more than recompense, and his good will provide and the justice of his dealings will finally vindicate.

There is one more consideration, the most important of all. It is the animating thought that this life is but the entrance to a world of inconceivable happiness to all those who love Christ. The Christian knows that beyond the grave there is untold compensation for all the trials he has passed through here. So then let us remember the language, "Be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."

An Earnest Word for Young Smokers.—The "monthly letter" of the English Anti-Tobacco Society and Anti-Narcotic League, for the 1st month of 1883, the following letter from Charles Garrett, President of the Conference, is given:

I am deeply grieved to see so many young people enslaving themselves to tobacco. Smoking is not only a waste of time and money, but it injures the health, the temper, and the influence of the smoker. It evidently promotes indolence and selfishness; almost every idler is a smoker, while the conduct of smokers in railway carriages is a miserable illustration of their selfishness; one smoker rather than exercise self-denial, will make whole carriage full of people uncomfortable. The aged man and the feeble woman alike sacrificed to his personal gratification. The bondage of the smoker is more despot than that of the drunkard. I have been assured scores of times that the giving up of tobacco was more difficult than the giving up of drink; every thing has to bow to this appetite when once formed. The company of a fair and the wise and the holy is gladly left for a pipe. I have seen Christian men miserable in the most attractive and interesting company, and stealing away to the most attractive room to secure a smoke. It is sad thing to see a young man, and especially a Christian young man, fastening these fetters upon himself. I trust you will never beg but for the sake of your health, your purity and your soul, you will resolve with me never to touch a pipe or cigar, but to retain and enjoy the freedom from this injurious habit which our Maker has endowed us."

A LIFETIME.

Selected.

BRYANT AFTER THE DEATH OF HIS WIFE.

And well I know that a brightness
From his life has passed away,
And a smile from the green earth's beauty,
And a glory from the day.

But I behold above him,
In the far blue depths of air,
Dim battlements shining faintly,
And a throng of faees there.
See over crystal barrier
The airy figures bend,
Like those who are watching and waiting
The coming of a friend.

And one there is among them,
With a star upon her brow,
In her life a lovely woman,
A sinless seraph now.

I know the sweet calm features,
The peerless smile I know;
And I stretch my arms with transport
From where I stand below.

And the quick tears down my eyelids;
But the airy figures fade,
And the shining battlements darken,
And blend with the evening shade.

I am gazing into the twilight,
Where the dim-seen meadows lie;
And the wind of night is swaying
The trees with a heavy sigh.

DEAR HANDS.

Selected.

Thinned and worn with ceaseless toil and care,
Perfumed grace, no dainty skill, had these;
They earned for whiter hands a jeweled ease,
Kept the sears unlovely for their share.
Fast and slow, they had the will to bear
The whole world's burdens, but no power to seize
The flying joys of life, the gifts that please,
Gold and gems that others find so fair.
Dear hands, where bridal jewel never shone,
Upon no lover's kiss was ever pressed,
Lied in unwonted quiet on the breast,
Saw, through tears, your glory newly won,
The golden eirelet of life's work well done,
With the shining pearl of perfect rest.

MY HOME.

When in gray of early twilight,
Fades the brief November day,
While the lamps are yet unlighted,
And the work is laid away,
Turn I from the voices round me,
From the sounds of thrift and care,
From all outward toil and burdens,
To my home serenely fair.

Fair when Autumn's brimming sunshine
Fills the lofty rooms with light,
Fair when dusky shadows gather,
And the fire burns red and bright,
Fair when spring-flowers fresh and fragrant,
Through the opening windows lean,
Fair when household joy and comfort,
Laugh at winter's frozen sheen.

Always fair, but not with gilding,
Statues, paintings, old and rare,
Costly carpets, stately mirrors,
Pride of wealth, and fashion's glare;
But the charm of perfect fitness
Touches all with simple grace,
And a clear true sense of beauty
Harmonizing all, I trace.

* * * * *
Here we often sit together,
One beloved well, and I,
Or, amongst the sofa cushions,
Idly by the fire I lie,—

Speaking not, while thought retraces
Paths wherein we have been led;
Speaking not for very sweetness
Of the peace around us shed;
And the only outward token
Of the trust and love we bear,
Is the thoughtful, mute eavesring,
Of the hand which strokes my hair

But my home has pleasant voices,
Tones not marred and strained by strife,
Cadenced to the gentle measure
Of a true and loving life;
And a sound of baby laughter
Sometimes thrills the quiet rooms;
Ah! the tiny cradle-blossom,
Dearer is than April blooms.

Fairest light that falls from Heaven
Shines in this dear home always,
Shines through loving eyes, whose brightness
Changes not for stormy days.
Pride and envy never enter,
Anger cannot there abide,
For our Heavenly Father's presence
All the place has purified.

Therein centre true affections,
Active care for others' need,
Holy thoughts and aspirations,
Seeking truth in word and deed.
But they call me,—fades the vision,
Close the pearly gates again;
Lamps are lit, and night has settled
With a sound of falling rain.

Religious Views and Tenets.

Has the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, set us free from the law of sin and death? The law of Moses was given for the restraining of the outward acts of an outward people. It was only added because of the transgression of the inward law of the Spirit of life which man first had. But what the law could not do because of the weakness and sinfulness of the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and as an offering for sin, condemned sin to death in the flesh, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. So Christ came not to destroy the law and the prophets, but to fulfil. And the righteousness of the old law is fulfilled in those who are crucified with Christ. It is done away with for the weakness and unprofitableness of it. For it made nothing perfect. But the bringing in of the better hope—the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, does make perfect, as it brings that life and immortality to light again which was lost in the fall. The old law was given by Moses, but the new law of grace and truth comes by Jesus Christ. And the true Christian is no longer under the law, but under grace—under the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus.

"On Sinai's mount Jehovah gave the law,
Life for obedience; death for every flaw."

It was then outward death for outward transgressions. It is now spiritual death for inward transgressions. And since by the disobedience of man, came death, even so by obedience to the Son of man came the resurrection from the dead. "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ (not out of him) shall all be made alive." But professing Christ, and talking abundantly about Him, is not being in Him, nor being made alive by Him. "If we have not the spirit of Christ we are none of his." And if we are his, we will learn of Him. For the Father says of Him, "This is my beloved Son, hear ye Him." It is by Christ that the gospel which is the power of God to the salvation of all who believe and receive it, is preached to every creature, or intelligent individual under heaven. And as Christ has his ministers, to minister out his gospel, in his power, so those who are obedient to it, become heirs of salvation. And anti Christ has his ministers, to minister out his counterfeit gospel, by sending them to and fro in the earth, "as ministers of righteousness." "By their fruits ye shall know them." Yes, by their fruits; not by the multitude of "converts," or of adherents; because "many shall follow their pernicious ways; by reason of whom the ways of truth shall be evil spoken of;" while but few enter in at the strait gate, and walk in the narrow way that leads to life eternal.

Many are crying up men, and the ways and religions of men, seeming to have more faith in the wisdom and eloquence of men than in the power of God. Many appear to be secretly, and some more openly, intercepting the ways of the true Israel of God; and like the Philistines stopping the mouths of the wells, and the springs of living water; not entering the heavenly Canaan themselves, but seeking to hinder those who are striving to enter. But "other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." He is the stone which the builders of Babylon have ever rejected; but which remains to be, through all ages of the world, the head of the corner in the true temple and worship of the living God. But He is "a stone of stumbling and rock of offence" to the wise and prudent of this world, who are seeking to climb up into heaven some easier way than that of the cross. "Woe to them that are at ease in Zion, and trust in the mountain of Samaria, which are named the chief of the nations! That chant at the sound of the viol, and invent to themselves instruments of music, like David; but they are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph."—Amos vi. 1, 5, 6.

If we are of the flock and fold of Christ we shall be heirs of his kingdom. And then, and not till then, we shall know the voice of Him, the true Shepherd, from the voice of the stranger; our wills would be subjected to his will. But if our wills are not entirely surrendered to the will of the good Shepherd, we cannot distinguish his voice from the voice of the stranger, nor be led by Him. Because our wills are in the way. And the voice of the hireling, or of him who is a stranger to the covenant of promise, is far more congenial to the unrenewed man, as it has less of self-denial and the daily cross in it. Our Saviour in speaking of the blind guides and persecuting inhabitants of Jerusalem, says, "How often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathered her chickens under her wings, and ye would not." His will was to gather them to Him, by the drawing cords of his love, but their wills were too much exalted, and they would not be gathered. They loved darkness rather than light, and why? because their deeds were evil, and their house was left to them desolate. Their wilful darkness and disobedience caused their overthrow, and how great was their fall? It is also said concerning them that "hearing ye shall hear and shall not understand; and in seeing ye shall see and not perceive; for the heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed; lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them." So the salvation of God was turned away from them, and offered to those who were willing to see and hear and receive it. And to such as had willingly received the gospel light and had their spiritual eyes opened to see it, Christ said, "Blessed are your eyes, for they see; and your ears for they hear." But "the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light." We have a worldly wisdom; and we have a heavenly wisdom. The world by its wisdom knows not God, nor the deep things of God. The children of light are, in their generation, wise in heavenly things because they are generated anew into the Divine life. That is, they are re-generated—born again—born from above—born not of flesh and blood, of corruptible seed as we by nature have, but of incorruptible seed by the over-shadowing power of that eternal Word which liveth and abideth forever. But the children of this world are in their generation, blest with a wisdom for which we should be truly thankful to the great Giver. For by it, the natural man is enabled to invent and carry on many wonderful works to the benefit of the world. But not many of this class are called by God to aid in the works of the heavenly kingdom. For He chooses such as are esteemed the foolish of this world, yea, and those who are despised hath he chosen, to confound the wisdom of the worldly-wise, and to bring to nought things that are, that they should have no place in heavenly things, nor with the children of light, in carrying on the works of God. That no flesh should glory in his presence. So the children of this world are, in their generation wiser in relation to worldly things. And the children of light are, in their renewed generation wiser in relation to heavenly things. But such as are not the children of light, must believe in the light, and walk in the light, that they may become children of light.

A poet, in writing on heavenly wisdom says:

"More than a sun is in thee though 'tis hurled
Beneath the worthless rubbish of the world;
Immersed in vanity's inconstant tide,
And buried deep beneath the waves of pride."

Selected.

The following letter from Sarah Grubb to Rebecca Jones dated 3d month 18th, 1785, contains much that is replete with instruction.

"There is so little in me that is comfortable, much less desirable even to myself, that I am ready to 'say to corruption, thou art my father, to the worm, thou art my mother and sister;' and were it not for the breaking in of immortality in the depth of this abasedness, which (though soon taken up again) leaves a renewal of strength behind it, how abject would my ease be! Were there not something which no outward gratification can satisfy, my husband and my situation in most respects, might soon fix my mind in a sort of earthly paradise, and centre my enjoyments in what the world calls good, and what under the blessing which makes truly rich, is really so.

Thy kindness and my feelings have urged me to write; an employment from which I am often led, believing that if it is my lot to make a safe progress, I must learn more and more to salute but few by the way. There is an airy, unconverted mind, very prevalent among the professors of Truth, and may it not sorrowfully be said, amongst some of the fore rank of the people; which is naturally seeking to attract us from the Rock of our strength; and though it is attended with a specious appearance of loving the Truth, and a readiness to say, 'Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord,' (and there is something in me that loves to be courteous to these, rather than abide the cross,) yet in those humbling abasing seasons wherein no human consolation can avail, except what is felt in the deep utterance of united spiritual exercise, I find not such to be my fellow helpers in the Lord; and I have clearly discovered, that to support an unrequired familiarity with them, is to be in great danger of hurting myself; and if it should be grateful to any such, will rather strengthen their contentment in their present state, than turn them from the sandy to the true foundation.

Thus my dear friend, has a line sometimes opened to the view of my mind, which being opposite to my natural disposition, brings with it its trials, a daily call for circumspection, and according to my measure, the suffering path of the great and holy Pattern, who, though he ate with publicans and sinners when salvation was sent to their houses, yet in no wise countenanced or approved those who boasted of being Abraham's children, but were under the power of the seducer. * * * To be sensible of our own infirmities, and therefore to be chaste to the Bridegroom of souls, when he is pleased to withdraw the sensible enjoyment of help, and discoveries of his putting forth, is a desirable situation for the mind to centre in; as it preserves us from joining with those spirits and things, either in ourselves or others, which we have once seen to be in the degeneracy from the pure life; and enables to possess the vessel in sanctification and honor."

The San Francisco Herald says, that "despite the hostility which has recently been displayed against them, the supply of Chinese labor in California is insufficient to meet the demands of the corporations here and in Oregon;" and further, that "a brisk demand for Chinese servants exists in the city, and they are employed in many instances by the United States Army and Navy officers at $20, $25, and $30 a month;" and moreover, that there is "a growing demand for Chinese labor in the vineyards of California." It is stated, too, that $10 premium per capita was offered lately for 1,000 laborers for the Southern Pacific Railroad, and so great was the demand for their services that no laborers could be found to meet the demand. By and by the American people will wake up to the great folly that has been perpetrated in the passage of this iniquitous bill. It will be remarkable to hear Californians crying out for a repeal of the bill; and yet that is what is not unlikely to happen before half of the ten years of prohibition have passed away. It is with shame and confusion of face that we see this bill go upon the statute book of the Nation.—Chris. Advocate.

Pundita Romabai, a learned Hindu lady, has excited profound interest by a course of lectures lately delivered at Bombay. She is a widow, twenty-five years of age, and is pleading for the emancipation of her sex from the many debasing superstitions of India, and for female education. At one of her meetings several native ladies followed her in speaking, and gave their earnest indorsement to her efforts for the elevation and education of women. The possibility of such a meeting, addressed by native ladies, indicates a wonderful advance in India.—Extract.

Religious Items, &c.

Russian Mennonites.—A considerable number of these people emigrated to Central Asia to escape from military service, to which they were conscientiously opposed. They settled in Bokhara, near the borders of Russian Turkestan, and have had a trying time, having been four or five times forcibly removed by the Bokharans across the boundary of the Russian possessions. The Russian authorities have procured them a home in the principality of Khiva, where large bodied land are lying uncultivated, in consequence of the liberation of 50,000 Russian and Persian slaves.

The London Friend for the Second month contains a translation of part of a letter describing their situation and prospects, which was sent to some of their brethren in Prussia, probably during some part of the year. From this it appears that a deputy of their number, accompanied by a Russian officer, waited on the Emir of Khiva, who assured them of perfect religious liberty in his domain, and promised to give each one as much land as he could take care of, in addition to the four years without taxes of which kind, and as much seed as was needed for the first year. The soil would need irrigation for which the Amu Daria River is adapted.

The letter says: "Our plan of travelling is as follows:—In eight days it is our intention to start per wagon from here, and to go about 30 werst* beyond the city of Bokhara; then we must take camels, on which we pack our baggage, as well as our wives and children; whilst the men travel on horseback; thus going 100 werst, crossing a desert, when we reach the Amu Daria River, where everything is landed on a ship, and we go on along the river till we reach our point of destination."

"And now through the mercy of God, we are 'free' quite 'free.' All the rest time we tell. The word of the Lord is and remains the truth now and forever. Things are as sad with us as has been said of us, and many outside think. We are happy and good courage."

The faith of these poor people, that their right home for them is in Central Asia seems strong—but in view of the efforts of the Russians to extend their dominions in that part of the world, and the consequent frequent wars with the native governments, there would seem to be a great probability that inoffensive Mennonites would ere long find themselves subjected to renewed trials, and their faithfulness to the principles of peace again severely tested.

Ritualism in the Church of England.—Church circles in England have been considerably agitated by the persistent defiance of the law regulating the performance of acts of worship in the "Established Church," by a clergyman named Mackonoehie. As the time drew near when he would be deprived of his "order" and thus lose his position as a clergyman, the law has been evaded by inducing him to sign his benefice of St. Alban's. Another ritualistic clergyman has been appointed to take charge at St. Alban's, and the vacant thus made was filled by the appointment of Mackonoehie—with the full expectation the same illegal practices will be continued in both places.

* The werst is nearly two-thirds of a mile.

In reference to this action, the Church Association "records its protest against a transaction which it looks upon as a betrayal of protestant reformed religion established v."

Record says: "The Mackonochie affair effected a definite change of front in the attitude of our rulers towards Ritualism. It became, and is accepted as betokening, the real toleration of the Mass."

These movements, and the confusion which arises from State interference with matters of churchmanship, seem to be preparing many for separation of Church and State, and the cessation of State patronage and State rights.

See Principles in Denmark.—In Denmark a journal named Freden (Peace) has been commenced as the special organ of a movement in favor of peace, and of making Denmark a neutral country, which shall not be involved by the wars or disputes of the other European States. A portion of the columns of this journal is devoted to the question of International Arbitration, and to papers showing the great superiority of this mode of settling disputes, as compared with the costly and terrible resort to war.

Scandinavian people enjoy a freedom of discussion and of action which are not possessed by their neighbors, the Germans and Austrians, who are more sternly held in the bonds of military despotism.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Oat-meal Water.—A handful of oat-meal in a quart of water is both refreshing and strengthening as a drink, especially in summer. In the Baldwin Locomotive works, where it is kept on hand, and the men, even those who are given to drinking intoxicating liquors, grow fond of it. They say that when they drink it, they do not seem to want their Houses Ready-made.—Quite a trade has been developed in ready-made houses by a man at Walkerton, Ontario, where orders for a row of buildings can be filled at short notice. They are made knock-down, and the materials shipped by rail to the point of destination, accompanied by one of the partners, who superintends the erection of the building.

Classification of Brandy.—A recent report of the American consul at Rochelle, states that the greater portion of the brandy is made from alcohol of grain, potatoes or beet, and flavored to imitate the genuine. The mention of a particular year on the label no longer means that it was made in that year, but that it has the taste or color of the brandies of that year are supposed to possess. It is said that an increase of violent political crimes in France has been caused by the use of this brandy and absinthe.—Scientific American.

The Flying Lemur.—Another curious animal which I had met with in Singapore and Sumatra, but which was more abundant in Sumatra, is the Galeopithecus, or flying lemur. This creature has a broad membrane extending all round its body to the tips of the toes, and to the point of the long tail. This enables it to pass obliquely through the air from one tree to another. It is sluggish in its motions, at least by day, going up a tree by short runs of a few feet, and then stopping a moment as if the action was difficult. It rests during the day clinging to the trunks of trees, where its olive or brown fur, mottled with irregular whitish spots and blotches, resembles closely the color of mottled bark, and no doubt helps to protect it. Once, in a bright twilight, I saw one of these animals run up a trunk in a rather open place, and then glide obliquely through the air to another tree, on which it alighted near its base, and immediately began to ascend. I paced the distance from one tree to the other, and found it to be seventy yards; and the amount of descent I estimated at not more than thirty-five or forty feet, or less than one in five. This, I think, proves that the animal must have some power of guiding itself through the air, otherwise in so long a distance it would have little chance of alighting exactly upon the trunk." [We remember, when a boy, trying to catch the common flying squirrels of our country. One of them which had been disturbed from its nest in a hollow tree, flew towards another tree, on which one of our company was perched. Before reaching the tree, the squirrel seemed to see its enemy, and turned in the air and directed its flight at a considerable angle to another tree; proving that a certain power of guiding their course is possessed by these flying animals.—Ed.]—Wallace's Malay Archipelago.

Baking Walls.—Among the recent discoveries at Hissarlik by Dr. Schliemann, are the remains of buildings of great antiquity, in which the walls were made of unbaked bricks, which had afterwards been baked in situ by masses of wood piled on both sides and kindled simultaneously.

Consumption of Wood.—The Census bureau gives the amount of wood used for domestic purposes in the United States and Territories in the year 1880, as 140,537,439 cords; the amount used on railroads and steamboats, about 2,760,000 cords.

Trepanning in Prehistoric Times.—One of the most curious traces of primitive belief which has come down to us is found in the trepanned skulls which have been discovered in several caves and dolmens of France belonging to the earlier portion of the new Stone Age. Dr. Paul Broca has devoted a pamphlet to the description of these trepanned skulls and the discussion of their significance. The fact is certain that a great number of these skulls were trepanned during life-time, probably in infancy and early youth, and that they healed up again, the subject of the operation surviving it for many years. P. Broca supposes this trepanning to have constituted a sacred rite of some sort.

Swallows.—In the year 1878, a pair of swallows built a nest on the ledge of an iron girder in the drawing-room of a new mansion in the course of erection; the birds having access through the windows. The nest was finished and five eggs laid. But before all the young ones were hatched, the workmen had to go into the room to lath and plaster the ceiling. The work could not be delayed in favor of the feathered occupants of the room. Fortunately, however, for the little strangers, T. Kemp, one of the workmen was a bird-fancier. He made a box and carefully placing the nest into it, suspended it from the ceiling by a piece of copper wire. The nest being about six feet from its original position, the old birds then became very timid and did not seem at first inclined to take to the box; but their natural instincts soon prevailed. Before however the parents regained confidence, the young ones began to get cold, so T. Kemp very thoughtfully saved the poor little creatures by warming them in his hands, till the old ones resumed their nursing. This they did notwithstanding the noise of the workmen's hammers, and the usual busy stir in the room. After this brood was flown, five more eggs were laid in the box, all of which were successfully hatched and reared.—Science Gossip.

THE FRIEND.

THIRD MONTH 17, 1883.

The following brief letter to the Editor from a Friend in Canada, is here inserted, in the hope that it may prove encouraging to those who are traveling in spirit for the welfare of the Church, and for the spread of the Redeemer's kingdom in the earth; and whose hopes are placed on the tender mercies of the Lord; who renews from time to time his visitations to the sons of men, and his offers of salvation to those who will submit to the operations of his Spirit.

"Dear Friend,—In reading a communication in the 28th No. of present volume of 'The Friend,' signed Joseph Morris, the exultation therein expressed, so met my approbation and unity, that I felt my heart to leap for joy, to hear the language of a true travail of soul for us individually, and for Zion's sake. This same subject has dwelt much upon my mind for a length of time. May we not hope there are many throughout the length and breadth of those called by the name of Friends who are secretly laboring for the good of Jerusalem all the days of their lives. As this humble secret travail of soul increases, I believe the true Church will be blessed.

"And let us not be weary in well doing, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not."

The Book Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings have recently added to their publications, three small books—Margaret Lucas, Elizabeth Stirredge, and Rebecca Hubbs. Of these the very interesting biographies of M. Lucas and E. Stirredge, are already in the "Friends' Library" series; but their publication in this more portable form will probably give them an increased circulation.

Rebecca Hubbs was a minister in our Society, who resided at Woodstown, New Jersey, and was a remarkable instance of the manner in which Divine Grace supplies defects in intellectual abilities and culture in the exercise of Gospel ministry. The preface of this little book, written by one who knew her well, says her ministry was an illustration of the truth of the Scripture declaration: "God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, &c., that no flesh should glory in his presence." "Though very deficient in the learning of the schools, Rebecca Hubbs became a dignified instrument prepared by the immediate power of Him that called her in upholding the standard of righteousness, and in calling others to come, taste, and see that the Lord is good."

We believe many Friends are very sensible of the importance of a wide circulation of such valuable spiritual publications as those issued by our Meeting for Sufferings; and frequently find occasions to present copies of them to those to whom they hope they will be useful. To do this to the best advantage requires the donor to be himself familiar with the books he distributes, so that he may adapt his gifts to the condition and wants of those to whom they are sent. It would be well therefore for those who feel this concern, to procure and read the works now noted. They are for sale at Friends' Book Store 304 Arch St., Phila., at 25 cents per copy.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In the next United States House of Representatives there will be 192 Democrats, 127 Republicans (counting the six Virginia Readjusters as Republicans), four Independents and two Greenbackers. The new House will have 365 members, making 163 a quorum for business.

On the 6th instant, an election was held in Vermont on Constitutional Amendments forbidding Federal officers to become members of the Legislature, and providing for the election of State Treasurer and Auditor by the people instead of by the Legislature. The returns indicate their adoption by a large majority.

In the Ohio House of Representatives a constitutional amendment resolution has passed—63 to 25—providing for full Legislative control of the liquor business, with power to pass local option laws, to levy a special tax and to prohibit. Two Republicans voted against the resolution and four Democrats for it. It goes to the Senate for concurrence.

In the New Jersey House of Representatives, on the 12th instant, a resolution was adopted, providing for a joint meeting of the House and Senate on Fifth-day to elect a State Comptroller. The bill prohibiting the sale of cigarettes or tobacco in any form to minors, under 16 years of age, under penalty of $20 for each offence, passed finally, as did also a joint resolution amending the Constitution, and making four persons out of a jury of six, and nine persons out of a jury of twelve, competent to render a verdict in civil cases.

On the 7th instant, a ruddy-faced lad about 15 years old, named Emil C. Gattstein, was brought before Justice Duffy, at the Essex Market Police Court, New York, charged with stealing $70 from his mother, who keeps a small cigar store, and who is treasurer for the Women's Bohemian Benevolent Society. The youth, it would appear, has been an inveterate reader of dime novels, and when discovered the night before in a theatre, with a new suit of clothing, a blunderbuss, four revolvers and a scalping knife, he informed his captors that he intended to go out to fight the Indians on the Plains. He had a passenger ticket in his pocket, but of the money as stolen from his mother, only 70 cents remained. The Justice committed him for trial.

Two more New York boys were arrested at the Erie Railroad depot in Jersey City, on the 12th inst., and searched. "Four revolvers, two bowie knives and 1000 rounds of cartridges, together with $184 in gold, were found on their persons." They said they were "going West to exterminate the hostile Indians."

The Assistant Secretary of the Interior on the 7th, received a despatch saying that about two hundred settlers recently invaded that part of the Sioux reservation which lies east of the Missouri river and put up shanties there; also that thousands of others are preparing to follow. The intruders will be expelled.

There are 1286 school buildings in Arkansas, valued at $254,217; 129 of the number were erected during last year. The school teachers number 2418, of whom 471 are colored.

The fruit growers of Southern Illinois are reported to be hopeful of the largest peach crop for several years.

The Mississippi river has fallen nine inches at Memphis and three inches at Helena, since the decline began. The levees around Helena are in good condition. A break occurred in the levee at Mason's, below Australia, Mississippi, on Seventh-day night, which is 500 yards wide and five feet deep. This will overflow a large district. The break at Green Grove, on the 7th instant, overflowed the country back of Australia, before the Mason's break occurred.

Judge Taylor, of Fort Wayne, a member of the Mississippi River Commission, says he has definite information that the damage to the Government works as the result of the Mississippi floods would be very small.

"There have been very exaggerated stories in some of the papers," he said, "but the facts are, that only slight damage has been done, and nothing has yet occurred during this great flood to show that the general plan of the improvements is not correct, and the money well expended."

The deaths in this city last week numbered 433, which was 29 more than during the previous week, and ten less than during the corresponding period last year. Of the entire number, 218 were males, and 219 females: 73 died of consumption; 43 of pneumonia; 24 of diphtheria; 19 of convulsions; 12 of old age; 14 of typhoid fever and 10 of croup.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 104½; 3½'s 104; 4½'s, 112½; 6's, registered, 118½; coupon, 119½; currency 6's 128 a 130.

Cotton continues steady, but there was very little movement. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 10¾ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ a 7½ cts. for export, and 8½ a 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in limited request, but steady. Sales of 1800 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.75 a $6.75; Pennsylvania family at $5.10 a $5.25; western do., at $5.50 a $6.40, and patents at $6.50 a $8. Rye flour is steady at $4 a $4.12½ per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is in limited demand and rather lower. Sales of 4200 bushels red, in car lots at $1.17 a $1.23½. Rye.—Car lots are wanted at 70 a 71 cts. Small lots will not bring over 68 cts. Corn was inactive and easier. Sales of 11,000 bushels, in car lots, at 60 a 69½ cts. Oats are dull but steady. Sales of 9500 bushels, in car lots, at 52½ a 57 cts.

Beef cattle were in demand and prices were a fraction higher: 2400 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5½ a 7½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

Sheep were a fraction higher; 7500 head sold at the different yards at 5 a 7½ cts., and lambs at 5 a 8 cts. per lb. as to condition.

Hogs were in fair demand at an advance: 3200 head arrived and sold at 10½ a 11½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—The statistical agent in London of our Department of Agriculture reports, that in England there are "continued rains and floods, great injury to the wheat crop, and gloomy apprehensions of the worst failure for years. The area is reduced and much re-sowing will be necessary. There is also much alarm at the spread of the foot and mouth disease among cattle."

On the 10th of this month, a large party gathered in London to witness the trial of the Tripp electrical tram car. The car ran a distance of four miles satisfactorily, and fulfilled the requirements of the Board of Trade.

Trevelyan, Chief Secretary for Ireland, in a speech in the House of Commons on the 10th, assured the House that the condition of Ireland was more tranquil than it had been for some time past. The same day Judge Lawson, addressing the Grand Jury at Armagh, referred to the decrease of lawlessness in Ireland. The murder conspiracy prisoners have been notified that their trial will be begun on 4th mo. 9th. They will be tried on three counts, namely, the Phoenix Park murders, the attempted murder of juror Field, and conspiracy. At a meeting of the Local Board of Swineford, County Mayo, it was reported that great distress prevailed in the district. Over 30 persons are in the poor-house, suffering from famine fever. There are 700 names on the list of persons needing relief. The distress has not been so great since the year 1847. People who refuse to enter the work-house are dying from want of food outside. The Government has ordered that prompt measures be taken for the relief of the starving people in Loughrea.

In Paris, on the 9th inst., five thousand persons, most of them attracted by motives of curiosity, collected on the Esplanade des Invalides. The police, without resistance, prevented groups from forming. Fifteen persons were arrested. The police barred the passage of 500 men who were marching to the Elysee, the residence of President Grevy. The affair was a fiasco.

The total number of persons arrested in Andalusia for complicity in the Anarchist movement is 1200. Of this number, 300 are charged with murders, agrarian outrages, and with being abettors of the "Black Hand" Society.

The steamer Navarre, bound from Copenhagen to Leith, foundered during the gale of the 8th. There were 81 persons, mostly emigrants, on board, only 16 of whom were saved.

The trial of 29 Socialists at Vienna, on charges of high treason and complicity in murder, was begun on the 8th. The accused persons admit that they carried out a resolution passed at club meetings to murder and plunder Merstallinger, proprietor of an extensive shoe manufactory.

The Porte has notified the United States Minister that the treaties of commerce will expire on 3rd mo. 12th, 1884. It is believed that there will be no difficulty in concluding new treaties involving increased import duties of from 8 per cent.

Alexander Comondouros, the Greek statesman leader of the opposition to Tricoupi, the present Minister of Greece, died in Athens, on 7th day. He was Prime Minister of the Kingdom several times from 1866 to 1882, his last term beginning in 19th mo. 1880.

Prince Gortschakoff, ex-Chancellor of the Russian Empire, died at Baden-Baden, on the 11th inst.

The revenue of Russia on imports during the 1882 exceeded that of 1881 by thirteen million roubles but was 5,500,000 roubles less than that of 1880. Among the prisoners to be arraigned at the approaching trial of Nihilists are several important State officials, three naval officers, an army officer, and Kob the constructor of the famous mine in Little G. street.

Calcutta advices to the Times state that great excitement has been aroused because of the proposed giving native magistrates criminal jurisdiction whites in certain cases, and has spread to the army letter from an officer doing duty in a large garrison published. He says the danger is most serious, and it will be impossible to control the men if a commiseration is universal among both officers and men.

Advices from Tamatane, Madagascar, under date 2nd mo. 26th, announce the arrival there of the French gunboat Vaudreuil. The town had not yet been plundered. Four French men-of-war had arrived on the northwest coast of the island. The natives were cited and were preparing to resist the French. There was no British war vessel present.

The Director of the Mint has received a letter from J. W. Helffrich, formerly coiner at the New Orleans Mint, and now Superintendent of the Mint of Mexico, at the City of Mexico, stating that he has a tract for coining 190,000,000 pieces of nickel for the Mexican Government. He submits specimens of the one, two and five-cent pieces, as coined by him, states that over $370,000 worth of them are already in circulation. The value of these nickel coins is denoted simply by a Roman numeral. The reverse of the five-cent Mexican nickel is almost an exact copy of the reverse side of the five-cent nickel now issued from the Philadelphia Mint. They are about the same size. The face and inscription, however, are entirely different. It is also stated, in connection, that the French Government has adopted the nickel coinage, instead of bronze.

Affairs in Hayti are quiet. Gen. Solomon, President of the Republic, has proposed to the Chambers of Deputies the abrogation of Article 7 of the Constitution, which prohibits foreigners from owning real estate in Hayti. The measure will pass by a majority.

TRACT ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS.

The Annual Meeting will be held in the Common room of Arch Street Meeting-house, on the even Fourth-day, the 28th instant, at 8 o'clock.

Friends generally are invited to attend.

How Deceit May Get Up.

postscript to a letter of Stephen Crisp, "not judging all that which is at enmity to the life, and tends to the hurting of the plant of God."

Dear Friends and Brethren,—I have some further in my heart to communicate to you, in dear and tender love, and in dependence of your preservation out of the snare of adversity; and that is, to exhort you to dwell in the pure judgment of the Truth, which is a defence upon your glory; and let me bereave you of this under any pretence soever. But as you come to a true feeling of the life in yourselves, to which alone certain judgment appertaineth, so let this save freedom, and stop it not from judgment all that which is at enmity with the life, tends to the hurt of the true plant of God. I have seen a harm hath come to many have parted with their judgment, and so become unarmed, and the enemy hath tilted upon them, under a pretended tenderness, to permit or suffer such things as hurtful to themselves and others; and when the Lord hath given them judgment discerning in the matter, yet were bereaved of that gift, and so by little and little beguiled.

! dear Friends! consider these days are busy times, and it is needful for every one to catch in that same eternal light to which first turned, that by its righteous judgment ye may be preserved from every thing yourselves that appears contrary to that pure life of which you have tasted. When have so done, then take heed that they do not do that by an instrument, but, through your watchfulness in the light, could not do without. All beware of that tenderness that cries out, be tender to and pray for all, and mind the good in all, love all, and judge none, but leave judgment to God, &c. I say, heed not the plausible words of that spirit, which being guilty, of its own head from a stroke, would beguile you of your judgment which God hath given you; and is indeed truly his judgment, to be administered in his wisdom and power, for the cleansing and keeping clean of the net. Such as have no judgment in their goings, are they that know not the true way of peace, but make them crooked paths. He that goeth in them, shall not know peace.—Isa. lix. 8.

But some may say, was not Christ meek and lowly? and ought not all to be like unto Him?

It is true, my Friends; but there is a difference between the Seed's suffering and its reigning, and there are times for them both. When it doth please God to permit the hour and power of darkness in the open persecutors, to exalt itself against his Seed and people by persecution, or such like; they are led by his spirit to appear in meekness and quietness, as a sheep before the shearer. But what is this to suffering bad and perverse spirits, that appear under pretence of the Truth, and yet are out of the Truth, and enemies to its prosperity, striving to exalt and set up another thing instead of the Truth? Such as these the Lord doth require you to use not only patience and meekness towards; but if that will not reclaim them, they must know the judgment of the Truth, and you in it must stand over them; for in this case the day of the exaltation of Christ is come, and God is crowning Truth with dominion over every false spirit, and corrupt practice thereof.

Therefore, dear Friends, eye the Lord in his goings forth, and as you feel his life in you to witness against any evil and corrupt thing or practice, use plainness, and keep sincerity, and turn not judgment backwards. That which is unwilling to be judged, and cries out, judge none, leave all to God, &c., the same will take upon it both to judge and rule, but not in the wisdom of God. Those that cry out so much for tenderness, and against Truth's judgment, the same are in much danger to be drawn out from the patient suffering in the spirit of Christ Jesus, when they ought to appear in the most meekness; they lose the exercise of that by which all should keep dominion over deceit, and lose that strength by which they should be enabled to suffer all things for the sake of Jesus Christ.

Dear Friends, in that which keeps out the defiler and the betrayer, all wait upon the Lord, that you may have your armor on, and be fortified with the strength, with the might, and with the judgment of God. Keep that under in every place, which under pretence of tenderness and forbearance, would make void the testimony of Truth, or make the offence of the cross to cease in anything wherein you have been instructed from the beginning; that the Lord may behold and see judgment established, and be pleased.—Isa. lix. The Lord looked, and there was no judgment, and it displeased Him; for thereby deceit got up, which with it is to be kept down.

So the Lord God of power and wisdom preserve you faithful, fitted for every good word and work; the strong to watch over the weak in singleness, and the weak to be subject to the strong in the Lord, that so the pure plant of righteousness and Truth may grow in and among you all, to his praise that hath called you; to whom be glory and honor for ever, amen."—S. C.

The Soudan and the Slave Trade.

In writing of the Soudan, we have not in mind that vast region lying immediately south of the Great Desert and sometimes called Nigritia, but the comparatively narrow strip lying east of this and stretching from Egypt proper to the country of the famous M'tesa. It is a narrow strip, a tract of land, relatively to the larger territory that bears the name. Make its area a common denominator for European States, and the area of Germany, or France, or Austria-Hungary, or Sweden, would be contained five times; that of Great Britain and Ireland, or Italy, or Norway, would be contained nine times; and the combined areas of Belgium, Switzerland, Greece, and the Netherlands, twenty times. Kordofan, Darfur, and Sennaar are some of its principal divisions thus properly included, and help to make up the 1,640 miles in length, 660 mean breadth which are its approximate dimensions. The reduction of Sennaar and Kordofan took place toward the close of the long rule of the warlike Mehemet Ali; while the annexation of Darfur and the Equatorial district was effected under Ismail, the ex-Khedive. Thus obtained and constituted, the Soudan was organized into a province of Egypt in 1877.

Of the character of the population, we have reason to believe that in a portion personal bravery is a trait to a degree remarkable for Africans. Their soldiers displayed their valor in initiating and, together with Egypt, accomplishing the invasion of Darfur in 1869. They have since conceived a sentiment of antagonism and independence which the absence of a vigorous provincial policy has fostered. General Gordon has described them thus: "They are smart, dapper-looking fellows, like antelopes, fierce, unsparing, the terror of Central Africa." Dangerous instruments in the hands of unscrupulous leaders, they might be transformed into useful members of society under the uplifting influences of Christianity and righteous law executed. This class live in Lower Soudan. The tribes in the vicinity and south of Gondokoro, are less aspiring, less attractive. The Arab immigrants are eager to take up the inconsistent war-cry "This is our land—we know no Khedive here!"

The country thus defined and inhabited, is being rapidly depleted by the slave-dealer. Few realize how rapidly. Two years ago Col. Gordon expressed the opinion that two-thirds of the population had already been carried away into slavery. More than ten years ago Sir Samuel W. Baker was sent out to stop this forced migration, and upon his return, reported success. Gordon, while Pasha, was unwearied in his efforts to follow it up, repeatedly dispersing caravans containing from 1, 600 to 2,000 slaves. In 1876 Egypt concluded an anti-slavery convention with Great Britain. Col. Gordon's resignation and a change of Khedive suspended the exercise of a firm authority over this region. Russia's recent interdiction of the abduction of Circassian maidens has destroyed the chief source of supply for the Turkish harems, and thus increased the demand for Africans.

The exportation of natives in large numbers has been revived with impunity and attended with more abhorrent cruelties than before. Obeid in Kordofan is the headquarters of the slave-hunter. To this point 40,000 are led annually, like dumb sheep, to be driven across a desert of twenty days' march to Debeh. At Debeh they are embarked on the Nile for the market at Wadi Halfa.

We wish that the concentrated gaze of the Christian world could follow one of those long, dismal processions over that baked and barren soil: England would go forward. Recently acquired dominance rolls upon her the moral responsibility of the initiative. A recent eye witness testifies that the route traversed by these bands is strewn thick with bones.

Those whose object in life was the emancipation of the Africo-American, are rapidly disappearing from among us; the agencies which furnished an opportunity and a channel for concerted effort, were largely disbanded nineteen years ago; and abolitionists and anti-slavery societies linger with the younger generation as memories of an heroic age. Such an organization drags out a feeble existence in Great Britain. The facts which we have cited reaching some of its members, led to a public conference during the month of November. R. W. Felkins, a medical missionary returned from the Court of M'tesa, confirmed the reports of correspondents in the field. Wm. E. Foster, indicated a line of action in the resolution that the Government be urged to exert its influence to the utmost in abolishing throughout the Egyptian dominions the legal status of slavery. Arnold M. P., moved a declaration of the antagonism of the slave trade to legitimate commerce and civilization, and of the justice of interference. The Earl of Shaftesbury presided at this meeting. His name recalls to us a passage in our own colonial history. It will be remembered that an Earl of Shaftesbury was a member of the original cabal; and through royal favor, was one of the proprietors and sovereigns of provincial Carolina. He associated with himself in the making of a lasting constitution, the philosopher John Locke. That instrument conferred upon every freeman "absolute power and authority over his negro slaves." Between times two centuries have intervened, and as Disraeli would put it, "a great many things have happened."

The meeting in Exeter Hall was not resultless. In the Circular Note which Earl Granville sent to Her Majesty's representatives at the various European courts, occurs this paragraph: "The question of the suppression of the slave trade and of the abolition of slavery as far as possible in Egypt, is one which Her Majesty's Government have much at heart. They will lose no favorable opportunity of advising the Khedive to take such steps as may be judicious for the attainment of these objects."—E. C. Dayton in N. Y. Evangelist.

Prayer is the vital breath of faith.

For "The Friend."

"In the world ye shall have tribulation; but he of good cheer: I have overcome the world." John xvi. 33.

I have lately been reading an account of one who deceased a number of years ago, (M. M. S.) in the perusal of which I trust I have received much instruction, though her path was at times a tribulated one, and one of many baptisms. I have been led to say, where is the trueborn Christian that does not at times have bitter cups to drink? but these dispensations are no doubt intended to purify and qualify, and make such as are willing to endure them, meet for the Master's use.

I love very much going along with one, in this way, on their pilgrimage journey through heights and through depths. As the outward elements and seasons come in their turn, so it is with the Christian traveller. But what a great favor it is, to have a little grain of faith left, a little glimmer of light when seasons of affliction appear, and the enemy comes in like a flood, and seems ready to devour; and what joy when light again breaks forth! "Unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings." So that any that would be followers of the Lord Jesus, must be willing to abide these chastening seasons; knowing that the dear Master will not afflict more than is necessary, but will come to their help in his own good time, and his everlasting arms will be underneath to support. He is not an hard Master to those that give up all to follow Him, but is full of tender compassion and pity; for, "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him."

There must be a willingness to partake of the bitter draughts as well as the sweet, knowing they are very necessary for refinement, for purification. Where would be the earnest pleadings, if our lives were all sunshine? Where would be our earnest prayers if we were to glide along smoothly all the while on the sea of life? It is not intended that it should be so, no more than that the outward elements should always be calm.

But what the Christian waits when chastened, is faith; for "Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth:—If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons; but if ye be without chastisement then are ye bastards and not sons." So that it behooves us to gird up our loins, and arm ourselves with the armor of faith, that we may be enabled to bear all that He is pleased to try us with, for He dealeth gently with his children, his little ones. His tender compassionate eye is over all such, to give them help in every needful time. Then what is wanting is to have a simple, childlike dependence and trust; wait for the Lord in seasons of desertion, for He has said, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." I believe when a low state is the Christian's portion, it is not an evidence of being forsaken by the blessed Master; but it is a trial of our faith; and it will be well for any not to take their flight at such a time, nor to be as the servant, when his master delayed his coming.

The Christian's path has ever been and still remains to be, one beset with thorns; at the same time not one that is bereft of joy and peace; but the latter overbalances the first. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee: because he trusteth in thee." It was those "who came out of great tribulation, that washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." So that these things must needs be, if we would attain to a "closer walk with God."

And what is more desirable in this world than to have Him for our friend, that sticks closer than a brother. One whom we can turn to in times of trouble. For our blessed Lord himself has said, "Call upon me in the day of trouble, I will deliver thee;" but what lows? "and thou shalt glorify me." So do not the Master want some fruits as an evidence of our love and appreciation of his goodness and mercy to us? In whatever way calls for it, faithfulness is required, even though it may be in a very little thing small it may hardly be thought worthy notice; but when peace consisteth in it, it is it not worthy of attention? Our Saviour has declared, "Herein is my Father glorified that ye bear much fruit."

Philada., 3d mo. 4th, 1883.

Christianity has often been injured by false testimony, the false lives, the misleading silence of its professed friends. It has often been injured because the action (or the inaction) of its professed friends put weapons in the hands of its enemies. A professed Christian, a "pillar in Zion," who is sharp or honest in business, who lives in selfish luxury whose whole life testifies that this world, all this man gives religion a staggering blow. Voltaire would have been powerless but for the help he got from the professed Christians of his day, from prelates and priests living in open vice, and wringing the means of self-indulgence from the poverty and ignorance of the people.

It is the false testimony of professed Christians that Christianity has most to dread.

*Words of an Exercised Mother (now no more for her children).—*They doubtless have heard the voice of the Blessed Shepherd, and that they could be persuaded to follow Him. Nothing in this life could so rejoice my heart as to see my precious offspring meekly and sweetly bending to the yoke of Christ. I am sometimes ready to cry out, what more can I do for my children than to bear them, with my tears, upon my heart before the throne of grace. They are naturally amiable and lovely but I long to see them new-born babes of Christ, and not ashamed or afraid to come to Him before men."

"Be still and know that I am God," Oh soul, rejoice that the Lord reigneth. He calms the rough surges of the mind. He bids the inward tempest cease. He can pour a reviving ray upon the drooping heart; cause a sweet serenity and peace to reign within. Trust in the Lord at all times. Be still, and know that He is God.

It is peculiarly soothing to the mind of a Christian, to know, that He who rules over all worlds, in whose hands are the destinies of nations, and individuals, is his Father and friend.

The more we know of God; of his power, wisdom, love, faithfulness, and truth; the more we shall bow before his throne in humble adoration, and filial confidence and love.

For "The Friend."

War and its Consequences.

Near the conclusion of Theodore L. Cuyler's work, "From the Nile to Norway," occurs the following: "All through the Orient, yes, and all through Europe, the perpetual eye is the ubiquitous soldier. In his various forms, white, scarlet, or blue,—he is everywhere. Except in their modern equipments these colossal standing armies seem like monstrous relics of the dark ages. * * * Whatever were my impressions of various countries, one thing is very clear, and that is, that the American Republic is making a prodigious impression upon the older continents. It is merely the coming nation; it has come! The great battle field of the next century lies between Plymouth Rock and San Francisco. When the devil gets America, the progress of humanity goes back more than ten degrees on the dial plate. If the Lord Jesus Christ visits America, then all the sooner will the millennium dawn break. It is not a matter of empty boasting, but it is a matter of momentous responsibility to be an American citizen, and to bear even the humblest part in shaping its moral destiny."

In a recent conversation with one ——— now beyond four-score years, but still in the possession of a clear and superior intellect; of eminent legal ability, and whose opportunities of observation have been unusually great, he stated it to be his belief, "That if the doctrines of the Society of Friends were universally known, accepted and adopted, it would bring about the millennium."

"Thy Will be Done."

No expression is uttered more frequently on human lips in prayer—and possibly I might add, with less idea of its solemn and full import—than the phrase that heads this article. When prosperity attends our footsteps in the path of life, and all things around us seem to work together for good to us and ours, how easy it is for us to say, "Thy will be done." When we are gathering earthly emoluments or honors for ourselves, and our children are growing up around us with credit to themselves in the school or college, or are rising in the ranks of professional commercial life, we are too apt to utter, with great unction and with a spirit submissive to divine dispensations, "Thy will be done." When social advancement, or political preferment, or any other thing on which we have set our hearts, turns out a successful venture, then the same formula, with the same willing submission to the divine will, is ever ready on our tongues. But let the tide of earthly prosperity turn against us; let us see the slow and toilsome accumulations of years swept away; let disappointment in some darling scheme meet us in an unexpected moment, when all seems ripe for full fruition; let a son on whose bright and prosperous career in the path of fame or fortune, we turn suddenly aside under an overmastering sense of duty to God and his own soul, and enter on some sphere of humble service for the Master, in which no hope of earthly preferment can ever enter; or let death, or sickness, or mental obscurance (commensurate to wealth) enter our dwellings and seize upon our heart's most cherished idol; then how few of us can say in integrity of purpose, and without some mental protest or some secret railing, "Thy will be done?"

It is such ordeals and such distresses that try our faith. It is such crucial tests that put our professions to the proof, and turn the pure gold of our imaginary submission to the divine will into dust and ashes. How many of us have—or rather, how few of us have not—passed through such trying ordeals?

A bright young girl, the pride of a household, not many years since was slowly but surely fading away. Her young life had been full of promise—too full it might be to give assurance of long continuance, although the parents, in their fond anticipations, had shut their eyes to the fact patent to all besides, until at length physicians of the highest standing were constrained to say that hope of her recovery could no longer be entertained. The father, who had, like all other professing Christians, so often repeated the formula "Thy will be done," sealed his lips to what seemed to be a solemn mockery. One evening as he sat beside the sick-bed, with feelings of bitterness and suppressed emotion, he was startled by this inquiry from his darling child, "Papa, is it right for any one to pray and not say, 'Thy will be done?'" and he was constrained to say, in agony of spirit, "No, my child, I do not think it is. We might ask for something, in our shortsightedness and ignorance, that it would not be proper for God to grant." "Well, papa," responded the child, "I do not want to die."

The bitterness of soul with which the father heard that sad response, can never be expressed in words, and he uttered in spirit, although no audible sound escaped his lips, this exceeding great and bitter cry, and thus he prayed: "O Father, if I can only see this dear child once reconciled to thy inevitable decree, and meet the last great change with hope and reconciliation, I will ask no more!" And he did receive within a few short days more than he had asked or even hoped; for the dear child looked death in the face with an undimmed eye and an unclouded intellect, even to the very portals of immortal life. She bade her friends a final adieu, and went to her rest "like one who wraps the drapery of his couch about him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

And yet, notwithstanding that bereaved father was granted all he asked for, and even more, in the reconciliation of his child to her Heavenly Father's will, and abundant evidence of her acceptance at the throne of heavenly grace, the old, old longing for her presence here, comes back at times upon the father's heart with a spirit half rebellious, half repining.

The old legend of the Scottish Highlander, who for the second time had been bereaved of his only child, illustrates the rebellious and murmuring heart.

In the midst of a bitter and blinding winter storm he went forth, lamenting loudly the calamity that had a second time fallen on his house, and was seeking a lamb for the customary funeral feast, when suddenly there met him in the way a stranger of a majestic and awe-inspiring presence, who asked him what he wanted.

"He had lost his only child," the poor man said, "and he wanted a lamb for the funeral feast."

"Does your flock make any resistance when you take a lamb, or any lamentation afterwards?" inquired the stranger.

"Never," was the answer.

"How differently am I treated," said the stranger; "I shield my flock from the frosts of winter and the heats of summer, and I lead them through green pastures, and cause them to lie down beside the still waters; and yet, if I choose one of the lambs to cherish in my own bosom, my ears are filled with the clamors of my ungrateful sheep."

The man looked up in amazement, but the vision had fled.—Selected.

The Serious Aspect of Freedom.

It is sometimes said that, as a nation, we are too grave, sober and quiet; that our people lack the merry, mirthful, nonchalant ways and manners of those of older countries; and it is supposed to follow, as a matter of course, that we lead, upon the whole, less happy lives. It is a fact that careful observation is continually affirming that the more despotic the government, the more light, trifling and volatile is the disposition of the people. It is true that there will be more suffering, there will be stern laws to obey, unwelcome tasks to perform, tastes and preferences must be given up, and the people must do as they are bidden rather than as they choose; yet they are vivacious and mirthful, often humorous and frolicsome. The truth is, they are, to a great extent, in the condition of children. They have no cares at all about State affairs, no responsibility in them, and consequently but little interest about them. They submit, as a matter of course, to be governed, and have no thought as to how it shall be done or by whom; their only part being to obey without demur or discussion.

As they have nothing to do with civil government, so they have but little to do with self-government. They are so hedged about with restrictions of authority and of custom that their employments, conditions, modes of life and even habits of thought are marked out for them, and to make a choice or a decision for themselves is a rare event. All this, which would seem to be so galling to us, with our notions of individual freedom, tends by its absence of responsibility to give a light and easy view of life to those who are accustomed to it, which is quite sufficient to account for the lightness and volatility of their disposition and manners.

The truth is, there is nothing so exacting in its demands nor so serious in its obligations as perfect freedom. It has a joy of its own, but not of the giddy and careless kind. There are continual choices to be made, decisions to form, undertakings to accept or refuse, actions to perform or leave undone, each of which is fraught with consequences more or less important and far-reaching. Wherever authority is absent, responsibility is present, and in the same proportion. It is not strange that the constant pressure of this influence should give to the manners a certain quiet gravity which contrasts with the volatility of some other nations. The necessity of wisdom, judgment, energy and discretion, which self-government implies, has a sobering effect on every one who is capable of it, and the thoughtful habit of mind which it induces must leave its trace on the countenance. And when to the responsibilities of self-government is added a share of responsibility in the government of the nation, the effect will be still more marked.

Thus, in the very freedom of our institutions and the consequent responsibility laid upon our people, we see abundant reason for a graver and more dignified bearing than will be shown by a people who have less liberty and fewer obligations. When, however, this is brought up as an evidence that our lives are less happy than theirs, we must deny the conclusion. There is nothing easier than to confound volatility with happiness, yet there is nothing more fallacious. As in nature, the most volatile substances most quickly lose their individuality, so in humanity the most volatile people usually have the least individuality of character. Yet all our best ideas of happiness are bound up in this very individuality. The slave, who does not own himself and has not even the charge of providing for his physical existence is, of all people, the most trifling and volatile. Yet who would think of ranking him among the happiest of mortals? or who, having once tasted the sweets of freedom, would accept his lot? So as we ascend the scale of individuality, of intelligence, of liberty, of responsibility, though laughter be less loud and gambols less frequent, real happiness increases with every step. Were this not the case the passage from childhood to manhood would be one of sorrow and regret. With every advancement in liberty, with every new power of choice, the youth grows somewhat more serious, somewhat more impressed with the dignity of life, somewhat more burdened with claims and obligations, yet at every succeeding advance he grows more conscious of the richness and fulness of life's happiness. Just as fast as self-government becomes established other governments become unnecessary, and the highest and best happiness of which we are capable must come, not through the merry, careless, easy life which depends on others and feels no responsibility, but through the serious and dignified acceptance of the duties and obligations which only the most perfect freedom imposes.—Public Ledger.

An American merchant who has been engaged in the tea business for seventeen years in Hong Kong, related lately some incidents which had fallen under his observation in China, which throws a pleasant light upon the character of these little-known people.

"Americans," he said, "are the best fed and best clothed people in the world. It is absolutely impossible for them to realize the excessive poverty which exists among the agricultural population of Northern China. They have no food but rice and water, and seldom enough of that. There are hundreds of thousands of them who do not possess twenty cents in currency in the course of a year.

"When famine comes—and it needs but a partial failure of the rice crop to produce famine—they are reduced to live upon earth and grass. Lots are drawn to find which of the children shall be sacrificed for the others, and the victim is brought down in the town and sold for fifty cents as a slave, the parents parting with a grief and despair, which are I believe genuine.

"Female infants are strangled at birth in a 'hard summer,' because the parents aver, it is impossible to feed them, and it is better for them to die in this way than by slow starvation.

"I tell you of these extreme conditions of their life to make you understand my story. I once went with some English officers duck-shooting up into these barren regions. Becoming separated from my companions, I lost my way, and asked the assistance of one of the poorest of these 'rice-planters.' He left his work instantly, and with the smiling, friendly courtesy, of which, by the way, one is always sure in the poorest Chinaman at home. He remained with me from noon till dark, searching among the winding creeks and flat marshes for my companions. When we had found them, I handed him a dollar, a sum larger than he would own probably in two or three years. He refused it, nor could all my persuasions force him to take it."

"My religion," he said, "bids me be kind to strangers, and the chance to obey the rule comes to me so seldom that I dare not destroy the good deed by taking pay for it."

"How many Christians might learn a lesson in humanity and faith from this poor follower of Confucius!"—Youth's Companion.

Sympathy.—A man sat in his study writing, when his little boy toddled into the room, and holding up his pinched finger, said with an expression of suffering, "Look, pa, how I hurt it!" The father, interrupted in the middle of a sentence, glanced hastily at him, and with just the slightest tone of impatience, said, "I can't help it, sonny." The little fellow's eyes grew bigger, and, as he turned to go out, he said, in a low voice, "Yes, you could; you might have said, 'Oh!'"

THE CLEAR VISION.

Selected.

I did but dream. I never knew
What charms our sternest season wore.
Was never yet the sky so blue,
Was never earth so white before;
Till now I never saw the glow
Of sunset on yon hills of snow,
And never learned the bough's design
Of beauty in its leafless line.

Did ever such a morning break
As that my eastern windows see?
Did ever such a moonlight take
Weird photographs of shrub and tree?
Rang ever bells so wild and fleet
The music of the winter street?
Was ever yet a sound by half
So merry as yon schoolboy's laugh?

O Earth! with gladness overfraught
No added charm thy face hath found;
Within my heart the change is wrought,
My footsteps make enchanted ground.
From couch of pain and curtained room
Forth to thy light and air I come,
To find in all that meets my eyes
The freshness of a glad surprise.

Fair seem these winter days, and soon
Shall blow the warm west winds of spring,
To set the unbound rills in tune,
And hither urge the bluebird's wing.
The vales shall laugh in flowers, the woods
Grow misty green with leafing buds,
And violets and wild-flowers sway
Against the throbbing heart of May.

Break forth, my lips, in praise, and own
The wiser love severely kind;
Since, richer for its chastening grown,
I see, whereas I once was blind.
The world, O Father! hath not wronged
With loss the life by thee prolonged;
But still, with every added year,
More beautiful thy works appear.

As thou hast made thy world without,
Make thou more fair my world within;
Shine through its lingering clouds of doubt;
Rebuke its haunting shapes of sin;
Fill, brief or long, my granted span
Of life with love to thee and man;
Strike when thou wilt the hour of rest,
But let my last days be my best!

—J. G. Whittier.

Hitherto the Lord hath blessed us,
Guiding all the way;
Henceforth let us trust Him fully,
Trust Him all the day.

Hitherto the Lord hath loved us,
Caring for his own;
Henceforth let us love Him better,
Live for Him alone.

Hitherto the Lord hath blessed us,
Crowning all our days;
Henceforth let us live to bless Him,
Live to show his praise.

OPPORTUNITY.

Say, who art thou with more than mortal air,
Endowed by heaven with gifts and graces rare,
Whom restless winged feet forever onward bear?

I am Occasion! known to few, at best;
And since one foot upon a wheel I rest,
Constant my movements are; they cannot be repressed.

Not the swift eagle in his swiftest flight
Can equal me in speed; my wings are bright,
And man who sees them waved is dazzled by the sight.

My thick and flowing locks, before me thrown,
Conceal my form, nor face nor breast is shown,
That thus, as I approach, my coming be not known.

Behind my head no single lock of hair
Invites the hand that fain would grasp it there;
But he who lets me pass, to seize me may despair.

Whom, then, so close behind thee do I see?
Her name is Penitence, and heaven's decree
Hath made all those her prey who profit not by me.

And thou, O mortal, who dost vainly fly
These curious questions, thou dost not descry
That now thy time is lost, for I am passing by!

—Translated from Terner

Exercise of a Mother in the Truth, about year 1860.—I feel solicitous that, not only literary but the religious guarded education of the children should be promoted by such means as may be in our power. Where suitable schools cannot be obtained, much may be done at home. A mother or a sister, under a due sense of the importance of the subject if concerned to devote a portion of their time to the careful instruction of the junior members of a family, may greatly aid in preparing the tender minds of the children to receive the precious Seed, and opening their understanding in best things: early impressions are very lasting, that we may be encouraged hope, with the divine blessing, a generation may be raised up prepared to support in this day, the doctrines of the Society and also peculiar testimonies, the treading down a overlooking many of which, we deeply mourn on our own account.

Religious Prudence.—It is a part of religious prudence to place ourselves as much and often as it is in our power to do, in circumstances directly favorable to our great design and to avail ourselves of all the positive help and furtherances which these circumstances afford. But we are to remember that it is the world which constitutes our outward circumstances; that in the form of the world, which is evermore at variance with the Divine form or idea, they are cast and moulded; and that of the means and measures which prudence requires in the forming anew of the Divine image in the soul, the greatest part supposes the world at enmity with our design. We are to avoid its snares, to repel its attacks, suspect its aids and succors; and even when compelled to receive them as allies within ches, yet to commit the outworks alone to their charge, and to keep them at a jealous distance from the citadel. The powers of the old are often christened, but seldom Christianized. They are but proselytes of the outer world; or, like the Saxons of old, enter the land auxiliaries, and remain in it as conquerors and lords.—Coleridge.

Chinese and Americans.—A Chapter of Contraries.

On the opposite side of the globe from America is a nation of people who are not our antipodes in geographical position, they differ from us in a multitude of ways. Only are they asleep when we are awake; only is their midnight our noonday, and our sunset our sunrise; but their peculiar manners and eccentric customs form a very interesting chapter. Perhaps, however, we ought to remember, when we call them a peculiar people, that they call us the same, and say we are the ones that do things contrary. Still, to us they are a very odd people. We shake hands as a salutation; a Chinaman shakes hands with himself; that is, he stands at a distance, and, clasping both hands together, he shakes them up and down at you. Instead of saying, "Good morning," or "How do you do?" they say, "How old are you?" "Have you eaten your rice?" We uncover our head as a mark of respect; they keep their heads covered, but take off their shoes as a matter of politeness. We shave the face; they shave the head and eye-brows. We wear the patriarchal beard before; they have a long "pig-tail" behind. We cut our fingers short; they consider it quite aristocratic to have nails from three to five inches long, which they are obliged to protect in silver sheaths. When broken off they are used as medicine.

The matters of dress John Chinaman finishes where the rest of mankind begin. His waistcoat is outside his coat, and his drawers outside his pants. We blacken our shoes; he whitens them. Our ladies compress the waist; theirs the feet. Our women wear long dresses; his long sleeves. In China the men carry fans, and the women wear the trousers. In eating, their customs are in striking contrast with ours. We have soup as a first course, and dessert at last; they have dessert first, and soup at last. They ignore knife and fork and spoon, and eat with two "chopsticks," both held in the right hand. Americans want their wines ice-cold; the Chinese like theirs scalding hot. In our land we drink our beautifully colored "Young Hyacinth" in the land of tea they leave out the infusion and Prussian blue, and wonder at the flavored taste that demands "doctored tea." They not only leave off the coloring, but also leave out the milk and sugar. Their books are also quite dissimilar to ours. Ours begin just where theirs end. We read lines; they in columns. We read horizontally, from left to right; they perpendicularly, from top to bottom. Our foot notes are on the bottom of the page; theirs on the top. We print on both sides of the leaf; they on one, but their leaves are always double. We set our volumes up on end in our libraries; they lay theirs down. We print with metal type; they with wooden blocks. In writing we use a pen; they a brush. We write our pen obliquely; they perpendicularly. Ink is a fluid; theirs a hard cake. Their language has no alphabet. The written language is not spoken, and the spoken language is not written. Two men can converse in writing when they cannot understand a word of each other in speaking. A Chinese school is a perfect Babel. The pupils study out loud, each one at the top of his voice, and all at once. When a scholar recites he turns his back to the teacher. This they call "backing the lesson."

In America, young people prefer to do their own courting, and engagements for marriage are made by the parties most concerned. In China, the parents, with the help of "go-betweens," select husbands and wives for their children, and the parties often never see each other till the wedding is over. After marriage, instead of a wedding trip, the bride is shut up as a prisoner in her husband's home, and does not go out for a month.

In China, the funeral customs are often directly the reverse of ours. In our country, a coffin would not be considered a very appropriate present; in the "Flowery Kingdom," a coffin is often given to a parent or a friend, while they are yet in perfect health. This is kept in the house for years, and often used as a table or bench. We go in silence to the grave; they with great noise and confusion. We deposit our dead in cemeteries; with them each family has its separate place of sepulture. We bury in the earth; they on its surface. We put our inscriptions on the top of a coffin; they on the end. We choose a shady place for burial; but no shadow must ever fall on a Chinese grave. With us, black clothing is a badge of mourning; with them, white garments indicate the loss of friends.

But where shall we end this chapter of contraries and oddities? In that land of opposites it is the old men that fly kites, play marbles, walk on stilts, and play shuttle-cock; and to keep up their odd way of doing things they play the latter with their feet, instead of their hands. In China, women do men's work, and men are the milliners, dressmakers, and washerwomen. With us the right hand is the place of honor; with them it is the left hand. In dating letters we place the year last; they write the year first. Instead of saying, "North-east" or "South-west," they say, "East-north" and "West-south." They always speak of the mariner's compass (their own invention) as pointing to the south. Here, a mother shows her affection for her child by kissing it; a Chinese mother smells of it. We locate the intellect in the brain; they in the stomach. We pay our physicians when we are sick; they pay the doctor while they are well, but as soon as they get sick the pay stops. Here, men kill their enemies in revenge, a Chinaman gets "sweet revenge" by killing himself. They mount a horse from the right side, and when they want him to go they say, "Whoa." The men ride sidewise, and the women astride. We use lanterns in a dark night; they carry more lanterns at full moon than at any other time. We place a candle in a candlestick; they put the candlestick in the candle. Their detectives sound a "tom-tom" at night to give thieves and rogues notice of their coming. We draw canal boats with horses; they with men. We sell wood by measure; they by weight. We vaccinate in the arm; they in the nose. We use a soft pillow; they a block of wood. Our store-signs are horizontal; theirs are perpendicular. They launch ships sidewise, ring bells from the outside, and actually turn their screws in the opposite direction from ours.—Selah Brown in Chris. Advocate.

By the Wayside.—Two aged men entered a street car a few days ago, in a neighboring city. One of them, who was paralyzed, said in reply to a question of the other as to his welfare, "I have a very large interest in the next world." When asked, "How are you off for this world?" he answered pleasantly that he had enough to meet his wants while he lived; and then he added, "But I have a very large interest in the next world." The conversation attracted the attention of other passengers, and one of them who narrated it said that those words kept ringing in his ears all the rest of the day. He could not get rid of the deep impression made by the singular earnestness and happiness of the old disciple.

Surely this is the beauty of old age, its joy and blessedness, the calm assurance of a portion beyond this life in "the inheritance of the saints in light."

Little, too, did the veteran think of the power of his reiterated sentence upon the hearts of his fellow travellers, who did not even know his name. Our unconscious influences are frequently the best or the worst that we exert.

But the best of all is when the pilgrim life draws near its close, and when the staff and sandals are so soon to be laid aside, to feel that our best and largest "interests are in the next world." That treasure grows at more than compound interest. Its value increases as the vision of it widens like the firmament! These riches can not "take to themselves wings, and fly away." It is a life interest for eternity, and faith only asserts its divine prerogative, "while we look not at the things which are seen, for the things that are seen are temporal, but the things that are not seen are eternal."—Selected.

Natural History, Science, &c.

The Polar Bear.—The polar bear is an animal of great strength and fierceness, and he seems to grow stronger and fiercer the further North he dwells. His rich soft fur is of a yellowish-white color. He has a long flat head, a long neck, high legs, and a powerful body. It is curious to observe how admirably his feet are adapted to the conditions under which he lives. The sole is provided with a kind of thick fleece, so that he treads thorough ice as on a carpet; while, the toes being connected by a membrane or web, the feet serve as paddles when he takes to the water, which he frequently does.

He is not often found on the land. He loves to prowls about the floating ice-field, where he feeds upon the dead bodies of whales and seals, or attacks the latter on their emergence from the water. When he catches sight of a seal basking in the sunshine on a distant piece of ice, he quietly drops into the water and swims until to leeward of his intended victim, who otherwise would scent his approach; thence by short but frequent dives, he silently continues his approach, and so arranges his distances that after the last dive he comes up at the spot where the seal is peacefully reclining. If the poor animal attempts to escape by rolling into the water, he finds himself in the bear's terrible grasp; if on the contrary he lies still his enemy makes one powerful leap, kills him on the ice, and proceeds to devour him.

The polar bear, unlike other species, does not hibernate, as its food being chiefly animal, it is able to obtain a supply of it at all seasons. The male is said to leave the land in winter, and go out on the ice to the edge of the water, where it hunts the seal. The females bury themselves in the snow from the 11th to the 3rd month. Preparatory to going into winter quarters, she selects a hollow place, often at the foot of a bank or underneath overhanging rocks, and there allows the drifting snow to cover her over to a considerable depth. She is at this season very fat, and on this fat she subsists for nearly five months, during which she sleeps in her bed of snow. The bed gradually enlarges around the bear, owing to the melting of the snow caused by the animal's warmth. The Esquimaux kill great numbers of the females in their holes during winter, being greatly helped in this by their dogs, who scent them and then begin scratching at the snow overhead. As it would be unsafe to make too large an opening, a narrow trench is dug, just wide enough to let a man see where the creature's head lies. This being ascertained, the spear of the Esquimaux is thrust into a mortal part, and the prize is then dug out.

The polar bear is a great sailor, and takes advantage of floating masses of ice to transport himself from one island to another. In this way he occasionally gets as far south as Iceland, where parties of bears have been known to land, as the old Norsemen used to do on the English coast, and do great damage by attacking and devouring the flocks, until the inhabitants rose en masse and destroyed them. A recent traveller in Iceland states that in 1859 vast masses of polar ice were swept down on that coast, and that on this pack the Icelanders received an importation of no fewer than thirteen polar bears. Weak and emaciated, however, from want of food during their long sea voyage, they were easily dispatched on landing. "One of these brutes," says the traveller, "made his entrance into a peasant's hut on the northwest coast in rather an unceremonious manner. The snow being on a level with the roof, Bruin found himself there in his travels in quest of food. Attracted, I imagine, by the redolent odor from within, he commenced scratching, and eventually went headlong through, scaring the whole family. The poor beast, however, scarcely less frightened, was speedily dispatched and eaten, the fate of everything the natives can lay hands on during the winter months." The polar bear is also a great swimmer, Capt. Sabine having observed one making its way between the north and south shores of Barrow Strait, which are forty miles apart.

The strength of the polar bear may be inferred from his size. He generally measures six feet in length, and about three feet in height to the top of the shoulder; but much larger individuals are met with. He is not an unsociable animal, and usually wanders about in small troops, while bears of a family always "flock together." Parents and offspring are united by bonds of the most devoted affection. The vigilant care with which the female watches over her cubs has been remarked by every traveller.—In the Polar Regions.

Curious Accident.—The Colonies and India reports an extraordinary fatality from British Guiana, where an inexperienced traveller having, as is the custom in tropical countries, taken a refreshing draught from the stem of one of the many water-holding plants which thrive in the forests, qualified his cold refreshment by a drink of rum. Shortly afterward he died in excruciating agony, and a post mortem examination showed that his internal organs were literally sealed up with India-rubber. He had imbibed the sap of the Mimusops balata, the juice of which coagulates and hardens in alcohol, and the rum had had its usual effect in the poor man's stomach, with necessarily fatal results.

Sun's Eclipse.—The Sidereal Messenger, states that the total eclipse of the sun of 5th mo. 6th, 1883, will be peculiarly favorable for studying the phenomena of the Sun's atmosphere on account of the duration of the total phase, which will be 6 minutes, while the average time is not more than 2 minutes.

Unfortunately the narrow strip of territory from which alone this eclipse is visible traverses the South Pacific Ocean nearly from side to side, just falling short of the solid ground for an astronomer to stand on in South America or in Australia. The track of the eclipse just misses nearly all of the small Pacific islands, including, in fact, only two small coral reefs named Flint and Caroline Islands, respectively. To the latter of these (which must not be confounded with the Caroline Islands, which are further west), an expedition is shortly to be sent, some account of which may be interesting.

The expedition is sent by the United States Government, by the co-operation of the National Academy of Sciences, of the Naval Observatory, and of the Coast Survey.

The island is a mere reef, or collection of small islands, which contained in 1874 only some thirty native inhabitants, and one stray Englishman. So far as is known it has not been visited since 1874.

When the eclipse is over the party will return home via Honolulu and San Francisco, after a voyage of some 12,000 miles by sea and a land journey of 3,000 miles. The party consists of Prof. Holden, director of the Washburn Observatory at Madison, Wis., who intends to examine the vicinity of the Sun for the detection of a planet nearer the Sun than Mercury; of Prof. Hastings, of the Johns Hopkins University, who will make spectroscopic observations of the solar corona; of Rockwell, of Tarrytown, N. Y., who will observe the contacts and make eye observations; of Prof. C. S. Pierce, of the Coast Survey, who will also make spectroscopic observations; of Lieut. Brown, of the navy, and of two photographers who will be sent by the Royal Society of London, to photograph the corona and its spectrum.

The party is well equipped with instruments in every way, and from the skill of its various members and from the unusual opportunities which they have, we have every reason to look for important results.

Teeth of the Beaver.—So hard is the enamel, and so good a cutting instrument is the incisor tooth of the beaver, that, when fixed in a wooden handle, it was, according to Dr. Richardson, used by the Northern Indians to cut bone, and fashion the horn-tipped spears, &c., till it was superseded by the introduction of iron, when the beaver tooth was supplanted by the English file.

The power of these natural tools is well described by Lewis and Clark, who saw effects on the banks of the Missouri. The ravages of the beavers say they, are very parent: in one place the timber was entirely prostrated for a space of three acres, a great part of it removed, although the stumps were in large quantities, and some of the thick as the body of a man.

Terror caused by a White Skin.—When R. Wallace was collecting birds and insects he penetrated to a village in Celebes, where hardly any of the people appeared to have been seen a European before. He says, "One disagreeable result of this was, that I in terror alike in man and beast. Wherever I went, dogs barked, children screamed, women ran away, and men stared as though I were some strange and terrible cannibal monster. Even the pack-horses in the roads and pack-trails would start aside when I appeared, and run into the jungle; and as to those ugly buffaloes, they could never be approached by me—not for fear of my own, but of theirs. They would first stick out their noses and stare at me, and then on a nearer approach break loose from their halters or tethers and rush away helter skelter without any regard for what might be in their way. When I met buffaloes carrying packs along a path, or being driven home to the village, I had to turn aside into the jungle and hide myself till they had passed, to avoid a catastrophe which would increase the dislike with which I was already regarded. Every day a number of the buffaloes were brought into the village, and tethered in the shade around the houses; and then I had to creep about like a thief by back ways, for no one could tell what mischief they might do to children and how they were I to walk among them. If I came suddenly upon a well where women were drawing water or children bathing, a sudden flight was the certain result; which things occurred day after day, were very unpleasant to a man who does not like to be disliked.—Lace's Malay Archipelago.

Religious Items, &c.

The Bible in Japan.—Letters from the Agent of the American Bible Society in Japan convey intelligence which is indicative of rapid progress of Christianity in that empire. It is to the effect that a number of Japanese Christians had presented a formal and earnest appeal to be allowed an active part in the work of translating the Old Testament. To speak of the translation of the Bible as a great work, and far-reaching in its consequences, of the blessings which had come to it through the New Testament, which had already published and widely circulated, the severe evils which would ensue if the maining work was not wisely done; and the want of uniformity in style, which would be sure to mark a translation which was produced by the labors of many different schools working apart. They therefore submitted a plan, the substance of which is as follows:

1. That the whole work be given to the Translating Committee, instead of the different books to individual translators.

2. That the Committee be composed of eight members, four of whom shall be foreigners and four Japanese.

3. That the Japanese members be chosen by Japanese Christians.

That the foreigners and Japanese members have equal rights in voting.

That means be furnished to enable the members to devote their whole time to the work.

Children's Aid Society.—During the last twenty years the Children's Aid Society of New York has taken out from that city into other homes about sixty-seven thousand children. In the majority of cases the children, who would otherwise have grown up into idleness and crime, have become good and useful members of society.

E. de Pressensé and Parisian free-thinkers.—As a pleasant sign of the progress which evangelical religion is making in France, that Parisian free-thinkers are not unwilling to let the "new gospel," as they term Protestant Christianity, have a fair hearing. The other day, E. de Pressensé, one of the best known of French evangelical workers, received an invitation to address a free-thinking society in Paris. He went, and he reports that he was warmly received. Much of what he said in defence of Protestant Christianity was received with every mark of approval; although more than once signs of dissent were wanting. He was asked if he had ever seen God. "No," he replied, "I have not seen God, but I have felt and heard him whenever the voice of conscience has reproached me in name for any wrong I have done. I pity those who do not hear this voice, but you will hear it one day." This statement was received with solemn silence. Pressensé himself thinks that this gathering "presented many hopeful features," especially as showing that even in a radical and revolutionary club, presided over by the notorious Louise Michel, it is possible to gain a hearing for words of Christian truth.

Sowing Seed.—At the funeral of Gambetta in Paris, a woman named de Broen had distributed 67,000 copies of a "souvenir" addressed to the citizens of Paris, "Free-thinkers, Catholics or Protestants." They contained passages from the Bible, of consolation to the afflicted and of pardon to the penitent, which were eagerly received and generally carefully kept.

Official Oaths.—The injunction "Swear not at all," seems to be coming nearer and nearer official observance in Europe. Bradlaugh's name has called up the subject in two ways. It is not merely proposed to substitute affirmation for the oath on grounds of belief or unbelief, but in Italy, where the oath has religious significance, objection has been made by pronounced republicans to being sworn to support the monarchy. France has abolished even the judicial oath, and hereafter witnesses will only be confronted with the penalties for perjury, read over to them before giving their evidence. Belgium and Greece have also been considering the judicial oath. In Portugal the Deputies have to swear upon the Holy Gospels to be faithful to the king and to maintain the Catholic, Apostolic and Roman religion. A party from Madeira, a pronounced Republican, found no difficulty, it seems, in making mental reservation. He was sworn in at the present session, and immediately presented a bill to abolish the religious oath, declaring himself at the same time an inflexible opponent of the monarchy, desiring to see Portugal a Republic.—Ledger.

If I had another life to live, and two thousand letters to write again, with God's help I would not hurt the feelings of the humblest of all God's creatures, honestly trying to do good. He might be as big as Daniel Lambert, and I would not call him fat and unctuous; he might be as lean as Calvin Edson, and I would not call him a bag of bones. I would count each day as lost on which I had not made some hearts gladder than they were in the morning; on which I had not plucked up some thorns, or planted some flowers on the path of human life. Dogs will snarl at him, but angels are around him. He may never have riches or fame, but better than both rare friends of God.—Dr. Prime.

THE FRIEND.

THIRD MONTH 24, 1883.

The Society of Friends has frequently exhorted its members to the careful perusal of the Holy Scriptures. In the book of Advices of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting is the following passage, issued in 1732, more than 150 years ago:—

"We tenderly and earnestly advise and exhort all parents and heads of families, that they endeavor to instruct their children and families in the doctrines and precepts of the Christian religion, as contained in the Holy Scriptures; and that they excite them to the diligent reading of those excellent writings, which plainly set forth the miraculous conception, birth, holy life, wonderful works, blessed example, meritorious death, and glorious resurrection, ascension and mediation, of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; and to educate their children in the belief of those important truths, as well as in the belief of the inward manifestation and operation of the Holy Spirit on their minds."

We regard this advice as an evidence of the soundness of judgment of Friends of those days, and of their care not to push their views of one great and fundamental truth to such an extreme as to lead them to undervalue others. The chief mission entrusted to them undoubtedly was to call the attention of the world to the spiritual nature of true religion—to turn people inward to the work of the Spirit in their own hearts, where the Light of Christ reveals sin, and enables all those to forsake it, who will be obedient to the holy commandment thus given to them. But they were willing to avail themselves of every help, which the Lord in his goodness might afford, in the working out of their soul's salvation.

Many Friends are in the daily practice of reading a portion of the Bible in their collected families, either at the morning meal, or at such other time as may best suit their business arrangements; and to spend a suitable time after it in a serious waiting together upon the Lord. Where this is done, not merely in a formal way, but with proper reverence and dependence on the Lord for instruction, we believe it will be found useful. Many can testify that such seasons have been comforting and refreshing to them, and that they have been helpful in assisting the mind to maintain a daily watch against evil, and a constant looking unto the Source of all good, on which largely depend our preservation and growth in spiritual life. Some may object to such reading at stated times, as being too much like a formal offering, but would not the same objection apply in measure to the appointment of regular times for meeting for Divine worship? Does not experience show that where there is no time set apart for such family readings, they are very seldom put in practice? and that the concern of the Society on this subject is very imperfectly carried out?

We have need to be on our guard lest the undue prominence given to the Scriptures and other outward means, by some, should lead any to the opposite extreme of improperly neglecting them. For as Isaac Pennington says: "The directions from God's Holy Spirit in the Scriptures, are exceedingly weighty and precious in themselves, and very proper to the several states to which they were given forth; and blessed is he, who is found in the practice and observation of them." At the same time, it is right to bear in mind the caution given by the same experienced Christian, that he who would be a true disciple of the Lord Jesus Christ, "must feel the law of life, the holy laws of the new covenant, not comprehended outwardly in his mind, but written inwardly in his heart by the finger of God's Spirit."

We have received a communication calling attention to the very different condition of different Monthly Meetings in regard to the support of their poor. Some meetings are so situated that they have no occasion to request contributions from their members for this purpose; in consequence of which there is danger that their benevolent feelings will not be sufficiently developed for want of exercise. In others, the demands are so large, as to be a little oppressive. Our correspondent suggests that a remedy may be found by making all such expenses payable out of the common stock of the Yearly Meeting. One advantage of this plan would be, that the wealthier meetings would more largely assist the poorer.

Some difficulty would be found in carrying out this scheme, from the fact that some meetings have special funds, the income of which is applicable to the relief of their poorer members, but might not properly be applied to the help of others. Again, to extend proper relief to those in need, is a duty that requires not only sound discretion, but tender sympathy. The knowledge of the circumstances of each case must be confided to but few, so that the feelings of the recipients may not be improperly wounded. There is some danger that if this proposal is carried out, there may grow up some dissatisfaction, and that meetings which make large demands on the common stock may be thought to be less prudent and careful in their expenditures than they ought to be; and that unpleasant discussions may result.

It is quite possible these difficulties can be obviated, but like every change suggested in the discipline of a society like that of Friends, the subject should be carefully considered in its various aspects before being adopted.

We have received the first number of The Hebrew-Christian, published at No. 25 East 7th street, New York. The prospectus says: "This paper is called The Hebrew-Christian, because we are first Hebrews and then Christians. It will be the exponent of the Hebrew-Christians." It is designed to foster the tendency to embrace Christianity, which it thinks exists in a greater degree among the Jews at present than it has since the days of the apostles. It desires also to awaken in the Christian community, greater interest in this movement.

The first number of a monthly periodical, "devoted to the cause of truth," has come to hand. It is called "The Primitive Friend," and is published by Ezra Lamborn, at Emporia, Kansas, at 50 cents per annum. It is issued under the supervision of a committee of Cottonwood Monthly Meeting. The Editor states, "It is our intent to publish nothing contrary to the principles and profession of the Society of Friends, believing them to be the Truth." This intention appears to be faithfully carried out in the number now issued.

In the notice of the three small books recently issued by the Book Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings, one of them is spoken of as a memoir of Elizabeth Stirredge. This was an error and should have been printed, Elizabeth Ashbridge.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The ratifications of the Treaty with Madagascar were exchanged in Washington on the 13th inst., and the Treaty was proclaimed by the President. Sheep men in Texas report heavy losses by the recent cold rain. Some of the largest owners say they will lose a third of their flocks and all their lambs.

The number of hogs packed in Chicago during the year which ended 3d month 1st, 1883, was 4,223,000 a decrease of 878,000 on the number of the preceding year. The average weight of the hogs packed was 218 pounds against 231 in 1881, and 234 in 1880. The number of cattle slaughtered in Chicago during the last year was 774,578.

Mayor Jacob, of Louisville, says the greatest suffering in the lately flooded portions of the Ohio valley, is among the farmers, not in the towns. Many of the farmers are entirely destitute.

The Mississippi river continues to decline at Memphis, and at many places between that city and Helena is again within its banks. The track of the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad is free from water and the damage to it is being repaired. At Helena, the river is falling six inches daily, and a few days since registered 45 feet. The bottom lands will soon be above water, and planting is expected to begin within three weeks. Stringent sanitary measures will be enforced in the flooded region when the water subsides. A telegram from Helena says, "the backwater from White river, uniting with the overflow from the Hubbard and Old Town breaks, has submerged a large region of country in the Beaver Bayou and Lower Big Creek section, which was never before known to be inundated from any cause. Owing to these hitherto high points having always withstood overflows no stock was driven out; consequently there has been absolute annihilation of every kind of live stock, together with a large number of deer and other game."

The latest reports from the lower Mississippi districts show that the water is receding at all points, and the planters are preparing to put in their crops.

The large railroad bridge across the Schuylkill river at Norristown was destroyed by fire on the evening of the 15th inst. The loss is estimated at $40,000.

The compendium of the census, recently issued by the Census Bureau, shows that there are 8,567 manufacturing establishments in this city, and products valued at $324,342,935.

There were 400 deaths in this city last week, which was 33 less than during the previous week, and 25 less than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number, 188 were males, and 212 females; 63 died of consumption; 33 of pneumonia; 21 of old age; 20 of diphtheria; 15 of marasmus; 17 of croup, and 11 of typhoid fever.

Sheep were in fair demand; 10,000 head arrived and sold at 4½ a 7 cts., and lambs at 5½ a 8½ cts. per pound, as to condition.

Hogs were dull: 3000 head arrived and sold at 10 a 11½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—On the evening of the 15th instant, a terrible explosion occurred in the local government board offices in Westminster. The report was heard at the distance of two or three miles; also in the House of Commons, where it caused alarm. Being the dinner hour, few members were present, and no one was injured. It is thought to have been caused by dynamite, and to have been the work of Fenians. The building has the appearance of having been bombarded. There is a deep trench, ten feet by three in dimensions, in one room, the floor of which has been literally ploughed. The adjacent streets are filled with myriads of fragments of glass, and heavy plate glass is lying in heaps on the ground. A stone, weighing 200 pounds, was projected against the King Street Police Station, making a hole the size of a man's head. A Government inspector has made an examination of the portion of the building damaged by the explosion, and places the loss at £4000. A close inspection shows that the explosion occurred from the outside of the building. The Government has offered a reward of £1000 for the discovery of the author of the explosion.

Lord Dunraven intends to propose at the present session of Parliament motions in favor of legislation on behalf of Irish laborers and for a large scheme of emigration, in order to prevent a recurrence of distress in Ireland.

Three Skye Crofters have each been sentenced to 21 months' imprisonment for resisting a sheriff.

The French Chambers have adjourned for a month. The Budget for 1884 has been presented in the Chamber of Deputies. The total increase of expenditure is estimated at 50,000,000 francs. The estimated revenue is 3,203,640,825 francs, and the expenditure 3,103,441,165 francs.

On the 20th instant, the representatives of France, Italy, Belgium, Spain, Portugal, Roumania, Servia, Switzerland, Brazil, the Argentine Republic, San Salvador and Guatemala, signed the convention adopted by the Conference, which has been in session in Paris, securing to the citizens of the various States the same advantages with respect to patents, designs, trademarks, and commercial names that other countries accord to their own subjects. England is holding off, and will defer action until the bills, now pending in Parliament, are passed. Russia will not sign. America will wait to see how the Convention works. It is possible, however, that these States will give their adhesion separately.

It is evident that the charge of high treason against the Socialists on trial in Vienna has broken down.

De Lesseps has embarked from Marseilles for Tunis to direct the surveys in connection with the project to convert the Desert of Sahara into an inland sea.

It is intended to reduce railway rates in order to enable the growers of wheat in India to compete on more equal terms with American producers.

The Russian Government has proposed to the other Powers that an international detective force be organized to cope with Anarchists, Nihilists, Fenians and Socialists. France, Switzerland and Austria have acquiesced in the proposal.

The coffee blight has spread from Ceylon and the Fiji Islands to Brazil, where the loss is already so serious that the Minister of Agriculture is making every effort to discover a means of stopping it.

It is expected that the emigration to Canada during the ensuing season will be unusually extensive. The steamer Parisian, which sailed from Liverpool for Halifax on the 15th inst., took 450 emigrants. A number of Scandinavians and Germans will proceed Northwest Canada in the course of the next five weeks.

Mexican officers, now in St. Louis, say that a party of heavy Eastern and English capitalists has formed with a view of colonizing from twenty to thousand immigrants in Mexico. It is proposed to provide each immigrant with a plot of ground, and farming implements and animals, and start him to work; the Company to receive in return from Mexican Government $800 for each immigrant, be large land grants. The scheme will be submitted to the Mexican Congress next month.

Address on War, by Henry Richard, M. P.

Condensed from the London Friend.

I remember meeting with the following remarkable passage many years ago in de's History of England: "There seems to be in religious men, whatever be their creed, and however limited their intellectual power, a prophetic faculty of insight into the true bearings of outward things, an insight which puts to shame the sagacity of statesmen, and claims for the sons of God, and for them, the wisdom even of this world. We only read the world's future truly who have faith in principle as opposed to faith in man's dexterity, who feel that in human affairs there lies really and truly a spiritual element, a spiritual connection, a spiritual tendency, which the wisdom of the serpent cannot alter, and can scarcely affect." It seems to me there is a very profound truth in this, that those who hold no principle in this world are far less able than we who do, to see and to pronounce a calm and judicial verdict even upon the current events of the day. Now look at the way in which wars usually arise.

Take the war with Spain in 1739, into which Sir Robert Walpole was driven against his own will by political intrigue and popular opinion. The people demanded a war with Spain; it was the fault and the folly of Sir R. Walpole that he continued in office and allowed the war to be proclaimed against his judgment. When the bells were set ringing in London to commemorate the proclamation of the war he said, "They are ringing bells now, but they will be wringing their hands before long;" and his prophecy was fulfilled. This war lasted for nine years, and cost at the time 54 millions of money. There were borrowed to support it 29 millions, the interest we are now paying, and which would amount to 140 millions sterling more; it is estimated that it cost 240,000 human lives, yet Burke says that he examined the official documents concerning these transactions and that they perfectly satisfied him of the extreme injustice of the war. Nay, he says that he conversed with the principal actors in the agitation which led to the war, and he adds, "None of them did in the least doubt the measure, or attempt to justify their act."

Take again the American War. I suppose there is no one living now who would say one word in defence of it. That war involved us in conflicts with France and Spain, as well as our own Colonies; it cost us at the time £136,000,000; there was borrowed in its support £104,000,000; the interest on which amounts to about £345,000,000; and here again we have this awful circumstance, that Lord North, who was the Prime Minister, and who had made the war, was, as has since been shown by the publication of letters by his daughter, against the war the whole time he was carrying it on.

With regard to the French War, Buckle says that it was "the most hateful, the most unjust, and the most atrocious war that England has ever waged against any country."

I will come now to times within the remembrance of many of you. You will recall the burst of excitement that passed over this country at the commencement of the Crimean War, and the opprobrium and contempt that were cast upon all who resisted the popular clamor. Richard Cobden was fiercely assailed and out-voted in the largest town in his own constituency in Yorkshire; John Bright was burned in effigy at Manchester; Joseph Sturge was threatened in anonymous letters, and, if I recollect aright, on one occasion hooted through the streets of Birmingham; and I, who was humbly associated with them, was denounced as a Russian spy, even in my own country. I remember going down to Cardiff in the midst of that excitement to deliver a lecture, and when I reached the town I saw large placards posted against me, announcing that the Russian spy was coming down to address the town, and calling upon the people to give him the reception he deserved. And this so frightened the poor people who had been getting up the meeting for me that I could not persuade one of them to take the chair for me, or accompany me to the platform, and so for two mortal hours I had to fight the wild beasts of Ephesus alone.

Well now what is the fate of that war in the retrospect of history? Three at least of the Cabinet Ministers who made that war have since declared that it was unjust and unnecessary. Sir James Graham told J. Bright, "You were entirely right about that war, and we were entirely wrong, we ought never to have gone into it;" and Lord John Russell, in the last work that he published, a work called "Recollections," says distinctly, "The Russian War was a blunder." He takes the blame largely to himself and says, "Thus has the course of history been changed by my weakness;" and, as regards Lord Aberdeen, I received a letter from my friend Cobden, written from the Bishop of Oxford's seat, in Sussex, and he said in that letter, "I paid a visit to my neighbor, the Bishop of Oxford, and met Lord Aberdeen, Roundell Palmer, and some others. The Earl was even more emphatic than at the same place a year ago, in lamenting to me that he had suffered himself to be drawn into the Crimean War. He declared that he ought to have resigned.

We are constantly told, "You who stick to what you call your Christian principles cannot be trusted to give an opinion that is entitled to respect in regard to any particular war. It is no use listening to what Mr. Bright or Mr. Pease or Mr. Richard may say against any particular war. They are against all war, and therefore we cannot trust them." Now, I say that those who have no principle, who are swayed by influence, by passion, by caprice, by popular clamor, can least of all be trusted to decide what is a just and necessary war, for in the great majority of instances history reverses their judgment.

Since the year 1816—that is, in sixty seven years—England has been engaged in seventy-six wars! If you take a wider view you will find that during the last twenty-seven years, beginning with the Crimean war and coming down to the present day, 2,188,000 men have perished in the wars of Christian nations, and the cost of those wars has amounted, according to the most careful calculation—now try to comprehend these figures if you can—to £2,653,000,000 sterling. And the mischief is that when the wars are over there is no relaxation in the demands made upon the people, for during times of peace the armaments with which the nations menace each other cost annually £500,000,000 sterling in three items; first of all, the money that is actually extracted by way of taxation; secondly, the money, the enormous capital, that is sunk in all kinds of machines and munitions of war, and which are utterly unproductive; and, thirdly—the most important item of all—the loss to society by the withdrawal of five or six million strong and active men, from the fields of profitable and productive labor to a service where they have to be maintained at the cost of the rest of the country. And yet, with all this prodigious expenditure going on year by year, the military demands cannot be met, for the national debts of Europe have grown from £2,626,000,000 in 1865 to £4,324,000,000 in 1879.

What is the result of all this state of things? The sovereigns of these countries are living in constant terror of assassination, society is honeycombed by conspiracies against Governments. In nearly all the countries of Europe these are going on—Germany, Russia, Italy, France—conspiracies into which the people are driven by sheer desperation, on account of the double burden laid upon them, not merely of an enormous taxation, which grinds them to the earth, but the compulsory military service, which is a still more heavy and oppressive burden. Would it not be a more reasonable thing that the Governments of countries that are in such conditions as these should first direct their attention to their own internal affairs? But what are they doing? They are all inspired with an insane ambition to extend their territories; Russia pushing herself into Central Asia, and into China, and casting a covetous eye upon some of the provinces of Turkey; France interfering with Tunis, Madagascar, and nobody knows where; England seizing Cyprus, Egypt, Borneo, and South Africa.

For "The Friend."

Selections and Reflections.

The accumulation of wealth, when it is accompanied and fostered by an earnest, longing desire after its possession too much for its own sake, is a temptation, by no means the least, which besets us in this probationary life; wherein Satan wages a too successful warfare, in seeking to beguile and ensnare so as to lead us by the wide gate into the broad way, where his seat and empire are. How apt and conclusive is the testimony of the apostle Paul on this subject: "They that will be rich, fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is a root of all evil; which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows." Paul had just before represented to his son Timothy in the faith, that "Godliness with contentment is great gain. For," he continues, "we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. And having food and raiment, let us be therewith content." And then follows the fearfully solemn declaration concerning such as "will be rich," quoted above.

The greed for gain alluded to, unless overcome through submission to the cross of Christ by whom we become crucified to the world, we apprehend grows almost insensibly upon its votaries. The habit of yielding to this as to any other temptation of a cruel foe, is strengthened by each repetition. The voice of conscience, which at first sounded an alarm in the bosom, is drowned by indifference or neglect; so that the sting for having violated its wholesome reproofs ceases to be felt. Is it not in this way that frequent transgression against the law written on the heart, causes first unconcernedness to its pleadings, and then insensibility and hardness of heart? Hence a long indulged craving desire for riches, may generate a disregard of heavenly convictions earlier felt; which, too, may be but the forerunner of the power of resistance being first weakened, and then laid waste; till finally the thirst for wealth, the desire to make a showy, attractive appearance before men, with the coveted honors which they bring, seem to be idols the nearest and the dearest, which lead away the heart from God.

Should we not fear and avoid this, as one of Satan's gilded baits so beguiling to many in the present day? and which is so far astray from the holy precepts, "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me;" "Seek first the kingdom of God; and all things needful shall be added unto you." Moreover the Psalmist, in allusion to Israel formerly, has written: "God gave them their request; but sent leanness into their soul." And again: "Behold, these are the ungodly, who prosper in the world; they increase in riches." Which, and of whom, he continues, he did not comprehend, "until I went into the sanctuary of God; then understood I their end." Does it not hereby appear, that there is much danger of being so swallowed up with the cares of this life, the deceitfulness of riches, and the love of other things, as to overlook the right use of the Lord's outward gifts, and even to neglect the great purpose for which we were created, and for which redeemed, or put into a capacity for salvation, through that ever-memorable propitiatory sacrifice on Calvary's cross?

A valuable minister in this Society and faithful watchman on its walls, has left the stirring record: "I cannot doubt, but that a desire to do a great stroke of business, get great riches, and make a great figure in the world, is as much some men's besetting sin, as ever the love of strong drink has been that of others; but where the temptation is yielded to, which of these do we conceive to be the greatest sinner—he, whose mind and faculties are so besotted with strong drink, that he is rendered thereby unequal to the performance of either his civil or religious duties; or he, in whom the same effect is produced by an overcharge of business, and desire to make a splendid appearance in the world? This must disqualify for a faithful discharge of those duties, when the mind and spiritual faculties of any person are so benumbed and overcome, if not with surfeiting and drunkenness, yet with the cares and gratifications of this life, (Luke xxi. 34,) with the love of his gold and silver, houses and lands, so intent on his mortgages and bonds, his interest, and compound interest, trying to make a heaven here below," &c. Would that the sage warnings—the line upon line and precept upon precept—from so many sources, superadded to the immediately vouchsafed instructions of our inward, ever-present guide and Teacher—above all worthy of much heed—might receive the close attention they not only claim, but so richly merit. Then would the pure limitations of Truth in respect to the right use of all the gifts with which we have been entrusted, be more duly regarded; the pang of sorrow and remorse be less our portion; and at the final issue, that earnest dying wish which otherwise may be too late for some—because of having set their affections upon the attainment of riches and the gratifications of this life—be avoided: Oh! that even Lazarus' life and portion on earth might have been mine, if thereby his eternally happy condition in the great end might have been mine also.

The subjoined selection from a pious author, instructively treats on the same subject: "Among the innumerable difficulties daily incident to the life of man, we may reckon as not among the least, the danger almost inseparable, which attends the yet inevitable necessity for money. To reconcile integrity in the pursuit with innocence in the possession, is indeed to convert a perilous trial into a valuable blessing. Riches are no evil in themselves; the danger lies in not being able to manage the temptation they hold out to us. Even where the object is fairly pursued, and the acquisition not unfairly appropriated, a close application to the attainment of wealth is not without its snares to the most upright and liberal mind.

Even these better disposed persons, in spite of purity of intention and integrity of conduct, are in constant danger, while in pursuit of their object, of being entangled in complicated schemes, and overwhelmed with excessive solicitude; of being so overcharged with the cares of this world, as to put that world which is out of sight, out of mind also.

Others find, or fancy, that there is a shorter and surer road to riches, than that which plodding industry holds on his slow and weary way. Industry is too dull for enterprising spirit; integrity too scrupulous for a mind which is bent on a quick accomplishment of its object. The rewards of labor are too remote, too uncertain, and too penurious for him 'who maketh haste to be rich.'

"Charge them that are rich in this world says the apostle Paul, 'that they trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy; that they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate, laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life.'" Then, after showing the nature of riches—"uncertain in every thing but their danger,—the same pious writer, from which the foregoing selection was made, continues: "Paul cautions against the love of riches from their uncertainty. He then contrasts what is uncertain with what is solid and durable. That confidence which is not to be placed in 'uncertain riches,' directs to be transferred to 'the living God,' the foundation of all substantial opulence, the giver of all the good that is enjoyed; the giver of all 'the power to get wealth,' and the heart to use it to his glory. This readiness 'to distribute,' this willingness 'to communicate,' these unequivocal fruits of faith, obedience, and love,—not the purchase of heaven, but the evidences of faith in Him, died to purchase it for them—will not be rejected by real Christians, after his declaration 'inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me.'

The annexed is from "The Holy Life of De Renti, a French nobleman;" who died in 1649, in the 37th year of his age: "It is a matter of amazement to me, when I consider that a thing so little as man, being raised so high a degree of honor as that which Christianity bestows upon him, can yet, under these admirable advantages, esteem the world and make great account of its vanities.

"But, should the things of earth, when death will entirely strip us, and that for which we should these, I say, occupy our hearts in little time allotted to us here, to work out our salvation? Ought we not rather to exult before God and man, that living faith which shall enable us to quit freely the things of this world, which, together with those we possess them, will all pass away like a dream, even as we see our ancestors are gone, and there is no more remembrance of them, nor the ebbings and flowings of those joys and sorrows, which cleaved so closely to their hearts, and which they found it so difficult to render to the law of Jesus Christ? These have all vanished! and is there not now cause to think that they must have been made foolish, if, during their short stay here, they considered any thing else of importance, than what related to their present and eternal condition; or passed much of their time in reasoning upon any other subject than God and his will concerning them? The same thing will happen to us. Every thing will pass away from us, and that which is of God will remain. How good is it then to be united to Him alone!"

the estimable John Barelay has bequeathed us the following: "Business, in its proper sense, is useful and beneficial, as well as absolutely necessary; but the abuse of it, or an excess of it, is pernicious in many points of view; I cannot approve, in very many respects, of the intense degree of application and attention, which seems often to be required of those that are in business.

There is one danger to which the man of business is particularly exposed, and the more so, because it is concealed,—I mean the danger of gaining a worldly spirit, and of losing that tenderness of conscience, that love of religion, which is the ground of all virtuous conduct. The person who is engaged in worldly affairs, whether the sphere of his engagements be large or small, should be most anxiously attentive to his eternal interests, that he may also be kept in a flourishing, profitable condition: if this be not the case, the saying of W. Penn is true with regard to such one—"He that loses by getting, had better than gain." He should also be very jealous of his scanty leisure, that he may not fail to employ some of it in his daily duties to his Maker, and in the constant cultivation of his holy frame of mind, which, it is the slow and sure tendency of the spirit of the world, silently to counteract. For I own I shudder at the very idea of any man's mainly pursuing his perishable interests, when perhaps in one short moment he is gone. How conceivably terrible and exquisite must be the man's anguish, whilst on the very brink of going he knows not whither, to think that he has given up an eternity of bliss, for the empty grasp of that which is not."

For "The Friend."

It is, we trust, with no desire to curtail the enjoyment of any, that the attention, particularly of our younger members, is directed to the sentiments presented in the following article, which may perhaps be properly entitled:

THE FAILURE OF ART PRODUCTIONS TO PROMOTE SPIRITUAL GROWTH!

It has been remarked, that the predominant passion may generally be discerned in countenance; because the muscles by which it is expressed being constantly or actually contracted, lose their tone and are totally relaxed; or that the expression remains when the passion has subsided; thus angry, a disdainful, a subtle and a suspicious temper is displayed in characters that almost universally understood. It is fully true of the pleasing and softer emotions, that they leave their signatures upon countenance when they cease to act."

Confirmatory of the above extract is the following impressive letter from one now in the 86th year of his age, and whose opportunity for observation during a long and successful legal practice have been unusual, and therefore worthy of attention and confidence.

"Philadelphia, 9th mo. 1st, 1882.

My dear —: Thy note asks me to relate to writing some expressions I casually uttered at a recent interview. First will be relating to our valued friend Sarah Penn. I was a scholar at Westtown one beginning in 1813, ending in 1814, and under the ministry of Sarah Farquhar, a teacher; a widow in the sorrow of her bereavement. She placed her nephew under my care, as one of the largest boys. She was very impressive in her ministry, and her sad and pathetic earnestness was very persuasive and her person and expression of countenance very attractive. In her, more than in any other, probably, began a study of countenances illumined by a Divine expression, though I had observed it in my mother and others before, and have continued such observation ever since, and have found in it a strong natural argument that the Holy Spirit does indeed visit the human soul; and that the soul thus visited must be immortal. And why such affectionate entreaty, such earnest desire, expressed in tones so sweet and pathetic, if God did not inspire the feeling and give a voice so divine for its utterance? Her features were regular and naturally expressed intelligence; but to these were added a power from within that can make the unsymmetrical regular and harmonious and beautiful and attractive; an attainment within the reach of all who will submit truly to the Divine Teacher in the soul. * * * I have looked upon the heads of the Madonna painted by the greatest masters of painting that have lived. They painted in their best conception of the beautiful and sacred; yet, I have had always to recur to my memory for examples more sacred in the living and the real, whom I have seen and heard and known, never omitting Sarah Emley's. That diviner living expression of countenance made by the Divine Spirit, cannot be imitated by the highest skill of human art. Only He can do it whose spirit broods upon the human soul, and can make the face the index of the divine harmony and beauty within. He who can paint the colors of the flowers and set his iridescent glories in the heavens. He who is spirit, and can dominate all matter, all life, placed the soul in man, a spiritual entity, that He loves to visit, and there to brood and give to it a sense of an endless life.

Thy affectionate uncle,
ELI K. PRICE."

J. S. L., now travelling in Europe, a man of superior mind and aesthetic tastes as well as a close observer of the effects produced by the cultivation of the fine arts, so-called, has written home some interesting letters; from one of these, dated at Florence, Italy, and recently published in "The Friend," the following striking passages are taken, believing they are worthy of repetition:

"Many reflections arise as I traverse this old city, so given over to art and beauty. To me, the human soul seems to be a vastly more noble subject for the shaping chisel of reforming art, than are the cold bronze or marble. Florence, in her teachers and revivers of ancient learning and art, has aimed to excel in moulding the insensible stone and painting the unfeeling canvas; but the intellect and spirit of her people she has left in darkness, vainly hoping that the study of and familiarity with forms of beauty and grace would reflect their charms upon the human character. They have by the study of art lost the artlessness of innocence, and their devotion to forms of ideal beauty has done nothing to reform their hearts, or add any grace to hide the native deformity of unregenerate human nature. Savonarola early saw the inherently debasing influence of art as pursued by its devotees generally, because of its sensuous influence, and consistently collected and burned the pictures that contributed to impurity of thought and manners. In harmony with his great purpose, he also suppressed the use of musical instruments, believing them to be engines conducing to mental and moral perversion and degradation.

"What a sermon does the new sacristy of San Lorenzo, the mausoleum of the Medici family, preach from the text, 'vanity of vanities, all is vanity.' Here are marbles, agates, jaspers, lapis lazuli, pearl and alabaster, shaped and fitted in forms of wondrous beauty, at a cost of many millions of dollars, and all for what purpose? To preserve and laud the memory of those who debased their fellows and destroyed their liberty, to gratify unholy ambition and greed for power! They have passed away, and the factions they raised, the crimes they committed, the miseries they inflicted upon the innocent, and the degradation they brought have been committed to the page of history, but their influence for good or for evil has not died with them. Had they—the Medici—been as virtuous and philanthropic as they were powerful and ambitious, they might have made their people the advanced guard of enlightened intelligence, and have led them, as Savonarola was permitted to incite some of his adherents, to the zealous illustration of every trait that ennoble a cultivated Christian nation."

Christian Feeling.

The following letter written by the widow of Frederick Cavendish, was penned in answer to the request of a clergyman who had asked permission to dedicate to her a sermon upon the assassination of the late Chief Secretary of Ireland. It says:—

"The Dublin disclosures do indeed teach the awful lesson contained in the last verse of the third chapter of 2 Samuel. You will, I am sure, forgive me if I beg you, before sending the MS. to the printers, to look through it first, with the special view of seeing if there is any word that could be turned into a desire for vengeance. You will readily understand how I must shrink from any such feeling. I would rather, as far as I reverently may, adopt the Lord's prayer on the cross,—'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.' The law, I know, must take its course, for the sake of the unhappy country itself. I pray that neither the unspeakable greatness of my sorrow, nor the terrible wickedness of those men, may ever blind either myself or any of the English people to the duty of patience, justice, and sympathy in our thoughts, words, and deeds, with regard to Ireland and its people at large.

Believe me, dear Sir,

Yours truly,
LUCY CAROLINE CAVENDISH."

If all the blind men in the kingdom should endeavor to bear me down that the sun is not bright, or that the rainbow has no colors, I would still believe my own eyes. I have seen them both; they have not. I can not prove to their satisfaction what I assert, because they are destitute of sight, the necessary medium; they would not—they could not—hesitate a moment if they were not blind. Just so they who have been taught of God, who have tasted that the Lord is gracious, have an experimental perception of the truth which renders them proof against all the sophistry of the infidel.—Newton.

The Red Sea.

At Aden you see a British Gibraltar—an island that is little more than a cinder, but carved into military might, heavy batteries frowning from the lower, middle, and upper slopes, great reservoirs for water in a rainless region, 30,000 people, large military detachments, huge men-of-war, a position that dominates Arabia and Northwestern Africa, and, of course, insures a proper respect for British interests in the whole length of the Red Sea and the Suez Canal. Nowhere on the highways of travel around the earth do you find a hotter region than between the sands of Arabia and those of Sahara. On your tour around the world you afterward cross the Equator, once in the region of the East Indies, and again south of the Sandwich Islands; but you suffer little from heat in the former case, and in the latter, under the cold trade-winds from the Andes, you cross the line in your ulster. In the Red Sea, however, it is possible that you may need a double Scotch cap, with the interstices filled with pounded ice, to prevent sunstroke. Many a poor invalid has had just this precaution provided for him. In spite of the broad punka, which servants of the ship now swing above your table in the cabin, in spite of your constant use of the wide fans of the Orient, in spite of your dressing as nearly as possible in gauze, in spite of your punctual attendance to your baths, in spite of your total abstinence, you need to guard against sunstroke by a helmet sun-hat. At Suez you carry everywhere in the sunshine an umbrella, covered on the outside with white. There is a fierceness in the sunbeams utterly unknown to one who has not been in the tropics, something searching and deadly in the impact of the radiance even at sunrise, but especially when the sun is directly overhead, or in the mid-afternoon sky. "Stand out of the sunshine! Keep out of the glare of the sun!" You hear constantly these directions given in anxious tones to inexperienced children. You fall into the habit of holding your eyelids half closed, a tendency which your present lecturer has not yet overcome, and perhaps never will. You are sometimes in a ship that moves with a slow wind, and so you have no relief afforded by the breezes of the ocean. Occasionally a ship has been known to turn about in the Red Sea, reverse its course, lose time, and move against the wind for a few hours, in order to relieve its passengers from the effects of the intolerable heat. There is however, in the Red Sea, as there is not in the cool season at Bombay, a great difference between the temperature at night and by day. The sands radiate heat rapidly. There is an Arabian proverb which says that "the servant in the coolness of the morning forgot to provide water for the heat of the day."—Joseph Cook.

Vanity and vexation of spirit.—Oh! if the time which is, and has been, spent in making ruffles, tassels, and such like foolish and needless articles, was occupied simply in preparing needful and comfortable apparel, with the mind rightly turned to the Lord, how it would lead to the lopping off all these spurious branches, that choke the good seed of the kingdom, and a lasting comfort would be the result; such as is not changed by fashion, nor worn out by time; but would redound to our everlasting happiness and peace; instead of which, the days of these are now spent too much in perplexity and vexations.—Rachel C. Bartram.

UNDER THE LEAVES.

Selected.

Oft have I walked these woodland paths
In sadness, not foreknowing
That underneath the withered leaves
The flowers of spring were growing.

To-day the winds have swept away
These wrecks of autumn's splendor;
And here the fair arbutus flowers
Are springing fresh and tender.

O perfect flowers with lips of bloom!
Surpassing in their beauty
The pearly tint of ocean shells,
To teach me faith and duty.

Walk life's dark way, ye seem to say,
In hope and faith, foreknowing
That when man sees but wither'd leaves,
God sees the fair flowers growing.

SONG.

Selected.

Stay, stay at home, my heart, and rest;
Home-keeping hearts are happiest;
For those that wander they know not where,
Are full of trouble and full of care;
To stay at home is best.

Weary, and home-sick, and distressed,
They wander east, they wander west,
And are baffled, and beaten, and blown about
By the winds of the wilderness of doubt;
To stay at home is best.

Then stay at home, my heart and rest;
The bird is safest in his nest;
O'er all that flutter their wings and fly
A hawk is hovering in the sky;
To stay at home is best.

—H. W. Longfellow.

SHADOWS.

Selected.

Oh the shadows—the beautiful shadows,
Floating far o'er the hills away;
As over the sky
The light clouds fly,
So over the mountains wander they!

Oh the shadows—the beautiful shadows,
Sleeping soft on the meadow green;
Fair are the flowers
In sun-bright bowers,
But fairer the flowers these shadows between.

Oh the shadows—the beautiful shadows,
Dancing light on the ocean's spray;
Changing each wave
From gay to grave,
Like the frowning smiles of a child at play!

Oh the shadows—the beautiful shadows,
Sinking deep in the moonlit lake,
Where the mountains seem
As if viewed in a dream,
And a world of purer beauty make.

Oh the shadows—the beautiful shadows,
In the world without and the world within;
For joy may borrow
A charm from sorrow,
And charity smile on repented sin!

Oh the shadows—the beautiful shadows,
Falling soft on the dazzled vision,
Where the tender thought
By memory brought,
Tempers the glare of hopes Elysian.

And there are shadows—merciful shadows,
Dropping the balm on the bleeding heart,
When first it knows
That love's flame glows
Stronger and purer when joys depart.

Then bless the shadows—the beautiful shadows,
And take this thought as thou goest abroad,
That in heaven and earth
Shades owe their birth
To light; and light is the shadow of God.

A SUMMARY.

Now of the things spoken in my former articles, this is, in part, the sum. We have a high priest over the house of God; whose house are, if we hold fast the confidence of our faith and hope firm unto the end. And he is the minister of ministers—the "minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle which the Lord has pitched and not man." Unto the old and outward priesthood, the service was "unto the example and shadow of heavenly things." But now under the spiritual priesthood, as we come from the shadow to the substance, we have "a more excellent minister. As our great high-priest is made higher than the heavens, to whom we may come and offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." If we want a pure and undefiled religion, we need a pure and undefiled ministry. And for this, our ministers must draw from the pure and living fountain. They must eat of the tree of life, and drink of the pure stream which flows from the threshold of the house of God. Thus, and thus only, will they become strong in the Lord, and the power of his might. Then they will feed the flock over which the Holy Ghost made them overseers, with wholesome food, that they also may become strong and valid in building up the broken walls of our Zion. As we receive this living and heavenly food, the faith of both ministers and hearers will be turned away from the wisdom and sequence of men, and be increased in the saving power of God. "For the kingdom of God is not in word but in power." And we shall experimentally find that the gospel is the power of God unto the salvation of all who hear and obey it. And as we receive it, we believe and obey it, we should no longer have a special need that "every man should teach his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, know the Lord," for we might all thus know Him from the least to the greatest. We have also, in addition to the Scriptures, "a more sure word of prophecy" than any thing outward; whereunto we do well that we attend, as unto a light shining in our darkness. For as we are led by it, and walk in it, it will become as a shining light, which will shine more and more unto the perfect day. And by this universal and saving light, "that which may be known of God is manifest in man; for God hath showed it unto them by his light. And 'whatsoever doth manifest is light.'" So when we have light of the Spirit within, and the Scripture without, the man of God is thoroughly furnished unto all good works. But if we have the Bible without the Spirit, what does it fit? Does it make us men of God? Are we thoroughly furnished unto all good works? Does the Bible give us the Spirit of truth, which is able to guide us into all truth? We may have the Spirit without the Bible, yet be men of God; having it, the heavenly anointing—the unction from the Holy One, bring all things needful to our remembrance and even to reveal unto us things to come. So we may have the Bible without the Spirit, and we may have both together in most perfect harmony; and thus witness them to be great comfort, and blessing to the wandering Christian traveller as he journeys on through his tribulated path from earth aven. But the Bible without the Spirit is "the savor of death unto death." But with the Spirit it is "the savor of life unto life." For "the letter killeth but the Spirit giveth life." And we may, without the Bible, have the sword of the Spirit, which is quick and powerful, to cut down and to destroy the transgressing nature within; and which is so a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart. And we may have, and now do have, a ministry with the Bible in hand, but the Spirit of it not in the heart. And the speaker may have the tongue of an angel, and be prompted to utterance from a desire for the applause of men, and yet have hid under all, a hypocritical heart.

And we may have, and thank God do have, from a tried and persecuted remnant, a ministry like Paul says his was, "not after men;" he says, "I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it but by the revelation of Jesus Christ." So it was in the demonstration of the Spirit and power. It came from God, and led the people to Him. So we may have a true ministry, and we may have a counterfeit. We may have a ministry from the head, and a ministry from the heart. A ministry from the letter, and a ministry from the Spirit. A ministry from the true light, and a ministry from a transformed light. Paul's ministry was to open the eyes of the Gentiles, and to bring them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God, &c. They had eyes but could not see heavenly things. Ears that could not hear—hearts that could not understand until they were divinely opened. Then so it is now with the nominal professors. They "are wise in their own eyes, and prudent in their own sight." But our Saviour said to his disciples: "Blessed are your eyes, for they see; and your ears, for they hear." And it is a great blessing to the man of God, when his spiritual eyes are opened, that he may see the beauty of holiness on the one hand, and the mystery of iniquity on the other. And that he might hear "the still small voice," and be able to distinguish it from the voice of a stranger.

It is only as we receive the breath of life that man becomes a living soul. And it is only as we are alive unto God, that we can see the deep things of God. And that which now letteth (or hindereth) will let until it be taken out of the way." It was sin that first caused the separation between man and his Maker. And while "sin lieth at the door," it will forever bar our entrance into the kingdom of God. And how is this hindering bar, our happiness, to be removed or destroyed but by the assisting grace of Him who came to the world that he might destroy the works of the devil? and thus make an end of sins, and also make reconciliation for the iniquity that is past; and bring in an ever-lasting righteousness into every individual, that God's kingdom might come, and all will be done, in earth as it is in heaven. But his kingdom will not come, nor his will be done, until the kingdom of anti-Christ is destroyed, and our wills taken out of the way of the Divine will.

We may, without great care, let our own wills, and our own human reason, take the place of revelation; and suffer our ideas of what would best suit the present occasion to govern us, instead of yielding simple obedience to what the promptings of the Spirit would incline us to deliver. Our religion is too much between man and man. We want our fellow members to think well of us. So we look more to their wills concerning us, than to the will of God. Our faith may stand more in the wisdom of man, than in the power of God. So we prefer the friendship of the world, and of our fellow members, to the friendship and grace of God. But we are told "that the friendship of the world is enmity with God." We have mingled with the world in its fashions, customs and worship. Strangers to our peculiar ways have devoured our strength and we do not seem to know it. "The lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life," prevail over us to an alarming extent. We go hand in hand very much in common with other denominations. May the Lord turn again the captivity of his people. Then would the aged pilgrims rejoice as in days of old; and the mourning remnant of our Israel be glad.

Stillness.

"Their strength is to sit still."

How these words oblige us as it were to take breath, to pause in the midst of the many thoughts and plans and duties of our busy days. They are God's words, very different from what man would say; for would not the thought of the natural heart be, What is to be gained by sitting still? God says it is "their strength."

Stillness, and yet power; is not this God's way? We see it in the wonderful works of his creation, all going on so silently, and yet manifesting through the very silence that He, the Creator, is "strong in Power." Surely we need to remember the teaching in this, and the companion verse of this chapter (Isa. xxx., 7, 15,) for, too often perhaps, we mar the work of God in our own souls, in his vineyard, by our hurry, our neglect of sitting still. "Commune with your own heart upon your bed, and be still;" then only can we offer acceptable "sacrifices of righteousness" (Ps. iv. 4, 5.) We must be still, to hear the "still small voice." May not this sometimes be the reason why we are puzzled as to this or that plan of work? We would not for a moment undertake it without consulting Him; but has there been stillness of heart before Him first, stillness such as there must have been upon the mountain top, when our Lord Jesus spent the night in communion with his Father (Luke vi. 12,) or when he rose up a great while before day, and went into a solitary place to pray (Mark i. 34.) Mary was learning the lesson as she "sat at Jesus' feet, and heard his word;" and we read of her afterwards, that in her sorrow she "sat still in the house" till the message came, "The Master is come, and calleth for thee;" then O, how she must have loved to arise quickly and go to Him! And so it will always be, for God's "sitting still" is not idleness, it is not holding back when He calls us to arise.

Then, stillness of heart seems to be part of the very preparation God looks for in us before He can use us in his service; our voice, our thoughts even, must be hushed, while we hear Him say: "Be still and know that I am God."—Ps. xlv. 10. The work is his, and it is his way we want to take, if we are loyal to Him; let us hear his thoughts about it—not be so full of our own; "the meek will He teach in his way." We all wish to be strong, "ready prepared for the war," like David's mighty men, let us take God's way to become so.—Selected.

Drowning the Tea-pot.—We lived in the country, and when we had friends to tea, and the meal was drawing near its end, my mother, thinking some one might want half-a-cup more, would call the girl and give her a whispered direction to put a little more water in the tea-pot; but the thoughtless girl would fill it, and when the expected demand was made for the half-cup, and it was poured out, it presented such an appearance that my mother would unconsciously exclaim, "Oh, that girl—she has drowned the tea-pot!" This, as it appears to me, applies to those speakers, who, after they have said what they really have got to say, and said what is likely, through God's blessing to have good effect, go on to weaken that effect and weary the hearers by repetitions and wearisome dragging out of the address.—From the Christian.

For "The Friend,"

In Humility and Faith.

The eternal gospel, which is the invincible power of God for salvation, has in all ages been working to draw the humble and obedient souls back to God from their alienation from Him. Enlightened by the true Light, in true gospel faith, Enoch walked with his God; Job knew that his Redeemer lived; the patriarchs, Moses and the prophets, and other good and wise men of the old times, did walk in righteousness before Jehovah, and had a manifestation of better things to come. In the fulness of time, the Word became flesh and dwelt among men; and those born not of flesh or blood or of the will of man—but of God—they beheld his glory as the glory of the only begotten Son of the Father, full of grace and truth. Jesus, the Saviour of mankind, the perfect and just One, who had a glory with his Father before the world began, lived and died in humility. He came not to do his own will but his Father's will. He denied himself, was obedient unto death—to the death on the cross. The prince of darkness and this world will exalt himself, and his servants, and teach people ambition and pride—not self-denial; while the Son of God, the Sun of Righteousness, teaches lowliness of heart and humility. God resisteth the proud, but giveth his grace to the poor and humble.

It is the most sad, lamentable, affecting fact, that men are in alienation from God and his ways, when they live in pride, ambition, vanity and the fashions of this world, ruled by the prince of darkness, and holding up self, which must die. If these profess religion, it is religion of self. They can praise the excellency of creeds and ceremonies invented by fallen man; and eulogize formal preachers and scribes as being so able in their discourses! They can think that they are increased in goods—needing nothing; but it is the anointed eye alone that can see the depths of Satan.

How few are the truly born children of God—the Father of Light. But praise to the Father of Light and of immortality, they existed in all ages, and they exist now. They have by the invincible power of Christ taken heed to the Light, and the heavenly seed in their souls has got life, and Christ has been born in them, and in some his kingdom is fully established, and He is the king who ruleth in perfection, righteousness and peace. O, blessed Immanuel state! God in man! O, blessed condition, in which the first resurrection is attained, where the natural will and self is nailed to the cross, where the soul has its communion with God, its father, and feeds in humility and faith on the tree of Life! This is hid from the proud and worldly-wise, but revealed in the humble by Christ living in them; and they follow his footsteps in humility. O, how deep is the wisdom of God; what instruction to the mind humbled and enlightened by Christ, the Light of the world. My soul bows in humility and reverence before the wisdom of God. Where is the self of man, when the soul of man is owned and possessed by the Bridegroom? It is crucified, dead and gone! All praise to Jesus who saves his people from sin. All elements of self, pride and sin are gone, and humility and love are the elements in which the children of Light are living. O, the depths of the divine mysteries and the perfection of salvation, which is Christ in man, or the Word in the heart and in the mouth. Truly did Paul say: "The righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise: 'Say not in thine heart, who shall ascend into heaven? (that is to bring Christ down from above:) or who shall descend down into the deep? (that is to bring Christ again from the dead.) But what saith it? The Word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth and thy heart; that is the word of faith which we preach.'"

The children of Light walking in the Light, having fellowship with one another, and cleansed by the blood of Christ, are one in Christ, as He is one with his Father. They all partake of the same joy, the same love, the same humility, the same goodness and kindness. There can be no jar, schism or dissension (which things are out of the Light) between the true children of Light. What a holy perfect state is attainable by those who are Christ's indeed! This blessed oneness with Christ is what puts down the dominion of Satan and Babylon, and never can be understood by those who know not that Christ is in them.

There is nothing short of Christ born and established in man, that can keep men unspotted and without blemish; along with Him who is holy and free from sin nothing unholy and sinful can exist. He must purge his floor thoroughly, and with his holy baptism of spirit and unquenchable fire, burn up all the chaff before He ruleth. Nothing of anti-Christ, however subtle, must enter the cleansed temple of God, who thus tabernacles with man; and in that condition man is free indeed, made free by the Son of God.

Often has an isolated child of Light felt the loneliness in this time of probation; and often felt as if there were no more children who had got that precious faith which overcometh the world and Satan in all his allurements, and had owned Christ revealing the mysteries of his kingdom in righteousness and peace. Often would such a child think with Elijah: I am alone. But again consider: with me and in me is my Lord. If I am alone here, I meet with an innumerable company in the spirit. My Lord is all! He trod the winepress alone, and I have to be contented with my Master. For such an one, when it has pleased his Master to make known other children of Light, what joy is it to find that through the wonderful leadings of the true Light, even though they be distant for thousands of miles by water and land, and had never seen or heard about each other before, they are still of one mind, no different doctrines among them, but one in Christ as He is one in his Father. There is great joy and gladness for such children of Light to meet and glorify their Saviour who lives in them and leads them according to his good pleasure, in righteousness, peace and joy in the glorious kingdom. C. S.

"The natural, uncontrolled, active mind delights in doing something that shall appear goodly; yea, can make sacrifices in its own will and way, and is gratified in self-complacency, and it may be appraise: * * * my long life and observation, tossed and sifted as I have been, have given me a measure of experience in the delusions of self. O! how different, how widely different, from the lowly, humble waiting at the feet of Jesus, the highest Teacher, as with our mouths in the dust; feeling our own impotency, our own blindness! Here is subjugation indeed, bearing the true cross. * * * If I know anything of true peace, it is in simple, childlike obedience to the still small voice of the Good Shepherd, who instructs the lambs and the sheep of his fold; a stranger's voice they will not know or follow."

Even admitting that some sins are not so great as others, let it still be remembered that they lead to the same fearful result, and that our greatest danger is not in the commission of enormous wickednesses, but in the permission of what we are accustomed to consider little sins.

Humane Indian Policy.—The special Committee of Councils of the City of Philadelphia agreed to report a resolution of request to Congress to adopt an Indian policy covering the following points. Never break faith with the Indians. Keep all intruders out of the Territory. Enact suitable laws to protect life and property on reservations. Never hold a tribe liable for the crime of individual members. Abolish all privileged tradeship. Absolutely destroy all traffic in liquors. Civilize the Indians where they are. Educate the entire Indian reservation population. On reservations divide the lands in severalty as soon as Indians can farm them. Give citizenship to all self-supporting Indians who ask it.

Longevity in the Society of Friends.—The Christian World, (London) says: "That members of the Society of Friends, the calm placidity and temperate habits of whose lives are notorious, attain exceptionally great ages, has long been well known. It may not, however, be so generally understood that the average duration of life among them is constantly lengthening. Yet such seems to be the case, if we are to judge from the annual obituary. Thus the average life of Friends dying in the triennial periods ending as below will be found to demonstrate the fact we have stated: In the three years ending 1850 it was 52 years; in 1860 it was 53 years; 1870, 52 years; in 1875, 54 years; in 1879, 58 years; and in 1882, 58 years.

Parliamentary Affirmation Bill.—The British Government propose extending to all the members of Parliament, the liberty which had previously been given to Friends and Jews of choosing between an oath and an affirmation. One of the London papers urges the propriety of taking a more radical step and abolishing all such tests. It says:—

"We make the meshes of the net of all possible sizes, so that every conceivable species of fish can pass through, and yet we religiously refrain from pulling the net down altogether and casting it aside. Surely, if it is right to do the one thing, it is right to do the other. 'Swear not at all' is, we are convinced, the comprehensively right and final direction to be applied to Parliamentary oaths. Though gladly accepting the Affirmation Bill, we regret that an obsolete and useless form should be perpetuated."

Bilsdale Meeting-house.—According to the Northern Echo, "Lord Feversham has [made] a virtual confiscation of a humble meeting-house, in Bilsdale, which, with its adjacent burial-ground, has been occupied by the Society of Friends ever since 1670—that is to say, from a period previous to that at which Lord Feversham's ancestors entered into possession of the estates which he at present holds. This meeting-house has been used by the Friends for services from time to time and has naturally been regarded by them with considerable interest and affection from its venerable associations and history. Now Lord Feversham has resumed, or rather taken, possession of the building, having taken the key from the custody of a member of the Society of Friends, who happens to be one of his tenants, and placed it in the care of his agent, to whom the Friends have now to apply if they wish to hold a service or bury their dead. His lordship lends the building at his discretion to a neighboring vicar to conduct services in, according to the rites of the Established Church. An earnest remonstrance, signed by fifty Friends in the neighboring district, was addressed to Lord Feversham."

The above is taken from the Christian World. We regret to observe by the British Friend, that in the remonstrance addressed to the Earl of Feversham the style of address and the manner of dating does not conform to that in use among consistent Friends. Such evidences of departure from our testimonies indicate a loss in a direction of far greater moment than the possession of an old meeting-house.

Tithes of Fish in Cornwall.—One of the speakers at a recent Liberation meeting at Preston mentioned a tax to which some of the fishermen on the Cornish coast are still subject. When those engaged in the pilchard fishery bring to land the spoil of the ocean some representatives of the State Church step in and demand a tithe of their gain, and this in addition to the usual tithe levied upon the land. With respect to that impost, we have heard more than enough of the mythical "pious ancestor" who imposed the burden but the assumption can scarcely be pleaded for this tax on personal earnings. No grant from any "pious ancestor" centuries ago could furnish any equitable right to individuals or corporation to subtract from these poor toilers in a dangerous and arduous occupation any portion of their hard earnings for an institution with which they have no sympathy. The truth probably is, that this is a survival of the personal tithes, the claim to which was once universal, including in its mesh every kind of laborer and handicrafts-man; but ich has had to be abandoned by the clergy about any compensation.—Extract.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Re-sharpening Files.—This is effected in the large establishments by forcing a stream of fine sand and water, or emery and water, with a steam pressure of 60 or 80 lbs. per square inch, against the file-teeth. Two tubes are used, so that both surfaces of the file are ground on at the same time.

Right to Pure Water.—In a suit recently brought in Rhode Island, by one manufacturing company to restrain another company situated nearer the sources of the stream from polluting the water by dye-stuffs, &c., the court granted the injunction; holding that every owner of land has the right to have the water which passes his land come to it in a pure, natural state; and that the Legislature itself cannot take the right away, any more than it can take the land itself.

Panics.—The Lancet says there is no use in asserting that assemblies of sane persons ought not to become victims of a panic—for the nervous system of man is such that there is always a tendency to receive and imprint impressions, which so powerfully affect the mind and body, that judgment is for the time suspended, and the limbs are under the control of the emotions. Discipline is the only remedy.

Laver Bread.—Laver Bread is made of a seaweed (Porphyra laciniata) found growing on the low rocks. The women gather it in large baskets. After it is thoroughly washed, it is boiled for about two hours, chopped up, and made into lumps and sprinkled with oatmeal to keep it together and make it look clean. It is only made along the Gloucester and Devonshire coasts, where a great many women earn their living by making it. After it is cooked it will keep for three or four days in summer and about a week in winter. Most of it is sent to the Swansea market, and sold for 4d., or 5d., per pound. The poor people are very fond of it, and eat it either with onion fat, or cooked like a vegetable with butter.—Kew Report.

Quinine.—More than 4,000,000 ounces of this drug are annually consumed. At present the largest manufactory is at Milan, Italy, where an establishment turns out 1,200,000 ounces, or more than one-fourth of the world's consumption.

The Mongoose of the West Indies.—In all the West Indian islands the black and brown rats are cause of great loss to the sugar planters. To combat these pests various animals were introduced; but the ferret succeeded before the attacks of the chigo; the mongoose, though it maintained itself and gained one of the planter's best friends, devouring the young of the rapacious rodents; so attacks kittens, puppies and calves. In 1829 nine Mongooses were brought direct from India and turned loose. In ten years they have so multiplied that they are abundant all over the island [of Jamaica]. Cuba, St. Domingo, Barbadoes and Santa Cruz have been supplied with these animals, and the first patron, Esprit, has undertaken to come to Australia and New Zealand, to combat the rabbit pests. As a rat-catcher the mongoose has proved itself worthy of its introduction, as it has reduced the expenses of rat-catching fully 90 per cent., and has reduced the quantity of rat-eaten sugar canes to one-fourth or one-fifth of what it was previously, representing an annual saving to the island of nearly £45,000. Notwithstanding this benefit, the short history of the Mongoose on the island goes to prove that the introduction of a new species into a district should not be done rashly. The Mongoose is now too common, and is making itself felt in other ways beside rat-catching. To some extent it preys upon eggs and chickens, where dogs are not kept, and quail, wild guinea-fowl, and game birds generally are rapidly diminishing before its attacks. As the Mongoose cannot climb a tree, the rats take refuge in cocoa-nut plantations, and prove more destructive than formerly; but, on the other hand, the coffee and cocoa plantations profit greatly by its introduction.—Am. Naturalist.

Leaf-like Butterfly of Sumatra.—Of this species, A. R. Wallace says: "Its upper surface is of a rich purple, variously tinged with ash color, and across the fore wings there is a broad bar of deep orange, so that when on the wing it is very conspicuous. This species was not uncommon in dry woods and thickets, and I often endeavored to capture it without success, for after flying a short distance it would enter a bush among dry or dead leaves, and however carefully I crept up to the spot I could never discover it till it would suddenly start out again and then disappear in a similar place. At length I was fortunate enough to see the exact spot where the butterfly settled, and though I lost sight of it for some time, I at length discovered that it was close before my eyes, but that in its position of repose it so closely resembled a dead leaf attached to a twig as almost certainly to deceive the eye even when gazing full upon it. I captured several specimens on the wing, and was able fully to understand the way in which this wonderful resemblance is produced."

The habit of the species is always to rest on a twig, and among dead or dry leaves, and in this position, with the wings closely pressed together, their outline is exactly that of a moderately-sized leaf slightly curved or shrivelled. The wings being pressed together, their under-surface alone is visible, and these are of ashy brown or reddish color, which matches those of dead leaves. The imitation is made more perfect by a dark curved line which resembles the mid-rib of a leaf, and by cross markings which imitate the lateral veins. The head and antennae are drawn back between the wings so as to be invisible.

The completeness of its disguise saves it from the attacks of insect-eating birds and reptiles, which would probably destroy it if it were equally conspicuous when at rest as when on the wing.

Pride in Animals.—Pride is developed in many animals. In herds, there is generally one leader at the head, who will not suffer any move to be made without his permission. In one case the man in charge would not suffer the head cow to go first out of the yard to pasture. The result was that she refused to go at all; and in order to get her out, the man had to drive the others back again, so that she might take her proper place at their head.

Many of the domestic animals are very sensitive to ridicule. J. G. Wood had a cat "Pret," who when laughed at, felt that was an insult which he could not brook, and would arch his tail, hold himself very stiff indeed, and march slowly out of the room.

The Siamese ape, "Ungka," whose history is given by Dr. Bennett, was exceedingly tame, and at meal times always came to take his share, a corner of the table being appropriated to his use. Dr. Bennett says: "When from any of his ludicrous actions at table, we all burst out in loud laughter, he would vent his indignation at being made the object of ridicule, by uttering his peculiar hollow barking noise, at the same time inflating the air-sac, and regarding the persons laughing with a most serious look, until they had ceased, when he would quietly resume his dinner."

THE FRIEND.

THIRD MONTH 31, 1883.

Some discussion has recently been going on in the English periodicals respecting the employment of untrained and unordained ministers. This class of preachers has long been made much use of in the Methodist societies. But of latter years there has been a decided increase in the proportionate numbers of trained ministers; and this has been accompanied with a corresponding diminution in the growth of the societies.

A writer in The Nonconformist states, that "in the oldest or Wesleyan Methodist body, the trained ministry has gradually grown till it now numbers about one to every seven local or lay preachers; in the New Connexion, the next oldest, they are, say, one to nine local preachers; whilst among the Primitives they are as yet but one to fourteen local preachers. Thus time and culture develop a higher proportion of trained ministers. Along with that increase of special and trained ministry, has come a decline in the rate of increase. The rates of increase for Primitives, New Connexions and Wesleyans, have almost precisely followed, in their proportions, the proportions of their number of lay local preachers to each trained minister."

We think from this statement the inference may fairly be drawn, that the higher literary education of ministers does not increase their power of converting sinners. That is a work that must ever depend on the extension of Divine power.

"Transformation of apostate man
From fool to wise, from earthly to divine,
Is work for Him who made him."

And those ministers will be most efficient in carrying on this work, who most fully place their reliance on the anointing power of the Head of the Church, and trust the least to the "wisdom of man." The consciousness of possessing a large fund of knowledge and ideas, and of practical skill in the use of the mental powers, which results from a systematic theological training, naturally tends to lead their possessor to rely in measure on them in his ministerial labors. In proportion as this effect is produced, it is reasonable to expect that the Divine blessing will be withheld.

The experience of our Methodist friends, as narrated by the writer above quoted, corresponds with the statement made by Robert Barclay 200 years ago: "The power, life and spirit of Christianity is the marrow and substance of a Christian ministry. And he that hath this and can speak from it, though he be a poor shepherd or a fisherman, and ignorant of all that learning, and of all those questions and notions; yet speaking from the Spirit, his ministry will have more influence towards the converting of a sinner unto God, than all of them who are learned after the flesh."

"In our day," he continues, "God hath raised up witnesses for Himself as He did fishermen of old; many, yea most of whom are laboring and mechanic men, who, altogether without that learning, have by the power and spirit of God, struck at the very root and ground of Babylon; and in the strength and might of this power have gathered thousands, by reaching their consciences, unto the same power and life, who, as to the outward part, have been far more knowing than they, yet not able to resist the virtue that proceeded from them."

Robert Barelay was a lover of learning himself, and he did not despise it when kept in its proper place. From its very rise our Society has encouraged the literary education of our youth, as well as their religious training; but it has ever been careful to guard against this being considered as essential to the successful discharge of the service of a Gospel minister. Gospel power depends on the measure of the Spirit of Christ that clothes the minister, and not on the measure of intellect or culture which he may possess.

We have received an Address on the 200th anniversary of the landing of William Penn at Upland, written by Howard M. Jenkins.

It is a well-written and interesting tribute to the character and statesmanship of that illustrious man; and attributes much of the peculiar features of his career to the influence of those convictions of Divine Grace, which, during all but a few of his earlier years, he followed as his guide through life.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Timothy O. Howe, Postmaster General of the United States, died on the 25th instant, in Kenosha, Wisconsin. He was a native of Maine, a lawyer by profession, but removed to Wisconsin in 1845. He represented the last named State in the U. S. Senate from 1861 to 1879, inclusive. He was 67 years of age at the time of death, which was caused by pneumonia.

All the designs submitted for the new two cent postage stamp bear the head of Washington. The selection of the design may not be made for several weeks.

The removal of Sitting Bull and his immediate followers, now under military surveillance at Fort Randall, to the Standing Rock Agency, where the others of the Sioux reservation Indians are stationed, will take place on 4th mo. 15th.

The Secretary of the Interior, on the 26th inst., addressed a letter to the Commissioner of the General Land Office in regard to the occupation of large tracts of Indian lands in Kansas by stockmen, saying that the Interior Department "will lend its influence to their appropriate punishment under the law for their trespass," and directing the Commissioner to notify the trespasser by circular of its determination.

Special Agent Townsend having written to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs from the Sac and Fox Agency in the Indian Territory, under date of the 15th inst., reporting an alarming condition of affairs, owing to the struggle between the opposing Creek factions, and recommending that the Government should interpose "to prevent further bloodshed and devastation," troops from Fort Gibson and Fort Reno have been ordered to arrest and disband them.

The Cincinnati Price Current publishes a report on the condition of the wheat crop throughout the winter wheat belt of the West, in comparison with last year's crop, the condition of which was placed at 100. The report shows the present condition as follows: "Ohio, 81; Indiana, 80; Illinois, 90; Missouri, 93; Kansas, 91; Michigan, 96; Kentucky, 70; Tennessee, 86. The winter wheat sections of Wisconsin promise well, the general average being about 10 per cent. below last year. The spring wheat sections of Minnesota, Iowa, Wisconsin and Nebraska show no essential change in area as compared with last year. It is hardly reasonable to look for a crop equal to last year's estimates. This year's crop will fall below four hundred and fifty million bushels, or fifty-three millions less than last year."

Reports from Des Moines, Iowa, state that the apple orchards in that section have been killed by the severe winter.

The new Tennessee funding bill, scaling down the debt to fifty cents on the dollar and three per cent. interest, has become law by the Governor's approval.

The Arkansas Legislature has passed a law which prohibits for two years the selling of liquor within two miles of any meeting-house or school-house, except on petition of a majority of the adult inhabitants.

A snow storm prevailed at Lynchburg, Virginia, from First-day evening until the next morning. The telegraph wires were levelled in some places. A heavy snow storm raged on Fifth-day, south of Weldon, North Carolina. At points along the Raleigh and Gaston Railroad the snow is reported to be ten inches deep. The Raleigh News and Observer says the snow fall in North Carolina during First and Second days was "unprecedented." At Greensborough the snow is two feet deep on the level, and at Henderson three feet. At Kittrell, a number of houses have fallen under the weight of the snow. The telegraphs north of Greensborough are prostrated.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 420, which is 20 more than during the previous week, and 31 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the above, 201 were males, and 219 females: 54 died of consumption; 47 of pneumonia; 34 of heart disease; 20 of convulsions; 18 of old age; 18 of typhoid fever; 16 of croup; 10 of scarlet fever, and 9 of Bright's disease.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 104; 3½'s 103½; 4's, registered, 113; coupon, 113; 4's, registered, 119½; coupon, 120½; currency 6's 129 to 132.

Cotton.—There was very little movement, but prices were unchanged. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 10¾ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 8½ a 8¾ cts. for export, and 9½ a 9¾ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour continues dull, but prices were unchanged, with sales of 1900 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.50 a $6.50; Pennsylvania family at $5 a $5.12½; western do., at $5.50 a $6.25, and patents at $6.25 a $8. Rye flour is steady at $3.75 a $3.87½ per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is in fair demand, and a fraction higher. Sales of 4600 bushels red, in car lots at $1.15 a $1.21½. Rye is steady at 68 a 70 cts. Corn is dull and weak: sales of 9500 bushels, in car lots, at 55 a 64 cts. Oats are quiet but steady. Sales of 10,000 bushels, in car lots, at 51½ a 55 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 3d mo. 24th, 1883.—Loads of hay, 380; loads of straw, 45. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 95 cts. to $1.05 per 100 pounds; mixed, 85 a 95 cts.; straw, 60 a 70 cts.

Beef cattle were dull, as most holders were demanding an advance: 2900 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5¾ a 7¾ cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were also dull: 9000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4½ a 7½ cts., and lambs at 5 a 8½ cts. per pound, as to quality.

Hogs were in demand at an advance: 3500 head arrived and sold at 10½ a 11½ cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

FOREIGN.—The trial of six more of the members of the Armagh Assassination Society, began in Belfast on the 26th instant.

A despatch from Glendale, Isle of Skye, reports that the Crofters at Waterstein are excited. They have driven the stock of Lord MacDonald away.

The Standard states on good authority that the Cabinet are divided on the question of the construction of a tunnel under the English Channel.

The emigration from Switzerland to America has assumed alarming proportions. Several districts are fast becoming depopulated. It is stated that Guttannen is without an inhabitant. The exodus is owing to the bad harvests and American competition.

The Standard's Varna correspondent says: Business at Erzeroum is at a standstill consequent on the movement of the Russians in the Caucasus. The growing opinion is that a Russo-Turkish conflict is imminent. The Armenians are wearied with the indifference shown by Great Britain to their wrongs, and would welcome

Russian occupation. The Russians along the front number 100,000.

Three earthquake shocks accompanied by rumbling have been felt at Biancavilla, a town on the declivity of Mount Etna. There is a great panic among the people of that place. They are building huts in the open country, fearing that the town will be destroyed. Prisoners in the jail have been removed to a place of safety. There are eleven fissures in the mountain. The central opening is active, but there is no discharge of lava.

A despatch to the Standard from Vienna says, the commander of the French squadron in Madagascar waters has been ordered to spare Tamatave as far as possible, and to blockade but few ports.

Late advices from the gold coast announce that thousands of Ashantees have renounced their allegiance to the king, and demanded the establishment of a British protectorate.

The latest advices from the Australian Colony Victoria, report great damage from floods. In Queer land there have been terrible thunder storms, with high and high winds, destroying the crops and killing many sheep.

The Haytien Chambers have passed a bill reducing the export duties 50 per cent., and raising the import duties 33 per cent. Coffee will now pay $1.25 per pound, "with the previous additional 20 per cent. remaining."

Advices from Buenos Ayres of the 24th ult. report that a fight occurred in Patagonia between troops of the Argentine Republic and Chilean troops, owing to the refusal of the former to quit Chilean territory. Several men were killed and a number wounded. The Argentines finally retired across the frontier.

Reports of the floods in Nova Scotia show that nearly every county bridges and mills have been swept away. The Eastern Extension and Halifax and Cape Breton Railways have suffered great damage. The town of Sherbrooke has been flooded, several houses have been swept away, and the people throughout the town have been driven into the upper stories of the dwellings. Mining operations are suspended everywhere.

Arrangements have been made by which Friends attending the Yearly Meeting can be furnished with simple meals, both before and after the sittings of the meeting, at moderate charge (15 cents), in the second story of the central part of the Arch St. Meeting-house. Meals will also be furnished for those attending the Meeting for Sufferings and Select Meeting, the preceding week.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

A Stated Meeting of the Committee having charge of the Boarding School at Westtown, will be held at Philadelphia on Sixth-day, 3rd mo. 30th, at 11 A. M.

The Committee on Admissions and the Committee on Instruction will meet the same day at 9 A. M.

The Visiting Committee, appointed to attend the examination at the School, meet there on Second evening, 26th inst. For the accommodation of the committee, conveyances will be at Street Road Station on the 26th inst., to meet the trains that leave the city at 2.25 and 4.55 P. M.

The Apostolical Miracles.

BY MARK HOPKINS.

The objects of miracles are two. The first show the existence of a personal God, his nature, and who has control over it. These miracles may be of small account. Relatively it is of little importance that a blind beggar shall have his sight restored. The restoration of sight, therefore, a miracle, may be as nothing compared to those great processes of nature by which any millions constantly enjoy perfect health, and yet, as revealing a personal God, showing that the whole order of uniformity is flexible to his will, a miracle is of a higher order and significance than any natural process, however beneficent or stupendous.

A system of invariable sequences, as in nature, moving on without regard to moral character, could never suggest the idea of a personal being lying back of them as their author. If supposed to include human action, as it must to be universal, it would be equivalent to fate. It would preclude free-will, accountability, revelation, and any religion worthy of the name. A miracle alone shows that which would be indispensable to personal beings immersed in a system of purely natural order, where prudence alone would find a sphere, into a dispensation where there should be true freedom, and a law of moral consciousness. As thus essential in showing the existence of a personal God who has control over nature, miracles, or direct intervention with God as equivalent to them, are recorded in the Bible just as the being of God is.

The second object of miracles is to show that he who works them has himself control over the forces of nature, or, he is the messenger and servant of Him who has such control. When Christ wrought miracles, he did it in his own name. To the Jews he said, as in his own right, "Peace, be ye said, "I will, be thou clean." But the apostles wrought miracles they did in the name of another, and a miracle thus wrought was conclusive proof that that other had power over nature, and that they were his servants. Here was a vital distinction, so that Moses was not permitted to enter the promised land because he did not sufficiently honor God in the miracle of bringing water out of the rock.

These being the objects of miracles, it is obvious that they would be especially needed at the opening of a new dispensation; and also that they would need to correspond with the nature and object of that dispensation. And so we find them.

At the opening of the Jewish dispensation, when a nation was to be organized, and a new order of worship, elaborate, typical, burdensome, and one that was to endure for generations, was to be established, we find miracles flaming out as a bright constellation in the historical sky. We find them conspicuous, greatly varied, long continued, addressing themselves unmistakably to the senses of the whole nation, and made the turning points of its very existence. The whole nation passed through the sea, drank of the water that came from the rock, ate of the manna, and followed the pillar of cloud and of fire. Respecting these they could not have been deceived, and if they had not occurred, the record of them could not have been credited by the very generation which is appealed to as having seen them, or by any subsequent generation which did not see them. The miracles were sufficient but no more than sufficient to establish the civil institutions of the Jews, and that peculiar form of ceremonial, sacrificial, and typical worship which was to continue till Christ should come.

When the Israelites were fully settled in the promised land, and their institutions were established, miracles, in a great measure, ceased. After that, the appeal is constantly made in the record to the miracles that had taken place. Still there were emergencies when they were needed, and then they were wrought. In some measure they were continued till the return of the Jews from their captivity, and then, so far as we have evidence, they ceased till Christ came.

We here find again, bursting upon us at once, after a long period of their absence, another constellation of miracles. As uniformly beneficent, these miracles were consonant with the spirit of the new dispensation; and in their number and variety they seem to have been purposely adapted to show a control, not only over the elements and forces of nature and over every form of disease, but, as had never been done before, over the spirits of the invisible world, and over death itself. These miracles wrought, as has been said, by Christ in his own name, were sufficient, to substantiate his claims. To them he himself appealed. "If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. But if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works; that ye may know and believe that the Father is in me, and I in Him." Thus were the miracles intended and adapted to bear witness to Him who came out from God to give life to the world, and who was himself, in his miraculous birth, and sinless life, and teachings, and death, and resurrection, and ascension, the greatest miracle of all.

We now come to the time of the apostles. And here, I think, we must see that nothing short of miracles wrought by them could have substantiated their claim before the Jews to be true witnesses of the resurrection of one whom they had crucified between two thieves, and over whose tomb they had set a watch. Here were a few uneducated, friendless, timid Galileans, whose hopes had been utterly crushed, and miraculous power was not less needed to strengthen them in facing the whole power of the Sanhedrin in the hour of its seeming triumph, and to give effect to their words, than it had been to draw attention to Christ in his humble guise. This, accordingly, was the period of the apostolic miracles. Not only did the apostles at that time "with great power give witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus," but we are told that by "their hands were many signs and wonders wrought among the people, inasmuch that they brought forth the sick into the streets, and laid them on beds and couches, that, at the least, the shadow of Peter passing by might overshadow some of them."

By these frequent miracles, public and undeniable, as the healing of the impotent man in the temple, together with the special power of the Holy Spirit that accompanied the preaching of the apostles, Christianity gained a footing. Its great facts were established, an organization was formed for its perpetuation and extension. The position thus reached was analogous to that of the Israelites when they had gained the promised land; and hence we might expect that miracles would cease in a measure from that point, as they did from the analogous point under the Old Testament dispensation. And so we find it. In the progress of the gospel, as we recede from Jerusalem, and especially as we recede in time from the resurrection of Christ, we find the number of miracles decrease. Of miracles among the Gentiles the accounts are few. They were less adapted to them than to the Jews who sought after a sign. We hear nothing of them at Athens, or at Rome; and in the Epistle to the Romans they are scarcely referred to.

Having, then, aided in establishing an organized Christianity, what further place could miracles have in accomplishing its great end? That end is not to prolong life indefinitely by healing diseases, it is not to excite wonder, or to detract from the value of industry under fixed laws. It is not to gather multitudes and lead them to shrines in expectation of physical effects. Its object is moral and spiritual. It is to save men from their sins. It is a moral transformation of them into the image of Christ. This no miracle has any direct tendency to produce. When the Jews had seen the miracle of the resurrection of Lazarus, they immediately sought how they might put both Christ and Lazarus to death. As addressed to the senses, a miracle has no more power to produce a moral transformation than the rising of one from the dead would have had to persuade those brethren of the rich man who would not be persuaded by Moses and the prophets.

This view of miracles the apostles had. It appears throughout their writings. Especially does it appear in the comparison of them by Paul with charity, or love. A man might work them all, and yet be but as "sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal." They felt that the great end of miracles had been accomplished, and that it was of comparatively little moment whether they were continued or not.

[The above article, condensed from the S. S. Times, is interesting and valuable. But we think the statement, that nothing short of miracles could have substantiated the claim of the apostles to be true witnesses to the resurrection, is not sufficiently guarded. That the miraculous cures effected by the apostles greatly aided their efforts in convincing the people of the truth of Christianity, is abundantly evident from the Scripture records. But then as now, the great agency by which conversion is effected, is the Spirit of Christ operating on the heart of man. The power of this Spirit, which accompanied the apostles' words, carried conviction to their hearers; and we doubt not would have been effectual in spreading Christianity in the earth, even if in the Divine counsels it had not been attended with the working of any outward and visible miracles. The same Divine Power which performs miracles and brings conviction to the heart through their agency, is able to produce that conviction immediately without their intervention.

Nor do we believe that such an extension of this power, as may truly be regarded as miraculous, is altogether withdrawn from the Church at this day, though we have little confidence in some of the pretended evidences of its exercise, that have been brought to public notice of latter times. The spirit of prophecy at times still rests on the living members of the Church, and would it not more conspicuously do so, if the communion of these with their Holy Head was more close and abiding?—Ed.]

I observe the first settlers in new countries are generally people in low circumstances; and they have many difficulties and hardships to encounter. When amongst them, I have often felt great tenderness towards them. Their fare being every way hard, they are low and poor and feel themselves so; some of them have large families about them to provide for, and little to do it with. Many of them feel humbled under the trials of their situation; and I have found their minds more tender and open to receive the truths of the gospel, than those in old settled places.—Selected.

"When art thou quiet?"—It is told of Claus Harms, a great German preacher in the first half of our century, that he related to a Quaker how much daily he had to speak. The Quaker listened; and when Harms had finished his narration, he asked, "Brother Harms, if thou speakest so much, when art thou quiet? and when doth the Spirit of God speak to thee?" Harms was so impressed that, from that time forward, he passed a certain portion of each day in retirement, and from that time forward received a blessing from God upon his labors.

For "The Friend."

Letters and Memoranda of William Scattergood.

The following are selections from the letters and memoranda of William Scattergood, second son of Joseph and Ann Scattergood of Philadelphia; who was born in that city the 26th of 10th month, 1804; and deceased at Concordville, Delaware Co., Pennsylvania, on the 13th day of the 8th mo. 1857, in the 53rd year of his age.

These manuscripts—his correspondence and diary—clearly represent their author to have had strong natural powers of mind; which were gradually subjected and humbled by the leavening, transforming discipline of the grace and cross of Christ; and thereby made subservient to the advocacy and exaltation of his kingdom in the earth, which consists "in righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost."

It is said to be by many painful incisions that the eye is made single; and if exercising lessons in tribulation were permitted our friend, as opened out in these essays, this is no more than is promised by the inspired apostle in that, "We must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God." These, also, Paul gloried in; "knowing," as he continues, "that tribulation worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience, hope; and hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us." There is no doubt that tribulations, when patiently abode under, serve to chasten and to purify; and, withal, to prepare the soul more diligently to heed the requisitions of the Saviour's will.

In view of this pilgrimage journey, whether in respect to its vicissitudes, its humiliations, its crosses, its sore afflictions, the lesson, through and over all, cannot be too strongly impressed, that that grace, which made the apostle Paul what he became—"strong in the Lord and in the power of his might"—is sufficient for each one of us, as, like him, we yield our hearts to its justifying, teaching, saving, and regenerating power. In proof of the same, moreover, how are we compassed about with a great cloud of witnesses, all bearing testimony to the efficacy and sufficiency of the unspeakable gift of establishing grace which came by Jesus Christ; and will ever remain effectual for the salvation of all, who are willing to yield themselves to it as the apostle did, who declares: "Unto every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ;" while to this same power from on high he commends the elders of Ephesus, as that which is able to build them up, and to give them an inheritance among all them which are sanctified.

As has been said, and as the sequel of this autobiography will prove, Wm. Scattergood had much to endure calculated to humble and to instruct. And is it not in the school of baptism that any learn saving lessons, and from the depths of Jordan as of old, that stones of memorial are brought up? It is believed that the baptism through which he passed, like to "a refiner's fire and to fuller's soap," had the precious effect, in measure, to "purge him as gold and silver," in order that his offerings might be pleasant unto the Lord, even offerings in righteousness.

A concise testimony, principally relating to his early years and experience, and believed to have been written by a truly worthy brother of his, also deceased, prefaces, as joined, W. S.'s letters and memoranda.

His parents were exemplary and valuable members of the religious Society of Friends, and earnestly concerned to bring up children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.

William was of a cheerful disposition, fond of the active pursuits and amusements of childhood.

In the year 1816, when about twelve years of age, he was placed at Friends' Boarding School at Westtown. At this seminar well as those he had previously attended, conduct and the progress he made in studies were satisfactory to his teachers. Care and concern of those who conducted the Boarding School, gave him a favorable opinion of its usefulness; and there is reason to believe that strong religious impressions were upon his mind while there, which were permitted to be wholly dissipated.

He was a dutiful and affectionate son, sought the advice of his parents upon an important matter even when quite young, and yielded to their control with a readiness which manifested that he was early convinced that it was his duty to honor them by obedience to their commands.

Upon his return from Westtown in 1817, he began the study of the Latin language in order to qualify himself for learning apothecary business; in which, after due consideration and consultation, he had concluded to engage. The next year he was appointed to his relative, William Evans, to acquire a knowledge of that business; whom he remained until he was 21 years of age. He performed the duties of his station with fidelity to his employer; and his agreeable manners and conscientious deportment accompanied with a knowledge of his business, secured to him the respect and attention of many Friends and others. He was fond of intelligent society, and of literary pursuits; and his reading was generally select.

In the early part of the year 1822, he brought under renewed religious exercises, and yielding to the serious impressions upon his mind, he became dissatisfied with some things in which he had too freely indulged; and among these, declined the company of some associates whose society no longer congenial to him. In a letter relation with whom he corresponded much freedom at this period, he, under date of 5th mo. 11th, 1822, says: "I am endeavoring to become entirely indifferent to everything that is not substantially useful. I shall succeed, time alone can prove. That I wish to discard every thing but what immediately relates to religious pursuits, to put aside every thing that is merely for speculation and trifling amusement, to read only such books as afford real unmingled truth; which will revive pleasing remembrance on the mind, and come a source of unfailing delight."

He was fond of epistolary intercourse, particularly on religious subjects. It is worthy that he seldom alludes in his letters to the passing events of the day, even to that he was accustomed to write with great freedom. The subject he felt to be, and which should be of the first importance to all, was theme he loved to dwell upon. To t se religious experience qualified them to pathize with him, and afford him counsel and help, he freely imparted his religious experiences, the pressure of which at times appears to have been almost overwhelming. The deep sorrows he was permitted to pass through, of which he ascribes to his unfaithfulness, are instructive to survivors. They doubtless were to himself, enabling him to enter fully into sympathy with those who are assailed with similar feelings; to some whom he was at times qualified to afford instant counsel and help.

Religious Conversation.

I believe both that the proposition is true, that it is expedient to set it down, that religious conversation is one of the banes of the religious world. There are many who are really attached to religion, and who sometimes feel its power, but who allow their religious feelings to evaporate in an ebullition of words. They forget how much religion is an affair of the mind, and how little of the tongue; they forget how possible it is to live under its influence without talking of it to their friends; and, some, it is to be feared, may forget how possible it is to talk without feeling its influence.

Not that the good man's piety is to be hidden in his breast like an anchorite in his cell. Evil does not consist in speaking of religion, but in speaking too much; not in making our allegiance to God; not in encouraging by exhortation, and amending by example; not in placing the light upon a candle—but in making religion a common topic of discourse. Of all species of well-intended religious conversation, that perhaps is the most exceptionable which consists in narrating our own religious feelings. Many thus depend upon that religious quietude which is peculiarly favorable to the Christian character. The habit of communicating "experiences" I think to be very prejudicial to the mind. It is sometimes right to do this; in the majority of instances I believe it is not peculiar, and not right. Men thus dissipate religious impressions, and therefore diminish their effects. Such observation as I have enabled to make, has sufficed to convince me that, where the religious character is, there is but little religious talk; and where there is much talk, the religious character is superficial, and like other superfluities, is easily destroyed. And if these are attendants, and in part the consequences of general religious conversation, how peculiarly dangerous must that conversation be, which exposes those impressions that perhaps are designed exclusively for ourselves, and some of which may be frustrated by communicating them to others. Our solicitude should be directed to the invigoration of the religious character in our own minds; and we should be anxious that the plant of piety, if it has fewer branches might have a deeper root.—Dymond Essays.

3. I am often deeply pained on account of superficial ministry among us. True and sincere silence is too little known in many of our religious meetings. Sometimes when it seems to be something solid and weighty being said over a meeting, up starts one and another, and away it goes, to the wounding of those who love to feel more than to hear.

Simplicity.

For "The Friend."

When man walks in the Light as God is Light, and is in simplicity before his God, then he knows and feels the divine life in him. The thoughts and affections are in union with God. In simplicity of walking in the Light of the Redeemer is acceptance of the divine kingdom, hid from the prudent and wise, but revealed unto babes. The eye is single, and all is light in the child of Light. There are no questionings and no wonderings after secret things, because all things are made manifest in the Light to the soul which liveth of every word which proceedeth out of the mouth of God, and feeds on the tree of life. For the child of Light, living in simplicity in oneness with Christ, there is no desire after that knowledge which is not revealed by the Light, Grace and Spirit, coming from God. Many seeking souls have commenced to serve God in the Spirit, but have ended in the flesh; because they did not submit in simplicity to the all-truth-revealing Light; and would not submit to the thoroughly purifying and chaff-ddestroying, fiery baptisms of Christ, the great and true baptiser of his people; and because they lusted after an outward knowledge, which was not from the Spirit, and so being turned from the simplicity in Christ have built on a sandy foundation.

When the soul in simplicity of Light draws near to God in perfect faith and submission to Him and his will, then is known the supernatural unity with God, and the true peace which the world and worldly religion cannot give, and the spiritual eyes behold the everlasting glorious kingdom of God in righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit,—seeing what natural eyes have not seen,—and hearing what natural ears have not heard,—and realizing supernatural things which never entered into the natural mind of man,—and tasting the blessings of divine life prepared for those who truly love God.

In simplicity of the Light of Christ, God is all and everything to the obedient soul. And as God is Light, and in Him there is no darkness at all, so in the Light of Christ there is no darkness for the soul—the darkness is swallowed up by the immeasurable ocean of Light flowing from the Father of Light. There is a living in the paradise of God or heaven, inward, which is righteousness, peace and joy; and nothing can hurt a soul whose calling and election is made sure.

In the Light of Christ we therefore possess our salvation, having passed through the ministration of condemnation, and realizing the blood of the immaculate Lamb to sprinkle our consciences from dead works, to serve God in the newness of life. All is seen and judged by the Light, and access given to God and life, and resurrection obtained.

But without the Light is darkness. If the Light is rejected, and man feeds on the tree of knowledge, or the outward history of Christ and his blood, it has no efficacy to save from sin, without the Light.

Men may believe that Alexander the Great conquered several kingdoms, but it will not benefit them anything,—even if they seriously believed that he conquered these kingdoms for them, because they are not Alexander's heirs, officers or soldiers,—and just so, men have no benefit in believing in Christ and his sufferings, if they do not follow his Light, given them for antidote against sin and vanity, and suffer and die with Christ, and arise with Him, and have Him to rule over them, and so be partakers with Him in his kingdom—become joint heirs with Christ.

The outward knowledge of Christ and his work for mankind, may give a sort of satisfaction to the outwardly directed mind, when supported by imaginations, and stirred up by the carnal feelings and affections. But this cannot save the soul, unless man walks in the Light.

Consider the effects of music, that now-a-days seems to form a large part of the worship of some. Look, for instance, at a troop of horsemen coming along with music, and we will see its effects on both men and horses. See how proud the men look and how proudly the horses advance! And who can deny that there is a great effect on the natural feelings from music? Think of a battle-field—the great music—fire—rattling of guns—cryings and wailings of dying and wounded—blood and carnage,—there is wholesale murder and music! None can deny that music has a great power to raise the passions of the actors in that terrible drama!

But since a man must retire and sink deep into his own soul to find the precious pearl of salvation, and have communion with God and hear his voice; how greatly injurious is it to use the exciting sounds of music, which draw the attention from the inward power and Light of God in man, to the outward feelings? The many hymns and songs used by outward professors hinder them from coming to the true knowledge of God, by stirring up the religious passions of men, and drawing them off from the true life. Men beguiled by the serpent have departed from simplicity in Christ!

CHARLES SHIELDSTREAM.

Two Pictures from Heine.

In 1826, in Germany, Heine, in his full consciousness of strength, drew a picture of what his old age should be, and how he would sing his dying song:

"At last, the day will come when the fervor in my veins is extinguished, when Winter reigns in my heart and his white flakes fall but sparingly on mine head, and his mist is as a veil before my eyes. The old names have died away, and I myself am heard no more; honored still perhaps by few, by many despised, and loved by none. And boys with rosy cheeks come to me, and put the old harp in my trembling hand, and laughingly say: 'Thou hast long been silent, thou lazy greybeard, sing us again songs of the dreams of thy youth.'

"Then I take the harp, and the old joys and sorrows awake, the mists dissolve, tears bloom again from my dead eyes, there is spring again in my heart, tears of sweet regret tremble in the strings of my harp; I see once more the blue river, and the marble palaces, and the fair faces of women and maidens, and I sing a song of the flowers of Brenta.

"It will be my last lay. The stars will gaze upon me as in the nights of my youth, the enamored moonlight kisses once more my cheeks, the spirit choirs of dead nightingales are heard in the distance, my eyes close themselves in the intoxication of sleep, my soul dies away like the music of my harp,—there is a perfume in the flowers of Brenta."

"A tree shall hang over my tombstone. I should prefer a palm; but this thrives not in the North. It shall be a linden, and lovers shall sit there of a summer and caress. The greenfinch who listens and rocks himself in the branches is silent, and my linden sighs sadly above the heads of the happy ones, who are so happy that they find not time to read what is written upon the white headstone. But, afterwards, when the lover has lost his beloved, he will come again to the well-remembered linden, and sigh, and weep, and look long and often at the headstone, where he will read the inscription, 'He loved the flowers of Brenta.'"

The years passed. Experience cured the poet of some of his vagaries. Illness seized upon his frame, and stretched him for eight years in perpetual pain. Not only did he see many things in a different light than that in which they had appeared in his younger days, but in the paralysis of his body, his spirit attained a higher flight and sweetness. His "Hebrew melodies" he published in those last eight years; and in the preface of his volumes of poems, he makes the following recantation, which may serve as a companion-picture to the one already given:

"When we lie on our death-bed, we become very gentle and tender-hearted, and would willingly make peace with God and man. I confess I have scratched many, and bitten many, and been no lamb. But since I have stood in need of God's mercy I have made a truce with all my foes; many beautiful poems, which were directed against very high and very low persons, are for that reason excluded from the present collection. Poems which contained in any degree personalities against Almighty God, I have committed to the flames with the zeal of fear. It is better that the verses should burn than the vesifier. Yes, I have made peace with the Creator as well as with the creature, to the great displeasure of my enlightened friends, who reproach me for my relapse into the old superstition, as they are pleased to call my return to God. Others express themselves with still bitterer intolerance. Atheism's convocation has pronounced its anathema over me, and there are certain fanatical priests of unbelief who would willingly place me on the rack to make me renounce my heterodoxy. Happily, they have no instruments of torture at command except their writings. But I confess everything without torture. I have really returned to God, like the prodigal son, after feeding swine with the Hegelians for many years. The divine homesickness came upon me, and drove me forth, through woods and vales, over the dizziest mountain pathways of dialectic. On my way I found the God of the Pantheists, but I could make nothing of him. This poor visionary creature is interwoven with and grown into the world. Indeed, he is almost imprisoned in it, and yawns at you, without voice, without power. To have will, one must have personality, and to manifest one's self, one must have elbow room.—Jewish Messenger.

Without holiness, without a heart thoroughly purified from the stains of voluntary transgression, we may be assured that we shall not enter into the secrets of the most High; the hidden life will be hidden to us; and there will be many things in the Christian's privileges, more precious than rubies, which will never, in the present state of being, come within the range of our experience.—Upham.

Spurious Ministry—Speaking Smooth Things.

Wherever there is a fondness for speaking and hearing, there will be a danger that sound judgment will not be exercised, in suppressing forward, active persons, who would intrude themselves into this sacred office, (that of the ministry.) Hence a spurious ministry grows up, and the people love to have it so, rather than endure silence in our religious meetings. By this means, instead of being seasons of solemnity, imparting spiritual strength, the mind is vacant, uneasy, and listless. Many seem to be very ignorant of the nature of religious exercise; and the practice of thus assembling, is in danger of becoming a mere form. If the habit of public speaking without life is promoted, a multitude of such preachers may be spread over the Society, ministering death; and leading the members away from the place of true waiting and feeding, into a restless desire after words; which will never build any on the most holy faith, nor strengthen them against one sin. Such find that speaking smooth things pleases their hearers, who will caress them for their fair speeches, and extol them as fine preachers; while the true minister, who cannot flinch from speaking the truth, will feel that his testimony is not relished, and a secret prejudice is indulged against him. But there are in almost every meeting, some painful travellers, who understand the language of the Spirit, and rejoice to find others speaking the same thing, and walking in the same tribulated path. These will salute each other as brethren and sisters, and rejoice in the fellowship of the gospel; and a secret satisfaction is felt in having been instrumental in visiting the seed.—Journal of William Evans.

WHERE THERE'S A WILL THERE'S A WAY.

Though troubles perplex you,
Dishearten and vex you,
Retarding your progress in sombre array;
To shrink with terror
Is surely an error,
For where there's a will there's a way.
The task may be teasing,
The duty unpleasing,
But he who confronts it will soon win the day;
Half the battle is over
When once we discover
That where there's a will there's a way.
Misfortunes uncounted
Are often surmounted,
If only we quit not the field in dismay;
Then once more endeavor,
Remembering ever
That where there's a will there's a way.

THE DANDELION.

My childhood's earliest thoughts are linked with thee;
The sight of thee calls back the robin's song,
Who, from the dark old tree
Beside the door, sang clearly all day long,
And I, secure in early piety,
Listened as if I heard an angel sing
With news from heaven, which he did bring Fresh every day to my untainted years,
When birds and flowers and I were happy peers.
How like a prodigal doth Nature seem,
When thou, for all thy gold, so common art!
Thou teachest me to deem
More sacredly of every heart,
Since each reflects in joy its scanty gleam
Of heaven, and could some wondrous secret show,
Did we but pay the love we owe,
And with a child's undoubting wisdom look
On all the living pages of God's book.

THE CURE OF SORROW.

Silence is no certain token
That no certain grief is there;
Sorrow which is never spoken
Is the heaviest load to bear.

Seldom can the heart be lonely
If it seek a lonelier still,
Self-forgetting, seeking only
Brighter cups of love to fill.

Fruitless will not be the labor,
Evil to subdue with good;
Try to understand your neighbor,
And you will be understood.

THE HILLS.

The hills! the hills! when we hear those words, w
the joyous breeze
Sweep past us on its free, wild way, like the sou
stormy seas;
We tread once more with blithesome step o'er the peaks and dells,
Where fresh green moss like a velvet robe of beauty swells;
Again we see the gorgeous furze in its dress of a shine,
With the glowing heath and bright sundew, and sc
purple thyme;
And the rich pine-odors float around, as in ple
days of old,
When we deemed, at sunset's lovely time, each was a shaft of gold.

The hills! the hills! what painter's hand can show varied shades
That flit o'er their streams, and glens, and knolls
dewy fern-clad glades?
Each changing hue o'er their kingly brows li jewelled gift is cast,
As if some wondrous pageantry in glittering state past.
There are colors like the fading eve, the pomp of n

And the solemn gloom of purple skies in the majestic night!
And the sounds from their green solitudes, how and glad they seem—Clear bird-notes, and the hum of bees, and laug many a stream!

The hills! the hills! from their lofty heights radiant scenes we see—Fair sheltered valleys, fertile plains, and the fi gleaming sea;
We look on fields of harvest-wealth with their ben

On cities, hamlets, lordly halls, and shadowy fo

We see the ivied homesteads 'mid their mossy

With the blue smoke rising merrily to the clear arching sky:
And amid their low and daisied crofts, by sunlit
tures green,
And beneath the shade of bending trees white cot dwellings gleam!

The hills! the hills! they bring glad tales from the
of childhood back,
When we marked the royal eagle's flight, and troc
wild-deer track;
When we saw the storm-clouds gather, and the li

All beautiful they were to us, in sunlight and in gl
And when the white mist floated o'er the gliste

When we hear a young voice telling of the hills—

For "The Friend."

Such a Man has no Judgments Against Him."

The above remark, which I have ventured to make the caption of this article, was spoken by my presence concerning a man of considerable means, who, I believe, is a member of no religious society, and is one who is reputed to possess great business shrewdness. It being probable that I should be apprised of the solitary standing of this person, some indices of his aptness for profitable dealing, and what might be called "sharp practice," were given, my informant's summary of opinion respecting his solvency being, that "Such a man has no judgments against him." Nevertheless, I could but reflect, respecting him, whilst all the court-records would exhibit clear searches as to any adverse liens or judgments, there was a possibility (without saying any harsh estimate) that riches too easily acquired might deprive their possessor of blessings in this life, and likewise a judgment of condemnation, altogether immovable, at the bar of that awful tribunal at which all must appear.

It is written that "the blessing of the Lord, maketh rich, and He addeth no sorrow with it." Therefore it is that the man of business who possesseth the wisdom that is from above, and is not neglectful of the injunction to be diligent, will find himself controlled by an inward check or limitation, instructing him not so to amass worldly substance as that it comes that sore evil under the sun, which is seen by the Preacher, "namely, riches brought forth for the owners thereof to their hurt, and to the hurt of their precious offspring." We know that "he that trusteth in riches shall fall;" but, it is also added, "the righteous shall flourish as a branch." Hence, when these have been given to know that they possess a sufficient estate, they will not continue adding each recurring year's income to the principal, but will diligently look around them and consider how they may better serve the Lord with their substance—what manner they may most wisely apply the silver and the gold," which, He says, is mine." These desire to be preserved in any approach to the miserable end of that man of whom it was lately related that he had declared he would not be separated from his wealth, and that he died clutching the keys of his money-chests in his hands.

The curse which accompanies the pursuit of riches for their own sake, was perhaps more strikingly and speedily illustrated in the case of that well-known "merchant prince" of a neighboring city, who died a few years ago the possessor of millions, and whose mercantile and other enterprizes have now mostly come to naught. His poor remains stolen from their place of sepulture, the costly cathedral-mausoleum intended to perpetuate his name, will scarcely be the scene—with its ornate furnishing and elaborate services—where the aching burdens of the children of men will be lifted.

There seemed to be a great deal of instruction and warning for this generation, in the sentence lately produced before the Legislative Committee of Inquiry, of the State of New York, relative to stock and merchandize speculation, and especially concerning the speculating and dealing in what are styled "corners" and "futures." The definition of the latter, as stated by a notorious operator in those shadowy ventures, was, "buying what you don't want from a man who hasn't got it;" and yet, according to the authoritative testimony of the statistician of the New York Produce Exchange, "ninety per cent. of the sales at the Produce Exchange were for future delivery." How opposed to the truth is such falsification, and such dealing upon utterly wrong principles! And when one thus speculates in life's necessities, making gain his god, can it be said of him, however prosperous as to the outward his affairs may seem to be, that "such a man has no judgments against him?"

Contemplating this matter in its social and national aspects, and witnessing so little of sorrow for, and of turning away from, this offence, on the part of the many participants, one is led ardently to desire such a general restoration to the way of financial rectitude as we have account in the book of Nehemiah. "Also I shook my lap," is the record of this earnestly-concerned governor, "and said, So God shake out every man from his house, and from his labor, that performeth not this promise; even thus be he shaken out, and emptied. And all the congregation said, Amen, and praised the Lord. And the people did according to this promise."

Our beloved Society having been raised up for the holy purpose of maintaining the standard of pure and undefiled religion before the people, let none of us, forgetful of our high commission, waste time and energies in simply heaping up dollars for the sake of accumulation, or for self-satisfaction and love of ease, or for family pride and aggrandizement, lest gradually there be witnessed that pitiful transformation from the precious and heavenly to the vile and earthly which was the burden of the prophet's pathetic lamentation, "How is the gold become dim! how is the most fine gold changed! * * * The precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold, how are they esteemed as earthen pitchers, the work of the hands of the potter!" J. W. L.

The White Stone.

BY W. P. BREED.

The "white stone" played a singularly varied and curious part in ancient life. Among the Scythians this custom is said to have existed! The thoughtful man, at the close of the day, would question himself as to his conduct and thoughts since he left his bed in the morning, and, if the verdict was favorable, he would go to the urn kept for the purpose and drop into it a white stone; if unfavorable, a black stone. Then, at the close of a longer or shorter period, by comparing the number of white and black stones in the urn, he could see how his account stood with himself. This custom suggests a good lesson on the passage in Rev. ii. 17, where we read: "To him that overcometh will I give a white stone." If, at the end of life's day, Jesus give us, what else we could not have, a white stone for the urn, it were the same as his saying, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Or the white stone might be the tessera militaris. This was a white stone—it might be of earthenware, or marble, or alabaster, or hard mined material of almost any kind—used to convey the watchword of the day when an army was on the eve of battle. Upon it the watchword was engraved, and the stone was passed from hand to hand along the ranks, and read by each soldier as it passed. At the battle of Cunaxa, says Smith's Dictionary, the watchword was "Jesus the Saviour and Victory." In each case this was a white stone with a new name written which no man knew, saving he that received it. The enemy knew it not.

Again, the white stone might be the tessera frumentaria. This was a "white stone" on which a certain quantity of food or sum of money was specified, together with the name of the giver; a name known only to him who received it. And on the presentation of this stone to the steward of the giver, whatever was mentioned upon it, would be given in exchange for the stone. It was not uncommon for a victor, riding to the capitol in his chariot, to cause great numbers of these white stones to be thrown to the crowd. One fortunate enough to secure one of them might read on it: "Ten pounds of meal," or "Two bushels of corn," or "Five loaves of bread;" and the stone would entitle him to receive whatever was named upon it. And the Saviour may be conceived as giving to every sincere follower a white stone with his own name written upon it; and upon the stone is pledged to the holder every needed blessing in this life and in the life to come an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled and that fadeth not away.

In ancient trials, before the Prætor at Rome, the judges who sat with him were furnished each with a white and a black stone. At the conclusion of the pleadings on either side, proclamation of this fact was made, and then the judges deposited in the urn the black stone if he voted for condemnation, or the white stone if he voted for acquittal. If those for acquittal were in the majority, the Prætor announced the result, and it was said of the liberated man, "He has the white stone."

The tessera hospitalis, however, seems most fully to meet the conditions of the case. In ancient times, when travel was rare and strangers few, hospitality took the form of an "institution." In the houses of the more wealthy a separate part of the house, with an entrance of its own, was set apart especially for stranger guests. We may imagine a citizen of Athens to encounter in the street a venerable or comely looking stranger from Miletus. He invites him to his home. They become acquainted and, it may be, warmly attached to each other. When the time arrives for the stranger to depart, the host brings out a small white stone of marble or alabaster, oblong in shape, and on it each one writes his name, one on one end and the other on the other. The stone is then broken in two, the host retaining the part on which the name of the guest is written, and the guest the part on which is written the name of the host. They separate, each possessing a white stone with a new name written, which no one knoweth saving he that receiveth it. And now, not only these two persons, but their families and their posterity are bound by laws of hospitality which it is infamous to break.

Years roll by, and at length (say) a grandson of the Athenian sets out for a voyage to Miletus. Before his departure he will examine the contents of the tessera box for a stone having on it the name of some citizen of the city to which he goes, and he finds the one deposited there so many years ago. On the voyage he is shipwrecked, and reaches Miletus destitute of all but his tessera. He inquires for and finds the family of the one named on it, and claims the rites of hospitality. When asked upon what grounds he makes this claim he produces the tessera. The family examine their tessera box, and find a white stone, which, being fitted to the one brought by the stranger, shows indubitably that it was once a part of the same whole. The stranger is now admitted, and treated as an old friend of the household—a very comfortable termination of the disastrous voyage.

Let every church member examine himself, and see to it that the stone in his possession is genuine, and not a mere fancy, deceptive and illusory.

The Beauty of Holiness.

Occasionally we see people whose lives show very conspicuously the loveliness and sweetness that Divine Grace can produce in the human character. How such people attract us, not only to themselves but to that which has produced these effects in them! That it is Divine Grace which produces this loveliness of character we cannot doubt, as none have the fruits of the Spirit—love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness and temperance—without they have yielded to that power which alone can produce such fruits.

In reflecting on this subject, I have thought how important it is that those who profess the Christian religion should, by their lives, show what it can and will do for those who yield wholly to its influence. We are creatures of influence; whether we will or not, we cannot help being influenced by or influencing those around us; and if we do not show in our lives the fruits of the Spirit, we will hurt the cause of Christianity. There are many people who would gladly promote the cause of Truth, and yet hinder its spread by not exemplifying in themselves and by their lives, what it has done for them. True, we are all human, subject to the weaknesses and temptations flesh is heir to, but if those who make a profession of religion, instead of being loving, joyful, peaceful, gentle, meek and temperate, are fault-finding, contentious, unhappy and rude, will they not be likely to repel, rather than to draw, those with whom they come in contact, to the source of real happiness? I believe there are many in our own beloved Society, many good people whose earnest desire is not only to secure their own eternal peace, but to draw others to the Fountain of living water, who do not sufficiently show forth in their lives "The Beauty of Holiness." Not only in public, but in the domestic life of every follower of the meek and lowly Jesus, should the Christian graces shine with brightness; and they who in their daily life, no matter how retired, it may even be in the seclusion of a sick chamber, show the meekness, patience, gentleness and love that abide in the heart of a Christian, will have a great influence; an influence that will not be confined to the narrow limits the suffering body is confined to, but it will go out into the great world, causing many, perhaps, to seek for that which can bring such happiness and contentment to the suffering and afflicted.

Doubtless the zealous, tender-spirited Christian sees much around him in the world to grieve him; and many dispositions have a tendency to yield to discouragements; but should we not strive to not allow these to dwell with us too much, remembering that

He who created the cause is able to care for it, to keep it and promote it! And if we desire to help it we must endeavor in our daily and hourly walk, to show that the ways of holiness, like those of wisdom, are "ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace."

Sportsmen.

Would that those who are given to the sport (so-called) of shooting, often of wounding, and taking the life of birds and other animals—"dumb, but yet endued with eloquence that agonies inspire"—might be imbued with more of the tender Christian spirit of Thomas C. Upham, as represented in the following paragraph from his "Letters—Aesthetic, Social, and Moral:"—

"Travellers on the Nile frequently go ashore for the purpose of shooting. The sound of their guns was not pleasing to me. It seemed to me to be cruel. I cannot see the good sense, the humanity, or the religion, of taking away that life which God alone can give, for the gratification of a useless and momentary pleasure.* Hearing a gun one day, I looked up and saw a dove winging its way heavily towards the boat. Its slow, irregular motion attracted my attention. The blood dropped from its breast. It struggled, but still descended nearer and nearer to the water. Its strength failed. Its white plumage sank in the dark wave. Near Minieh a wounded eagle fell by the side of the boat, and was taken on the deck, and died. That dark struggling wing, now feeble in death, had power to climb the mountains. As the light faded from his dying eye, he seemed to utter a reproach, and to say that to destroy him thus was unworthy of man. I am not ashamed to say that I wept."

Election of the Archbishop of Canterbury.—The London correspondent of the Tribune in commenting on the election of Dr. Benson as Archbishop of Canterbury, quotes the caustic description of the process given long ago by Emerson.—

"The modes of initiation are more damaging than custom house oaths. The Bishop is elected by the Dean and Prebends of the cathedral. The Queen sends these gentlemen a congé d'élire, or leave to elect; but also sends them the name of the person whom they are to elect. They go into the cathedral, chant and pray, and beseech the Holy Ghost to assist them in their choice; and, after these invocations, invariably find that the dictates of the Holy Ghost agree with the recommendations of the Queen."

In early times, the right of choice rested, we suppose, with the Dean and Prebends. But Henry VIII. made the recommendation of the Crown obligatory upon the Chapter. The old forms were retained, but the substantial part was changed. If the Chapter should now refuse to elect the person signified in the licence, the canons would be liable to outlawry and imprisonment during the Royal pleas. Nor could they do anything more than receive their own protest by this refusal, for Crown has the right to appoint by letter patent twelve days after the refusal of Chapter.

* No doubt there was a clear distinction maintained in the mind of T. C. U., between the act of the sportsman who destroyed the life of animals for his pastime or mere amusement—which a Christian poet has termed "Detested sport"—and such as used the gun to procure, in this way, food for the support of themselves, their friends, or their families.

Before any one can really become Archbishop he has to be: 1, nominated; 2, elected; 3, confirmed; 4, enthroned. The nomination which practically makes him in the opinion of the public the second head of the Church (the Queen being first,) leaves him where was. Election does not seem much to improve his position. Confirmation confers upon him spiritual prerogatives. Enthronization gives him a right to his pay and completes the ceremonies by which he becomes fully entitled to perform archiepiscopal functions.

Probability of Life to Total Abstainers & Moderate Drinkers.—The law of averages exhibited in the experience of life assurance companies during the last forty years, triumphantly justified the temperance principle of total abstinence. Among serious & thoroughly well-informed persons debate over on this matter. When I was in London I took much pains to ascertain exactly facts as to the experience of British life assurance societies in making a distinction between moderate drinkers and total abstainers. I nearly half a century now many of the life assurance societies of England have insured moderate drinkers and total abstainers in separate sections, and a bonus has been paid to the sections made up of total abstainers—seven, thirteen, seventeen, and in some cases of twenty-three per cent. over that paid to the section of moderate drinkers.—Jos. C.

Unselfish training.—In many of the Friday schools connected with the Reform Episcopal Body, an effort has been made to teach the children that "it is more blessed to give than to receive." For three years past one of the largest of these schools has as Christmas season approached, referred the matter to the unbiased decision of the pupils whether the old custom should be followed of a Christmas tree loaded with presents to the scholars, or whether the children should themselves contribute to the aid and comfort of poor children.

Each year they have settled the matter in favor of giving rather than receiving, and the sum contributed in a single instance by the school of between six and seven hundred children amounted to fifteen hundred dollars.

Tin in Alabama.—It is reported that valuable deposits of tin-bearing rocks have been discovered near Ashland, Clay Co., Alabama. The tin is finely disseminated in gneiss rock. The ore is crushed and the metal extracted on the spot.

Tellurium in Copper Ore.—Some copper from Colorado, in which neither arsenic nor antimony were present, was purchased by a metallurgical firm, who were unable to refine it. When the copper was passed through rollers, cracks showed themselves, which came larger the more the copper was rolled until finally the cake of copper fell to pieces. When heated repeatedly the copper became covered with a white powder consisting of oxide of tellurium. The quantity of tellurium which produced such a decided effect, was less than one-tenth of a per cent.

Effects of Bacteria.—The peculiar poison of common poison-vine, swamp sumach, and other species of the genus Rhus, is now believed to be due to a species of small vegetable animalism, which has been named Micrococcus catus. They may be found in the interior of the stem as well as upon the leaves. Transferred to the human skin they multiply rapidly in number and set up the inflammation so well known.

Another species attacks the destructive cock-bug, so as in some seasons to sweep them away as with a pestilence.

Investigations on Contagious Diseases.—The French Minister of Agriculture has placed 1000 francs at the disposal of Pasteur to continue his admirable investigations upon contagious diseases of animals.

Fame Red-breast.—To the lady who sent this anecdote, I am indebted for several of my most interesting accounts of animal life. She does not wish her name to be mentioned, but it is well known throughout the literary world.

In the years 1864 and 1865, a robin made himself at home in my dining-room, always sitting at the window and tapping to have it opened at breakfast time. When he came in he shared my oat-meal porridge with me, sitting himself on the edge of the cup, and picking out such grains as caught his fancy. I then picked up crumbs of bread or toast, and when he had satisfied himself, he sat on the back of my chair and sang, or sometimes took himself to the top of a large screen. When he wished the window to be opened for him, he used to make a peculiar little noise, like any sound I ever heard from a bird—loud, but very much like articulate language.

As you may fancy, he was a great favorite with every one in the house. If the day was very cold, he always seated himself on the top of the fender as soon as he was let in, flapping out his feathers to receive the heat, and when he found that he was warm enough, he came to his breakfast.

During the summer of 1864, he came occasionally to the window, but seldom came and then only for a moment, though he would sometimes follow me out of doors. In the winter of 1864-5, he again established himself in the house, on his own familiar terms, and became even a greater pet than before. He then began to prefer the butter-plate to the porridge-cup for his breakfast. I never allowed him to take too much. He almost lived in the house, sometimes remaining all night when the weather was bad. When summer came round again, he appeared one day at the window with his wife and children, who sat on the ledge of the window while he entered and took food out of the bowl. It then came out that of late he had not been detected in carrying off food from the peacock's bowl which I kept in the dining-room; this food he had, doubtless, carried to the lady in her nest: the dining-room window, being mostly open in summer, gave him access to the bowl.

A sister-in-law of mine and her daughters used to stay with me just then, and to see the little red-breasts get their breakfast daily from their papa was one of our morning's amusements.

But, alas! one day, he came looking very red with his feathers puffed out, and looking much larger than his natural size. I observed that he swallowed large lumps of butter himself while helping his young ones. This went on for some days, and at last he did not make his appearance at all; his wife and family came without him, and then we knew that he must be dead."

The reason that the wife and family did not enter the house is evident to all who know the habits of the red-breast. It is one of the most jealous of birds, and never will allow another bird to enter the place of which it has pleased him to consider himself the owner. There can be little doubt, but that he had previously forbidden his family to enter the house where he felt himself a privileged inmate.—J. G. Wood.

A Covetous Man.—O monster of a man! that can take up the cross for covetousness and not for Christ.—W. Penn.

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 7, 1883.

In conversation, several years ago, with that wise elder, and estimable man, Alfred Cope, he mentioned that a young woman had gone over the Bible, and made from it a collection of texts, pointing out the peace, happiness and joy which attend the steps of him who is living in the fear of the Lord. After examining the sweet promises and blessed hopes thus grouped together; and which, if taken without reference to the unavoidable conflicts and baptisms which are to be endured, might paint the Christian's path as one of perpetual sun-shine and fair weather; Alfred Cope advised her again to take the sacred volume, and select from it those passages which speak of the trials, temptations and sore buffetings of which we must partake, as well as of the consolations of the Gospel. He thought, that the two collections of texts would enable her to form a more just conception of the real truth than she could obtain by dwelling exclusively on one of its aspects. She excused herself from following his suggestion, by saying that it was more agreeable to her tastes to look at the joys than the sorrows of life.

However pleasing may be the contemplation of uninterrupted comfort and pleasure, it is not the path marked out for us in this present world. The glorious hope set before us, of eternal felicity to those who, by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory and honor, so animated the apostle Paul, that he counted all things but loss, so that he might win Christ; and though he knew that bonds and afflictions awaited him wherever he went, yet none of these things moved him, "neither," said he, "count I my life dear unto myself, so that I may finish my course with joy." There have been thousands since his day, who, through the power of Divine Grace, have been made willing to lay aside every weight, and to run with patient endurance the race set before them; having their hearts so filled with the love of God, and the glorious prospect opened before them, as to willingly endure all the struggles and sufferings that they have to encounter. Many of these have felt a secret comfort in the soul-sustaining assurance that the trials and baptisms which they were enduring, were part of the dispensations allotted by their Heavenly Father for their refinement and preparation for the joys of his kingdom, of which at seasons, He is pleased to grant "large prelibation oft to saints below," tendering their hearts, filling them with a sense of his goodness, and causing them to overflow with love to others.

It is very evident, that in the wise ordering of the Ruler of the universe, no great object can be accomplished in this state of existence without toil, and struggle and self-denial. These are often hard to endure, however they may be sweetened by the hope of success, or by the consciousness of Divine approval in the efforts we are making. We cannot alter the Divine laws under which we live, and which are undoubtedly adapted to our mental and spiritual constitution. It would be wise therefore not to think too much upon the circumstances attending upon our passage through life, whether joyous or grievous, but to have our thoughts mainly directed to the accomplishment of the great object of life; which is, a preparation for admittance into the Kingdom of Heaven, through submission to the heart-changing power of God inwardly revealed. As to our temporal experiences, it is "not enjoyment and not sorrow" that we should mainly regard, but whether we are so walking in the Light of Christ, that "each to-morrow finds us further than to-day," on the road to the Heavenly Jerusalem.

In "The Friend" of 3d mo. 17th, a poem entitled "Home" has affixed to it the signature "R. G. A." It was probably taken from a book entitled "Gold and Frieze," compiled by R. G. Alsop. We are requested to state, that "It was not written by her, but by an author whose contributions appear in that work under the signature of 'L.'"

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The receipts of the Post-office Department for the fourth quarter of 1882 were $943,000 more than during the preceding quarter of the same year.

The total debt, less cash in the Treasury, on 4th mo. 1st, was $1,891,966,271, and the decrease during 3d mo. was $9,344,826. The amount of cash in the Treasury 4th mo. 1st, was $315,034,983.

During last week the number of immigrants landed at Castle Garden was 5568, against 13,598 corresponding week of 1882, a decrease of 8030. For the 3rd month the total was 28,091, against 40,691 in 1882, and since 1st mo. 1st, 49,652, against 68,685 for a like period in 1882. The explanation of the heavy falling off is that in the early months of last year the rates of passage on steamships and railroads were unusually low, and many then availed themselves of that advantage.

It is reported from Santa Fe that Lieutenant Thompson, with a body of the Fourth Cavalry, is in pursuit of the Indians in New Mexico, and will follow the hostiles into Mexico, the recent treaty giving him the right to do so. A despatch from Tucson, Arizona, says that Captain Dougherty, who is scouting the country, has orders from Gen. Crook to take no Indian prisoners.

A late despatch from Portland, Oregon, says the reports of Umatilla Indian hostilities are unfounded, and adds: "It is believed that the rumors of the movements of the Indians were circulated for the purpose of bringing on a commission, which would result in their removal and the throwing open of their reservation to land sharks."

The Senate of Delaware on the 29th ult., passed the Local Option bill favored by the State Temperance Alliance, but it is not expected to pass the House. A resolution to adjourn sine die on the 13th instant has passed both Houses.

The Tennessee Legislature passed an act making it a felony to keep gambling houses in that State, or to rent buildings for gambling purposes. The penalty is imprisonment for not less than one year, nor more than three years, in the penitentiary.

A telegram from St. Louis says that a number of capitalists of that city and New York have formed a company to build and operate an immense steel mill in Gunnison, Colorado. They have bought 2000 acres of land at Crystal Butte, twenty miles from Gunnison, the tract containing large and valuable deposits of iron and anthracite coal. The iron is said to be equal to the best in Missonri, the coal superior to the best in Pennsylvania. The mill, when finished, is to employ several thousand hands.

A large number of capitalists at Buffalo, New York, have petitioned the Common Council of that city to grant the right of way to build a tunnel under Niagara river, the city to receive 25 per cent. of the profits of the tunnel when completed.

The Wilmington Evening is informed by prominent fruit growers in the lower section of Delaware, that the peach buds have not been damaged by the storm of last week. Had the season been more advanced, there might have been damage to the crop.

Professor Sharpless, of Haverford College, says: "It is possible that we may soon be able to add to the bright comets of the last two years yet another, which can be seen by the naked eye. A comet of medium brilliancy appeared in 1812, which was found to be moving in an elliptic orbit. A recent computation brings it back to us in the fall of 1884, but as a margin of two or three years on either side is permitted for uncertain data, we may have it at any time."

The Public High School in Hartford, Connecticut, is to have a new equatorial telescope with an object glass nine and one-third inches in aperture. This will be one of the most powerful glasses in the country.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 425, which was five more than during the previous week, and 14 less than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number, 211 were males, and 214 females: 67 died of consumption; 48 of pneumonia; 22 of old age; 20 of typhoid fever; 17 of convulsions; 14 of diphtheria and 13 of croup.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 104½; 3½'s 104; 4½'s, coupon and registered, 113½; 4's, registered, 119½; coupon, 120½; currency 6's 129 to 132.

Cotton.—There was very little movement, but prices were unchanged. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 10¾ cts. per pound for nplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 8½ a 8¾ cts. for export, and 9½ a 9¾ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour was in fair demand and prices were steady. Sales of 2200 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.50 a $6.50; Pennsylvania family at $5; western do. at $5.50 a $6.25, and patents at $6.25 a $8. Rye flour is steady at $3.75 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was unsettled and rather easier. Sales of 4200 bushels red, in car lots at $1.16 a $1.23. Rye is nominal. Corn is fairly active and firmer. Sales of 12,000 bushels rejected and yellow, in car lots, at 61 a 66 cts. Oats are quiet and barely steady. Sales of 9000 bushels, in car lots, at 51½ a 55 cts., the latter for No. 1.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 3d mo. 31st, 1883.—Loads of hay, 231; loads of straw, 40. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 90 cts. to $1.00 per 100 pounds; mixed, 85 a 95 cts.; straw, 60 a 70 cts.

Beef cattle were a fraction higher: 2400 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5¾ a 7¼ cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were in demand and prices were a fraction higher: 9000 head arrived and sold at 4¾ a 7¾ cts., and lambs at 4 a 6 cts. per pound, as to condition.

Hogs were firmly held: 2800 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 10½ a 11½ cts. per pound, as to quality.

FOREIGN.—A man named Dennis Deasy, a resident of Cork, was arrested in Liverpool on the 29th ult. He was carrying a box containing explosives. Another man named Patrick Flanagan, an Irish railway porter, was also arrested on the suspicion that he was an accomplice. On the 31st they were arraigned for trial. At Flanagan's lodgings a variety of explosives were discovered, besides a revolver, false beard and other equipments for dynamite war and disguise. The most interesting evidence given during the examination was that of expert scientific witnesses, who testified that the explosive material in question was known as "lignine dynamite," an article that could not by any possibility be connected with commercial or business transactions, and which was not made for any legitimate purpose. Flanagan interrupted the proceedings with the pointed question, "It is material similar to what shook the House of Commons, is it not?" The prisoners were remanded for a week.

Judge Lawson has sentenced twelve of the members of the Armagh Assassination Society, who were recently convicted of conspiracy to murder, to terms of penal servitude, varying from five to ten years.

One hundred and fifty persons have left the Island of Achill, County Mayo, on the west coast of Ireland, and sailed for America on the steamer Nestorian. They were driven away from their homes by famine.

Reports from the Scottish coast say that a terrific and destructive gale has visited that section. Three vessels have gone ashore in the vicinity of Aberdeen. There are no reports of loss of life as yet. Damage to property, however, is considerable.

Leon Say, speaking at Lyons, strongly advocated the opening of fresh outlets for commerce, which, he said, would be of more advantage to France than protection. France should keep in close rapport with her offshoots abroad, and even with those not now under the tricolor.

Advices from Tozer, Tunis, say that Count de Lesseps has arrived in that place. He says his explorations make it plain that the inland sea in the desert of Sahara which he has been advocating is practicable, and that it can be accomplished by using one hundred excavating machines, equal in their aggregate capacity to the labor of a hundred thousand men.

In many parts of Spain farming operations have made little or no progress since the expulsion of the Moors. The same sort of plow is used now as then, oxen tread out the corn after the ancient Oriental fashion, and women separate the chaff from the corn by tossing the grain up in the air during a breeze of wind.

The craters of Mount Etna are again in a state of activity. The rumblings of the volcano are frequent, and signs of an earthquake are becoming more evident.

A special despatch from Trebizond to the Daily News confirms the statement that the Russians are preparing to occupy Armenian territory.

An exhibition of marine products and fishing implements was opened in Tokio, Japan, on the 1st instant. "Fifteen thousand varieties of fish and other productions from sea, lake and river" were displayed.

It is reported that extensive deposits of gold and silver have been discovered on the northern end of Vancouver's Island.

Two steamers have arrived at St. Johns, Newfoundland, one with 16,000 old seals, the other with 27,000 young ones. Eight steamers are already loaded at the fisheries, and an unusually good season is expected.

The Annual Meeting of "Temperance Association of Friends," will be held on Fourth-day evening, 4th mo. 18th, at 8 P. M., at Meeting-house, 12th St. below Market. The attendance of Friends generally is respectfully invited.

THOMAS SCATTERGOOD, Chairman.

FRIENDS' FREEDMEN'S ASSOCIATION OF PHILADELPHIA AND ITS VICINITY.

The Annual Meeting of "The Contributors," will be held in the Committee-room of Arch Street Meeting-house, on Second-day evening, 4th mo. 16th, 1883, at 8 o'clock.

Friends who are interested in the cause, and others, are invited to attend.

The Fourteenth Annual Meeting of the Indian Aid Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, will be held in Arch Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia, on Fifth-day, 4th month 19th, 1883, at 8 P. M. Friends generally are invited to attend.

RICHARD CADBURY, Clerk.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The SUMMER SESSION opens on THIRD-DAY, 5th mo. 1st, 1883. Parents and others who intend sending pupils, are requested to make early application to JONATHAN G. WILLIAMS, Supt., Westtown P. O., Chester Co., Pa.; or to CHARLES J. ALLEN, Treas'r, No. 304 Arch St., Philadelphia.

Arrangements have been made by which Friends attending the Yearly Meeting can be furnished with simple meals, both before and after the sittings of the meeting, at moderate charge (15 cents), in the second-story of the central part of the Arch St. Meeting-house. Meals will also be furnished for those attending the Meeting for Sufferings and Select Meeting, the preceding week.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE, Near Frankford, (Twenty third Ward,) Philadelphia. Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M.D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board of Managers.

DIED, on the 24th of 12th mo. 1882, at his residence in Bristol, Penna., NATHAN D. ROBERTS, in the 67th year of his age, a member of Fallsington Monthly Meeting. He was esteemed by all who knew him for integrity of character and upright walk amongst men. He endured a protracted and suffering illness with great fortitude and Christian resignation. His friends have the comforting belief that his end was peace.

—, on the 3rd of 2nd mo. 1883, MARY ANN WOOD, daughter of Horatio C. Wood, a member Philadelphia Monthly Meeting, in the 50th year of age. This dear Friend was called to pass more than twenty years, almost entirely in the quiet seclusion of her chamber, in consequence of an aggravated spinal disease; with frequent weeks of utter prostration and acute suffering. But she was enabled to magnify Divine Grace by a cheerful patience, instructive to those who were privileged to be with her; for early in life Saviour became precious to her through his forgiving and redeeming love. About seven months before her decease, it was given her to understand that the gracious words "I am the Lord that healeth thee," she must accept in their literal meaning; that his time had come to raise her up from the feebleness which had so long pressed her; and after a season of deep baptism known to but few, to make her willing to resign herself into his hand, his strength was made perfect in her weakness, and in simple trust in Him she went forth from her chamber to take her place in the family circle and was even enabled to walk and drive as she had done for twenty-one years—calling upon those who deeply sympathized with her, to "magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt his name together," "who giveth all thine iniquities: who healeth all thy diseases who redeemeth thy life from destruction: who crowneth thee with loving-kindness and tender mercies," say again and again, "It is the Lord's doings and marvelous in our eyes." She spoke with tenderest feelings of the renewal of the Holy Spirit which had been mercy granted her, and showed to those about her fresh dedication of her humbled spirit—her voice "countenance bewraying her that she had been a Jesus." This anointing, however, was soon found to be but a preparation for deeper trials; and in little more than a month the sudden removal by death of her loved mother, was a great shock to her feeble frame and not long after a new form of disease manifested itself, which brought her, with intense bodily suffering to the valley of the shadow of death; but she was able to walk through that valley without fear, for the Lord was with her, and his rod and his staff comforted her; and her friends have the joy of believing that is now fully "satisfied in awaking in his likeness."

—, at his residence in Pennsville, Lycoming Co., Pa., on the 11th of 2nd mo. 1883, THOMAS MEND HALL, in the 87th year of his age, a member of Monthly Meeting. This dear Friend was warmly attached to the principles of our Society; and his judgment, with an amiable, sympathizing temperament, peculiarly qualified him to fill the station of elder, which position he occupied, to the comfort and satisfaction of his friends, nearly fifty years; and has gathered, we reverently believe, to his heavenly inheritance, "in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in his season."

—, on the 27th of 2nd month, at her residence near Camden, New Jersey, LYDIA, widow of Benjamin W. Cooper; in the 78th year of her age, member of Haddonfield Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, on the 1st of 3rd month, at her residence Moorestown, N. J., JANE, wife of Amos Roberts, in 81st year of her age, a member of Chester Monthly Meeting, N. J.

—, on the 11th of 3rd month, TRUMAN COOPER, member and elder of London Grove Monthly Meeting, Pa., in the 74th year of his age.

—, at Rahway, N. J., on the 14th of 3rd mo. 1883, SIDNEY WILSON, wife of Joel Wilson, in the 7th year of her age, a highly esteemed and consistent member and overseer of Rahway Preparative and Rahway Plainfield Monthly Meeting of Friends. It is believed that the following scripture is truly applicable to her: "Thou hast also given me the shield of thy vocation, and thy right hand hath holden me up, and gentleness hath made me great; thou hast enlarged steps under me, that my feet did not slip."

—, on the 17th of 3rd month, SUSANNA J., wife James P. Cooper, in the 66th year of her age, a member of New Garden Monthly Meeting of Friends, Pa.

—, on 23rd of 3rd month, at Harrisburg, PEN ELIZABETH D., wife of Thomas J. Edge, in the 4th year of her age, a member of London Grove Monthly Meeting of Friends.

The first letter of W. S., as presented by MSS., is to M. T.,* and dated 12th mo., 1822, being as follows: "The correspondence which has so long ceased to exist between us, has not been for want of a thought-remembrance on my part; but from a fear of many of those letters which are written solely in the name of friendship, are too often filled with matters which are not calculated to produce any permanent benefit, but often to draw the mind into a belief that those things which are professed, stand on a firmer foundation than the reality would warrant. When I look back upon my past life, my conversation, my thoughts, my actions, I am ashamed. Thou mayest wonder that I write thus; but when, I say, I look back and confess that I have walked so long after the flesh, heedless of the reproofs of him who speaks from above—following my corrupt inclinations and passions, and veiling all cloaking these with the mask of piety—I am in amazement at the long-remembered merciful kindness of an Omnipotent Father. * * *

I am with feelings, I trust, of heartfelt gratitude, that I acknowledge the merciful condescension of the ever gracious Lord who has pleased to arouse me, I hope effectually, from this state of torpid uselessness, and called by his grace which purifies the heart, to obtain an inheritance in that city which hath foundations, whose maker and builder God is. Whether I shall persevere to the end, or if some of tribulation make shipwreck of faith, I do not know; but by trusting in that fountain of light and life in which alone is lasting strength, I hope, humbly hope, I have made a fit vessel for the house of the Lord, though occupying the lowest place therein; for 'I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of the Lord, than dwell in the streets of wickedness.'

I am as yet a novice in the mysteries of the Kingdom; but enough has been shown me to satisfy my eyes, and I can say: 'Thou art faithful, O my love, as Tirzah; comely as —this, no doubt, was Mary Tatum; then living with her parents at Woodbury; who was afterwards the wife of John Mickel Whitall—a cousin with whom he was associated when young.

Jerusalem; terrible as an army with banners.' O, may my future walking through life be pure, as my former has been impure! And may the beams of heavenly radiance so far enlighten the dark chambers of my heart that Zion may put on her beautiful garments; that henceforth there shall no more enter therein the uncircumcised or unclean. I am sincerely desirous that I may not be found sounding a false alarm, and that those things which I do desire may be my experience; may, through faithfulness on my part, be sanctified unto me by the washing of regeneration; and that, purified and cleansed from the defilements of the world, I may be qualified to go forth a faithful standard bearer in the armies of the living God. May I be permitted to address thee in the language of the prophet: 'Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and He will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths.' I often feel myself led to desire the preservation of those who are young like myself; and to crave at the footstool of mercy that those to whom I am joined by the double tie of consanguinity and friendship, may grow in the grace and truth which is in Jesus Christ our Lord. And I am sometimes, through faith, led to believe that many will be gathered from the highways and hedges of the world to bear their testimony to the goodness of Him who is the leader and supporter of those who humbly and reverently trust in the shadow of his wing."

To the same.

"6th mo. 4th, 1823.

* * * I am exceedingly desirous that nothing that I may have done or may do, may tend in the least to render those who have been my sincere friends either shy or reserved towards me; but, on the contrary, that the bond of friendship may be more and more strengthened, and that those social affections which are the bond of civil society may not be laid entirely waste, although rendered subservient to religion. There are some who conceive that religion is incompatible with the pursuits, even though lawful, of this stage of existence; but this appears to me to be an erroneous idea. Although we are to keep ourselves unspotted from the world, yet as long as we are in the world we are allowed the exercise of those faculties with which we are endowed, when kept within the bounds of moderation by the regulating principle of light and grace. With these views I shall still continue to desire the preservation of that harmony and good feeling which I trust has subsisted between us; and also to wish that we may be led into closer union and connexion—into true gospel fellowship, which is beautifully expressed by the apostle as the 'bond of peace.'"

The limited sphere of action in which it is my lot to move, denies me the opportunity of seeing, knowing, or enjoying many of the refined enjoyments of the more polished circles; and also debars me from the view even of many of the miseries to which my fellow beings are subject. The latter circumstance I regret far more than the former. The benefits which result from scenes of misery and distress are more essentially useful in their nature, more salutary to the heart, and promote more effectually the permanent interests of the soul, than any of the smooth paths of life could suggest or produce. They are calculated to draw the mind out of that habitual listlessness into which it is too apt to fall when not aroused by something which presses immediately upon its interests or its happiness. It calls to action; it calls forth the sympathies and the energies of the mind; and points to the line of difference there is between our own situation and those who are the sad subjects of famine, misery and disease, and calls upon us in our more favored positions, to render to Him from whom all true blessings flow, that thanksgiving which is in this view of things particularly needful.

These reflections have been suggested by my having been called upon to attend frequently the bed-side of a poor sick man, who has now passed from this to another state of existence. I furnished him with some few articles, in order to render him more comfortable, and to smoothe the pathway to the grave. * * * In looking round upon the children of penury and want, I have been led to exclaim, 'Not more than others I deserve, yet God has given me more;' and sincere desires that I might be found grateful for the unmerited blessings which are showered upon me, have been renewed in my heart day by day. We cannot fully appreciate our blessings unless we compare them with the privations of others. And if we were more frequently to consider the situation of forsaken orphans, or children of dissolute parents, we might be better qualified to look upon our different lot with an unprejudiced eye. I cannot avoid referring to another circumstance which has claimed my attention in my little adventure which, though not necessarily connected with poverty, is often an attendant upon it—I mean the want of an affectionate nurse, a sympathizing friend, who can soothe the sad hours of affliction and soften the pangs of disease or pain. * * * The wife of the invalid to whom I have referred is a sad instance of the evils which (sometimes) attend degradation and ignorance. Instead of the kind and soothing language of soft affection, I heard nothing but the reproaches of indifference; the look of dismal dislike was the substitute for love; and instead of the cordial of kindness to mitigate the distresses of her husband, the dram bottle was provided for her own debauchery. But the reverse of this is what forms the truest element of female character. 'Tis theirs to call to life the dormant energies of the body when just sinking into non-existence; by enlivening the mind by assiduous attention; by affectionate and tender sympathy; and by all those arts which none but themselves can practise, and which none can appreciate but those who have been the subjects of their care.

I have thought that if I was half so often in thy remembrance as thou art in mine, I should be favored with a letter at shorter intervals than has for some time past intervened between thy communications. A desire often occurs that thou with myself might be found walking under the banner and ensign of the cross of Christ. It is a glorious standard, my friend, to fight under; and a victory gained in this cause is worth more than fields of blood, or laurels stained by the blood of thousands of human beings. It is worth every faculty we possess to be found among the militant church of the Lamb; to be found pressing forward in the glorious cause of Christian liberty, and following Christ, the Captain of our salvation, through every bitter trial. Such pursuits as this afford the most solid satisfaction, which mortal man in this stage of existence could ask. They are above every earthly consolation, and they afford feelings which the world and all its fascinations can neither give nor take away. Could we attain to this state of mind, could we so far cast aside every temptation, and every foolish though glittering foible which dazzles the eye, could every thought and every word and every action be brought into obedience, there would be a precious unity felt far surpassing that natural affection which binds the worldly-minded together. It would be a band unbroken by any unpleasant attendant, and of which the Lord himself is the portion and the cause. To Him would the aspirations of gratitude often, yes constantly ascend; and our hearts, sanctified through his grace, would be fit receptacles, and would indeed be inhabited by the great and holy One of Israel.

The Removal of the Acadians.

Acadia, now called Nova Scotia, was the oldest French colony in North America. There the Bretons had built their dwellings sixteen years before the Pilgrims reached the shores of New England.

By the Treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, Acadia was ceded to Great Britain, but the old inhabitants, says Bancroft, "remained on the soil which they had subdued, hardly conscious that they had changed their sovereign. They still loved the language and the usages of their forefathers, and their religion was graven upon their souls. They promised submission to England; but such was the love with which France had inspired them, they would not fight against its standard or renounce its name. Though conquered, they were French neutrals.

"For nearly forty years from the peace of Utrecht they had been forgotten or neglected, and had prospered in their seclusion. No tax-gatherer counted their folds, no magistrate dwelt in their hamlets. The parish priest made their records and regulated their successions. Their little disputes were settled among themselves, with scarcely an instance of an appeal to English authority at Annapolis. The pastures were covered with their herds and flocks; and dikes, raised by extraordinary efforts of social industry, shut out the rivers and the tide from alluvial marshes of exuberant fertility. The meadows, thus reclaimed, were covered by richest grasses, or fields of wheat, that yielded fifty and thirty fold at the harvest. Their houses were built in clusters, neatly constructed and comfortably furnished, and around them all kinds of domestic fowls abounded. With the spinning-wheel and the loom, their women made, of flax from their own fields, of fleeces from their own flocks, coarse, but sufficient clothing. The few foreign luxuries that were coveted could be obtained from Annapolis or Louisburg, in return for furs, or wheat, or cattle.

"Thus were the Acadians happy in their neutrality and in the abundance which they drew from their native land. They formed, as it were, one great family. Their morals were of unaffected purity. Love was sanctified and calmed by the universal custom of early marriages. The neighbors of the community would assist the new couple to raise their cottage, while the wilderness offered land. Their numbers increased, and the colony, which had begun only as the trading station of a company, with a monopoly of the fur-trade, counted, perhaps, sixteen or seventeen thousand inhabitants."

As the English colonists increased in Nova Scotia, the position of the Acadians became more insecure. "Ignorant of the laws of their conquerors, they were not educated to the knowledge, the defence, and the love of English liberties; they knew not the way to the throne, and, given up to military masters, had no redress in civil tribunals. Their papers and records, the titles to their estates and inheritances, were taken away from them. Was their property demanded for the public service? 'they were not to be bargained with for the payment.' The order may still be read on the Council records at Halifax. They must comply, it was written, without making any terms, 'immediately,' or 'the next courier would bring an order for military execution upon the delinquents.' And when they delayed in fetching firewood for their oppressors, it was told them from the governor, 'If they do not do it in proper time, the soldiers shall absolutely take their houses for fuel.' The unoffending sufferers submitted meekly to the tyranny. Under pretence of fearing that they might rise in behalf of France, or seek shelter in Canada, or convey provisions to the French garrisons, they were directed to surrender their boats and their firearms; and, conscious of innocence, they gave up their barges and their muskets, leaving themselves without the means of flight, and defenceless. Further orders were afterwards given to the English officers, if the Acadians behaved amiss to punish them at discretion; if the troops were annoyed, to inflict vengeance on the nearest, whether the guilty one or not,—'taking an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth.'"

The breaking out of hostilities between the English and French nations filled the cup of distress of these poor people to overflowing. They were willing to take an oath of fealty to England, but refused to pledge themselves to bear arms against France. It was determined that they should be carried away into captivity to other parts of the British dominions. "They have laid aside all thought of taking the oaths of allegiance voluntarily; thus in August, 1754, Lawrence, the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia, had written of them to Lord Halifax. 'They possess best and largest tract of land in this province if they refuse the oaths, it would be no better that they were away.'"

"The inhabitants of Minas and the adjacent country pleaded with the British officers: the restitution of their boats and their promising fidelity, if they could but retain their liberties, and declaring that not the use of arms, but their conscience, should engage them not to revolt. 'The memorial,' Lawrence in council, 'is highly arrogant, sidious, and insulting.' The memorialist his summons, came submissively to Halifax. 'You want your canoes for carrying provisions to the enemy:' said he to them, though knew no enemy was left in their vicinity. 'Guns are no part of your goods,' he continued, 'as by the laws of England all Roman Catholics are restrained from having arms, and are subject to penalties if arms are found in their houses. It is not the language of British subjects to talk of terms with crown, or capitulate about their fidelity or allegiance. What excuse can you make for your presumption in treating this government with such indignity, as to expound to the nature of fidelity? Manifest your obedience, by immediately taking the oath of allegiance in the common form before council.'

"The deputies replied that they would as the generality of the inhabitants should determine; and they merely entreated leave to return home and consult the body of the people.

"The next day, the unhappy men, foreboding the sorrows that menaced them, offered to swear allegiance unconditionally; but they were told that by a clause in a British statute persons who have once refused the oaths could not be afterwards permitted to take them, but are to be considered as Popish Recusants, and as such they were imprisoned.

"The chief justice, on whose opinion hung the fate of so many hundreds of innocent families, insisted that the French inhabitants were to be looked upon as confirmed rebels who had now collectively and without exception become 'recusants.' Besides: they counted in their villages 'eight thousand souls, and the English not more than 'thirty thousand;' they stood in the way of 'the progress of the settlement;' 'by their non-compliance with the conditions of the treaty of Utrecht, they had forfeited their possessions to the crown;' after the departure of the French and troops the province would not be in a condition to drive them out.' 'Such a juncture as the present might never occur,' so advised 'against receiving any of the French inhabitants to take the oath,' and for the removal of 'all' of them from the province."

"To hunt them into the net was impracticable; artifice was therefore resorted to. a general proclamation, on one and the same day, the scarcely conscious victims, 'both old and young men, as well as all the lads ten years of age,' were peremptorily ordered to assemble at their respective posts. On the appointed fifth of September, [1755] they obeyed. At Grand Pré, for example, five hundred and eighteen unarmed men came together. They were marched into the church and its avenues were closed, when Winslow the American commander, placed himself at their centre, and spoke:—

"You are convened together to manifest

you his majesty's final resolution to the French inhabitants of this his province. Your lands and tenements, cattle of all kinds, and stock of all sorts, are forfeited to the crown, and you yourselves are to be removed from this his province. I am, through his majesty's goodness, directed to allow you liberty to carry off your money and household goods, in as many as you can, without discommoding the vessels you go in. And he then declared in the king's prisoners. Their wives and families shared their lot; their sons, five hundred and twenty-seven in number, their daughters, five hundred and seventy-six; in the whole, women and babes and old men and children all included, nineteen hundred and thirty-three souls. The blow was sudden; they had left home but for the morning, and they never were to return. Their cattle were stay unfed in the stalls, their fires to die on their hearths. They had for that first even no food for themselves or their children, and were compelled to beg for bread. The tenth of September was the day for the embarkation of a part of the exiles. They were drawn up six deep, and the young men, five hundred and sixty-one in number, were ordered to march first on board the vessel. They could leave their farms and cottages, the shady rocks on which they had reclined, their herds and their garners; but nature turned within them, and they would not be separated from their parents. Yet of what avail was the frenzied despair of the unarmed youth? They had not one weapon; the bayonet drove them to obey; and they marched heavily and heavily from the chapel to the shore, between women and children, who, kneeling, prayed for blessings on their heads, and themselves weeping, and praying, and singing hymns. The seniors went next; the women and children must wait till other transport vessels arrive. The delay had its horrors. The wretched people left behind, were crowded together near the sea, without proper food, or raiment, or shelter, till other ships came to take them away; and December with its appalling cold, had struck the shivering, clad, broken-hearted sufferers, before the greater number of them were removed. 'The embarkation of the inhabitants goes on but slowly,' wrote Monckton, from Fort Cumberland, near which he had burned three hamlets; 'the greater part of the wives of the men we have prisoners are gone off with their children, in case I would not send off their husbands without them.' Their hope was vain. Near Annapolis, a hundred heads of families fled to the woods, and a party was detached on the coast to bring them in. 'Our soldiers hate us,' wrote an officer on this occasion, 'and they can but find a pretext to kill them, if they will.' Did a prisoner seek to escape? he was shot down by the sentinel. Yet some fled to Quebec; more than three thousand had been drawn to Miramichi, and the region south of the Ristigouche; some found rest on the banks of the St. John's and its branches; some found a lair in their native forests; some were miserably sheltered from the English in the swamps of the savages. But seven thousand of these banished people were driven on board ships, and scattered among the English colonies, from New Hampshire to Georgia;—a thousand and twenty to South Carolina alone. They were cast ashore without resources; hating the poor-house as a shelter for their offspring, and abhorring the thought of selling themselves as laborers. Households, too, were separated; the colonial newspapers contained advertisements of members of families seeking their companions, of sons anxious to reach and relieve their parents, of mothers mourning for their children.

"The wanderers sighed for their native country; but, to prevent their return, their villages, from Annapolis to the isthmus, were laid waste. Their old homes were but ruins. In the district of Minas, for instance, two hundred and fifty of their houses, and more than as many barns, were consumed. The live stock which belonged to them, consisting of great numbers of horned cattle, hogs, sheep and horses, were seized as spoils, and disposed of by the English officials. A beautiful and fertile tract of country was reduced to a solitude. There was none left round the ashes of the cottages of the Acadians but the faithful watch-dog, vainly seeking the hands that fed him. Thickets of forest-trees choked their orchards; the ocean broke over their neglected dikes, and desolated their meadows.

"Relentless misfortune pursued the exiles wherever they fled. Those sent to Georgia, drawn by a love for the spot where they were born as strong as that of the captive Jews, who wept by the side of the rivers of Babylon for their own temple and land, escaped to sea in boats, and went coasting from harbor to harbor; but when they had reached New England, just as they would have set sail for their native fields, they were stopped by orders from Nova Scotia. Those who dwelt on the St. John's were torn once more from their new homes. When Canada surrendered, hatred with its worst venom pursued the fifteen hundred, who remained south of the Ristigouche. Once those who dwelt in Pennsylvania presented a humble petition to the Earl of Loudoun, then the British commander-in-chief in America; and the cold-hearted peer, offended that the prayer was made in French, seized their five principal men, who in their own land had been persons of dignity and substance, and shipped them to England, with the request, that they might be kept from ever again becoming troublesome by being consigned to service as common sailors on board ships of war."

Baneroft adds: "I know not if the annals of the human race keep the record of sorrows so wantonly inflicted, so bitter and so perennial, as fell upon the French inhabitants of Acadia."

"The Deepest Waters Stillest Run."

Humility ranks among the prominent graces of the Christian character. As the roar of the stream or river indicates shallowness rather than depth of waters; so the boasting of man indicates shallowness in those things of which he boasts. The man who is truly rich in this world's goods seldom refers to his vast possessions. The true physician does not seek to introduce himself to the public by long and flaming advertisements, his real advertisement being in deeds and not in words. Those who boast of the possession of knowledge and wisdom, or of aught else, may well be suspected of not having all that they claim to possess. Says Wisdom: "Let another man praise thee and not thine own mouth: a stranger, and not thine own lips."

Our spiritual strength lies in the heart, in the power of Christ revealed there, filling it with love to God and man; and is not to be measured by the strength of the vocal organs in preaching, praying, testimony and singing, for these may be thus exercised while the heart yet remains carnal. There are some whose "strength" seems to consist in religious excitement, in continued bodily prostration and other outward manifestations, which bespeak a diseased state of mind and body, rather than any superiority of Divine grace. The power of religion in the soul does often affect the body, as was often experienced in the tremblings visible in the meetings of our early Friends; yet there are manifestations not of the Lord, which if persisted in may drift into fanaticism or religious mania.

The object of this article is to caution those who may have confided too much in man's boast of religious attainments. "Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God." Reject not all of religion because of counterfeits. Counterfeits prove the existence of the genuine thing. Know every tree by its fruits and not by its leaves, and every river by its depth rather than by its noise. O. A. PRATT.

Greene, N. Y., 3d mo. 6th, 1883.

Every-Day Duties.

An element of weakness in many of our desires for better life and larger usefulness is that we think of great and perhaps impossible attainments, and overlook the simple things that lie within our reach. No violent, overstrained exertions are necessary to a noble life, no superhuman efforts and achievements—nothing but every-day duty faithfully done. The most of us must be content to live what are regarded as common-place lives, without attracting the attention of the world, or winning the laurels of fame. We must, for the greater part, devote ourselves to the duties that spring out of our ordinary business, social and domestic relations. The pressure of life's necessities is so great that we cannot often turn aside to do things that lie outside of our common calling. Whatever service we render to Christ must be rendered in and along the line of these relations, and while we are busied in the imperative duties which every day brings to our hands.

It is just at this point that many fail. They spend all their life seeking for the place in this world which they were intended to fill. They never settle down to anything with any sort of restful or contented feeling. They have a lofty ideal of a very brilliant life, to which they would like to attain, in which their powers would find full scope, and where they could achieve great things. But in their present condition, with its limitations, they can accomplish nothing worthy of their powers. So they go on discontented with their lot and sighing for another; and while they sigh the years glide away, and soon they will come to the end to find that they have missed every opportunity of doing anything worthy of an immortal being in the passage from time to eternity.

The truth is, one's vocation is never some far-off possibility; it is always the simple round of duties that the passing hour brings. Some one has pictured the days as coming to us with their faces veiled; but when they have passed beyond our recall the draped figures become radiant, and the gifts we rejected are seen to be treasures fit for kings' houses. No day is commonplace if only we had eyes to see its splendor. There is no duty that comes to our hand but brings to us the possibility of kingly service.

We greatly mistake, therefore, if we think there is no opportunity for ordinary people to make their years beautiful—to fill them with acceptable Christian service. There is room in the commonest relations of life, not only for fidelity, but for heroism. No ministry is more pleasing to the Master than that of cheerful and hearty faithfulness to lowly duty, when there is no pen to write its history, and no voice to proclaim its praise. To be a good husband—loving, tender, unselfish, and cherishing; or a good wife, thoughtful, helpful, uncomplaining, and inspiring, is most acceptable service. To live well in one's place in the world, adorning one's calling, however lowly, doing one's most prosaic work diligently and honestly, and dwelling in love and unselfishness with all men, is to live grandly. To fight well the battle with one's own lusts and tempers, and to be victorious in the midst of the countless temptations and provocations of every-day experience, is to be a Christian hero.

There is a field, therefore, for better living very close at home. It is in these common things that most of us must make our progress and win our distinction. And there is room enough in these prosaic duties and opportunities for very noble and beautiful lives. There is nothing possible to a human soul greater than simple faithfulness. "She hath done what she could," was the highest commendation that ever fell from the Master's lips. An angel could do no more. When we are resolving to live more grandly in the future than in the past, it will help us to bring our eyes down from the far-off mountain peaks, where there is nothing for us to do, and look close about our feet, where lie many neglected duties, and many unimproved opportunities; and many possibilities of higher attainment in spirit, in temper, in speech, in heart.

Another element of weakness in much of our resolving is, that we try to grasp too much of life at one time. We think of it as a whole, instead of taking the days one by one.

It ought not to be hard to live well one day. Any one should be able to carry his burden, or fight his battle, or endure his sorrow, or stand at his post, or do his work, for just one day. Any one should be able to remember God, and keep his heart open toward heaven; and to remember others in need and suffering about him, and keep his hand stretched out in helpfulness, for just one day. Yet that is all there is to do. We never have more than one day to live. We have no to-morrows. God never gives us years, or even weeks; He gives us only days. If we live each day well, all our life will, in the end, be radiant and beautiful.—S. S. Times.

I find it needful to take care lest the Spirit should be grieved by too much social converse. It is much easier to lose a calm state of mind, than to gain or regain it. Some persons seem as if they never know where to stop talking; and such often speak on subjects of little or no instruction or real use. Scarcely anything renders company more disagreeable, than a person who seems to delight in nothing more than to hear his own voice. H. J.

To be descended of wealth and titles fills no man's head with brains, or heart with truth.

"THIS IS LIFE."

BY SARAH K. BOLTON.

Selected.

"I have planned much work for my life," she said;
A girlish creature, with golden hair,
And bright and winsome as she was fair.

"The days are full, till he comes to wed;
The clothes to buy, and the home to make
A very Eden, for his dear sake."

But cares soon come to the wedded wife;
She shares his duties, and hopes, and fears,
Which lessen not with the waning years;

For a very struggle, at best, is life;
If we knew the burdens along the line,
We should shrink to receive this gift divine.

Sometimes, in the hush of the evening hour,
She thinks of the leisure she meant to gain,
And the work she would do with hand and brain.

"I am tired to-night; I am lacking power
To think," she says; "I must wait until My brain is rested, and pulse is still."

Oh! woman and man, there is never rest,
Dream not of a leisure that will not come
Till age shall make you both blind and dumb.

You must live each day at your very best:
The work of the world is done by few;
God asks that a part be done by you.

Say oft, of the years, as they pass from sight,
"This, this is life, with its golden store:
I shall have it once, but it comes no more."

Have a purpose, and do with your utmost might:
You will finish your work on the other side,
When you wake in his likeness, satisfied.

THE TWO GLASSES.

There sat two glasses, filled to the brim,
On a rich man's table, rim to rim;
One was ruddy and red as blood,
And one as clear as the crystal flood.
Said the glass of wine to the paler brother,
"Let us tell the tales of the past to each other.
I can tell of banquet and revel and mirth,
And the proudest and grandest souls on earth
Fell under my touch, as though struck by blight,
Where I was a King, for I ruled in might.
From the heads of kings I have torn the crown,
From the heights of fame, I have hurled men down;
I have blasted many an honored name;
I have taken virtue and given shame;
I have tempted the youth with a sip, a taste,
That has made his future a barren waste.
Far greater than any king am I,
Or than any army beneath the sky;
I have made the arm of the driver fall,
And sent the train from the iron rail;
I have made good ships go down at sea,
And the shrieks of the lost were sweet to me,
For they said, 'Behold, how great you be,
Fame, strength, wealth, genius before you fall,
For your might and power are over all.'
Ho! ho! pale brother," laughed the wine,
"Can you boast of deeds as great as mine?"
Said the water glass, "I cannot boast
Of a king dethroned or a murdered host,
But I can tell of a heart, once sad,
By my crystal drops made light and glad—
Of thirsts I've quenched, of brows I've laved,
Of hands I have cooled and souls I have saved:
I have leaped through the valley, dashed down the mountain,
Flowed in the river and played in the fountain,
Slept in the sunshine and dropped from the sky,
And everywhere gladdened the landscape and eye;
I have eased the hot forehead of fever and pain;
I have made the parched meadows grow fertile with grain;

I can tell of the powerful wheel of the mill
That ground out the flour and turned at my will;
I can tell of manhood debased by you
That I lifted up and crowned anew.
I cheer, I help, I strengthen and aid;
I gladden the heart of man and maid;
I set the chain-wine captive free,
And all are better for knowing me."
These are the tales they told each other—
The glass of wine and paler brother—
As they sat together, filled to the brim,
On the rich man's table, rim to rim.

For "The Friend"

"THE INNER LIGHT."—John iii. 19—22.

Gliding along from morn to night
Upon life's all uncertain sea,—
Our pilot is the inner Light,
To show where hidden dangers be.
How quick this all-illuminating ray
To point the path, and lead the way!

Brought near the entrance to the tomb,
All unprepared to enter in,—
We shudder at the awful doom
Still due to unforgiven sin;
Thy chastening Light, O Lord! is there,
Moving to penitential prayer.

Oh Death! thy stern forbidding mien
Stirs the deep fountains of the heart,—
Gives sight to "see as we are seen,"
Ere flesh and spirit rend apart;
Gives confidence, or clothes with fear,
As life's last solemn hour draws near.

Can man deny the pardon bought
Through Christ, "the Life, the Truth, the Way
And deem it all a thing of naught—
This heavenly Light's most holy sway?
In vain our hope—in vain man lives,
But for the peace its presence gives.

Though fleshly minds eschew the right,
And "walk in darkness" all their day,
God knoweth his—"for God is light,"
E'en unto those who go astray:
Invited all—all may be free,
Born of the Light, O God! and thee.

For "The Friend."

In carrying out the salutary advice of the Meeting for Sufferings, made through the Yearly Meeting last spring, that subordinate meetings should examine into the condition of all their various records, some interesting minutes have been found bearing evidence that what was once written in the Light never fades away, no matter how long it may have lain in obscurity. The following was obtained from the first book of records* the meeting of "ministers"† of Chester, now and since 1800, known as Concord Quarterly Meeting.

FIRST MINUTE.

† "At our meeting of Ministering Friends held at the meeting-house in Providence, in the county of Chester, held the 22nd day of the 9th mo. 1701.—We being met together in the fear of God with desires for the prosperity of Zion, and that the blessed truth of our Gospel may spread over all nations, who was and the upholder of all those that put their trust in Him; and several fresh and living testimonies being delivered to the comforting of our souls; have renewed cause to say that the strength of Israel's God is still felt to be with those that wait for Him and truly see after the blessed enjoyments of his presence and now it is concluded that the next meeting of ministering Friends is to be held at the same place, upon the account of the same service, upon the last 7th-day of the 12th mo. next, and next upon the last 7th-day of the 3d mo., and the next upon the last 7th-day of the 6th mo., and upon the last 7th-day of the 9th mo."

the holy Jesus run through our meeting the great comfort and reviving of our souls, that the Lord's power reigned to the use of his name. Complaint being made to meeting against — concerning his testimony being burdensome to Friends, and an examination things not being found well in him, it is the judgment of this meeting that he ought to be silent and not to appear in the testimony in meeting till he be truly reconciled to Friends. It is concluded that the next meeting of ministering Friends be held at John Simcock's, of Ridley, upon the 7th-day of the 3d mo."

At our meeting of Ministering Friends in the county of Chester, this 30th day of the 3d mo. 1702.—The love, power and presence of the great God of wisdom being among us, several sweet and living testimonies being borne with wholesome advice, which was to the overcoming and affecting of the hearts of those present, which give us for us to say, that He, that by his great power, gathered and brought our ancients to himself, is still felt and enjoyed to the glory and praise of his holy name. This meeting appoints Geo. Maris and Jno. Blunston to attend the Quarterly Meeting of ministering Friends next at Philadelphia. This meeting further concludes that if any appear from time to time in meetings in declaration [not] acted by the Spirit of Truth, and not coming to sound words in declaration, that he be spoke to by any person or persons attending to their meetings, that they keep the True Guide, or otherways to be silent; and if such a person refuse to take that advice, that then he have notice to appear at our meeting of ministering Friends. "At our meeting of Ministering Friends, held at Walter Fausit's, in Ridley, this 27th day of 12th mo. 1702.—It pleased the Lord in his ancient love and goodness to appear to the reviving of the hearts of those that was present; several fresh and living testimonies being borne in the power of God, which was to the encouragement for the going on of this great work which is the upholding of the blessed Truth. Geo. Maris and Jno. Blunston appointed to attend ye Quarterly Meeting of ministering Friends at Philadelphia. It is concluded the next meeting of ministering Friends be held at Jacob Simcock's, in Ridley, and that Jacob Simcock get a book for the service of ministering Friends."

"At our meeting of Ministering Friends, held at Jacob Simcock's this 29th day of ye 3d mo., 1703.—Many sweet, living and heavenly testimonies being borne, the Lord's great power and heavenly majesty was with and amongst us, by which our souls were livingly and divinely comforted and our faith strengthened; forever blessed be his holy name. Inquiry being made concerning ye affairs of truth in meetings, it was reported well in general way, and now this meeting appoints Geo. Maris and Jno. In a meeting held in 1808, no allusion is made to any vocal service, the minute states, "After a time of sitting together in silence waiting upon ye Lord for his assistance, this meeting proceed to business," &c. &c.

3d mo. 17th. Elizabeth Webb laid her concern of visiting Friends in Old England before this meeting; ye meeting approves well of, and have good unity with her therein," &c.

The foregoing may serve as a sample of these interesting minutes, which continue to express the same feelings of gratitude for favors received. The presence of elders at these meetings appears to be first mentioned 6th mo. 1710, informally, as it might appear from the following minute:

"At a meeting of ministers held at Concord for the county of Chester, &c., the 28th day of the 6th mo. 1714. After a time of silence, we were exhorted to wait on the Lord in true humility, that so those that minister may know and be covered by the Spirit of God, keeping upon the true foundation, the Rock of Ages, Christ Jesus, which abilitates those that preach the truth, to live in the truth; after which, supplication being put up to God for the renewing of his Spirit, his good presence being witnessed amongst us, the meeting proceeded to business. * * Inquiry being made concerning the ministers, the answer was, that things in general are pretty well, considering we are at present without the assistance of elders sitting amongst us, for which cause we renew our request to the Yearly Meeting to have their help, and appoint Abraham Marshall and Jno. Smith, to attend the Yearly Meeting to be held at Burlington."

The Empty Coat.

F. DENISON.

Some months ago there came to our notice a touching story that we find ourselves incapable of forgetting. In the case of a shipwreck, on one of the islands of the Atlantic, a mother and her little boy were washed from the wreck and driven towards the shore. The lad was dressed in an ulster overcoat. The mother, in grasping for her child, seized the belt of the coat at the back and held fast as she was rolled and dashed by the billows and blinded by the spray and brake of the waves. With an undying grasp, she held to the belt till she was thrown upon the beach, in an almost lifeless condition. Her rescuers on the shore were deeply affected by the sight, the almost dead mother holding fast the little coat by the belt. When at last she could open her eyes to see what was around her, how keen was her anguish to discover that she held only the coat. Her boy was gone. The waves had torn him out of the little coat and made him their prey. Then there was an agony of soul such as only a mother can know and no eyes were dry around her.

That mother's aim, effort and final agony, suggest to us what we only too often find in other relations and experiences of human life. How many love this world, and, in their idolatrous passion, grasp its garments and hold fast with all the energy of their natures, and amid all perils, until their eyes are opened at last to find that their idol has passed their reach, leaving only the empty coat to remind them of their vain struggle and to stir their souls to an unavailing agony. The grasping after wealth, after honor, after a name, after renown, after pleasure, is only a clutching upon the belt of what proves finally to be an empty coat. How often the last hours of human life are filled with experience like these of the agonized mother; labor lost, aims deceived, hopes disappointed, the future darkened, the heart wrung with anguish. In sober truth, the world and all it contains will soon be washed from our grasp by the billows of time, leaving us utterly alone and miserable, if we have no hold upon things beyond. In the final wreck of all things here below—an event sure to come to us all—what shall we have? We can carry nothing of this world in our hands. Shall we then have a grasp upon what is living and enduring? Shall we have the pledge of life and joy forever in our hands, or shall we have only an empty coat?

Oh, man, by time's fierce billows tossed,
Not on the transient, outward dote,
Lest in the end they all be lost,
And thou have but an empty coat.

Good Friday a Chronological Mistake.—This is the title of a book recently published in London, in which the writer attempts to prove that the generally accepted opinion, that our Saviour was crucified on the Sixth-day of the week, is a mistake; and that it was really on the Fifth-day of the week, that the momentous event occurred. It is stated in Mark xv. 42, 43: "When the even was come, because it was the preparation, that is the day before the Sabbath, Joseph of Arimathea . . . craved the body of Jesus." The author states, that the Jews regarded the Sabbath as commencing on Sixth-day at sunset; and therefore the preparation day, a day preceding it, must commence at sunset on Fifth-day. The question is one of some interest, but its practical importance is not very apparent.

Baptist Liberality.—The Baptists have raised $50,000 for the renovation of the University Hall of Brown University, Providence. A legacy of $250,000 recently received is to be appropriated to the scientific department.

Ministry.—At the Monthly Meeting held in London on the 29th of 1st month, the attention was turned to the ministry as it exists amongst us. A strong feeling was expressed that in these days of high intellectual culture, great care should be maintained not to depart from the true basis of ministry; and that the exercise of the gift should always be under the renewed anointing and fresh putting forth of the Holy Spirit. The few words uttered in His power and demonstration being more effectual to reach the heart than any elaborate or learned discourse which might please the ear.—British Friend.

A bill has been introduced into the Connecticut Legislature for the suppression of the sale of corrupting papers.

Church property in New Hampshire is no longer exempt from taxation.

Growth of Christianity in India.—In India, Burmah and Ceylon the number of native Christians in 1861 is said to be 213,370; in 1871, 318,363; in 1881, 528,590. Of the spread of the English language in India, Joseph Cook remarks in a recent lecture, that nowhere, except perhaps in the case of the Spanish in South America, has a foreign language spread more rapidly through great populations. There is a universal demand for instruction in English among the educated classes.

The Disciples of Christ.—This body of professors dates from 1811, and originated with Thomas Campbell and others in Washington Co., Pa. They now claim 625,000 members in the United States, and some in other countries. They are Congregational in polity, each congregation being ecclesiastically independent of every other.

Temperance.—In the Christian College at Sapphiro, Japan, instruction is given to the students on the physiological effects of alcohol.

Theatrical Performances.—The vice-chancellor and heads of Colleges of Cambridge University, England, have exercised the right which the law gives them, of shutting up the theatres in the town during term-time; that is for six months in the year.

Educated Ministers.—At the meeting of the Baltimore Conference of the M. E. Church South, in Charlestown, West Virginia, Bishop Keene, in an address, said that it would be a lamentable day for the Church when the selection of preachers is confined to educated men.

Ritualism.—The Church Review recently expressed the real object and ultimate aim of the Ritualists in these emphatic and most unmistakable words:

"The thing wanted to correct and purify our worship is—if you like to express it by a phrase—the restoration of the Holy Communion to its right place as the centre of Christian worship;—or if you prefer to express exactly the same thing in five words—the restoration of the Mass. That is the thing for which we are contending. Anything which tends to bring about this consummation is a victory. Anything which hinders it is a misfortune.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Sand in Snow.—Henry G. Hanks, of the Mining Bureau, read an interesting paper before the Microscopical Society, on "some notable features of the great San Francisco snowstorm." He showed that the snow, far from being pure, contained an immense amount of fine sand, estimated at seventy-five tons per square mile. An analysis showed it to be identical with that which fell in the mud shower at Fresno.—Local Paper.

Salt in Rain.—According to observations made for the last fifteen years near the sea in England the amount of salt carried from the sea by the autumnal gales and deposited after rain varied from five to seven grains per gallon, while the ordinary amount was only .5 grain. The average winter quantity was but slightly in excess of the summer average. At Oakley Park one side of the trees was severely injured after a south-west tempest, and if no rain fell for a few days after the gale, the salt sparkled on the trees, even at a distance of thirty-five miles from the sea. The salt acted in abstracting the moisture from the leaf-cells, and formed a condensed solution, so that the leaf became completely dried up, and consequently perished. As has been remarked by Sir J. D. Hooker, the celebrated Dalton was the first to note a like phenomenon at the beginning of this century. Some trees resist the influence of the storm-carried salt better.—Chr. Ad.

Investigation of Diseases.—The Department of Agriculture has leased a piece of ground in the District of Columbia for an experimental farm for the investigation and treatment of the diseases of domestic animals. The farm will be under charge of Dr. E. E. Salmon, who has been for many years employed by the Department in the investigation of animal diseases, and the Pasteur system of inoculation will be adopted. Investigations will be made into the origin and nature of the Texas cattle fever, pleuro-pneumonia, and hog and chicken cholera, and the means for preventing and curing those diseases.

Exploring Greenland.—An arctic expedition this summer has been decided upon in Sweden. It has been promoted by the well-known Swedish Mæcenas, Dr. Oscar Dickson, and will be in command of Baron Nordenskiöld, whose intention it is on this occasion to explore the east and north-east coast of Greenland. It was originally his intention to have proceeded this summer into the Siberian seas, but seeing the delay caused by the Danish Polar Expedition, which will now be there during the summer, this idea was abandoned, and Greenland decided on instead. Baron Nordenskiöld, having formerly visited the country, is of the opinion that some kind of "break" or oasis is to be found in the interior of Greenland. He proposes to proceed along the east coast of Greenland as far as the ice will allow, and then to penetrate into the interior, some 300 miles across the inland ice. The country inland is nearly the whole year covered by ice and snow, which, during the summer months, render it entirely one bog. The enormous stretch of inland ice has also always been a barrier to exploration.

Another object in view by Baron Nordenskiöld is to attempt to find traces of the N colonies, which existed in Greenland from about the year 1000 until the end of the fourteenth century. The ultimate fate of Norse settlers in Greenland is shrouded in mystery, as there is no authentic record of their existence after the end of the fourteenth century. There has also, in later days, been great diversity of opinion where to seek the settlements; thus the Danish explorer Graah, who in the years 1828-31 was looking for remains of the same, sought them west of Cape Farewell, but without success. Baron Nordenskiöld is, however, of the opinion that the Osterbygd and the Norse settlements were situated east of the Cape, and it is there he intends to search for them.—Chr. Adv.

Mediterranean Coral.—The Naples coral harvest has been very plentiful, although quality is not very high, and over a mill and a quarter pounds have been fished worth about $1,000,000 in the rough state. There is a goodly quantity of the pale coral, which is highly valued by some countries, such as England, Germany, Russia, and the United States; but, while fair complexion prefer this more delicate tint, pink coral despised by their brunette sisters in Spain and India and China, who favor the deep red. During the past year 600 vessels and 57,000 men have been employed in dredging off the coasts of Sardinia, Corsica and Sicily, off the mainland of Southern Italy and on the Barbary coast.

Animals in the Ancient Scotch Lake-Dwellings.—From the respective reports of Professors Owen, Rolleston and Cleland on a selection of osseous remains taken from the lake dwellings at Dowalton, Lochlee and Buxton, we can form a fair idea of the food of the occupiers. The Celtic short-horn (Bos longifrons) the so-called goat-horned sheep (Ovis arvensis brachyura), and a domestic breed of pig were largely consumed. The horse was scarcely used. The number of bones of the horns of the red deer and roebuck show that venison was by no means a rare addition to the list of their dietary. Among birds on the goose has been identified, but this is not a criterion of the extent of their encroachment on the feathered tribe, as only the large bones were collected and reported upon. This bill of fare the occupiers of Lochspoo Crannog, being comparatively near the sea, added several kinds of shell fish. In all the lake dwellings that have come under my observation the broken shells of hazle-nuts were in profuse abundance.—Ancient Scottish Lake Dwellings—Munro.

Malayan Jungles.—The most characteristic feature of the jungle was its thorniness. The shrubs were thorny, the creepers were thorny, the bamboos even were thorny. Everything grew zig-zag and jagged, and in an inextricable tangle, so that to get through the bush with gun or net, or even spectacles, was generally not to be done, and insect catching in such localities was out of the question. It was in such places that the ground-thrush often lurked, and when shot, it became a matter of some difficulty to secure the bird, and seldom without a heavy payment of prickles and scratches and torn clothes could the prize be won. The dry volcanic soil and arid climate seem favorable to the production of such stunted and thorny vegetation, for the native assured me that this was nothing to the thorns and prickles of Sunbawa, whose surface sti-

the covering of volcanic ashes thrown forty years ago by the terrible eruption of Mount Pelee.

Among the shrubs and trees that are not only the Apocynaceae were most abundant, but the bilobed fruits of varied form and color, often of most tempting appearance, hang everywhere by the waysides as if to invite to destruction the weary traveller who is unaware of their poisonous properties. In particular, with a smooth shining skin of golden orange color, rivals in appearance the golden apples of the Hesperides, and has great attractions for many birds, who feast on the crimson seeds which are displayed when the fruit bursts open.

The great palm, called "gubbong" by the natives, is the most striking feature of the forest, where it grows by thousands. It has a very cylindrical stem about a hundred feet high and two to three feet in diameter. The leaves are large and fan-shaped, and fall off at the tree flowers, which it does only once in its life, in a huge terminal spike, on which are produced masses of a smooth-skinned fruit. When these ripen and fall the trees die. Troops of monkeys may often be seen occupying a tree, showering down fruit in great profusion, chattering when disturbed and making an enormous rustling as they slip off among the dead palm leaves.—Nature's Malay Archipelago.

Anecdotes of a Raven.—My raven, "Grip," unfortunately, died from eating too much liver, had astonishing delicacy in the use of his great iron beak. If I tied a knot in a piece of string and left it within his reach, he was sure to untie it and then walk about triumphantly with one end of the string in his beak. He had a large wooden cage made of a chest, and faced with strong iron bars. He was cut in the end of the box, leading to a large "run," enclosed with wire netting. There was not a spot at which the netting had been joined that had not been tested by his beak, and more than once I have just in time to prevent his escape. He always resented my interference, and used to tug in his beak the wire with which I was trying to mend the defect good, and try to pull it out with my hands. At last he gave up the wire and turned his attention to the bars of his cage. They were much too strong for him to bend, but he deliberately set to work to break one of the central bars, and dug away the wood in which it was set until he had loosened it at the bottom. Fortunately, I was just in time to see him pulling out the bar, or he would have been an escaped raven and a fearful havoc among the poultry kept by my next-door neighbor.

Directly Grip saw me he set up a great cry, and did his best to get out the bar he could reach him. I at once sent for my pliers, and at last succeeded in cutting the whole of the bars with cross-wire, at least all the bars were dug out both above and below they would hold their place. Grip was horribly angry during the time, and tried to annoy me as much as possible by tugging at my fingers through the bars, and trying to pull away the wire. Once he did the pliers, and I was obliged to bring on my dog "Bosco," whom Grip hated from conception, before I could induce him to let go the pliers. Bosco's presence, however, elicited a scream of rage; and as the raven fell from his beak, I secured possession of them. He afterwards tested the wires from end to end, tried to undo every knot, and, finding himself baffled, gave up the whole business as a bad job.—J. G. Wood.

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 14, 1883.

In the obituary column will be found a notice of the decease of our aged and valued friend, Daniel B. Smith, of Germantown, whom it seems proper to notice here, because he was one of the little company who commenced the publication of "The Friend," more than 55 years ago, and became responsible for the payment of its necessary expenses.

This publication originated in a concern to support the doctrines and testimonies of our Society, by spreading among our members correct information on matters connected with its interests; and by the weekly introduction into their families of reading matter calculated to strengthen their good desires and their attachment to those principles which William Penn declared to be Primitive Christianity Revived. For these principles, Daniel B. Smith maintained a sincere love, and therefore he felt a warm interest in the prosperity of the journal he had been instrumental in establishing, and contributed many valuable articles to its pages, during a long series of years. When the infirmities of advanced age were more sensibly felt, and his pen was laid aside, he still preserved a thoughtful oversight of its contents, and his words of loving counsel and encouragement were cheering to its conductors.

Though so warmly attached to our religious Society, his labors were not confined to its interests alone. He was instrumental in organizing and putting in operation several valuable institutions which have since largely developed. Among these are the Apprentices' Library, now situated at the corner of Fifth and Arch streets, the House of Refuge, the Savings' Fund at Third and Walnut, the Pennsylvania Company for Granting Annuities, and the College of Pharmacy, of which he was for a time the President.

Of the trials and afflictions which belong to this state of existence, he had his share, but the conflicts and struggles of an active life were succeeded by a calm and peaceful old age. Much of his time in his last few years was passed in his quiet library, where he was surrounded by the valuable works which had accumulated about him, cheered by the visits of those who loved and valued him, and sustained by a humble confidence that the everlasting arms of Divine mercy, which had reached to him in early life, were still extended for his support.

Many of those who knew him can bear testimony to his superior intellectual abilities, to the extent of his literary and scientific acquirements, to his amiable character, and to his devotion to the cause of truth and righteousness. But there is abundant consolation for our loss in his removal, in the belief that through his submission to the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, shed on him as on all, through Jesus Christ, he has entered into his eternal rest.

"The period for the holding of our Annual Assembly is nigh at hand. Surely no less in the prospect thereof than at other times, does it behoove us to dwell deep, and under close religious exercise, that so preservation be witnessed, and the Lord's cause be promoted to his honor."

The above extract from a letter recently received from a beloved friend, seems to the Editor to express so clearly and briefly the feeling which pervades the minds of many, in looking towards our approaching Yearly Meeting, that it is here inserted in lieu of more elaborate remarks. For the Lord's cause can only be promoted by us, as we abide under that religious exercise with which He will clothe the hearts of his children; neither is there reasonable hope for preservation to the church or to individuals, but in the extension of his power—the avivings of which are to be reverently waited for and sought after.

When Richard Shackleton attended London Yearly Meeting in 1776, he wrote to his wife, "This is a time and place for deep feeling, weighty concise speaking, and close attention to a variety of church-business."

The cautions embodied in these few words are applicable at the present time.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President has appointed Walter Q. Gresham, of Indiana, to be Postmaster-General. Postmaster Pearson reports that the heaviest requisition for postage stamps ever drawn in the United States was forwarded from the New York Post-office to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, on the 2d inst., the number of stamps being 21,220,000, which represented a value of $453,000.

Peter Cooper, of New York, died on the morning of the 4th inst., in the 93d year of his age.

Papers have been filed at Albany, organizing the Globe Telephone Company, with a capital of $10,000,000, for doing a telephone business throughout the United States. The company purpose "to use instruments that will overcome all the present obstacles and talk over the longest distances."

The Ohio Legislature on the 4th inst., agreed on the report of conference committee for the submission of two propositions for amendments to the Constitution on the liquor question. One provides for prohibition and the other for legislative control.

The Supreme Court of Iowa met on the 3d inst. in Davenport, and oral arguments were begun in the rehearing of the Prohibitory Amendment case. On the result depends the validity of the amendment.

In the Massachusetts House, the proposed prohibitory amendment to the State Constitution has been defeated by a vote of 115 to 83.

It is said that the law prohibiting the direct importation of Chinamen to the Sandwich Islands has been repealed, and that the regular steamship Oceanic, on her next voyage from Hong Kong, will stop at Honolulu on her way to San Francisco, and unload nearly 1000 Chinese laborers. The next five steamers will take more than 3000 to the islands.

A reunion of the so-called "Reorganized Church of Mormons," was begun on the 6th instant at Kirtland, Ohio, Joseph Smith, Jr., presided. About 300 members were present. This body repudiates polygamy. Bishop Taylor from England, reported a membership in Europe of 8000, and in England and Wales of 2000.

The Wyoming Stock Growers' Association is holding its tenth annual session in Cheyenne. The Executive Committee's report shows that during last year 220,000 beef cattle were inspected, an increase of 52,000 on the number for the preceding year. About 1000 head of cattle "were killed by the Union Pacific Railroad." Herds of breeding cattle are selling 25 per cent. higher than last year, and $30,000,000 of Scotch and English capital was invested in Wyoming and the Texas Pan Handle during 1882.

The annual report of the Board of Managers of the House of Refuge, of this city, states that on 12th month 8th, 1829, the first child was admitted, and since that day upwards of 14,300 young persons "have enjoyed the advantages of this seminary, and at least two-thirds of them properly instructed and reformed were restored to society."

Eighty-six deaths from small-pox were reported in New Orleans last week. The small-pox is reported to be increasing in Nashville.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 462, which was 37 more than during the previous week, and 36 more than during the same period last year. Of the whole number, 228 were males, and 234 females: 59 died of pneumonia; 52 from consumption; 17 from diphtheria; 17 from old age; 15 from scarlet fever; 15 from typhoid fever; 14 from convulsions, and 13 from bronchitis.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 103 $\frac{3}{4}$; 3 $\frac{1}{2}$'s, 103; 4 $\frac{1}{2}$'s, 114 $\frac{1}{2}$; 4's, 120 $\frac{1}{2}$; currency 6's 129 to 132.

Cotton.—There was very little movement, but prices were unchanged. Sales of middlings are reported at 10 $\frac{3}{4}$ a 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 8 $\frac{1}{4}$ a 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. for export, and 9 $\frac{1}{4}$ a 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour continues dull, but prices were unchanged. Sales of 2100 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at \$5.25 a \$6.25; Pennsylvania family at \$4.87 $\frac{1}{2}$ a \$5.12 $\frac{1}{2}$; western do. at \$5.25 a \$6.15, and patents at \$6.25 a \$7.75. Rye flour is dull at \$3.75 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is dull and easier. Sales of 4400 bushels red, in car lots at \$1.15 a \$1.21. Rye is nominal. Corn is in fair request and irregular. Sales of 12,000 bushels in car lots, at 60 a 65 cts. Oats are quiet and easy. Sales of 10,000 bushels, in car lots, at 52 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 56 cts.

Beef cattle were dull this week, and prices were unsettled: 2600 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5 $\frac{3}{4}$ a 8 cts. per pound, the latter rate for a few choice.

Sheep were a fraction higher: 7000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 7 $\frac{3}{4}$ cts., the latter rate for extra, and spring lambs at \$4 a \$8 per head.

Hogs were in fair demand: 3300 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. per pound, the latter rate for extra.

FOREIGN.—On the 5th instant, four men were arrested in London and one in Birmingham, all of whom are believed to be associated in the plot to blow up Government buildings. A dynamite factory was also discovered in Birmingham, and 150 pounds of a highly explosive liquid was found stored in skillfully devised rubber bags. Several arrests have since been made.

A bill to amend the law in regard to explosives has passed both Houses of Parliament and is expected to receive the royal assent immediately. It provides that the maximum penalty for causing an explosion by which life or property is imperilled shall be lifelong servitude. An attempt to cause an explosion or the making or keeping of explosives with intent to cause an explosion is made punishable by imprisonment for a term of twenty years, and the unlawful making or keeping of explosives under suspicious circumstances is to be punishable by fourteen years' imprisonment. All accessories to such crimes are to be treated as principals.

Provision is made in the bill for the ordering of official inquiries into the crimes specified for the arrest of absconding witnesses, and for searching for explosives. The penalties are to be inflicted irrespective of the damage done by the explosives. The bill also empowers the master of any vessel to break open any packages to search for explosives. The act applies both to explosives proper and to materials for making them, or to any machine or part thereof connected with them. It contains no retroactive clause.

The arrests in London and other cities of England of men having explosives in their possession cause considerable uneasiness in France. Fears are entertained that attempts will be made to blow up buildings in Paris. To prevent the introduction into their houses of anything of an explosive nature, owners of large establishments are stopping up the openings to their cellars, as was done in the time of the Commune.

The Capitan Fracassa, an Italian paper, states that the Governments of Italy and Austria have given their assent and affixed their signatures to a treaty by the terms of which each Empire guarantees to the other complete integrity of territory. Although Germany is not directly and by signature a party to this treaty, the document contains a clause in which it is mentioned that her approval has been given.

An article in the Republique Francaise, attributed to Challemeil-Lacour, Minister of Foreign affairs of France, on this subject has the following remarks: "The Republic will attack no one, but will make itself respected by all. To recommend the Republic to the kind feeling of Europe as the sole safeguard against the supposed bellicose instincts of Frenchmen is an outrage against the nation, and every Frenchman, whether Monarchist or Republican, resents the insult. Watch us, form defensive leagues against us, but * * * save us advice concerning the Constitution best suited to us, Republic or Monarchy. France in the presence of the foreigner is France."

A despatch to the Exchange Telegraph Company from Paris, says Prime Minister Ferry, informed President Grévy that the Government had decided to take energetic action in Tonquin with the view of establishing a Protectorate.

The Spanish Chamber of Deputies has passed the bill, permitting the substitution of affirmation for the oath, when desired.

The resistance of the Danes in Schleswig to the demands of Prussia that they serve in the Prussian military service, is as strong as ever. Thirty of them have just been expelled from the country for refusing to inscribe their names for such service.

A conflagration at Vallorbes, in the Canton of Vand, has destroyed 145 houses, together with the post-office, in which important securities were deposited. Twelve hundred persons have been made homeless by the disaster.

THOMAS SCATTERGOOD, Chairman.

DIED, at his residence in Philadelphia, on the 12th mo. 1882, WILLIAM M. PHILLIPS, aged years, a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends, Philadelphia for the Northern District. This young Friend bore a serious illness for many months with great fortitude and patience, expressing thankness and appreciation for the comforts he was furnished with and the many tokens of kindness from dear sympathizing friends. He was of a diffident and retiring nature, which greatly endeared him to those who knew him intimately. For some time after his attack he manifested a strong desire to recover, and to his mother—"There is so much I would like to do and to one or two other dear friends, 'I feel that I have done so little for my Lord.'" His mind continued bright to the last, when he was permitted the mercy of his dear Saviour, to have a full and evidence of his acceptance. When queried with dear Friend "Whether he was afraid to die?" a quiet earnest confidence he replied, "No! No! short time before his death he spoke in a plain and earnest manner to his brother and mother, weeping by his side, 'Do not weep, it will not be before you follow me.'" In a clear, distinct voice gave directions about his interment, and almost immediately after passed peacefully and quietly, leaving the consoling evidence of being admitted that city "Whose walls are salvation and whose are praise."

—, at the residence of his son, James Kersey near Amo, Hendricks county, Indiana, on the 2d Second mo. last, Dr. JAMES KERSEY, in the 83rd of his age. He was born in Guilford county, N. Carolina, and when fourteen years of age, he joined the Society of Friends, and was ever after an excommunicated member. At this period of his life he was engaged reading the Scriptures to the colored children in the huts on First-day afternoons. He also gave literary instruction, and throughout his life he continued his interest in the welfare of their race—longing for their freedom whilst they remained in slavery and after the war made several journeys to the South on their behalf. In the year 1821, he visited Indiana and in 1831 he removed to that State. In early life he was engaged in teaching school; but his knowledge of medicine as well as his success in prescribing for the sick, soon rendered him quite popular as a physician, and he continued in practice about forty years. Labors among the sick were not actuated so much by emoluments of the profession as the conscious feeling of doing good; often prescribing without fee or reward. He was diligent in attending religious meetings, the generally opening therefor, though at the sacrifice of much-needed rest. With natural and acquired abilities above the average of his day, he was an interesting, instructive companion, modest and unassuming daily Christian walk being manifest to those who knew him. For nearly half a century he was an active member in the church, and for a long time he was one of the correspondents of Western Yearly Meeting of Friends. His last sickness was short, during which he often expressed a feeling of no choice as to the result, whether to get well or not—all looking bright before him. He was greatly beloved by many, and his funeral was largely attended. The remains were interred in Friends' burial ground at Spring.

—, on the 15th ult., at his residence in this city, JAMES SMEDLEY, in the 56th year of his age, a member and overseer of the Monthly Meeting of Friends, Philadelphia, for the Northern District. The consoling walk and conversation of this beloved Friend, with the amiability of his disposition, had endeared him to a large circle of relatives and friends, who saw in him the "ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is the sight of God of great price." While mild and bearing in his intercourse with others, he was ever ready for the maintenance of the doctrines and testimony given us as a people to bear before the world. Friends deeply feel their loss in his removal from the church militant in the meridian of his usefulness; they have the consoling belief that through redemption and mercy, he has been admitted to the Chariot Triumphant, and has received the gracious welcome "well done, good and faithful servant."

—, on 29th of 3rd month, at his residence, Germantown, Philada., DANIEL B. SMITH, a member of the Philadelphia Monthly Meeting, in the 91st year of his age.

find that a desire to ramble much from e is calculated to draw the mind off from own states and to lead into unwatchful-
; and if encouraged too much, scatters and roys: yet if kept in subjection to the venly Minister, such a disposition may be lged in moderation. I feel sincerely deis for myself that I may be kept from y snare which may entrap my inexperid and unwary feet. It is not so much in laces themselves, as in the disposition in h we visit them. For the Lord's presence everywhere; and if the mind is properly ed upon Him, he will deliver out of every tation.

uch is the instability and such the weak-of the mind of the young, that the ex-ment of company is liable to overthrow r resolution if not carefully entrenched he safeguards of watchfulness, vigilance sobriety. It is my sincere desire day by to abide in that state of watching unto er so emphatically recommended by our t and glorious Pattern, and to be as the ant who is looking for his Lord, having my girt about and my lamp burning. O! this llessed state to be in, and one which I may d daily covet; but such is the prevalence e flesh and the devil, that I often find elf a sad delinquent in my well known
. I am often led to reflect upon the unlity of our prospects here, and by what er ties we are held to this state of exist-
; and though through the merciful good-and condescension of my Redeemer I am ed to feel that state of mind in which I ay at times

'Or life or death is equal—neither weighs,
All weight in this—O let me live to thee.'

this is not sufficient to answer for future gencies; and hence the importance of sober and vigilant lest the Son of man in an hour when we think not, when ful must be our doom. These things or serious reflection; and the very great nestinable consequences dependent upon connected with a proper exercise of our ous duties are calculated to arouse the ant faculties of every soul.

For my part, when I reflect upon this life and all its fading allurements—whatever others may think of their value—I am ready to exclaim, Who that has had a taste of the precious enjoyments of the communion of the Holy Ghost, would be willing to resign their hoped for portion in the heavenly mansion for all worldly gratifications? who would not rather count all things as dross that they might win Christ?

It is a sorrowful thing indeed to look round upon the inhabitants of the world and to see them pursuing its phantoms with all the eager avidity of a fatal delusion, for such it will prove unless turned from; and then to reflect upon the assertion of our blessed Lord when He says: "Whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple;"
and "except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." These are precepts to the import of which we cannot be too much alive; and which must convince us that nothing short of the operation of the regenerating power of Divine light and life in our hearts, and a full surrender to the cross of the Redeemer of all our unsanctified propensities, will obtain for us an admittance with the saints in light. How truly awful, then, must the summons of death be to him who is reposing at ease in the possession of worldly and perishing acquirements, who, caring for nothing but the advancement of his temporal interest, looks upon the world to come as something in which he has no concern.

Let us then, my dear friend, seeing that time here is uncertain, and indeed that all its enjoyments are alloyed more or less with trouble and sorrow, let us seek for those things which are above where Christ sitteth on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty on high. There will be in this true and unchanging satisfaction, while it will give to the lawful pleasures of this life a zest which can be found nowhere without it."

To the same.

"About 7th or 8th mo. 1824.

Thou mayest a little wonder at the time that has been suffered to elapse since my promise of writing to thee. It has seemed as though but one subject has occupied my leisure moments from the affairs of business, next to the one great concern. The recent deeply afflictive dispensation* which we have experienced has stood prominently forth as the claimant of my meditations. But why should I call it afflictive? Deeply trying as it truly is to the natural and affectionate part, yet I am ready to think we have in reality cause to be thankful for the mercy and goodness and wisdom of Him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own pure, holy and blessed will. Yes, my friend, I may, for my own part say, that while I much deplore the loss of him who diligently strove to guide my infant and childish feet in the path of virtue, and who as an affectionate and kind adviser and reprover in more advanced years, endeavored to keep me in that straight and narrow way in which he had found true and lasting peace, yet when I reflect that the measure of his tribulation seemed filled up, and that to have remained longer in this unstable world would have been but to endure persecution which seemed almost sufficient to overwhelm the strongest—when I reflect upon these things, can I but rejoice? Yea, and I will rejoice. But at the same time when I recur to the blank that is thus left in our family, and look around me for the countenance and voice of him who has departed to his long home, those feelings which burst upon me like a flood as I first sat by the side of the bed whereon his body lay, will force themselves upon me and recall all the fondest recollections of my heart. Thou who hast partaken of such feelings canst no doubt realize them even at this distance of time. Well, my friend, I am ready to think that these feelings, these manifestations of affection, are held excusable in the Divine sight, and that He looks upon us and remembers that we are dust. I have sometimes in former days looked forward to such trials, and have thought that should such an event take place within the sphere of my connexion, that I could stand unmoved by those feelings which many think it is a relief to indulge in upon such occasions. But when the reality came, when I saw him inanimate whose animation and whose smile had been my joy and delight, when the object of my strongest affection was forever enclosed in the arms of unrelenting and unsparing death, my fortitude forsook me, and I gave vent to my feelings in sighs and in tears. The prayer of my heart was, Lord pardon my weakness; and as I was brought to look a little more into the subject,

I was favored to feel that heavenly language of holy resignation pervade my bosom: "Not my will, O Lord, but thine be done." This is what heals the bleeding heart; this is the language which Christianity enables its votaries to adopt, and which furnishes a strong consolation amid all those distressing events which affect and encumber the soul in this transitory and probationary state of existence."

The above tribute of filial affection and gratitude to a worthy father for his Christian care and oversight, is none too strong. We would that this and other similar testimonials, might have a stirring effect upon more of the descendants of watchful and concerned parents; and lead to the wise resolution to heed the counsel, and to cherish the precepts and example of these while they have them;
as we have no reason to doubt was the case with W. Scattergood toward his venerable father.

Tenderness and tears on such solemn occasions and bereavement need no apology nor

* The death of his father, which occurred in the 6th mo. of 1824.

explanation. It is written for our learning, that Jesus, the adorable Son and Sent of God himself, wept for Lazarus whom he loved. And who has not experienced that the effusion of tears, when the bosom is overborne with grief or with religious exercise, is as a relief-valve to the deep feelings of such stricken, sorrowing hearts!

Faithful and exemplary parents who, with judicious restraint and prayerful solicitude, have endeavored to watch over and to train those so responsibly committed to their care, in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, are worthy of much honor; and it is to be hoped that the favored offspring of these will never forget the obligations they owe, not only while blessed with them, but in emulation of their virtues and in taking up their mantles, honor them by walking in their footsteps, when the places which have known them and their upright walk on earth, can know them no more.

The poet, Cowper, in a beautiful tribute to his departed mother, writes:—

"My mother! when I learned that thou wast dead, Say, wast thou conscious of the tears I shed?"

And the same author in pointing out one way by which we may miss that happiness we might have found, says:—

"Some friend is gone, perhaps his son's best friend!
A father, whose authority, in show
When most severe, and must'ring all its force,
Was but the graver countenance of love;
Whose favor, like the clouds of spring, might low'r,
And utter now and then an awful voice,
But had a blessing in its darkest frown,
Threat'ning at once and nourishing the plant.
We lov'd, but not enough, the gentle hand
That rear'd us. At a thoughtless age, allur'd
By ev'ry gilded folly, we renounced
His shel'ring side, and wilfully forewent
That converse which we now in vain regret.
How gladly would the man recall to life
The boy's neglected sire! a mother too,
That softer friend, perhaps more gladly still,
Might he demand them at the gates of death.
Sorrow has, since they went, subdued and tamed
The playful humor: he could now endure,
(Himself grown sober in the vale of years,)
And feel a parent's presence no restraint.
But not to understand a treasure's worth,
Till time has stol'n away the slighted good,
Is cause of half the poverty we feel,
And makes the world the wilderness it is."

For "The Friend."

Chunder Sen and the Theistic Societies of India.

This is the subject of one of the series of Boston Lectures, recently delivered by Joseph Cook. The lecturer visited India last year, and was several times in the company of Chunder Sen, and took pains to ascertain his character and sentiments, and to become acquainted with the religious movement with which he is identified.

This movement commenced more than 50 years ago, and probably originated in the dissemination of Christian ideas, by which it has been greatly influenced. Ram Mohan Roy, who was one of the early laborers in this field, highly revered the Christian Scriptures, but did not become a professor of Christianity. He sought to bring his countrymen back to the worship of one God. The Brahmo Somaj (God Society) was established in 1860.

An Indian Reform Association was established in 1870; an active missionary organization was constituted; preachers began to travel from one part of the country to the other; the doctrines of love for God and communion with God began to be explained with new intensity; sacraments and ceremonies were instituted; and, at last, the New Dispensation, as the highest development of the Brahmo Somaj, was proclaimed, in 1880, under the spiritual and intellectual leadership of Keshub Chunder Sen.

He was born 11th mo. 18th, 1838, and educated at the Hindu College in Calcutta. In college, although at first fond of mathematics, he devoted himself almost exclusively to English literature and mental and moral philosophy. He passed four years in collegiate study. He became an active member of the Brahmo Somaj about 1859. His devout character and his eloquence at once made him a leader. He visited England in 1870, and was received with distinguished honor, especially by the Unitarians, and was introduced to the Queen. Two volumes of his addresses in England have been published at Calcutta, and have lately been followed by a third volume, containing English lectures of his in India. Besides editing a weekly religious newspaper and directing the instruction of theological students and various religious assistants, he preaches often to his people in a tabernacle in Calcutta, and once a year delivers, in the great town hall there, to an immense assembly, an elaborate oration in English on some point of faith or practice connected with the religious movement he represents, and which he hopes to make national in its influence.

Joseph Cook regards him, not only as an honest, but a profoundly devout man, who sees religious truths through his conscience, rather than through mere reason, listens devoutly to the inner voice, believes in Providence, and is perpetually inculcating the duty and the blessedness of prayer and self-surrender to all the loftiest impulses of conscience, which, as he teaches, are really supernatural touches of God upon the spirit of man.

"Chunder Sen holds a certain doctrine of inspiration which has often startled his British and American readers, so far as they have attended to his English utterances. He believes that, at certain moments, he is himself inspired; but, after cross-examining him again and again on this theme, I am convinced that by his inspiration he means very little more than we mean by illumination of the Holy Spirit. He grants, however, that the reality of his inspiration must be tested by the accord of his teachings with those of every inspired authority in religion. It is reassuring to find that he holds, in as many words, that the spirit of the prophets must be subject to the prophets. He regards the Christian Scriptures as incomparably the most important sacred books of the world. Familiar with all the sacred books of Asia, he and his followers find in the Bible only that which satisfies their deepest spiritual wants. All their study of comparative religion brings them back with unabated hunger and enthusiasm to the study of the Christian Scriptures.

"Chunder Sen would not trust any inspiration of his own that should seem to be opposed to fundamental biblical truth. Nevertheless, he believes that supplementary truth may be discovered through prayer, and that it has been revealed to him that a new dispensation of the Holy Spirit is to come into the world; and that his Church, which is named the Church of the New Dispensation, is to lead this movement; and that it is to unify all the religions of the earth—Christian, Mohammed-dan, and Pagan, so far as they agree with inmost voice of conscience."

In the issue of his paper, for 5th mo. 14 1882, he says:—

"Our doctrine and principles of faith: practice are not derived by processes of reasoning; but excited in our hearts by prayer; inner experiences, so that we cannot view them as directly dispensed unto us the Spirit of God. For a long time the Brahmo Somaj has ceased to believe in reason as source of religion, and professed to look up God for the direct revelation of truth in soul. The Brahmo Somaj has always the faculty of faith to be the organ for the discernment of spiritual realities and assigned such matters a subordinate place to reason."

Of Chunder Sen as an orator, Joseph Cook says: "He was born an orator. He has splendid physique, to commence with; excellent quality of organization, capacity of sudden heat and of tremendous impetuosity; lightning-like swiftness of thought and expression, combined with a most iron control. You cannot throw him off his balance before any audience, with a manuscript without one. He is unquestionably the most eloquent Asiatic I ever heard. He speaks English as perfectly as any man in this assembly; he seems to have learned it from pages of Addison or Macaulay, and not from colloquial usage. His English is extremely pure, and is pronounced without the slightest foreign accent. Six feet in height, with broad complexion and quite regular features, he is a commanding figure, in his Asiatic costume whether seen in public or in private."

"He has a theological school, quite well patronized. The examination papers upon it include many Christian books, and questions are very keen on the topics of providence and prayer and inspiration. In his own dwelling, the Lily Cottage, on Circular road, in Calcutta, a mansion with deep verandas on both lower and upper stories, standing in large, open grounds, among graceful and stately palms, he has what he calls a sanctuary. I must introduce you to this house of holies of Chunder Sen's home, if you are to understand this theistic reformer of India. He showed the room to me with a man of intense reverence for it, and I could but wish it to be a sacred place.

"Chunder Sen meets his theological pupils and his chief religious associates in his sanctuary nearly every day, except Sunday, when he is usually engaged in preaching at the tabernacle. The room is fitted up in Asiatic style. C. Sen has a little platform, not more than three or four inches high, on which he is seated in the Asiatic manner. There are mats scattered about the floor for the seating of pupils and apostles. Musical instruments stand in the different corners—not elaborate instruments, but of the simple ancient Hindustani patterns, some times one-stringed lyres, such as the Hindu saints and recluses, were accustomed to use in their meditations in solitudes of the Himalayas. After music, seated on this platform, he enters into a very long prayer. His pupils and followers devoutly believe that, in the best parts of prayer, he is inspired. They note carefully not merely his language, but his intonation. When the divine afflatus seems to come upon him in his devotions, they feel that they are communing through him with the Holy Spirit. They actually believe this and are correspond-ly solemnized. They hold in reverence, however, not the organ, but the divine influence that plays through it."

In the religious services in the tabernacle, where Chunder Sen, when his health permits, presides, there is a most impressive ceremony, in which the whole congregation stand up and petition God for light. There is then a silence of several minutes, the whole of it occupied, presumably, in secret devotion. Every member of this Church of the New Dispensation seems to be a man of prayer. Remember that these persons do not profess to be Christians. They say little against Christianity. Except by asserting the sufficiency of his form of Theism, I could not find that Chunder Sen now ever says a word against Christianity. He wishes to absorb into his system faith and practice all those parts of Christianity that can be made to accord with his theistic principles. In moving the vote of thanks at the last address I had the honor to deliver in Calcutta, Chunder Sen said that India was ruled by Christ. On another occasion, in the massive Town Hall, holding more than 100 people, he said, 'The crown of India does not belong to Great Britain. It belongs to Jesus Christ our Lord.' He is almost constantly uttering things that are nearly Christian in their tone, and yet at frequent intervals he utters things that lean far overboard mere Hinduism.

He has introduced into his Church several ceremonies imitated from old Hindu practices. I know that there is great reverence for the fire among many Oriental sects, and C. Sen has endeavored to transmute one of the old Hindu ceremonies, in which the use of fire is very prominent, into an impressive theistic symbol. He brings before his worshipping audience a vessel of metal, filled with oil, and places at each side sticks of scented wood. He lights the sticks and takes the wood, and before the whole congregation, throws it, stick by stick, into flames, saying, 'Thus perish our lust, our pride, our worldliness, our unjust anger, all the diversities from God.' The ceremony is exceedingly impressive, for at the end of it the congregation cries out repeatedly, 'Victory to God!' and then he pronounces over them or invokes upon them the benediction, 'Peace, peace.' Several ceremonies of this kind, introduced by him, with slight changes from the old Hindu ways, appear to be intended to conciliate Hindus. The criticism which many acute missionaries make upon Chunder Sen is that his composite set of ceremonies and religious doctrines has in it so many appeals to ancient Hindu prejudices that it never leads the mass of the Hindun populations out of their attachments to hereditary misdeeds. Chunder Sen replies that he is anxious only that Christian truth should be preached to India in an Oriental dress, and that there should be something national left in the religion of Hindustan. At times he exclaims, 'Blessed Jesus, I am thine. I give myself, body and soul, to thee. Let India revile and persecute me, and take my life-blood out of me drop by drop, still thou shalt continue to be my homagel'"

There is something very interesting in the theory and spiritual views of this remarkable man; and one can join in the desire expressed by the lecturer, that he may yet be led into more profound knowledge of Christianity.

For "The Friend."

Religious Views and Tenets.

Idolatry, in some of its various forms, either outwardly or inwardly, may be suffered to come in and take the place of true religion and worship. Some worldly object, either smaller or greater, may be so cherished as to take the uppermost seat in our hearts. If our affections are upon any thing more than upon God, we become idolaters. No mundane or earthly image should be allowed to remain between us and the Sun of righteousness long enough to eclipse the brightness of its shining. If we suffer our affections to be placed more on earthly than on heavenly things, an evil heart of unbelief, or cold indifference will soon be likely to enter and cause us to depart from the living God. And if we forsake Him, the fountain of living waters, the busy restless mind of man is not long content without a substitute, or a similitude. So we go to work in our own will and strength and hew out cisterns; but what are they? "Broken cisterns that can hold no water." So the Lord complained that "his people had changed their glory for that which doth not profit." We may have a zeal of God, but not according to an inward experimental knowledge. And while we are earnestly exerting this zeal for the salvation of others, we may neglect our own. And we may go about under the solemn pretext of working for our Lord, while the secret promptings of the heart, are to establish our own righteousness, instead of silently submitting to the righteousness of God. Here is a great snare of the enemy. He cares not how near we are on the Christian's path, so we are a little off of it, either to the right or to the left. He cares not how actively we may work in a religion that does not weaken his kingdom. He knows that if we have not the Spirit of Christ in the work, it does not take us away from him, nor from the pride of life. We may speak fluently of justification, and of sanctification, and of the cleansing blood of Jesus, without having passed through the washing of regeneration, or without knowing Him for ourselves, whom to know is life eternal.

All true Christians have a portion of God's Holy Spirit poured out upon them, which is an earnest of that inheritance which fadeth not away. And it is so much above the natural spirit of man, that by it he may know the deep things of God, which the natural man with all his boasted wisdom can never know. It is God alone, by his enlightening Spirit, that can open the eyes of the blind, and unstop the deaf ear, and turn us from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to Him, and enable us to carry on his work to the salvation of souls. And to such as fear his name, and thus work under his power, the Sun of Righteousness will arise with healing in his wings; and they will become increasingly strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, and be enabled to overcome the wicked one. What is it that gives us the victory, and enables us to overcome sin but the faith and power which He gives to all who receive Him? For as many as receive Him in his spiritual coming, to them He gives power to become his sons. And for what purpose does He give us of his power, except for us to use it in working out our own salvation, and the salvation of our fellow-men in co-operation with Him who worketh in us both to will and to do? And to such as are willing to receive Him in the way of his coming, He does give power to become his sons, even to them that believe in his name or power, with that saving belief which produces the new birth, not of flesh and blood, nor of the will of man, like the old birth that we now by nature have, but a new birth from God, that makes us new creatures in Him.

"O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out" by poor finite man! The world by its wisdom can never know Him; nor the deep things concerning his kingdom. They are wisely hid from the learning and prudence of this world, and placed far beyond the reach of cultivated intelligence. But thanks be to God, a sufficient portion is revealed to the new born babes, or little ones in Christ Jesus, to guide them onward from glory to glory, even by his secret and invisible power. Here let us leave it; remembering that secret things belong to God; but those which are revealed belong to us, and to our children. While I thankfully admit that almost the entire sum and substance of both the old and new Testament, is to point us to Jesus Christ and Him crucified to save a sinful world; yet we must also admit that the Scriptures set before us the difficulties of the way—the hardships, the trials and temptations that a Christian has to encounter in this present evil world. The Bible sets before us a race that we have to run, laying aside every weight, and every besetting thing. And a battle that we have to fight; "not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places." And in describing the armor that we have to put on, Paul says, "Above all taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked." And in another place he speaks of fighting the good fight of faith, that we may lay hold of eternal life. But I do not find that faith of itself, without a conflict, is sufficient. "For as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also." So there is a living faith that overcomes the world; and there is a dead faith that is easily overcome by the world. Our faith may be on a present Christ—a Christ within us,—without undervaluing his death on the cross for the sins of the world. He said to his disciples when He was about to leave them, "It is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you." For if He continued to dwell outwardly among them, they would look to Him outwardly, and fail to receive Him in the heart as a comforter, a convictor, a reprover for sin, and as a guide into all truth.

There is a danger now, even under this spiritual dispensation, of our holding Christ too much outwardly, in our views, and depending too much on what He has done outwardly for us, and so fail to realize Him so fully as Christ within, the hope of glory. Let us thankfully receive and acknowledge what He has done for us outwardly, and receive Him with more full faith inwardly. It is the heart that is deceitful and impure. So it is an inward work that we need. We want a more inward and heart-changing religion, and less of an outward show.

I write as I do, under a fear that many a precious seeking soul is in danger of stopping short of that full salvation which is only to be found by a more earnest striving to enter in at the strait gate. There is great danger of taking up our rest under the praise and flattery of men, and yet know but little of that true rest that remains for the people of God. Dangers also of a counterfeit peace which the world can give, instead of that true peace of God which passeth all understanding of the natural man. So what I say unto one, I say unto all, watch.

Colored people in Alabama.—We number among our acquaintances a well known citizen of the State of Alabama. He was writing us on matters appertaining to some things in which he is interested. He makes some statements that are of general interest. They show that if the colored people of that State ever make any progress, the laws will not be to blame for it. There is a great deal of work to be done by somebody to humanize the laws. Our correspondent, who is a very calm and careful man, and speaks simply as an observer, says: "The outlook of the colored people in Alabama is very gloomy. The strict laws, the 'sundown law,' selling an article of produce after sundown, or before sunrise, is a felony; the stealing of an article of produce, an apple, a potato, or an ear of corn, is a felony; the sale of seed cotton, except one thousand pounds is a felony. (This law is restricted to the 'black belt.') Seven-tenths of the victims of the 'chain-gang' and State-prison are young men. We have sixty-four counties, and two Courts held in each county per annum, and there is upon an average twelve colored men, sentenced at each court; these are all disfranchised, and the fare and treatment of the convicts as a general rule is simply horrible. The two previous years of scarcity reduced the people to great want. the last year, though one of plenty, has not fully relieved the masses; nearly all are in debt, consequently religious institutions, among the poorer classes, languish; finances short, morals low, and pure Christianity at a discount."—Chr. Ad.

The Hindu ladies of Bombay are having a new and strange sensation. A fair widow, aged scarcely twenty-five, who has attained quite a reputation as a learned Sanskrit scholar, and who has devoted her life to the labor of educating her countrywomen, has been delivering a course of lectures in a hall crowded to excess with the Hindu and Parsi ladies of Bombay. This lady, called the Pandita Romabi (Pandita being the feminine of Pandit or Pundit, a learned man,) spoke with perfect fluency and self-possession, and argued the importance of education for women, that they might be real companions to their husbands, and receive their share of the benefits of the age.

It has been like an electric shock to those who heard her, stirring them up to an ambition to gain such culture as they saw that the Pandita had. After she had finished, the ladies present were asked to volunteer to express their own views; and it is said that a number did so, with a force and propriety that were surprising to themselves and to the audience.

A native newspaper says that "even the most hopeful of women's advocates among us were hardly prepared for this singular but most delightful spectacle." This is not a Christian movement; but it is, like the whole system of Hindn education and the Brahmo Somaj movement in religion, only what Christianity and missionary labors in India have made possible there.—Independent.

A Well Directed Zeal.—"Some there are," said Ecclampadius to Luther, in introducing Farel to him, "who would moderate his zeal against the opposers of the truth; but I cannot help discerning in that same zeal a wonderful virtue, and which, if but well directed, is not less needed than gentleness itself." Posterity has ratified the judgment of Ecclampadius.—History of the Reformation.

THE GIRDLED ELMS.

A wanderer in far distant realms,
I turned my pilgrim feet,
To seek beneath a grove of elms,
A refuge from the heat;
The swaying branches overhead,
With foliage dark, and close,
Cast on the earth a cooling shade,
Inviting to repose.

The sportive breeze above me played,
And whispered songs of praise;
While graceful branchlets gently swayed,
Attuned to nature's lays.
The stately trunks, above were crowned
With verdant living green,
And not a withered branch around
Did mar the lovely scene.

Though living grace and beauty rare,
Above appeared to be;
A cruel foeman had been there,
And girdled every tree;
The sap of life no longer flowed
From root, till boastful head
Which wearing still life's garb above
Was living while 'twas dead.

And when the present season's past,
The present leaves decay;
And chilling winter's icy blast
Sweeps present life away;
Returning spring shall give no more
To death a living grace,
Nor clothe his grizzly visage o'er,
With living, smiling face.

How many men are like this grove,
Dead while they seem to live,
Whose life consists in mercies past,
The root hath ceased to give;
Whose life consists in mercies past,
And not in mercies new;
Who seek to make old manna last,
And not each morn renew.

Alas! alas! how many here,
Have names to live, while dead:
In sight of men are green and fair,
And yet to sin are wed.
When death shall strip their guise away
Which they on earth have worn,
They'll shine not in the glorious day
Of Eternal Spring's return.

* * * * *
Oh God, let thy preserving care,
Be round me day by day,
And answer thou my daily prayer,
Keep deadly foes away;
May I each day draw life from thee,
The true and living Vine;
That, nourished by thy love, I be Preserved in Life Divine.

That, when the wintry blast of death
Hath blown my leaves away,
Hath chilled this fleeting feeble breath,
This body froze to clay;
This hidden life that in me lies,
By thee kept from decay,
May into glorious being rise,
And live in endless day.

A WISII.

There is a joy, a pure delight
That Nature's lovely works bestow,
The gleaming torches of the night
The whispering breeze, the streamlet's flow,
The sight of vernal fields, the song
Of birds melodious from the spray,
The glorious tints of light that throng
The closing portals of the day,—
A smile of joy, a song of praise
From field, and wood, and stream are given,
That prompt the swelling heart to raise
Its song of gratitude to Heaven.

There is a peace, a Heavenly peace,
That reigns within the tranquil breast;
That bids each troubling conflict cease,
And doubt and fear alike repress.
A thrilling sense of Heavenly love
Awakes a love responsive there,
And lifts the trembling soul above
The thoughts of earth and worldly care;
This heart-felt joy, this Heavenly peace,
This grateful song, this love divine,
Forever as thy years increase,
In life, till death, my friend, be thine.

For "The Friend"

Old Minutes of Concord Quarterly Meeting Ministers and Elders.

At our meeting of Ministers and Elders held at Providence meeting-house the 15 of 7th month, 1721.

Friends met, and waiting in the fear of the Lord for the enjoyment of his love and goodness who, in his infinite mercy, was pleased to draw near unto us, and by the influence of his Holy Spirit bow our hearts, in which testimonies were dropped tending to caution and encouraging one another. The paper from the Yearly Meeting of Ministering Friends London, called a Brief Memorial, &c., is agreed in by this meeting, and is as followeth, a to the end that they may for the future be better able to answer the particular Queries therein contained, viz:

1st. Against undue and restless behavior under one another's ministry whilst in the unity of the body.

2d. Against long, frequent and unnecessary preambles.

3d. Against pretending to a few words, a brief declaration, and apologizing for a short conclusion, and contrariwise prolonging several pretended conclusions, and recommending the people, &c.

4th. Against misstating, misquoting, misapplying the Holy Scriptures, for preventing whereof it is desired all those concerned be conversant in reading the Scriptures.

5th. To be careful how they fall upon disputable points or dialoging and making unfair objections, such as they do not clearly answer.

6th. Against hurting meetings toward conclusion by unnecessary additions when the meeting was left well before, and that public friends keep to week-day meetings.

7th. Against all affectations in speech, tone, sounds and gestures not agreeable gravity, affecting and seeking popularity themselves.

8th. Against undertaking or running in employment they have no knowledge of, no experience in, as physic, merchandizing; and also to avoid an idle life, applying themselves to some lawful employment when they return from their services; yet not to overcharge themselves so as to hinder their services.

9th. Against speaking against persons a porting things on hearsay without first asking to the person concerned; and therefore showing discord.

9th. To be careful to keep their whole conversation unspotted, being examples of kindness, temperance, and charity.

10th. Not to indulge themselves in what they preach against in others.

11th. To be just and honest in dealing, not to launch into trade and higher living than their estates will answer.

12th. That their apparel, and furniture of their houses, as well as their tables, be with simplicity, modesty and temperance.

13th. Against men and women travelling together as companions in service, to avoid offence thereby.

14th. That women friends be careful not to hinder their brethren in their service in public meetings, and that the brethren have authority towards the women and not to disengage them in their respective services.

15th. To beware of too much familiarity, and not to draw out the affections for one another to their hurt.

16th. Against any one running headily in their own will to disturb or interrupt any one in their worship.

17th. That all be cautious in laying too much stress on their testimony by pretending to have no motion, and too often repeating the same to gain credit.

18th. That none follow their own spirits and presume to prophesy therein against any one, city, town, people or person.

19th. That none show or expose manuscripts so as to give expectation of their being read, before they are approved of by the next-day morning meeting of ministering friends in London.

20th. And lastly, that ministers be careful not to make their visits burdensome nor their charges chargeable, and be courteous and thankful for such entertainments as they meet with among friends.

With tender salutation in our Lord Jesus Christ, we recommend you to his Holy Spirit, our blessed Leader, great Remembrancer, and our Guide into all Truth, in faith, love and gratitude.

Religious Items, &c.

The Church of England.—The London Standard in an editorial on the practical working of the Church of England system, says:—

"There is no Church, there is no Government, there is no institution in the world that so little adapts its means to its ends, its resources to its work, its men to its positions, as the Church of England. The fact is proved, want supplied, and the evil mitigated by the surrounding atmosphere of Nonconformity everywhere pressing in to fill the void. The ministry—that is, the entire system of employment in the service of the Church of England—will have to be adapted to the work everywhere to be done unless the Church find itself one day the shadow of a great reality."

Travellers in the New Hebrides.—Recently a deputation, consisting of representatives of some of the leading missionary societies, waited upon Lord Granville at the Colonial Office, for the purpose of calling attention to malpractices in the New Hebrides and other islands of the Pacific. The evils complained of have arisen in connection with the exportation of natives of those islands to English and French colonies, under circumstances which are not to be distinguished in many of their repulsive features from the slave-trade. The story bears a strong resemblance to others, which have frequently been told, of the treatment of native races by lawless and adventurous Europeans in various parts of the world. The resemblance arises from the fact that under similar conditions the baser passions of human nature—such as selfishness, cruelty, and greed—are very apt to manifest themselves in the same forms again and again. On behalf of the deputation referred to, T. Powell Buxton stated that the traffic in native labor had long been carried on in the Pacific Islands, and that in connection with it great injury was being done to the natives, both physically and spiritually, numbers of them being kidnapped, and others induced by false pretences to leave their homes, to work in the colonies of this country and of other nations. Dr. G. Smith, one of the deputation, gave an account of missionary work done in the New Hebrides by the Society of the Scotch Free Church and others, since 1852, and asserted that "the present operations and future permanence of the mission were continually imperilled" by the absence of settled government in the islands, by the prevalence of the labor traffic, leading frequently to bloody reprisals, and by the fear of the natives that the French whose ships of war frequently visited the group, desired to use the islands for the extension of their convict settlement in New Caledonia. In supporting these representations, Inglis, a returned missionary from the New Hebrides, said, among other things, that the natives, who appeared to be strong when removed from their native islands, died like rotten sheep when carried away as laborers to the colonies; and the result of the present system, if continued, would be to entirely depopulate the islands. Both Lord Derby and Lord Granville expressed great sympathy with the object of the deputation.

Relative number of Drinking places.—Nevada has 1 for every 65 inhabitants; Colorado, 1 to 76; California, 1 to 100; Oregon, 1 to 170; New Jersey, 1 to 178; and New York, 1 to 192. South Carolina, of all the States of the Union, has the least number of liquor shops in proportion to population—1 to 917, while Kansas comes next, with 1 to 879. The figures are from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and were computed to 7th mo. 1, 1881.

Prohibition in the South.—The principle of prohibition of the traffic in intoxicating liquors is making considerable progress in the South. In Georgia, under a local option law, many of the counties have voted for prohibition. The Atlanta Constitution says that it does not know of a single county that has voted on the question, and authorized the sale of liquor. In some of the other States the sentiment in favor of prohibition is rapidly growing.—Chr. Adv.

Use of Tobacco.—It is affirmed on the authority of official statistics that Russians and Britons consume annually one pound of tobacco; but that Americans consume three pounds per individual.—J. Cook.

The Power of Ministry.—The subjoined extract is taken from the Philadelphia Inquirer of recent date and is a striking testimony from the Episcopal Bishop of Philadelphia to the spiritual views long held by Friends on the right origin of the Christian Ministry.

"Bishop Stevens delivered an address yesterday afternoon to a number of the ministers of the city on the subject, 'What is the Chief Power of the Ministry?' He thought that the answer to the question, 'Wherein does the chief power of the ministry lie?' could be found in the words of Christ when he said 'Ye shall have power after that the Holy Ghost has come among you.' The speaker continued 'We may know a great deal about Christ and yet not be able to preach Christ.' It is not enough to be acquainted with his personal history, what He said and did, but one must be possessed of the Holy Spirit. Only as we know and understand the power of the Holy Ghost working in us can we preach Christ as He should be preached.' Knowledge of the truth is revealed only by the Holy Spirit. It does not come from mere study of the Bible."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Blight.—It has long been believed that the spores of a species of blight, common upon the barberry bushes, would develop on the wheat plant and produce blight there. This belief appears to be confirmed by experiments described in the Gardener's Chronicle for 1882, in which the spores of the barberry blight sown on wheat produced disease; and the spores of wheat blight produced a similar effect when sown on the barberry. In 1755 the province of Massachusetts passed a law requiring the owners of land to destroy the barberry bushes growing thereon, and the overseers of the roads to cut down those which might spring up in the public roads. The reason for the Act is given in the preamble which states: "It has been found by experience that the blasting of wheat and other English grain is often occasioned by barberry bushes to the great loss and damage of the inhabitants of this province."

The Origin of Cultivated Plants.—Alphonse de Candolle, one of the most eminent of living botanists, has published at Paris a work giving the results of his researches into this subject. The following statements are condensed by the Christian Advocate from a review of De Candolle's book in Nature.

Of the species discussed, 99 are traced to the Old World, and 45 are believed to be American. The best domesticated plants have developed their merits with the races that educated them. If we stumble now against the primitive stock, they might seem as little susceptible of development as the plants of the United States, whose capabilities are ranked so low. If the gardens of the United States are filled with Old World vegetables, the houses are inhabited by an Old World people. The two things seem to go together. The indigenous races could neither develop their latent vegetables, nor hold their own against an Old World, human invasion.

The turnip and rapeseed originated in Northern Europe. The cabbage was derived from the western coasts of Europe, where its wild stock may still be found. Purslane is wild from the Western Himalayas to Greece. The onion was brought from Western Asia.

As to textiles, the origin of flax is somewhat complicated. The inhabitants of the Swiss lake-dwellings did not use our present annual flax, but a subperennial sort indigenous to Southern Europe. This was displaced by a native of countries south of the Caspian, which was introduced into Europe and India by Arab races. The knowledge of hemp seems to have been brought into Europe by the Scythians about 1500 B. C. The grape-vine is indigenous in Western Asia, whence its use was carried to various countries by both Aryan and Semitic races; but it did not reach China before 122 B. C.

The almond seems to be a native of Western Asia, and perhaps Greece. As late as the time of Pliny the fruits were known to the Romans as Nuces Græcæ. The wild stock of our pears and apples seems to have been indigenous to Southern Europe and Western Asia, before the Aryan invasion. The quince is a native of North Persia, but seems to have been introduced into Eastern Europe in pre-Hellenic times. The pomegranate seems to have existed in France at an early date; but it died out, and was reintroduced from countries adjoining Persia into the Mediterranean region, of which it is now so characteristic a feature. The primitive home of the olive was apparently the eastern shores of the Mediterranean, where the Greeks discovered its useful qualities, the Romans learning them later. The home of the fig must be sought in the Southern Mediterranean shores and lands.

The common bean seems to have become extinct in a wild state; it may have originated south of the Caspian, and was introduced into Europe by the Aryan. The remains of lentils have been found in lake-dwellings of the Bronze Age, and it was probably indigenous in Western Asia, Greece, and Italy before its cultivation in these countries; subsequently it was introduced into Egypt. The chick-pea was carried from the south of the Caucasus by the Aryans to India and Europe. The earob is indigenous to the Eastern Mediterranean, whence the Greeks introduced it into Italy and the Arabs into Western Europe. De Candolle regards all the various kinds of wheat as derivatives of the small-grained kind found in the most ancient lake-dwellings of Western Switzerland. The origin of spelt* is very doubtful, and it may possibly be an ancient cultivated derivative from the wheat stock. As to barley, the inhabitants of the Swiss lake-dwellings cultivated both the two-rowed and the six-rowed kinds. Oats and rye seem to have originated in Eastern Europe. From Pliny's mention that the Germans used oat-meal, it is concluded that it was not cultivated by the Romans.

Procuring Birds of Paradise at Waigiou.—My first business was to send for the men who were accustomed to catch the birds of paradise. Several came, and I showed them my hatchets, beads, knives and handkerchiefs; and explained to them as well as I could by signs, the price I would give for fresh-killed specimens. It is the universal custom to pay for everything in advance; but only one man ventured on this occasion to take goods to the value of two birds. The rest were suspicious and wanted to see the result of the first bargain with the strange white man, the only one who had ever come to their island. After three days, my man brought me the first bird—a very fine specimen, and alive, but tied up in a small bag, and consequently its tail and wing feathers very much crushed and injured; I tried to explain to him and the others, that I wanted them kept as perfect as possible. Six others took away goods; some for one bird, some for more, and one for as many as six. They said they had to go a long way for them, and that they would come back as soon as they caught any.

The red birds of paradise are not shot with blunt arrows as in the Ave Islands and some parts of New Guinea, but are snared in a very ingenious manner. A large climbing Arum bears a red fruit of which the birds are very fond. The hunters fasten this fruit on a stout forked stick, and provide themselves with a fine but strong cord. They then seek out some tree in the forest on which these birds are accustomed to perch, and climbing up it fasten the stick to a branch and arrange the cord in a noose so ingeniously that when the bird comes to eat the fruit its legs are caught, and by pulling the end of the cord which hangs down to the ground, it comes free from the branch and brings down the bird. Sometimes when food is abundant elsewhere, the hunter sits from morning till night under his tree with the cord in his hand, and even for two or three whole days in succession, without getting a bite; while, on the other hand, if very lucky, he may get two or three birds in a day.

When it was necessary for me to return, most of the men who had taken payment from me had brought the birds they had agreed for. One poor fellow had been so unfortunate as not to get one, and he very honestly brought back the axe he had received in advance; another who had agreed for six, brought me the fifth two days before I was to start, and went off immediately to the forest again to get the other. He did not return however, and we loaded our boat, and were just on the point of starting, when he came running down after us holding up a bird, which he handed to me, saying with great satisfaction, "Now I owe you nothing." These were remarkable and quite unexpected instances of honesty among savages.—Wallace's Malay Archipelago.

For "The Friend."

Lydia Cooper, a notice of whose death appeared in No. 35 of "The Friend," we feel deserves from those who loved and knew her most intimately, a little further testimonial.

She was a much beloved member of Newton Particular Meeting, where she was constant in attendance whenever her health permitted. Of an unobtrusive character, she was faithful, tender and loving as a wife and mother, always kind and sympathizing to the poor and afflicted. In meekness and patience she was favored to endure increasing bodily weakness and suffering during the last year of her life with uncomplaining submission, and passed away without groan or struggle, and we doubt not the peaceful close of her innocent life opened to her a blissful immortality.

If Christians must contend, let it be like the olive and the vine, which shall bear most and best fruit; not like the aspen and the elm, which shall make the most noise in the wind.—Jeremy Taylor.

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 21, 1883.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

The annual gathering of this body commenced on Second-day, 4th mo. 16th. The first sitting of the Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders was held on the Seventh-day previous. It was marked by an unusual number of brief communications, the longest of which perhaps did not occupy more than ten minutes in its delivery. The general current of exercise seemed directed to two subjects—right source and qualification for true ministry and spiritual worship, and the religious training and education of the young. In reference to the first, the doctrine was clearly forth, that the Spirit of Christ revealed in heart of man is the foundation of all our testimonies. In speaking on the latter subject a fear was expressed that some in the care of their children reversed the order laid down by our Saviour, "Seek first the kingdom of heaven and the righteousness thereof"; were principally anxious to see them successful and prosperous in their outward business, trusting that the Heavenly treasures would somehow be subsequently attained. This was manifested in the meeting a willingness to examine into the weak places among and to labor for a reformation. There was much time spent in silent meditation; waiting on the Lord, and the meeting was felt to have been a favored and profitable one.

The concern expressed in it for our young people was in unison with that which largely prevailed in this Yearly Meeting a considerable time past, and which was principal cause that led to the appointment one year ago of the large committee which has been since laboring so extensively in the meetings and families of our members. The same exercise on behalf of this interesting class was manifested in the meetings for worship on the following day, when the most fervent, tender and impressive appeal was made to them to yield their hearts to the visitations of the Lord and Saviour.

Amid the discouragements which abound at the present time in our religious Society was cheering to have an undoubted evidence of the Lord's holy presence eminently manifested in shadowing those who were assembled to worship Him. It tended to refresh the faith of some, that He, who in days of old moved upon the hearts of thousands, had awakened an earnest desire to know how they might obtain power to overcome their sins and enter into the Divine rest; and who prepared them to receive as glad tidings the message of George Fox and his fellow-laborers turning them to the Light, Grace and Spirit of Christ, which would bring them salvation—would still care for his own precious cause and raise up those who would be as birth bearers in the Church, when the present laborers were removed from works to rewards.

At the meeting for business on Second-day after the usual opening, the minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings were read, omitting Address to our members, which was deferred to a future sitting. Among the subjects which claimed their attention, were the following: The circulation of the Address on demonizing literature and art, approved by ly Meeting one year ago. Of this 30,000 es had been printed and widely diffused. These about 8000 had been mailed to Libraries in various parts of the United States, a large number had been sent to the teachers of First-day schools, and to other persons whose character or position enabled them to exercise an extensive influence over others.

A committee had been appointed on the preservation of the Records of our Society, which had been recommended to its Yearly Meeting. They had prepared a set of queries relating thereto, which were forwarded to the different Quarterly Meetings. This matter was still under the Trustees of the Charleston Estate had authorized to pay $500 to Dunning's Book Monthly Meeting, Pa., (belonging to the former Yearly Meeting)—$300 to Deep River Monthly Meeting, N. C., and $425 to the Square Monthly Meeting, N. C., to assist in building or repairing meeting-houses. Trustees of this estate, having requested us as to the proper disposition of the applications which come before them, a committee had been appointed to consider this subject, whose report had been adopted, recommending the trustees freely to make appropriations for such uses, where no obstruction was presented; but not to assist in the erection or repair of meeting-houses where it was probable the meetings held therein would not be conducted in accordance with the ancient principles and practices of Friends.

The Report of the Book Committee showed a distribution of more than 4000 volumes, besides many pamphlets, during the year ended 31st mo. 1883. This branch of the business of the Meeting for Sufferings has been much developed during a few years past and has been supplemented by a fund derived from the estate of our late dear friend, Anna Cope, which has been applied to the publishing and distribution of "Passages from the Life and Writings of George Fox," a condensation of Fox's Journal; "A Brief View of Christian Doctrine," which is an abridgment of Barclay's Apology, and "Passages from the Life and Writings of William Penn," which is properly a new work, compiled from the various sources of information now accessible. Of these three valuable tracts, several thousand have been printed and circulated, of which no notice appears on the minutes of the Book Committee. The occurrence of a Bi-centennial celebration of the landing of William Penn in this country, opened the way for a wide distribution of this of William Penn, and about 1500 copies were spread abroad on that occasion. This tract, and a Life of Rebecca Hubbs, had been distributed during the year, to the list of those to whom the Book Committee distribute. They have also printed in portable form the lives of Elizabeth Ashbridge and Margaret Lucas, which were in the Friends' Library series.

The legacy left to the charge of the Meeting for Sufferings, about the year 1804, by Thomas Wharton, for the benefit of Friends in France and Germany, was one of the cares which that meeting had long been desirous to have relieved. Sums of money out of that had been sent at different times to France and Germany through the Meeting for Sufferings of London. A balance of about $1200 remained on hand. Through the visit of a member of the Meeting for Sufferings during last summer to Germany, it was found that Friends at Minden were at present in such a situation that some aid would be desirable; and the balance of the money was accordingly remitted—thus closing an account which had been a source of care for nearly 80 years.

The subject of judicial oaths having claimed attention, an essay on them and their effects had been prepared, designed to diffuse in the community at large correct views on the duty and importance of obeying the command of Christ, not to swear. It was a clear and forcible document.

The danger to which our members are exposed from the diffusion within the Society of principles and practices inconsistent with our religious profession, had occasioned much exercise, and led to the preparation of an address on these matters, the reading of which, as already stated, was postponed to give time for attention to some other business.

The proceedings of the Meeting for Sufferings were approved by the Yearly Meeting, and the publication and circulation of the essay on oaths was committed to its care.

One of the Quarterly Meetings having called attention to a case of application for membership by a person residing out of the limits of any meeting of Friends, a committee was appointed to consider the proper course to be pursued with respect to such applications.

The sitting this day was largely attended, and was a dignified and harmonious one—in which the business was transacted, as our discipline advises, "with decency, forbearance and love of each other."

The remainder of the account of the Yearly Meeting is deferred until next week.

Through the kindness of the publisher, we have received several numbers of The Gospel Expositor, a weekly paper published at Columbus, Ohio, and edited by Dr. Dougan Clark. In his "salutatory," the editor says: "Its object will be primarily and chiefly—but not exclusively—to promote the doctrine and experience of scriptural holiness."

Though the proprietor and conductors of this journal claim (as we suppose) to be members of the Society of Friends, yet its general tone is not in accordance with the doctrines and practices of our Society. It is therefore rather satisfactory than otherwise, that it does not assume to represent the views of Christian doctrine as held by the Society of Friends from the beginning. We suppose it may properly be regarded as speaking the sentiments of those who have most widely departed from our original standard.

Our Early Friends earnestly pressed upon all the necessity of holiness—as that without which no man can see God or be admitted into his Heavenly Kingdom; and this holiness or freedom from sin, they taught was wrought in man by faith in the teachings of the Light of Christ in the heart, and obedience thereto, whereby they were both taught and enabled "to live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world." They taught that the procuring cause of man's redemption was the mercy and forgiveness of God, who sent his Son into the world that we might obtain salvation; and that this salvation is experienced by the washing of regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, shed on us through Him, our Holy Redeemer—that whatever theoretical distinctions might be drawn between justification and sanctification, they were practically so united, that we could not experience one without partaking of the other.

The Gospel Expositor says: "Holiness as a distinct experience through faith in Christ, was taught definitely by George Fox, the founder of the Quakers."

As we understand the views of the conductors of that paper, they believe that we are delivered from the guilt of our sins, placed in a state of acceptance with God, and are therefore in a saved condition, (in other words, justified) by an acceptance of what Christ did for us when on earth in a body of flesh; and that this is independent of the practical redemption wrought within us by his Spirit. This redemption from the dominion of sin, they believe to be a subsequent experience, which may be instantaneously received by an act of faith.

George Fox was so far from holding such a view, that he distinctly states, "So far as a man is sanctified, so far is he justified, and no farther; for the same that sanctifies a man, justifies him; for the same that is his sanctification, is his justification, and his wisdom, and his redemption; he that knows one of them knows all; but he that doth not feel one of them, feels none of them at all." (Works, Ed. of 1831, Vol. 3, p. 450.)

He fully proclaimed the doctrine that redemption is through the blood of Christ; but he taught that the way to partake of that redemption was, not through the exercise of the natural powers of belief, but by receiving his Spirit in the heart, and walking in obedience thereto; and that those who so walked would receive a Divine and saving faith in Christ, and would know his blood to cleanse them from all sins. When he was commissioned to proclaim the Gospel to others, he says: "I was to turn [people] to the Grace of God and to the Truth in the heart, which came by Jesus; that by this Grace they might be taught, which would bring them salvation, that their hearts might be established by it, their words might be seasoned, and all might come to know their salvation nigh." He further adds: "I was glad that I was commanded to turn people to that inward Light, Spirit and Grace, by which all might know their salvation and their way to God, even that Divine Spirit which would lead them into all truth, and which I infallibly knew would never deceive any."

In the "Expositor" for "February 9th," the proprietor of the paper gives directions how to obtain sanctification, (which he speaks of as "a second experience obtained after conversion.") In these the following occurs: "A public confession of consecration and trust, with a continued abandonment of your all to God, is essential to the reception of this inestimable blessing to the Christian, and must be continued to retain it."

A public confession will be of no value whatever, unless it is called for by the Lord. If one of our early Friends had been giving such instructions, he would have advised his hearers to take heed to the Light of Christ, and walk therein. Thus Edward Burroughs says: "Whosoever will be saved with the salvation of God, must own the Light of Christ Jesus in his own conscience, and he must believe in this Light and walk in it." Thomas Stubbs: "Loving this Light of Jesus Christ, it will teach you to deny yourselves and take up the cross daily and follow the Lord Jesus Christ through the regeneration: and watching to be guided by it, the pure law of God will be set up in thee, and judgment will pass upon the vain, earthly, carnal part in thee." William Penn, in a letter of love to the young convinced, thus admonishes his readers: "This I am fully persuaded of, that the same pure principle of Light and Truth that hath appeared to give a certain discerning of our states and conditions, and wrought a conviction upon our understandings, is able to give us that succor and support, if our minds be but seriously stayed thereon, as shall sanctify us throughout in body, soul and spirit, and so preserve us clean to God over all."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Commissioner Raum is preparing regulations for the guidance of Collectors of Internal Revenue in regard to the withdrawal, transportation and storage of matches without the payment of stamp tax after the 15th of 5th mo. next, in accordance with the provisions of the new Internal Revenue act.

Orders from Postmasters were received at the Post-office Department on the 10th inst. for seven million postal cards.

The design for the new two cent postage stamp was approved on the 13th instant by the Postmaster General. It contains a tablet, upon which is a profile of Washington similar to that on the present three-cent stamp. Surrounding the profile is an oval band. In the upper part of the band the words "United States Postage," beneath the band a large "2," and at the extreme bottom of the tablet the words "2 cents." After the design is engraved the color will be decided upon.

The nickel 5 cent piece, bearing the word "cents," is now being issued from the mint.

The steamer Nestorian arrived at Boston on Seventh-day night with 650 passengers, most of them evicted Irish tenants from the counties of Galway, Mayo, Derry and Donegal, sent out by the British Government. The British agent furnished money to those who desired to go to places beyond Boston, the amounts—depending on the size of the family—varying from a few shillings to five or six pounds. The Parthia, from Liverpool, has arrived with a large number of the same class of emigrants.

The Department of Agriculture reports the average of winter grain at 80, against 104 last 4th mo., and 85 in 4th mo. 1881. The Department has received returns from the spring wheat region, showing that on 4th mo. 1st seeding was in progress but had not been finished anywhere. In Dakota and parts of Minnesota it had hardly begun, large areas being still covered with snow.

A tornado struck White Oaks Station, on the Little Rock and Fort Smith Railroad, ten miles west of Ozark, Arkansas, about one o'clock on Seventh-day morning, making great havoc there and in the surrounding country. Oak trees on the mountain sides were snapped like pipe stems; three meeting-houses, a gin mill, a planing mill and about twenty dwellings were demolished, a number of persons were injured, three fatally. The loss in property is estimated at $50,000.

The Secretary of the Treasury has decided to grant a request of the Hawaiian Government for the coinage of its silver money in the United States mints. The coinage will be done at San Francisco, and the dies probably made in Philadelphia Mint. The Hawaiian silver coins are of the denominations of one dollar, half a dollar, quarter of a dollar and eighth of a dollar.

The Secretary of the State Board of Health of Indiana has announced that the small-pox has assumed "alarming proportions" in that State. It is epidemic in many towns in the eastern and southern portions of the State, while scattered cases are reported in the other sections.

There is another flood at Helena, Arkansas. The water is within two feet of the level of the late flood, and is rushing through the old town break, submerging many plantations.

Northern Pacific Railroad officials at St. Paul say that large slaughter-houses will be established at points in the Yellowstone country, along the railroad, for the purpose of sending dressed beef to the East. This will be cheaper than shipping live stock.

T. W. Tallmage, of the Milwaukee Chamber of Commerce, has collected reports of the condition of the winter wheat crops in fifteen of the principal States. These reports estimate the damage at 20 per cent., making an aggregate of 100,000,000 bushels short of last year's crop.

Work in the pineries of Minnesota is practically suspended. The total cut of logs on the stream above St. Paul is 435,000,000 feet, which is 50,000,000 feet in excess of that of any previous year.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 417, which was 45 less than during the previous week, and 12 less than during the corresponding period of last year. Of the whole number, 227 were males, and 190 females: 76 died of consumption; 45 of pneumonia; 24 of old age; 17 of typhoid fever; 17 of convulsions; 14 of diphtheria, and 9 of scarlet fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 103½; 3½'s, 102½; 4½'s, 113½; 4's, 119½; currency 6's 129 to 132.

Cotton continues dull, but prices were unchanged. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 10½ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 8½ a 8½ cts. for export, and 9½ a 9½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in moderate request and steady. Sales of 2300 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.25 a $6.25; Pennsylvania family at $5; western do. at $5.25 a $6, and patents at $6.25 a $7.50. Rye flour is steady at $3.62½ a $3.75 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was dull and lower. Sales of 4600 bushels red, in car lots at $1.16 a $1.21. Rye is steady at 67 cts. Corn is dull and weaker. Sales of 12,000 bushels in car lots, at 61 a 66 cts. Oats are quiet. Sales of 10,000 bushels, in car lots, at 53 a 57 cts.

Beef cattle were in fair demand this week, and prices were rather easier: 2400 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5½ a 7½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

Sheep were in demand at full prices: 12,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4½ a 7½ cts., and spring lambs at $4 a $7 per head, as to quality.

Hogs were in demand: 3300 head sold at the different yards at 10½ a 11½ cts. per pound, as to quality.

FOREIGN.—On the 12th instant, Norman, Gallagher, Dalton, Wilson, Curtin, and Ansburgh, the six men recently arrested in London on suspicion of being connected with a dynamite conspiracy, were taken to the Bow Street Police Court and arraigned before Judge Ingham. Joseph Brady, one of the Phoenix Park conspirators, has been convicted and sentenced to be executed. Daniel Curley, another of their number, is now on trial.

The papers chronicle as a remarkable circumstance that William Leadham Bright, second son of John Bright, was married recently to Isabella McIvor Taylor. The ceremony was performed by Canon Farrar, and in the Carshalton Parish chapel, although both the bride and groom, and their families and friends are Friends.

The London Exchange Telegraph Company announces that a Commissioner has been sent from Queensland to take possession of the island of New Guinea as a dependency of Queensland.

A special committee of the Danish Folkthing has presented to that body a report upon the order issued by the Prussian Government on the 7th of 1st month. The committee says the order dealt unjustly with the Danes living in Schleswig-Holstein, and although the German Minister to Denmark at the time and since has disclaimed that his Government was actuated by any feeling of hostility toward them or the Danish Government, the wrong done to Denmark was not removed by his disclaimer.

Advices have been received from St. Petersburg to the effect that the secret police in that city, as well as at Moscow, are making numerous arrests at night time in consequence of the recent strong revival of Nihilist intrigues. On the 4th inst. 39 arrests were made in a house in Wassily Ostrow, where a quantity of prepared explosives was discovered. The newspapers are forbidden, on pain of complete suspension, to publish reports of arrests or of the trial of Bogdanovitch Stephanovitch and the other Nihilists, which was begun on the 9th inst. with closed doors. The London Evening News reports that 2000 persons have been arrested in Moscow on suspicion of being engaged in plotting against the life of the Czar.

A large section of country in the southern part of Russia is covered by water, owing to floods in the rivers. Traffic on the railways has been suspended temporarily.

There arrived in the Dominion of Canada during 3d mo. 8598 immigrants, and during the first three months of this year 20,646, against 20,191 during the first quarter of last year. There remained in the Dominion during the first quarter of this year 11,690 immigrants against 9844 in the first quarter of 1882.

Letters and Memoranda of William Scattergood.

"Philada., 9th mo. 4th, 1824.

My Dear Cousin,—A feeling of affectionate sympathy, I trust, subsists between us which will be broken by no common occurrence; I have wished many times of late, that we might be more and more united together by the bands of true gospel fellowship: that we might for our aim the same thing, and mind the same rule for its attainment, we might walk together in grace and in the saving knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ—pressing forward with a fixed and unflinching ardor for the mark of the prize which is high calling of God. I feel it, for my part, a precious privilege, poor and unworthy as I am, to be enabled to draw near to the footstool of mercy, and, by a sense of my many backslidings, humbly beseech Him, who has promised to be faithful to them that turn the battle to the Lord, that He would be with me in the way which I go.

And when I reflect upon the heavenly consolations which are sometimes permitted to enter into the soul, I cannot but desire that my much loved young friends could, or rather should be willing to undergo the sanctifying influence of the Divine Word, that they might be made fit vessels for the Lord of hosts to dwell in. It is a blessed state to be brought into; and although the means for its attainment may seem, as it is represented to be, to be of flesh and blood, and may tend to cast out many visionary prospects of unhalloved glory which we have formed, and every propensity to mere self-gratification, yet as we patiently abide the turnings and windings of his holy hand upon us, we are in his own good time, as the apostle expresses it, 'Reap if we faint not.' My soul is, I may say daily, introduced into such trials as these. They are not the prodromes of a moment; but the result of earnest desires that there may be those raised up who will stand as watchmen upon the walls, and pillars in the Church, which shall go no more out.

The inhabitants of our city are much excited by the approach of General La Fayette, whom thou hast no doubt heard. I could myself removed during next week (his probable stay here) from the scene of tumult and confusion it will doubtless create. Where can be his enjoyment of such foolish pomp and parade? Is this the design of man's creation? Are such extravagant manifestations of respect due from men to man—almost amounting to worship? and this too on account of war and bloodshed. This is a weighty consideration; and although I am ready to believe that the Almighty does look upon his poor creature man with an eye of infinite mercy, yet He is surely a just and righteous Judge. Would the same, even the same respect be paid to the ever adorable and glorious, yet lowly, meek and humble Saviour, who died to save millions of immortal souls from the bondage of sin and from endless perdition, should He appear at the present day in the manner he did near 1900 years ago? Oh! when will men learn true wisdom? when will they be taught that all the honors and pleasures of this life, are but as grass and as the flower that fadeth. Words are not strong enough to express the abject littleness of all earthly things when brought into comparison with those infinite and eternal. And what are man's short-sighted and short-lived projects when weighed in the balance with his future never-ending existence? The Scriptures hold up this in a very interesting point of view; exhorting to leave the perishing things of time, and to seek earnestly a better and an enduring substance. Truly how great an attainment must it be to become meet to be clothed upon with that house which is from heaven, that mortality may be swallowed up of life!

My reading of latter time has been much confined to the Scriptures; and the more I read these blessed writings, the more I learn of their tendency; and the more I see of their scope and design, the more I am astonished with the wonderful workings of Him, whose ways are indeed past finding out. I see them studded with jewels, precious jewels, which to those who find them are better than gold, yea than much fine gold. I think I may say I read them day by day with increased satisfaction; and with the hope that the relish for their invaluable contents may never be lost. It is a day in which their value is much decried. Those whose principles and whose lives have not been brought into subjection to the Holy Spirit which gave forth the Scriptures, and anxious to cast down such a barrier to their evil designs, boldly declaim against them as false. Those who thus cry out, cannot bring a single substantial argument to prove their position. Yet who so positive? who so dogmatical? I have latterly given myself to the examination of those proofs which stand in favor, together with some of the strongest arguments put forth against their authenticity. My searchings have thus far resulted in the fullest conviction that the shafts of infidelity must ever be levelled in vain. He whose will it was that the records of his ancient goodness to the children of men should be transmitted to future generations for instruction in the way of life will never permit them to fall to the ground, but will vindicate his own cause. Nevertheless, the tear of pity will fall for those, more particularly in our own religious community, who have been caught in the snares of the devil, and are led captive by him at his will. How important is it that those who are mercifully preserved upon the unchangeable foundation should seek for a qualification to intercede for these at the throne of mercy; remembering what is written: 'The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much.' There are many who have known better days; but who for want of a close attention to the nature of the insidious workings of the adversary, have been unwarily led astray. The situation of such as these is peculiarly stirring; and the awful consideration that the last state of some such is worse than the first, certainly calls for the deepest commiseration. That we should beware of falling from our first estate is of the greatest importance; remembering that, 'Let him who thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall.'

With affectionate desires for thy welfare in the best sense, and with love to all your family, I remain thy cousin,

WILLIAM SCATTERGOOD."

To the same.

"10th mo. 7th, 1824.

[After alluding to several deaths which had occurred in the family, he writes:] These deeply trying bereavements I hope may not altogether be without their good effect; and if the loss of an earthly father may be the means of arousing any of my much loved young friends to a sense of the importance of making Him our Father who sitteth on high and who has promised to be a Father to the fatherless in his holy habitation—if, I say, it may be the means of arousing us to a sense of this solemnly important concern, may we not bless the means which Infinite Wisdom has seen fit to employ, and thankfully and reverently acknowledge, that 'He hath done all things well.' As this comes to be our blessed experience, how joyfully can we adore the Hand that is thus stretched out for our sanctification, and under all the dispensations of his providence sincerely say in humble resignation and filial confidence, 'Thy will be done.' It is truly said, 'He wounds for his mercy's sake. He wounds to heal.' The means that are often made use of, to try and to prove the Christian traveller in his progress through this vale of tears, are such as seem calculated to overwhelm his feeble efforts, and many, many times prompt the exclamation, 'Lord! save, or I perish.' Thus under a sense of their own weakness and frailty, of their own utter nothingness and insignificance, they are led ardently to desire to supplicate that the Lord would be pleased to be with them in the way wherein they go, knowing that of themselves they can do no good thing. It is surely worth all the chastening and tribulation meted, poor rebellious creatures as we are, to have set before us, through them, such glorious prospects as those of becoming the inhabitants of the courts of the Lord's holiness, and of being forever present with the Most High. Moreover, how ought our hearts to be imbued with gratitude and thanksgiving to the glorious Giver of every good and perfect gift, for the way which is set open through the Mediator of the new covenant for poor lost man to return to a state of reconciliation and acceptance with the Father?"

After alluding to the arrival of a female minister from England, he says: "The situation of a gospel minister, in whatever circumstances he or she may be placed, is surely a very important one—one which calls for peculiar watchfulness, lest the cause which they are advocating should suffer by their contrary example. The situation of those who are thus called from home and all its endearments, from the comforts and enjoyments of their families and friends, to advance the interest of their Heavenly Master's kingdom in a foreign land, certainly claims the sympathy of every mind."

In reference to his sister being about to go to Westtown Boarding School, he writes: "I hope it may prove a lasting blessing to her; as I believe it has already proved to many of the present generation. I have no doubt there has been much good seed sown in the hearts of children while there; and although it may have lain dormant for a season, yet there is no doubt that precious and flourishing plants have been brought forth to the praise of the Great Husbandman, under whose direction, I trust, it was founded, and who still continues to bless the honest endeavors of those who feel an interest in its welfare, especially in the religious and moral improvement of its inmates."

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend,"

Isle of Capri.

Island of Capri, Italy, 2d mo. 22d, 1883.

My Dear Cousins,—Again at Capri, lovely Capri, where seven years ago I passed twelve days. * * * I am again permitted to breathe its pure air, and gaze upon its azure sea. * * It is still as lovely, its air is as soft, its sunshine as grateful, its flowers as attractive as of old, when we dwelt for a time among its peaceful people.

We arrived here on the 20th inst., having passed many weeks in Naples, where I had been mewed up too closely, and felt the need of "fresh fields and pastures new," and sunshine. We had three weeks before, returned from a week at Sorrento, where I had contracted a cold, which had added to my discomfort, and even here we were yesterday obliged to keep house and exercise ourselves in efforts to provoke the grape-vine trimmings and olive sticks into a blaze, upon a hearth and beneath a chimney built before the art of constructing smoke conduits had been discovered,—before the laws of pneumatics had been learned and Count Rumford had taught the art of remedying smoky chimneys! If the day was dreary the night was glorious, for the moon shed a silver radiance over fair white buildings, over olive terraces, over the grey heights of Monte Solaro, and flooded with beauty this already charming scene. To-day "a sunshine rich as fell, brightening of old with golden rain, the isles Apollo loved so well," is around us and laps us in its warm embrace. We have ventured out, and having rambled around the terraced walks among lines of olive trees to a high outlook, clamber down the rustic stone path, and picking our way along the steep slope that dips to the sea, we spread our shawls, and bask in the sunshine, to enjoy the dolce far niente (the sweet do nothing) appropriate to the day, the occasion and the scene. Above us are frowning escarpments of limestone, grey and broken and rough, and we sit upon the talus, still far above the waves that kiss the shore and throw a mantle of malachite upon the pebbles beneath. The varying blue and golden in their marble-like commingling and varying harmonies, are beyond the reach of art to imitate or describe, and find in the glories of malachite their worthiest resemblance. Far down to the water's edge the slope descends, grassy, stony, rocky, while flowers of many kinds, mostly unknown to the stranger, deck the sod even thus early. Hieraciums are recognized, which here take the place of dandelions, many large Euphorbias of remarkable aspect, of which I have observed six species, a wild thyme clings in crevices of the rock above us, and purple anemones at more distant points spread their bright petals more than two inches in diameter, to star the greenery beneath. A St. John's Bread—Carob-tree (Ceratonia siliqua) stands near by—the only tree besides the many grey olives that line the terraces, that is permitted to feed upon the scant soil of this rocky slope. Near us terrace beneath terrace steps down almost to the sea, each with contorted olives, of recent planting, but thrifty growth; and inland in a few sheltered places, the orange and lemon are glowing among their wealth of glossy foliage. How beautiful is a luxuriant orange orchard! the golden balls hanging in rich clusters or covering the mass of bright green with their golden color. We have seen them at Sorrento in all their glory, on a vast scale and impressive indeed, characteristic as they are of scenes so unlike anything even in our Atlantic land of rank productiveness. But the sea! the blue sea! how it sparkles in the sunshine,—how gently it laps the foot of yonder lofty rocks that rise like cathedral spires from the depths! and there they have stood and looked upon other men and other times. A Roman tomb, it is said, rests upon the summit of one, seemingly inaccessible,—the other is pierced and stands as a bridge, and through and beneath it small vessels can securely sail. These stately Farallioni, the grey rock of the island and the adjacent coast of the mainland, are tertiary limestone, the last raised above the sea in the convulsions or gradual changes, as it may be, that have overtaken nature; yet though geologically of yesterday, what scenes have they witnessed even within the historic period, on the sea and on the land around them! The traditions of nearly two thousand years still throw a pall over the sweet island once the home of the step-son of Augustus, and whose example, had he emulated, might now be among the honored names of Capri, instead of continuing through the ages to be the theme of execration. Whatever there may have been of evil, and there must have been much to color his story so fearfully dark, I apprehend the still much of exaggeration and much placed to the score of hatred by old enemies who were later safely beyond his reach. His best defence for the enormities of the last of Tiberius is that he was insane. Here, Capri, he could have enjoyed a paradisaic earth, in an almost inaccessible retreat; had he surrounded himself with elevating ennobling companionship, such as he so in his early days, or had he had the wisdom of Dioclesian, and found in his garden pleasures of peaceful occupation, he might have solicited to return to Rome, have been able to make the sage reply: "Did you know the delights I find in my garden at Salona, among my cabbages, you would not ask me to share with you the cares of the throne!" He could have exclaimed with Napoleon at Helena after a fatiguing exercise at success digging, "This is the happiest day of my life!" What a comment upon the hollowness of worldly ambitions, the worthlessness of the for which men spend time and strength often life itself in aiming to compass, do the remarks supply! How much more would the quiet, useful enterprises, that find the contented with its lot, and leave no sorrow. The morning has passed, we return to dinner.

In the afternoon my A— having taken a walk while I reposed, has returned with a great bouquet of wild flowers, brilliant and beautiful; numerous crocuses, the first of the season, jonquil and lovely white heath (Leucodendron arborea), and bright purple anemones at the gathering, and the fragrance of the lemon blossom with which it is scented, for lemons are both in fruit and in bloom at the same time, remind me that I am far away from my northern home. Alas! how often am I enabled upon to compare the loveliness of nature with the unworthiness of man: "where every respect pleases, and only man is vile." If this fair land has been the prey of unbridled ambition, and misguided attempts to man to its purposes, and to force him upon paths it was believed would result in the highest good! What a lesson its story is continually telling us! What a sermon against the union of "Church and State" does it perpetually preach. "Constraint makes but hypocrites," surely not converts, and the effort of Catholic restraint upon the minds and souls have but eventuated in rendering this people the most mendacious of men. "It is enough alone that needs the support of government. Truth can stand by itself." This is a new wise maxim, would that it had been known and regarded in times past! how might it have profited by its peaceful application!

2d mo. 27th.—I would like to give a sketch of our ascent of Monte Solaro, but to do justice would extend this scrawl beyond endurance if not already thus prolonged. I climbed its height, 2000 feet, on donkeys, found it rough, precipitous, rude and somewhat dangerous; one only of our five companions fell to the ground three several times happily unburt. A new road cuts off 249 steps up stairs, but 535 remain for those who would attempt the shorter way from Capri in the direction to Anacapri in the west of the island. I shunned them all, and by the graded Mount Adam our calvacade wound around, doubled upon the brink of the precipice that looked down nearly 1000 feet to the sea beneath, from which Naples, Vesuvius, Sorrento and the beauty of sea and land are spread before us. A mighty precipice towered above from whose grey, grooved sides hung at blue flowers and many a green growth, accessible. The level of Anacapri was soon reached, and we began to ascend the mountain by a way so rough, rocky and obscure, our little guide often mistook his way led us by zagzag steppings, dangerous difficult. Our poor donkeys had a hard time in this hard climb, until they could not go further, and we were compelled to go for ourselves, and learn how hard was the lot. But we could not do without them again brought them into service, and as they carried us to the summit were too tired to crop the tempting grass around and around them. I thought as they gazed upward from the fort, that their sad eyes were reaching us for driving them to heights where there was nothing for their enjoyment or, patient, hard used neddies! The view from the summit was extensive and truly grand. The islands—Baie, Posallipi, Sorrento, Capri, Amalfi, Salerno, Capri, lay basking in the hazy sunshine, a dreamy scene of love and peace. We stood within a dismally old fort, once a stronghold of the British, the site of the expulsion of Bonaparte—now a sad ruin. From its battlements the works descended almost sheer 2000 feet to the malapara shore below; but, “the waves that on unnumbered pebbles idly chafed, could be heard so high.” The descent was on foot and was painfully difficult; but refreshed ourselves by the way, and stopped to call upon the hermit brother Anselmo, who greeted us with a winning smile, and offered us his white wine before us. Passing through the chapel, his cell, &c., we stood on the lofty platform in front, that commands a fine view of the saddle of Capri and the village below, the distant forts and villa Pharos of Tiberius on the coast. Bidding farewell to our host we essayed the further ascent, and with many a weary step over the rocks and by sliding paths, and by a new course now dry, we reached our donkeys, already drawn up for remounting, and somewhat refreshed, I hoped. Where not too steep and precipitous, the mountain is terraced with sustaining walls, and vines in the terraces and olives in the upper are abundant. Wheat and lupines are also grown between. Much dark soil has gathered or caught in the hollows of the limestone, on the mountain side, but whence derived not obvious, but certainly, I thought, not the decay of the underlying rock. It is a source of improvement made available by busy peasants who have borne vast quantities of their heads to the terraces below; and the pabulum of growths for the life of the mountain.

There is inestimable blessing in a cheerful heart. When the soul throws its windows open, letting in the sunshine and preparing to all who see it the evidence of its peace, it is not only happy, but it has an invincible power of doing good. To all the beatitudes may be added, “Blessed are the peacemakers.”—United Presbyterian.

Decision of Character.

We bend in homage before the ambitious spirit which reached the true sublime in the reply of Pompey to his friends, who dissuaded him from hazarding his life on a tempestuous sea in order to be at Rome on an important occasion: “It is necessary for me to go, it is not necessary for me to live.”

Revenge has produced wonderful examples of this unremitting constancy to a purpose. You may have read of a Spaniard, who, being injured by another inhabitant of the same town, resolved to destroy him: the other was apprised of this, and removed with the utmost secrecy, as he thought, to another town at a considerable distance, where however he had not been more than a day or two, before he found that his enemy also was there. He removed in the same manner to several parts of the kingdom, remote from each other; but in every place quickly perceived that his deadly pursuer was near him. At last he went to South America, where he had enjoyed his security but a very short time, before his relentless pursuer came up with him, and accomplished his purpose.

You may recollect the mention in one of our conversations, of a young man who wasted in two or three years a large patrimony, in profligate revels with a number of worthless associates calling themselves his friends, till his last means were exhausted, when they of course treated him with neglect or contempt. Reduced to absolute want, he one day went out of the house with an intention to put an end to his life; but wandering awhile almost unconsciously, he came to the brow of an eminence which overlooked what were lately his estates. Here he sat down, and remained fixed in thought a number of hours, at the end of which he sprang from the ground with a vehement exulting emotion. He had formed his resolution, which was that all these estates should be his again; he had formed his plan too, which he instantly began to execute. He walked hastily forward, determined to seize the very first opportunity, of however humble a kind, to gain any money, though it were ever so despicable a trifle, and resolved absolutely not to spend, if he could help it, a farthing of whatsoever he might obtain. The first thing that drew his attention was a heap of coals shot out of carts on the pavement before a house. He offered himself to shovel or wheel them into the place where they were to be laid, and was employed. He received a few pence for the labor; and then, in pursuance of the saving part of his plan, requested some small gratuity of meat and drink, which was given him. He then looked out for the next thing that might chance to offer; and went, with indefatigable industry, through a succession of servile employments, in different places, of longer and shorter duration, still scrupulously avoiding, as far as possible, the expense of a penny. He promptly seized every opportunity which could advance his design, without regarding the meanness of occupation or appearance. By this method he had gained, after a considerable time, money enough to purchase, in order to sell again a few cattle, of which he had taken pains to understand the value. He speedily but cautiously turned his first gains into second advantages; retained without a single deviation his extreme parsimony; and thus advanced by degrees into larger transactions and incipient wealth. I did not hear, or have forgotten the continued course of his life; but the final result was, that he more than recovered his lost possessions, and died an inveterate miser, worth £60,000. I have always recollected this as a signal instance, though in an unfortunate and ignoble direction, of decisive character, and of the extraordinary effect, which, according to general laws, belongs to the strongest form of such a character.

But not less decision has been displayed by men of virtue. In this distinction no man ever exceeded, or ever will exceed, for instance, the late illustrious Howard.

The energy of his determination was so great, that if, instead of being habitual, it had been shown only for a short time on particular occasions, it would have appeared a vehement impetuosity; but by being unintermitted, it had an equability of manner which scarcely appeared to exceed the tone of a calm constancy, it was so totally the reverse of any thing like turbulence or agitation. It was the calmness of an intensity kept uniform by the nature of the human mind forbidding it to be more, and by the character of the individual forbidding it to be less. The habitual passion of his mind was a pitch of excitement and impulsion almost equal to the temporary extremes and paroxysms of common minds; as a great river, in its customary state, is equal to a small or moderate one when swollen to a torrent.

The moment of finishing his plans in deliberation, and commencing them in action, was the same. I wonder what must have been the amount of that bribe, in emolument or pleasure, that would have detained him a week inactive after their final adjustment. The law which carries water down a declivity was not more unconquerable and invariable than the determination of his feelings toward the main object. The importance of this object held his faculties in a state of determination which was too rigid to be affected by lighter interests, and on which therefore the beauties of nature and of art had no power. He had no leisure feeling which he could spare to be diverted among the innumerable varieties of the extensive scene which he traversed; his subordinate feelings nearly lost their separate existence and operation, by falling into the grand one. There have not been wanting trivial minds, to mark this as a fault in his character. But the mere men of taste ought to be silent respecting such a man as Howard; he is above their sphere of judgment. The invisible spirits, who fulfil their commission of philanthropy among mortals, do not care about pictures, statues, and sumptuous buildings; and no more did he, when the time in which he must have inspected and admired them would have been taken from the work to which he had consecrated his life. * * *

His attention was so strongly and tenaciously fixed on his object, that even at the greatest distance, as the Egyptian pyramids to travellers, it appeared to him with a luminous distinctness as if it had been nigh, and beguiled the toilsome length of labor and enterprise by which he was to reach it. So conspicuous was it before him, that not a step deviated from the direction, and every movement and every day was an approximation. As his method referred every thing he did and thought to the end, and as his exertion did not relax for a moment, he made the trial, so seldom made, what is the utmost effect which may be granted to the last possible efforts of a human agent: and therefore what he did not accomplish, he might conclude to be placed beyond the sphere of mortal activity, and calmly leave to the immediate disposal of Providence. * * * * *

This would be the proper place for introducing (if I did not hesitate to introduce in any connexion with merely human instances) the example of Him who said, "I must be about my Father's business. My meat and drink is to do the will of Him that sent me, and to finish his work. I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened till it be accomplished!"—John Foster.

For "The Friend."

William Caton's Ministry.

About the year 1655, being then not more than eighteen years of age, William Caton began his career as a minister. Few even in that day were more diligent in the duty of this sacred office, visiting most parts of England, and many places divers times, travelling chiefly or altogether on foot, often in the depth of winter; his ministry doubtless carrying with it its own evidence in the hearts of his hearers, as he writes that "the word of the Lord grew mightily, and many were added to the faith."

His experience in the work of the ministry may serve to illustrate that state of entire dependence and emptiness, into which gospel ministers must be brought, before they can truly witness the Lord to be unto them "mouth and wisdom," and to open for them "a door of utterance."

In speaking of his ministry he says: "Many large and precious meetings I had in the country, and the Lord was very much with me, who furnished me plenteously with his word and power; insomuch that I stood admiring, at sundry times, from whence I had that fullness. And it was not [admired at] by me only, but by many more, who looking with the eye of reason upon my earthly tabernacle or outward man, could not expect any great thing from me, being then but about twenty years of age; neither had I ever been in much profession, until I was convinced of the Truth of God. Yet plenty of heavenly things the Lord was pleased to open in me, and through me, to the end that I might communicate the same to the multitude, which sometimes being very great, I was ready to say within myself, 'Where shall I have wherewithal to satisfy all these.' And when I looked out to my own weakness and insufficiency, as of myself, I was ready to faint within me; but when I looked only at the Lord, and put my confidence entirely in Him, I was strong and courageous. For the Lord showed me this, by his eternal light, upon a time when I was bemoaning my own weakness, and groaning under a sense of the weight of the burden of the service and work of the Lord; saying or thinking within myself, Oh, such and such (meaning the ablest and wisest of the brethren) are so and so fitted and furnished, that they need not care what service they are called unto. But as for me, I am so simple, I am so weak, and I never have anything beforehand, neither do scarce ever know when I go into a meeting of several hundreds, what I shall say, or whether anything or nothing. And even when I was full of those and such like reasonings, the Lord showed me, I say, how 'they that had much, had nothing over, and they that had little had no lack,' even as it was with the Israelites of old. For the brethren that were wise and eminent, who had received much from the Lord, behold there was so much the more required of them; so that, of all they had, they had nothing over, but what they were to employ in the work and service of God. As for my own part, I, who was so little in mine own eyes, and so mean and contemptible in the eyes of others, had no cause to complain; for though it was often that I knew not what I should say when I went into a meeting; yet even at such a time hath the Lord been pleased to give me his word so plentifully, that through Him I was enabled to speak two or three, yea, sometimes four hours to the congregation, with little or no intermission. And often it hath been with me, that as I knew not before the occasion what I should speak in a meeting, neither could I remember after the meeting what I had spoken in it; and yet had plenty and fulness, though I was often daily at meetings, and not only so, but in the evenings also, the Lord giving a fresh supply always out of that gospel treasury, which affords both new and old."

"Now these things I rehearse, not for my own praise; but do say 'Not unto me; not unto me (that have nothing but what I have received) be the praise, but unto the Lord alone, who is the giver of every good and perfect gift. I can truly say that which I received of Him I delivered unto the people; and did much rejoice in the Lord, notwithstanding my great travails and sufferings; all which through Him were made easy to me, neither were they much to me, with all the dangers and perils I went through both by sea and land, in comparison of the power and presence of the Almighty, which did so sweetly and eminently accompany me in those days."

FLOWERS.

Selected.

With what a lavish hand
God beautifies the earth,
When everywhere, all o'er the land,
Sweet flowers are peeping forth!

Down by the babbling brook,
Up in the silent hills,
The glen, the tower, the shady nook,
Their breath with fragrance fills.

They creep along the hedge,
They climb the rugged height,
And leaning o'er the water's edge
Blush in their own sweet light.

They seem to breathe and talk,
They pour into my ear,
Where'er I look, where'er I walk,
A music soft and clear.

They have no pride of birth,
No choice of royal bower;
The humblest, lowliest spot on earth,
May claim the fairest flower.

TRUST IN PROVIDENCE.

On a bridge I was standing one morning,
And watching the current pass by,
When suddenly into the water
There fell an unfortunate fly.

The fishes that swam to the surface,
Were looking for something to eat,
And I thought that the hapless young insect
Would surely afford them a treat.

"Poor thing!" I exclaimed with compassion,
"Thy trials and dangers abound,"
For if thou escap'st being eaten,
Thou canst not escape being drown'd.

No sooner the sentence was spoken,
Than, lo! like an angel of love,
I saw, to the waters beneath me,
A locust descend from above.

It glided serene on the streamlet,
'Twas an ark to the poor little fly;
Which, soon to the land reascending,
Spread its wings in the breezes to dry.

Oh! sweet was the truth that was whisper'd,
That mortals should never despair;
For He who takes care of an insect,
Much more for his children will care.

And though to our short-sighted vision,
No way of escape may appear;
Let us trust; for when least we expect it,
The help of our Father is near.

THE MOTHER HEART.

I am cutting papers to-day, mother,
(Papers to cover a shelf,)
And saving out bits for my scrap book;
But unlike my former self,
With the thoughts that are grand and noble,
And the lines the poet sings,
I am saving some very simple
And decidedly childlike things.

For throned in her chair beside me,
Sits the wee one, dainty and sweet,
And I trust in the days that are coming
She will care these lines to repeat.
I think that, in planning her life-work,
The same fair future I see
Which you saw in the long ago, mother,
When you planned and prayed about me.

I long to come home at the twilight,
And sitting down by your feet,
Listen again to the Bible tales
You used long ago to repeat—
Of Adam, and Eve, and Abel;
Of Noah, who heard and obeyed;
Of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob,
With the faith and the love they displayed.

There was Joseph sold into Egypt,
And Moses before the king,
And David, who slew Goliath,
With a little stone in his sling;
There was Samuel called at night-time,
And Jonah cast in the deep,
And many a dream and vision
Of prophets and kings asleep.

Then there was the wonderful story
Of the Child in a manger bed,
Who marked the pathway to glory
With tears and blood that He shed.
Dear mother, that "old, old story"
Is the light of my life to me,
And I want to train up my children
To be all He would have them be.

A Thousand Children.—An old man I lately died in Vienna, whose name deserves to be chronicled in all lands for the singularity of his life. Ferdinand Reidt I been known in his own city as the "Father of the Orphans" for nearly half a century. He was a man of considerable means, and was happily married, but it was a great grief to him and his wife that they continued to be childless. Herr Reidt said to his wife, "Sir, we are not to have children of our own, or we not be parents to some of those who are fatherless and motherless?" He was a man of action, and began at once to carry his conception into practice. He commenced by taking fatherly charge of two or three orphans, but his zeal and repute increased to such extent that, at the time of his death, he was legal guardian of more than a thousand fatherless children. Those whom he adopted in this manner were not fitfully taken up and then let drop, but he kept conscientious watch and ward over them from their early education.

until their marriage, or their start in life at the close of their apprenticeship. He never sought fame or publicity, and took no credit to himself for his devotion to one who had no natural claim upon him. That he is departed, however, every one speaks of his singular life, its quietness and restless energy, its conscientiousness and its fidelity to his self-imposed obligations. He began by asking as a favor to be accepted as "honorary guardian" of two or three persons, serving without fee or reward, and calling, which he had thus taken up for his own satisfaction, as he put it, was in time regarded by many of his fellow-citizens as a part of official occupation, which he was bound to fulfil.—London Globe.

For "The Friend."

Our Late Yearly Meeting.

With deep feelings of gratitude for the united mercies vouchsafed to us during the various sittings of the late Yearly Meeting, many members, it is apprehended, return to their respective homes after its solemn close on Sixth-day last.

The unusually large attendance, the unanimity of judgment in regard to the various important subjects considered, as well as the solemnity that prevailed, were all causes true and reverent thankfulness; may they be held in grateful remembrance by all!

In view of the probably increased attendance in future, both by our own members, as well as those from more distant places, the variety, if not the necessity, of providing a convenient and comfortable lodging place is forcing itself on the attention of many minds. It is apprehended that some are prevented from attending Yearly Meeting who would gladly do so, if they knew of a place near the meeting-house, where they could be accommodated with food and lodging at a moderate cost.

The opening, during the late Yearly Meeting, of a temporary home on a limited scale, supported by a few Friends, afforded accommodation to quite a number of this class, and a step in the right direction. The kindness and liberality extended to it by a few Friends of Philadelphia, is much to be commended, and it is believed if a larger establishment of the kind could be provided by next Yearly Meeting, by some official department of the Society, conducted in a Society capacity, and located near the meeting-house, where lodgings could be had at a moderate cost, it would afford positive relief to very many who are to attend the Yearly Meeting, but who have no place to look to for shelter during its sittings. It is to be hoped that some may open in the minds of Friends who have authority, to consider the subject in all its bearings, and take such action as may lead to the relief of many country members.

There can be no appearance more hopeful and promising in childhood and youth, than the hardness of conscience respecting small sins. A child who is never inclined to plead excuses for what is known to be wrong, by saying, "Is it not a little thing?" who resists improper thought, forbids a hasty word, and fears the slightest deviation from the path, bids fair to rise by gradual but certain steps to true excellence. But whatever may be our view of the subject, it is certain that it does not, in any sense, condemn small things. He looks at motives more than at actions; at thoughts more than at words; and by these we shall be judged. He does not despise the day of small things; the bruised reed, the smoking flax, the grain of mustard-seed, the little leaven:—over these small beginnings He watches with patient and gracious care, till by little and little they attain to perfection.

For "The Friend."

Gather up the Fragments.

A valued friend has forwarded for insertion in "The Friend," the following notice of a remarkable communication of Thomas Evans in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of 1867. It may be regarded as his dying testimony against those superficial ideas of religion which tend to draw the attention of people away from the work of Christ in their hearts; for though his life was prolonged till the 5th month of the following year, he was confined at home by disease, and unable to meet with his friends at the time of their next annual assembling.

There are probably many who were present on that memorable occasion who remember the holy authority and divine power which accompanied this testimony, under which a willingness was wrought in the mind to follow the Saviour whithersoever He might lead—even if that should be, as in days of old, to suffer persecution for his sake.

When the late Samuel Cope was near the end of his long life, passed in the bosom of our Society, and with the opportunity of listening to many of the most eminent preachers who have been raised up amongst us in the present century, he was asked, what particular sermon had left on his mind the strongest impression, as to the degree of the Divine anointing and authority which was manifested by it. His reply indicated, that this communication of Thomas Evans, bore the most impressive evidence of being "in the demonstration of the Spirit and with power."

"We were favored this morning in the sitting of the Yearly Meeting, with a remarkable overshadowing of Divine Goodness, under the ministry of our worthy friend Thomas Evans, who, though his outward tabernacle is frail and tremulous, yet is a strong man in the Lord. His communication followed the reading and answering of the first three Queries. In the course of which he spoke much of there being a great deal of what might be termed surface religion in these days, not only amongst other societies, but it was creeping into our own. We could hear flourishing accounts of other societies, how prosperous they were, and how much they were doing, and while he believed there were many amongst them who clearly saw and mourned over such a superficial religion, yet, the great tendency was, to bring the people to a literal and head knowledge merely; that which is obtained by the exercise of the intellectual faculties, without experiencing that change of heart which it is necessary for all to experience for themselves. There is no other way to come to Christ but by the Cross. Said there were many who had need to be themselves instructed in the rudiments of the doctrine of Christ who took it upon themselves to teach others. These do plead in excuse that our early friends were very active in going up and down, preaching and doing good, &c. But what preparatory tribulations and exercises did they first endure, nor did they presume to go in their own wills, but they felt a distinct call to service, the what, the where, and when!

In perusing the writings of Geo. Fox, we might see he often makes use of this language;—'I was moved;' to do so and so, and Wm. Penn said 'we were changed men ourselves before we went about to change others.' And the apostle said 'That which we have heard, which we have seen, which we have looked upon with our eyes, and our hands have handled of the word of life, that declare we unto you.' And much more to show that all our efforts in our own will, and by the strength of our intellectual faculties would be of no avail. How was it with Leigh Richmond? a minister in the Episcopal Society. He was at length favored with a powerful visitation from on High and humbled in dust, saying he must go back and begin at the beginning. How was it with Cowper's brother? On a bed of sickness he was brought to a like acknowledgment. In both instances they were brought to see the utter insufficiency of themselves by all their scholastic attainments to make themselves acceptable and true ministers of the gospel, &c., with much more, accompanied with life and authority.

Many wanted us to be an aggressive people, to go forward and gain converts and do a great deal and make a show. He believed the time was coming when we would be an aggressive people, but it would be by submission to the leadings and guidance of Him whose is the cause, and not in the will of man."

A recent letter from a friend states, that Thomas Evans was one of the committee named in 1867 to draft a minute on the state of the Society; and that he was urged by one of the other members of the committee to embody in the minute the substance of the testimony delivered by him—though such an exercise, partaking so largely of the character of gospel ministry, would seem much less striking when put in words. The writer of the letter adds, "I do not know that I ever, before or since, listened to such a stirring and profoundly solemn and reaching communication."

The following extracts from the minutes of 1867 appear to be those which more especially refer to the concern expressed by Thomas Evans.

"We cannot doubt that the Lord has preserved within the professing Church a noble band of witnesses to the spirituality of the Gospel and the transforming power of his grace. These, whatever their profession, and whether conspicuous in good works or more obscure, are the true Israel of God whose circumcision is that of the heart, in the Spirit and not in the letter, whose praise is not of men but of God. But there is abundant evidence that a large portion of those who claim the name of Christians, are satisfied with an outside performance of rites and ceremonies, and substitute obedience to the moral law and works of their own righteousness for submission to the crucifying power of the cross of Christ, and walking in that strait and narrow way in which alone is found the flock of his companions.

There are influences operating in the present day, both within and without the pale of our Society, the tendency of which is to draw the members from the simplicity and spiritnality of our christian profession, and from a faithful and consistent support of the principles and testimonies of the gospel as always held by us, into a nearer conformity to the religion, the worship, and ways of the world. These influences are apparent in the same disposition to shun the daily self-denial and cross-bearing belonging to the Christian; in the effort to reduce religion very much to a formal and intellectual work, which the unaided powers of man may originate or promote; to smooth and widen the path to salvation, so as to make it more easy and attractive to the tastes and inclinations of the unregenerate mind; and to substitute works of a benevolent or ostensibly religious character, for lowly watchful waiting, in silent introversion, at the feet of Jesus, to be taught of Him, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and who only can savingly instruct in the things which belong to the soul's peace.

Minds which have been favored with the precious, tendering visitations of the Lord's Spirit; have been turned from the vanities of the world to seek the durable riches and righteousness of heaven, and in inward, silent prostration to bear the operation of the Spirit of judgment and burning, to purify from the pollution of sin, and to create them new creatures in Christ Jesus, may, it is to be feared, have had their attention diverted from this indispensable work in themselves, to their serious injury, by being persuaded that it is necessary they should at once become active in undertakings professedly designed to promote the cause of religion; while some who may be a little further advanced, have been dwarfed and withered by being urged into performances to which the Master had not called them; for which they had not undergone the requisite preparation, and which were mainly attributable to the unsanctified activity of the natural will.

The awakened mind is readily influenced by the desire to be doing something for Christ's cause, and unless it watches diligently unto prayer, in the Light of the Lord, the will of man prompts this desire into unbidden activity; takes pleasure in it; gradually dims the spiritual vision, and leads to the substitution of these formal services, for the patient abiding under the heart-changing and crucifying work of the Holy Spirit in the soul, which is in danger of settling down at ease in them. We should ever bear in mind the words of our dear Lord, "Without me ye can do nothing;" and also that we are told such "as kindle a fire, compass themselves about with sparks, walk in the light of their fire, and in the sparks that they have kindled, shall have this of the Lord's hand; that they shall lie down in sorrow."

In the feeling of Christian love and interest for all our dear Friends, and especially for the younger class, we tenderly desire that we may all diligently watch against these plausible and delusive tendencies, and strive to dwell much inward with Christ Jesus, in reverent, silent retirement from the many alluring voices that are abroad, seeking above all to be taught of Him who is the only saving Teacher, and who will not fail to give true peace and rest to all who come to Him, take his yoke upon them, and learn of Him, who is meek and lowly of heart.

Thus, the work of sanctification will be carried on; all the preparatory baptisms of the Holy Spirit and of fire will be endured; and when the period arrives in which the Lord sees meet that any should engage in more public or active service, his call and command will be distinctly and intelligibly heard, pointing out what, and when, and where; and He will vouchsafe his own wisdom and strength to perform faithfully whatever He requires, and cause his blessing to rest upon it; and without these, all our efforts to advance his cause must prove unavailing.

Hat-honor.—I was once myself in France (before I professed the communion I am now of) set upon about eleven at night, as I was walking to my lodging, by a person that waylaid me, with his naked sword in his hand, who demanded satisfaction of me for taking no notice of him, at a time when he civilly saluted me with his hat; though the truth was, I saw him not when he did it. I will suppose he had killed me, for he made several passes at me; or I in my defence had killed him, when I disarmed him; I ask any man of understanding or conscience, if the whole ceremony were worth the life of a man, considering the dignity of the nature, and the importance of the life of man, both with respect to God his Creator, himself, and the benefit of civil society.—W. Penn.

Serving God in our Daily Duties.—The anecdote is told of the excellent Cecil, that calling one day, to see one of his parishioners, a blacksmith, who was diligently at work in his shop, the latter began to apologize for his appearance, and that he was not suitably dressed to receive his pastor, when Cecil pleasantly, but seriously stopped his apologies by saying, "May the Lord, when He comes, find me, as I find you, diligent and busy with your appropriate work."

And when a lady once said to Wesley, "Suppose you knew you were to die at two o'clock to-morrow night, how would you spend the intervening time?" he replied, "Why, just as I intend to spend it now."

And so when the celebrated dark-day came over New England, in 1780, and when it was proposed that the Legislature of Connecticut should adjourn because they thought the Day of Judgment was approaching, the memorable reply of good old Abraham Davenport, was, "If the Day of Judgment is not approaching, there is no reason for adjournment; and if it is, I choose to be found doing my duty, so bring in the candles!" And so when, under the pungent preaching of John, the soldiers, roused by his powerful appeals, came to ask, "And what shall we do?" he said unto them, "Do violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely, and be content with your wages."

Serving God in the daily occupations of life; this is the lesson, in all these cases, so pointedly taught us. For the common avocations and duties of every-day life are all designed to be, and to a right spirit as truly may be, the gate of heaven as the sanctuary itself. All of them are intended to be, and all in fact are means of grace; that is, they are means for developing and exercising our Christian graces, in the practice of which we gain the discipline and training that form us to a high and holy character, and fit us for duty and for heaven. The pulpit may and does teach the way of duty, but life is the school in which we are to practise it. Our trade, or profession, or calling, the right ordering of our property, or farm, or merchandise, our family or household or business cares, each of these may be means of access to God and of faithfully seeing Him. So that a busy life, instead of being an irreligious life, or one that necessarily breaks in upon our enjoyment of God, may give us nearer access to, and therefore greater joy in him.

The laborer toiling at his daily task, the mother diligently training up her children, taking the oversight of her household, the merchant in his counting-house, the professional man in his office, the farmer on his farm or the servant in his daily duties, each may not only find a sphere for the exercise and growth of his graces, for patience and gentleness and contentment and charity and self-denial, but through these, for that nearer to and joy in God, which only the good and faithful servant may expect, or can find. Truly spiritual life does not mean a life of exemption from common and every-day duties, but it does mean the discharge of those duties whether they are what we call sacred or secular, with a right aim, and in a holy and heavenly spirit, and that is the spirit that will anywhere find and serve and enjoy God. "I that is faithful in that which is least, will be faithful also in much."—Nat. Baptist.

The Holy Spirit God's Agent in Salvation.—The Holy Spirit is the efficient agent in the regeneration of lost men. No masterly eloquence, no exhaustive learning can supply his place. "Paul may plant and Apollon water, but God giveth the increase." The consolidation of all human agencies is comparatively inoperative in the work of man's renewal and uplift to spiritual life. It is "not by might, nor by power, but by My Spirit saith the Lord." This conclusion is full of significance to all who are endeavoring to lead men into a better life. Not the elaborateness of our efforts, but the presence and power of the Spirit of God, is the essential of success. We are to concern ourselves less about our intellectual greatness and more about our fitness to be instruments, through which and with which the divine power can work.

The coarsest reed that trembles in the marsh,
If heaven select it for its instrument,
May shed celestial music on the breeze
As clearly as the pipe whose golden tip
Befits the lip of Phœbus.

Dunkards.—The St. Louis Times-Democrat contains the following sprightly letter, giving some account of the Dunkards, and written by a fashionable woman of that city who has attended one of their meetings.

"Says Carlisle, 'All goes by approximation in this world,' and everything is relative, and 'wrongness' by the greater or less degree prominent according to its environment. Rebricks were eminently pretentious and smart until some one reared a stone front, and, by the same ruling, man is well satisfied with himself until he is set down among angels. Thus much I reasoned last Sabbath morning, and contritely added my separate sins, which had accumulated to an amazing sum. My collected wickedness stood out in startling eminence, as I sat down among a most godly people. Having heard of the existence of most peculiar sect, I repaired to their place of meeting, which I found in the north end of town. They are the Brethren, and are of Dunkard school; their singular customs press one lightly until, seated in their midst, influence is felt of their honesty, sincerity and piety.

The men wear full beards, and long hair tied in the middle, thrust back of the ears covering the collar. One face struck me peculiarly. Such an one I never before saw, or thing that approached it. It bore a most repulsive resemblance to that which the actors have portrayed to us as that of the mother of Mary, the purest face ever worn by a woman, absolutely free from a tracing of guile. I was perfectly fascinated and dwelt long on the absolute beauty of that faultless face, and I felt mean while lest he should speak, and destroy the illusion. The woman wore simple white caps, their dress plain Quaker degree, no ruffles, no puffs, nor the faintest hint of a shirr. The simplicity of these garments lent a happy air of purity to the matron and maid. The preacher extended their severe doctrines, with a plainness not to be misunderstood.

I felt wonderfully insignificant, as I sat bearded in my Sunday clothes, which before looked exceedingly humble. In my experience it was the only instance wherein I had elegance of vesture at a discount. Unfortunately I had removed my fur coat on entering, and had thus exposed my partnership in original sin, by sundry bits of ribbon and lace. Each jet bead, which on my outstart had viewed with such comfortable satisfaction, was then an accusing eye. Thus you see as before, how materially the standpoint, through the variance of visual rays, alters the effect of the original object. I felt profound thankfulness that my friendly gloves covered my hands, when the preacher hit upon the metaphor of jewels. I tucked my bracelets, unbuttoned my sleeves, and longed to take out my eyes. Such a poor, vain peacock was I. In my apparel, he condemned worldly pleasures, dancing and theatres mainly.

Our attractions have been such that I have had an unusual amount of play-going lately, and at that moment my opera gloves were very cool. These transitions of thought from self-condemning, yet one cannot say but thankful berating by a righteous man is beneficial. The sensations of being taken to task are very singular in this easy day of liberal light, I was forced to transcribe. Passing the point where I felt he preached directly at me, I found much meritorious worth in the words of this simple man. At close of day he approached with friendly mien, and I learned. They are a wealthy people, and are to erect a church here shortly. They have no contributions, have no paid ministry, but seven serving a congregation. They do not go to war, and let the law alone, never an oath, recognize no secret organization, and are prohibitionists. They practice abstention of the 'holy kiss,' and live to the principle of the quotation, 'Don't pull down other people's houses; build a better one and invite them over.' The women do not wear the hair, nor wear hats, which article of count belongs exclusively to men.

A young girl was recently expelled for wearing a hat; they neither wear gold, and are equally pious and fast horses. The observance of Communion celebration is peculiarly their own. Following the New Testament literally, they prepare 'for the Lord's Supper' with a good, substantial meal,' around which all assemble as in one family. Before eating the Biblical ceremony of washing the feet is gone through with. After the Supper, the bread and the cup is blessed and partaken of. Leaving this pious people, one can but feel their presence has a purifying influence within this tainted town. The reflecting mind is amazed that with so much iniquitous dust floating upon the air, as is blown about these modern days, they should hold themselves so spotless. Their self-control and self-denial is worthy of a Spartan, and Lycurgus could not make more stringent laws than did this Dunkard."

Judicial Oaths.—The Spanish Chamber of Deputies has passed a bill permitting the substitution of affirmation for the oath, when desired.

FOURTH MONTH 28, 1883.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

On Third-day (4th mo. 17th) the Queries and answers were read. In deliberating on the condition of things amongst us, as thus brought to view, the meeting was dipped into much religious exercise, under the pressure of which many of those present, both of our own members and of visitors from other Yearly Meetings, labored for the removal of the deficiencies which are apparent.

Among other subjects that claimed attention cautions were extended against a superstitious removal of the hat on entering places for worship, or approaching a corpse at the time of funeral, and against the use of plural language to one person. The spiritual dwarfishness which must ever result from a want of full obedience to the convictions of the Spirit of Truth, was adverted to; and we were reminded that true religion had ever led its followers into plainness and simplicity. A disregard of the testimonies of our Society on these subjects is an inlet to the spirit of worldliness which, if allowed to spread, will eat out the life of religion. The practices of Friends in these matters were not the result of any formal agreement or conclusions of the founders of the Society, but naturally grew out of the fundamental principle of the Light of Christ, in the heart of man, which William Penn terms the root of our doctrines. This led our early members, as it always leads its obedient children, into watchfulness over all their words and actions, and gave them a testimony to bear against pride and vanity.

With thankfulness it may be said that the good presence of the Lord was evident in the assembly, tendering the hearts of some; and, it may be hoped, raising fresh desires to walk uprightly and consistently before Him.

On Fourth-day, the meeting was occupied with the reading and consideration of an Address prepared by the Meeting for Sufferings, setting forth several of the leading doctrines which have ever been held by the Society of Friends, bearing a renewed testimony against the departures in principle and in practice which have crept into our Society, and extending cautions against becoming infected with those errors.

This essay bears a clear testimony to Christ as the Author of our salvation, to his coming and sufferings in the flesh, and to the work of his Spirit in the heart of man as the means by which we must be saved. It proclaims the doctrine, that while we are reconciled to God by the death of his Son, we are to be saved by His life—the life of Christ inwardly revealed. It points out, how the fundamental doctrine of the Light of Christ as God's gift for man's salvation, was the root from which our manner of worship and other distinguishing practices flow;—and also how a departure from this has led to corresponding departures in practice which, if unchecked, would destroy the character of our religious meetings.

A solemn and comfortable feeling attended the reading of the document; and the revival in its pages of many of the clear testimonies borne by our early members to the truth was refreshing. It was very largely united with, and without a dissenting voice directed to be published and circulated.

It is a source of great satisfaction that the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia has thus once more re-affirmed in unequivocal language, its adherence to those doctrines and testimonies, for which it has contended during many years.

On Fifth-day, meetings for worship were held as usual in the morning. In the afternoon, the Report of the Committee in charge of the Westtown Boarding School was read. It was an interesting document, and represented the institution to be in a prosperous condition. The warm interest felt in this nursery of our Yearly Meeting had been manifested during the year by several donations to its funds—$16,000 having been received from one Friend, since deceased, and several other sums from others. The Committee were desirous of introducing several improvements in the heating, ventilating and other arrangements, for which the present building (erected nearly 90 years ago) was not thought to be adapted, and they asked the permission of the Yearly Meeting to erect new buildings, if funds for the purpose should be voluntarily subscribed. This permission was given, and the whole subject left in the charge of the Committee.

The Reports from the Quarterly Meetings gave the number of children of school age as 844, of whom 177 were receiving their education in schools not taught by members of our Society.

The Yearly Meeting again recommended to its members to abstain from the use of all beverages which could intoxicate.

On Sixth-day the meeting closed. The committee appointed one year ago to visit the meetings and members made their report. They had been industriously employed, all of the meetings had been visited, many of them several times, and portions of the committee had gone into the greater part of our families. They had found a body of men and women who were concerned for the prosperity of the cause of truth; and much interest had been felt for the younger members, among whom there is reason to believe a renewed visitation of Divine love is operating. They had felt that as to a middle aged class, much loss had been sustained both by individuals and the Church, from a want of more full obedience to the Divine requirements, which had retarded the spiritual growth of many. The committee was released from their appointment, and their report directed to be printed in the Extracts from the Minutes of the Yearly Meeting.

A committee was appointed at the first sitting of the Yearly Meeting to consider the proper course to be pursued where individuals are brought under conviction of our principles, and desire to be received into membership, whose residence is remote from any meeting of Friends. This committee proposed the adoption of a rule of Discipline, authorizing Monthly Meetings to act on such applications in the same manner as if they resided within the usual limits of such meetings, which was accordingly done.

The reading of a memorial for our beloved friend, Elizabeth Stroud, of Wilmington, Del., brought a precious covering of solemnity over the meeting.

A Friend from another Yearly Meeting, who was in attendance, proposed a visit to the women's meeting. Though sympathy was felt for him, the way did not open with that clearness which is desirable in such cases.

This sitting, as well as those which preceded it, was favored with a precious covering of solemn and tender feeling, drawing the hearts of those present nearer unto each other—and under this feeling the meeting closed.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The little towns of Wesson and Beauregard, in Mississippi, were devastated by a tornado about four o'clock on First-day afternoon last. Twenty-seven houses in Wesson were demolished, while the whole of Beauregard was destroyed. At Wesson, according to the latest reports, 13 persons were killed and 60 injured; at Beauregard the killed numbered 23, the injured 90. The town of Tillman, on the Vicksburg and Meridian Railroad, was also destroyed, and several persons killed and injured there. The tornado passed near Aberdeen in the same State, killing 8 persons and injuring about 50. It also swept through lower Georgia, killing, according to one estimate, 25 persons in that State. A terrific gale struck West Point, Mississippi, at 12.20 on the same afternoon. It was accompanied by "torrents of rain and the largest hail ever seen" there. The Court House, two hotels, Flanagan Hall and several other buildings were unroofed and otherwise damaged, but no persons were killed.

According to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, Captain James B. Eads, projector of the ship railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, asserts that "the work is being vigorously prosecuted, and that the massive railroad will be finished long before De Lesseps' Panama Canal is opened."

An epidemic of glanders has prevailed among the horses in Whiteside and Carroll counties, Illinois. In the latter county, a man and his son contracted the disease and died.

Rain fell throughout California last week. An average wheat crop is now believed to be ensured in every part of that State. The seeding of wheat in Dakota is about finished. Contrary to expectation, the winter wheat crop in Wisconsin promises to be the largest for several years.

The New York Tribune publishes several columns of reports from the Western and Northwestern States describing the condition of the winter wheat crop. They indicate a yield which, if not perhaps equal to the full crop of last year, will be at least up to the average of the wheat crops for several years past. Reports of damage from severe cold are in most cases proved unfounded. In actual results, however, it is too early yet to do more than give indications.

Professor Henry Morton, of the Stevens Institute of Technology, delivered an address in New York on Second-day night, in which he is said to have shown by experiments that "by a simple contrivance and at slight expense electricity could be used as a motive power, not merely to propel street cars, but to run the most complicated kind of machinery." The energy stored in a box a cubic foot large, he said, could take a car full of passengers from one end of New York city to the other. He claimed that "the contrivance might exceed in value the invention of the telephone, as the secret of applying electricity as a motive power has hitherto been sought in vain."

The Delaware House of Representatives on the 17th indefinitely postponed the Senate bill for the submission of the question of license or prohibition to the popular vote.

In the Senate of Connecticut, the prohibitory Constitutional amendment was defeated for lack of a two-thirds vote in the affirmative.

The Constitutional Prohibitory Amendment was defeated on the 20th in the House of Representatives at Harrisburg—yeas 27, nays 151.

The City Council of Minneapolis has passed an ordinance raising saloon licenses from $100 to $1500.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 387, which was 30 less than during the previous week, and 3 less than during the corresponding period of last year. Of the foregoing, 199 were males, and 188 females; 54 died of consumption; 46 of pneumonia; 17 of old age; 15 of diphtheria; 12 of croup, and 10 of scarlet fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 103½; 3½'s, 103; 4½'s, 113½; 4's, 119¾; currency 6's 129 to 132.

Cotton continues dull, but prices were unchanged. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 10¾ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 8½ a 8¾ cts. for export, and 9½ a 9¾ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in good request at full prices. Sales of 3300 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.50 a $6.50; Pennsylvania family at $5 a $5.12½; western do. at $5.25 a $6.20, and patents at $6.25 a $7.50. Rye flour is steady at $3.62½ a $3.75 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was in fair demand, and 1 cent per bushel higher. Sales of 6600 bushels red, in car lots at $1.17 a $1.25. Rye is nominal at 67 cts. Corn is in fair demand and higher. Sales of 11,000 bushels in car lots, at 63 a 68 cts. Oats are quiet. Sales of 9500 bushels, in car lots, at 53 a 57 cts.

Beef cattle were a fraction lower: 3000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5½ a 7½ cts. per lb.; the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were dull and lower: 15,000 head sold at the different yards at 3½ a 6 cts., for clipped, and 4½ a 7½ cts. for wool sheep. Lambs sold at $4 a $7 per head.

Hogs were in fair demand, and prices were steady: 2400 head sold at the different yards at 10½ a 11¼ cts. per pound, as to condition.

FOREIGN.—Daniel Curley, one of the Phoenix Park conspirators, has been convicted and sentenced to be executed.

The Pull Mall Gazette says the evidence that the dynamite plots now under investigation were hatched in New York is as clear as the proof the foreign police possessed twenty-five years ago that Mazzini's plots against Italy were hatched in England, and it says the extradition of Kossa from the United States is about as likely as Mazzini's was from England.

Steamers which sailed from Liverpool on the 19th inst. for the United States and Canada, carried nearly three thousand emigrants.

It is stated that the object of the alliance between Germany, Austria and Italy, is to secure the isolation of France in order to effect a simultaneous disarmament which Prince Bismarck intends to propose at a European Congress.

During a discussion in the Italian Chamber of Deputies on the 19th inst., on the subject of tobacco culture, Magliani, Minister of Finance, declared that the Government firmly intended to encourage the home cultivation of that plant, and would grant large bounties for the purpose; but the people, he said, must not delude themselves with the idea that Italy would ever overcome American competition in this branch of Agriculture.

The trial of eighteen prominent Nihilists ended in St. Petersburg on the 19th, and resulted in the conviction of all the prisoners. Six were condemned to death, two to life-long servitude, and the remainder to terms of imprisonment varying from 15 to 20 years.

It has been resolved to hold another trial of Nihilists at Odessa previous to the time fixed for the coronation of the Czar. Twenty persons will be arraigned on the charge of propagating Nihilistic ideas among working men. Fifty persons have been arrested for Nihilism during the last week. They include military officers, young ladies, teachers, students, working men and soldiers.

It having been discovered that a certain area in Central Asia is suitable for the production of cotton, Orenburg Russians are preparing to make the experiment.

Lisbon papers state that the French have occupied Porto Negro in Congo, after some resistance on the part of the natives.

In reference to the announcement that a commissioner had been sent from Queensland to take possession of the island of New Guinea as a dependency of Queensland, it is pointed out that this action is the res of the Colonial Institute having notified the Australian Government in 12th month last that an article had appeared in the Allgemeine Zeitung advising the German Government to annex New Guinea.

Delhi, India, 4th mo. 20th.—An extensive conflagration has occurred in this city. Two thousand houses have been destroyed, and a great number of families are destitute and homeless.

The steamer Scandanavian, which has just sailed from Moville for Quebec and Montreal, took 282 emigrants from County Mayo. It is stated that 12,000 persons from Galway have applied to the Government for assistance to enable them to reach America.

The exports of the Dominion of Canada during 4th mo. were nearly $500,000 less than during the corresponding month of last year, while the imports of the Dominion during 3rd mo. last were $469,000 in excess of those of 3rd mo., 1882.

Letters and Memoranda of William Scattergood.

To M. T.

No date.

My heart is often deeply depressed, and such times all the pleasures and enjoyments which are afforded us in this life, even though innocent and rational, are not capable of relieving or supporting the mind. The tendency of human nature is such, that although apparently relieved from the seductions of the world, those even who are striving for the better, oftentimes find themselves sorely perplexed and baffled by this unwearied adversity of their soul's peace. Under such circumstances as these, how dark, how unchristian, how discouraging, is the doctrine which would teach that man's salvation is to depend on himself—upon his own weak efforts. These things are often brought to my mind, and I am led to bow and adore the wisdom and the goodness which led to the glorious redemption of man's salvation; it is beyond all human comprehension; it is above the comprehension of man, yet so little and insignificant in his view, that he slights it or heeds it not. The circumstance mentioned in thy last letter is one among thousands of others, which could be brought to attest the excellency of the one at offering and sacrifice by which, through repentance, faith and obedience, our transgressions are blotted out. This is one of the Christian's great consolations; this the sinners' door of hope.

However there may be those who are endeavoring to overthrow the importance and value of these, our great Redeemer's sufferings; however they may bring forth reason to oppose the efficacy of this, yet every truly awakened soul finds it an unfailing fountain of mercy; in and by which, and through submission to the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, all our sin and uncleanness may be washed away. I could enlarge upon this subject, but words, of themselves, cannot show the importance of these great and glorious truths: they are to be known only as they are experienced, felt in the secret of our own hearts; and none can know or understand, but those who, seeking in simplicity the pearl of great price, come to see, feel, and taste that the Lord is good to all them that love and fear Him. Human observation cannot fathom the depth of religion. It is so placed, no doubt in wisdom, out of the reach of man in his unregenerate state; and so hidden from his view, that he may not at his own pleasure and in the darkness of his natural state, trample upon holy things. But when they are revealed to him, when man comes to feel himself introduced into the presence, as of the Almighty, how different are his sensations from those of the mere speculative theorist in piety! His ideas are more elevated, his soul is more enlightened; and although looked upon by others as one who enjoys little, yet he partakes of enjoyments of which others are incapable, being as superior to the imaginary devotion of an enthusiastic and romantic mind, as calm reason is to the phrensy of a madman.

There are many, whose hearts, though sincere in their admiration of nature, and who can with uplifted hands adore the Power who formed its beauties, in reality know not God. The words of Cowper are applicable to these, where he says:—

"Acquaint thyself with God, if thou would'st taste
His works. Admitted once to his embrace,
Thou shalt perceive that thou wast blind before."

To enter into this acquaintance with the Author of our existence is surely a glorious attainment to aim at! Short of it there is no true enjoyment on this side of the grave, and, may I not say, no reasonable hope of happiness beyond it. It is then that we perceive that every act of praise, which we may have pretended to before, has been done in blindness of heart.

I hope I may be allowed thus to write, without being charged with endeavoring to exalt my own attainments. I am often rendered sensible, under the operation of the humbling power of the Most High, that I have nothing to depend upon but that grace which alone bringeth salvation; that I am exceedingly frail; and that if any thing at all, it is wholly by the grace of God.

There is nothing worthy of exaltation in this world, but the wonderful goodness, mercy, forbearance, and condescension of the Most High; and if the condition David was in when he says, 'I am a worm and no man' could be more generally felt, it would more comport with our real condition, than many of the high sounding titles which men arrogate to themselves."

To the same.

No date.

"Did I apprehend that the chain of friendship which links us together needed frequent brightening, I might be induced to assume my pen at shorter intervals than has of latter time been the case. But feeling as I do my inability to say or do much that may be beneficial to others, it seems best to remain, at least measurably, inactive, rather than to be the trumpeter of my manifold weaknesses.

Indeed, in the present day, surrounded as I often feel myself with very discouraging and many deeply trying considerations, my mind seldom feels at liberty to undertake a task, which used often to be my delight. Not that I have felt an objection to this mode of communication between friend and friend, but when the mind is borne down with a sense of deep-rooted infirmity, or perhaps humbled in the consideration of the desolations which prevail, it is difficult so to rise above it, as to find much satisfaction either in verbal communication or otherwise, even with those we may dearly and tenderly love. The silent swell of sorrow is, perhaps, more congenial with these deeply afflictive dispensations than many words; and earnestly do I desire, that by a steady attention to that Monitor within which speaks in stillness, some may be qualified to stand forth as the champions of Israel of old did, to deliver us from that potent enemy who now seems to compass us around, and I believe is often like the noise of archers in the place of drawing water.

Well, I seem to wander into a recital of what may just now not be very desirable to hear! You being so quietly retired at ——— you scarcely hear the sound of the commotion in which we live. But though that sound may have lost its terror ere it reaches you, perhaps, nevertheless, there are those there-away who secretly feel an earnest desire that Zion may arise and shine; and who do as truly mourn over the defections which are so abundantly manifest, as some whose lot it is to be more immediately engaged in connexion with those who are the sad causes of them."

I cannot convey to thee much that is new; for in the present day almost every public transaction is sounded far and wide as soon as past; and my own life is so void of eventful circumstances, and so closely confined within a small space, that I might almost be considered a blank in the busy multitude which surrounds me. However, I still feel as if there was one important event, in which I am with others deeply concerned; and in looking towards it sometimes, I am willing to think that if in the day of final retribution all is found to be well, no matter what may have been the means of its attainment.

* * * I wish whenever thou feels like writing thou wouldst do it and not wait for me. I really feel so poor and empty of any thing that is good, or at least communicable so, that I might say I cannot write; while at the same time a letter occasionally from a friend, is calculated to revive the heart and comfort it amid the tumults of life."

Great is their peace who know a limit to their ambitious minds; that have learned to be contented with the appointments and bounds of Providence; that are not careful to be great, but being great are humble and do good.—W. Penn.

For "The Friend."

The Early Settlers near Camden, New Jersey.

The subjoined account is copied from an old volume of records belonging to Haddonfield Monthly Meeting of Friends. The settlement at Newton was located on the headwaters of the creek of that name, about three miles south of the ferry at Market street, in Camden, and a mile south of the present meeting-house of Friends, in the outskirts of the City of Camden. The old burying ground on Collings Road still marks the spot where the meeting-house originally stood. It has long since been removed. Mark Newby's house, where the first meetings were held, as stated in this narrative, was near the place. Did the "zeal and fervency of spirit" which T. Sharp says abounded among these poor emigrants, inducing them "immediately" to set up a meeting for worship, prevail among those who now occupy their place of settlement and its vicinity, there would be a brighter prospect than is now seen for the maintenance of those principles and practices which these godly men strove to plant as a good seed in the then wilderness of New Jersey.

"A book wherein is recorded the births of Friends' children belonging to the three meetings that make up the Monthly Meeting now held at the new meeting-house in Haddonfield, in the township of Newton, county of Gloucester, and western division of the Province of New Jersey. With the account of burials; as also some account of the settlement and beginning of Newton, and the Friends that were the first concerned in the same."

"Let it be remembered,—It having wrought upon the minds of some Friends that dwelt in Ireland, but such as formerly came thither from England; and a pressure having laid upon them for some years which they could not get from under the weight of, until they gave up to leave their friends and relations there, together with a comfortable subsistence, to transport themselves and families into the wilderness land of America; and thereby expose themselves to difficulties which, if they could have been easy where they were, in all probability might (not) have been met with; and in order thereunto sent from Dublin, in Ireland, to one Thomas Lurtin, a Friend of London, commander of a Pink, who accordingly came, and made an agreement with him to transport them and their families into New Jersey, viz: Mark Newby and family, Thomas Thackara and family, William Bates and family, George Goldsmith, an old man, and Thomas Sharp, a young man, but no families. And while the ship abode in Dublin harbor, providing for the voyage, the said Thomas Lurtin was taken so ill that he could not perform the same, so that his mate John Dagger undertook it. And upon the nineteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand six hundred and eighty-one, we set sail from the place aforesaid. And through the good providence of God towards us, we arrived at Elsinburg, in the county of Salem, upon the nineteenth day of November following; where we were well entertained at the house of the Thomson's, who came from Ireland about four years before; who by their industry were arrived to a very good degree of living; and from thence we went to Salem where were several houses that were vacant of persons who had left the town to settle in the country, which served to accommodate them for the winter. And having thus settled down their families, and the winter proving moderate, we at Wickacoa, among us, purchased a house of the Swanson's, and so went to Burlington, to the commissioners, of whom we obtained a warrant to the Surveyor-General, which then was Daniel Leeds; and after some formidable search in that then called the third, or Irish tenth, we at last pitch upon the place now called Newton, which was before the settlement of Philadelphia, and then applied to the surveyor, who came and laid it out for us. And the next spring being the beginning of the year 1682, we all removed from Salem, together with Robert Zane, that had been settled there, who came from Ireland along with the Thomson's, before hinted; and having an expectation of our coming, only bought a lot in Salem town, upon the which he seated himself until our coming; whose proprietary right and ours being of the same nature, could not then take it up in Fenwick's tenth. And so began our settlement, and although at times we were pretty hard bestead, having all our provisions as far as Salem to fetch by water, yet through the merey and kindness of God, we were preserved in health, and from any extreme difficulties. And immediately there was a meeting set up, and kept at the house of Mark Newby, and in a short time it grew and increased; unto which William Cooper and family, that lived at the Point, resorted, and sometimes the meeting was kept at his house, who had been settled some time before. Zeal and fervency of spirit was what in some good degree abounded among Friends, in commemoration of our prosperous success, and eminent preservation, both in our coming over the great deep, as also that whereas we were but few at that time and the Indians many, whereby it put a dread upon our spirits, considering they were a savage people; but the Lord, that hath the hearts of all in his hands, turned them so as to be serviceable unto us, and very loving and kind: which cannot be otherwise accounted but to be the Lord's doing in our favor, which we had cause to praise his name for.

"And that the rising generation may consider that the settlement of this country was directed by an impulse upon the spirits of God's people, not so much for their ease and tranquillity, but rather for the posterity that should be after, and that the wilderness, being planted with a good seed, might grow and increase, to the satisfaction of the good Husbandman. But instead thereof, if for wheat it should bring forth tares, the end of the good Husbandman will be frustrated, and they themselves will suffer loss. This narrative I have thought good and requisite to leave behind, as having had knowledge of things from the beginning. THOS. SHARP."

A Letter of Maria Fox.

London, 24th of 4th mo. 1837.

To ——. Before I enter on any description of our movements, I shall proceed to notice some of the contents of thine.

Thou mayst be assured, my dear, we feel for and with thee, under those exercises thou describest; but I infer from the tenor of the communication altogether, thy mind is at present in a state of excitement which it is safest for thee not to foster; for thankful as we ought to be, and I trust are, that thy attention is seriously turned to the consideration of those solemn truths which are of finite and eternal importance, and on which the hopes of the true Christian depend, should be sorry to see thee carried away that current, which, though it may not always take the same direction, seems in the present day to endanger the deep, thorough, hidden work which must be carried on in every generated soul (and which is not the work a day) before it can be prepared to bring forth mature, substantial, and good fruit to praise of the Great Husbandman. Far be from me to give an opinion as to what may be thy future path; the Great Head of the Church chooses his own instruments as it pleases Him; but even if it should be his purpose that thou shouldst thus testify thy love to Him, he may show it thee, as He has done to many others, for years, before He called thee to the public acknowledgment of it.

I believe also that young converts—who are newly awakened to the value and importance of religion—are very apt, in the ardor of their feelings, to imagine they are called to great things, and in the overflowings of that love to their Saviour which may be raised in their hearts to believe they may, as thou expressest it, "speak his praise" to those around them; but it does appear to me to be one of the very successful stratagems of our ever-watchful enemy to persuade the young, as soon as they begin to walk in the right way themselves, that they are called upon to teach others rather than to abide under that blessed teaching which would, if they had patience to endure its secret proofs, and to wait upon its many salutary though silent monitions, in due time make them much more capable to do so in the daily life and conversation.

I write to thee in great freedom, because thou hast asked it, and because, as one who has lived longer and has seen something of the insidious working of the cruel tempter, I feel it my duty so to do, being assured that thou wilt accept it as it is intended,—not to discourage thy progress in the way that I cast up for thee, whatever that way may be, but to show thee, if it may be, some of the dangers that surround the path of the young pilgrim. The longer I live, the more anxious I feel that the Lord may give me such a sense of the awful importance of the great truths of religion, as that I may always be fearful of substituting expression for experience, and that I may be more desirous to feed in secret upon the bread of life than to talk about it to others.

Let us remember, my dear, that the stillest streams are the deepest, and that it often pleases the great Sanctifier, Enlightener, and Comforter of the people of the Lord to earn on his work in their souls after a very hidden manner. I would therefore rather encourage thee to diligence in the duties of the closet, in private reading of the Scriptures, to close self-examination, meditation, and secret prayer, than to suffer thyself to be drawn forth into much conversation or writing on thy spiritual concerns. If thou look to the Lord Jesus and desire to be his sincere, humble follower, He has promised, such "shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life;" and there is no teaching like his teaching. * * With respect to visiting the sick poor, thou knowest I have ever encouraged thee to thin of them, and to attend to their temporal want if in the course of thy visits amongst men for this purpose, thou feel inclined to do to them, it is a very useful and profitable employment for thee and them; but I freely need say to thee, it requires great caution and much religious experience, to talk suitably to persons who are perhaps undergoing the correcting discipline of our heavenly Father, or whom He may be training by many afflictions, for a better inheritance. "To speak a word in season" requires the assistance of that Spirit which only can enable us to speak aright, and therefore I would say it is often safer, especially for young persons like thyself, to offer up a secret prayer for their behalf, if that is raised in the heart, than to express ourselves to them under the influence of present excitement. I hope, my dear, this letter will not discourage thee. Wait on the Lord, be of good courage, and He shall strengthen thine heart."

The Sepulchral Caves of Palestine.

Leaving the high road to Nazareth to the left, we followed a path for about half an hour, which took us to the village of Sheik Zeik. It was a miserable collection of mud huts, in the muddiest of which dwelt the people. After much palaver and promises of abundant backsheesh, we got him to admit the existence of the caverns of which we were in search, and persuaded him to be our guide. The first was called by the Arabs "The Cave to Hell." Its entrance seemed to justify the ill-omened appellation. It was a deep, sloping tunnel into the bowels of the earth, just large enough to admit the passage of a man's body. To slide into this after a heavy rain involved a coating of mud from head to toe. After going down a few yards we entered a chamber in which we could stand upright. Here we lighted our candle and looked about us. We found that it was the first of a series of similar chambers opening one into another. Each contained stone coffins hewn out of the solid rock. The entrances to these were arched. The pilasters on each side of the entrances were in some cases ornamented with rude sculptures and decorated with designs in a yellow pigment. These were in the form of curves, scrolls, and circles, and were carried over the roof. Each chamber was about ten feet long by six feet wide, and on an average contained three tombs—one across the chamber facing the entrance and one on each side. There do not seem ever to have been lids to these stone receptacles for the dead.

The bodies were embalmed, wrapped in linen, as we read in scriptural accounts of Joseph, notably in that of our Saviour. "Each in his narrow cell, forever laid," they remained undisturbed until rude hands ages afterward "rolled away the stone from the mouth of the cave," and rifled the contents. Some of the entrances to the chambers had been completely filled up. In such cases the partition wall of rock had been broken through. Some of the chambers were larger than others, and there were two tiers of coffins. In order to get from one chamber to another it was often necessary to drag your body along at full length upon the ground. In some cases the roof had been broken through by a chamber above, and this probably led to the next cave. In the next cave we visited we found the letters "R. E." scratched in red paint on the rock, which, under these circumstances, can only mean "Royal Engineers," [and indicated that the sepulcher had already been examined by Lieutenant Corder.]

This cave was a much more comfortable one to examine, though not nearly so interesting. You could walk about it comfortably, but there was no ornamentation. The chambers were larger, but there were only five or six of them. The stone coffins had in many instances been completely destroyed, but the massive stone columns, or rather blocks, of living rock, which supported the roof, were finer than those in the "Cave of Hell." Perhaps it owed its more dilapidated condition to the largeness of the entry, and its proximity to another huge cave which had evidently in crusading times been converted into a Christian place of worship. According to a rough measurement obtained by pacing it, the cave was 70x30 feet, the apse 18x21, and two apse-shaped transepts about 20x18; but these were very much filled with rubbish. The height of the cave was about thirty feet. The whole formed a subterranean church, which, in its perfect condition, when entered from the hillside, must have presented a very imposing appearance. On the slope of the hill, not far from this cave, was the carved pedestal of a granite column, and near it a handsome stone sarcophagus.

Instead of going back to the Nazareth road after finishing our examination of this interesting spot, we made for a hill, on the summit of which we saw some large blocks of stone betokening ruins. Here we came upon a native excavation, evidently very recent. Indeed, we heard later that it had only been abandoned the week before. The natives occasionally find an unopened tomb, and dig into it for treasure. Indeed, it was useless to attempt to disabuse their minds of the idea that we were treasure-hunters. On asking them what they had found, they said some red glass bottles, which they had broken to discover what they had contained. They had also found three jars, one containing ashes, one earth and one was empty. These they had also smashed. It was enough to make one's mouth water to hear of the destruction of these curiosities so very recently. I implored them if they found any more not to break them, but to bring them to me. They laughed and promised to do so, saying at the same time, "They are so very old that they are not worth anything."

Had it not been necessary to push on in order to reach Nazareth before night, I would have lingered longer at these ruins, which are called Zebda by the natives. They are worthy of full examination. The whole rocky summit of the hill is evidently honeycombed with cave tombs, many of which have not yet been opened. One of these, some miles further on toward Nazareth, especially attracted my attention. A huge circular stone about two feet in diameter had been rolled into the carved stone entrance to the cave, and become tightly wedged. All the efforts of the natives to remove it, and the marks of such efforts were visible, had evidently been unavailing. It needed a very small charge of dynamite to remove the obstacle which had so successfully resisted the barbarian ingenuity of ages. This I had arranged to do, but on the day fixed for the purpose persistent rain disappointed me. However, it is a treat in store.

The first entrance into one of these old Jewish tomb caverns will be an exciting episode, but there is an amount of suspicion and jealousy on the part of the natives which will render prudence and circumspection necessary if any attempt of this sort is to be carried out with success.—Correspondence of the N. Y. Sun.

Gather up the Fragments.

In the winter of 1843-4, there were at Westtown School a few of the boys who were the subjects of much religious concern from a belief that they were rebelling against the convictions of the good Spirit in their own hearts. At that time Sarah Emilen was living there. The following record of her remarkable exercise was made by one or more of the female teachers. The writer of this was present at the time, and well remembers the scene. In justice to the scholars there, it should be stated, that the few who were so closely pleaded with are not to be considered as fairly representing the great bulk of the boys. The general tone of that institution, and increasingly so of latter years, has been such as to give evidence that the Divine blessing has rested upon it.

"On the 29th of the 2nd mo. 1844, after the meeting had been settled some time, Sarah Emilen rose, laid her bonnet on the seat, and walked along the isle for some distance, then stopping between two benches on the north side, put one hand on each and stood for some time silent. A very solemn covering spread over the meeting, when she commenced, as nearly as we can recollect, in these words:—'I believe it is in the authority of my divine Master, the Lord Jesus Christ, that I am constrained to come and stand thus before you on this side of the house. Oh how has my spirit been grieved this day with the lightness and frivolity of your spirits. Some of you seem to contemn your Maker, and dishonor your exercised teachers, and you have turned into contempt their labors. Some of you have godly parents who are exercised for you and grieved on your account, and the Holy Spirit is grieved. I have been made to fear that the vials of the Almighty are ready to be poured out on some of you, for your irreverence towards Him, and for the hardness of your hearts.'

Can you bear with me; I am a mother myself (here her emotion stopped her utterance for a short time) and from the very bottom of my spirit I have felt for you as a mother. Though you are now young, and your bones are full of marrow and your veins with blood, which is your life, yet in the twinkling of an eye ye may be brought down; and have ye not had instances in this very house of the youth being brought down.' She then went on to say that when cast upon a sick bed, the inmost recesses of their hearts would be laid open by Him whose eyes are as a flaming fire, and all the sins and transgressions which they have committed against their teachers in this place will be written as on the wall before them; repeating 'I have been made verily to fear that the vials of the Almighty are ready to be poured out on some of you.' She entreated them to repent, assuring them that mercy was still extended towards them.

Near the close she said, 'Honor God, for they that honor God He will honor, and they that dishonor Him shall be lightly esteemed.' She then returned to her seat.

Soon after she knelt, 'We all have need of thy mercy and that our sins and transgressions should be forgiven; but oh Lord, more especially would we intercede with thee for the wayward, the untoward, the disobedient, and may we not say the hardened sons. Spare them, oh! Lord, a little longer, and lengthen out to them the day of grace, that they may not be cut off. Some of us this morning have been made to believe, that for some present not many days, perhaps not many hours, are allotted for the great work of regeneration. Bow thy heavens, oh Lord, and come down; cause their hearts to be melted like wax, that they may receive again the impression of thy image, which has been effaced by iniquity. Meet with them in a narrow place where they can turn neither to the right hand nor to the left. Inspirit them with a desire for thy saving grace. Make them to cry out from the inmost recesses of their hearts, "What shall we do to be saved?" Be pleased to assist them in this work, that the vials of thy wrath may not be poured upon their heads, but that they may return, return, repent and live. We thank thee, oh! Father, that one more opportunity has been granted. * * We pray thee as on the bended knee of both body and mind, that the impressions which have been made this day be fastened as a nail in a sure place, even by the Master of assemblies, that we may yet all unite in worshipping thee in the silence of all flesh.'

Though we have not given all that was said, yet it is as nearly correct as we could remember. But the indescribably awful feeling which pervaded the meeting, must alone be felt to be understood. Many of the children were much tendered. When meeting closed and the girls passed to the collecting room, the same awful solemnity continued, though a few commenced talking quietly; yet the sobs of one or two who seemed unable to control their feelings, and the deep, quiet, seriousness of others effectually stopped all conversation. The language arose 'verily there is a God in Israel.'

On the next First-day she addressed a state that was tried and tossed and not comforted. Such she recommended to come to the Saviour, to spread their cause before Him in the secret of their hearts. 'Whatsoever ye shall ask believing, ye shall receive.' She had remembered the comforting declaration of our Saviour, 'If ye have but faith as a grain of mustard-seed, ye might say unto this sycamore tree: be thou plucked up by the root, and be thou planted in the sea; and it should obey you.' And ye should say to this mountain, 'Remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you.' Though 'the sin that most easily besets' might be deeply rooted in their hearts, it should be plucked up; and though the mountains of difficulty obstruct, they should be removed. She then sweetly alluded to the love of their compassionate Saviour, who, on the cross, bore the sins of the whole world. She had also thought of Moses, the servant of God. When he descended from the mount and saw his people given to idolatry, he earnestly prayed for them, If they could not be forgiven that his name should be blotted out. 'How typical of the Saviour!'

Sin is of one nature all the world over.

A MEMORY.

There broods a stillness in the early gloaming,
A sense of quiet rest,
And busy thoughts that all the day were roaming,
Now settle in my breast.

With peaceful throbbings beats the pulse of even,
And out from yonder star,
There seems the radiance of the inner heaven
To stream thro' "gates ajar."

The time and feeling bring a sweet remembrance
Of long departed hours,
That to the present only bear the semblance
Of crushed and faded flowers.

But yet the odor of the blossom lingers,
Embalmed from all decay,
And still the heartstrings touched by loving fingers
Vibrate in song alway.

I see again with clear unshadowed vision,
A form beloved of old,
Whose spirit long in fadeless realms elysian
Hath walked the streets of gold.

This hour to her was dearer than the morning,
And lovelier than deep night,
With all the beauty of its grave adorning
Its clear yet mellowed light.

And now I hold as girlhood's richest blessing
That hour beside her chair,
When bending o'er her, with my touch caressing
The soft brown of her hair,

And listening words of pure and tender meaning,
As thought was linked to thought,
Till to my heart the truths of years of gleaming,
In gathered sheaves were brought.

Oh! mother, mother, that the fruit is sparing,
Is never fault of thine!
Both late and early with a hand untiring
Thou sow'dst seed divine.

The years are many since the cold, dark river
Hath rolled our lives between,
While Time and change are pressing me forever
On to the great unseen.

Now to my chair the little ones come thronging
As to their earthly goal,
And in each childish face I trace the longing
Of an immortal soul.

Had but thy mantle on thy daughter fallen,— Sweet spirit passed away!—
Less weak and helpless for the duties calling,
Would my heart stand to-day.

Ah! well, the bread was cast upon the waters,
And after many days,
May it be found to thine eternal honor,
And to our Maker's praise.

RELEASED.

BY SUSAN COOLIDGE.

Only a few short weeks ago,
All icy bound and packed with snow,
This rocky cleft, through which to-day
Runs the glad brooklet on its way;
The merry brook which leaps and flows,
Flashing and singing as it goes,
To find and join and make a part
Of the great river's urgent heart.
Could it have dreamed so sweet a thing
In all those months of prisoning?
O happy brook! made glad, made free,
Shalt thou not find at last the sea?

Only a few short months ago,
A harder frost, a deeper snow,
Lay on my soul and held it tight
Away from hope, away from light.
Now God's sweet sun has entered in
And melted all the chains of sin,
And led by his dear hand to-day
My soul goes singing on its way,
To link its little thread of good
With the vast, over-brimming flood!
O happy soul! made glad, made free,
Shalt thou not find at last thy sea?

THE FIRST FLOWER.

I feel too tired and too old
Long rambles in the woods to take,
To seek the cowslip's early gold,
And search for violets in the brake;
Nor can I, as I used to, bend
My little bed of flowers to tend;
Where grew my scented pinks, to-day
The creeping witchgrass has its way.

But when my door I open wide
To breathe the warm, sweet air of spring,
The fragrance comes in like a tide,
Great purple plumes before me swing;
For looking in, close by the door,
The lilac blossoms as of yore;
The earliest flower my childhood knew
Is to the gray, worn woman true!

Dear common tree that needs no care,
Whose root in any soil will live,
How many a dreary spot grows fair
With the spring-charm thy clusters give!
The narrow court-yard in the town
Knows thy sweet fragrance, and the brown
Low hill-side farm-house hides its eaves
Beneath the gray-green of thy leaves.

Loosed by the south wind's gentle touch,
In perfumed showers thy blossoms fall;
Thou askest little, givest much;
Thy lavish bloom is free to all;
And even I, shut in, shut out,
From all the sunny world about,
Find the first flower my childhood knew
Is to the gray, worn woman true.

Royal Foot Washing.—The Hofburg, chief palace of the Austrian sovereigns, has been, says the London Standard, the scene of an ecclesiastical ceremony or act of devotion which is a curious relic of mediæval custom. In accordance with a usage observed from time immemorial on Maundy-Thursdays a ceremony of "Washing the Feet of the Poor" was recently performed as usual by the majesties at the Imperial residence. In the Middle Ages the custom prevailed at many other Catholic Courts, but in the present day to find a parallel would be impossible, except at the Vatican and at the palace of the King of Spain. The proceedings opened at nine o'clock, when twelve old men, of whom the oldest is in his ninety-third year, and the youngest eighty-seven, and twelve old women, the oldest ninety-six, and the youngest ninety, dressed as usual, in the old German costume, presented to them by the Emperor and Empress, entered the Court Chapel, in order to receive the sacrament, and were then brought into the Hall of Ceremonies at the Hofburg. On each side of the hall was a table with twelve covers, the one table for the old men and the other for the old women. They were all citizens of Vienna, and many among them showed by their behavior that they had taken part in the ceremony more than once. With the appearance of the clergyman, eleven, the ceremony began. The Emperor, who was followed by all the archdukes present in Vienna, served the old men, and the Empress, followed by all the archduchesses and court ladies, served the old women at the respective tables. The Corps Diplomatique was, as usual, in attendance, but this year, for reasons generally known, the British, French and Turkish ambassadors did not appear. The Ministers were present, as well as Countignaries and Privy Councilors, the Chamberlains, the Grand Masters, and the high representatives of the army. The tables being removed, the Emperor and Empress knelt down in front of each of the old people, to kiss a shoe and stocking from each, and wash foot with towels moistened from a golden er, held by a chamberlain. After the feet the old people had been wiped the arches and archduchesses replaced the shoe stocking, and their majesties concluded ceremony by hanging round the neck of h of the old people a purse with thirty silflorins. The old folks were then sent home cabs, each with a well-filled box of provisions and wine.—Chr. Adv.

Uselessness of Oaths.—When James Backhouse visited the penal settlements on Norfolk Island, he was much impressed "to see unmoved hardness with which prisoners ke oath, most solemnly, to the truth of at they state, on both sides, when it is ous that on one side there must be per-." This shocking spectacle led him to ke these reflections on the use of oaths: uly oaths are insufficient to secure correct imony, where the moral standard of truth ow; where it is gone, they only add to ne; and where this standard is properly ntained, they are useless, yea being yea, nay, nay."

Religious Items, &c.

Temperance.—The darkness of Germany on temperance question may be inferred from fact that the Moravian brethren carry on breweries to help missions. The darkness of Britain has long been shown by the that eminent members of the benevolent self-denying sect called "Friends," carry immense breweries, and own hundreds, haps thousands, of beer-shops in London. Christian Cynosure.

Moral Character of the Opera.—A Cincinnati correspondent of Zion's Herald, Boston, disses the moral effect of the opera season in "Queen City of the West." He says: "the ten operas rendered, five were little than glorifications of licentiousness. How effect can be other than to familiarize opera-goer's mind with the arts of the rtine and the unchaste it would be diffi- to tell. And there are no means by ch the mental pictures and suggestions vividly produced by the lifelike acting and penetrating voice of song may be erad- ed from the memory." "Out of every ten he best operas, five are unspeakably foul. for pure operas, there are none."

It is a strong proof of the deceitful character him who is the father of lies, that persons ming the name of Christians can be made believe that there is no harm in their par- ing in such corrupting amusements.

Religious Awakening.—There appears from newspaper reports to be an increased rest in vital religion in parts of Great tain, Germany, Russia, Asia Minor and thern Africa. Through the labors of those aged in the work in these places may be ried on in a mixture of truth and error, all can rejoice in every evidence that the rit of the Lord (which alone can effect a spiritual change) is at work in the hearts he people, turning them from darkness to t.

Mohammedan Movements.—A Mohammedan ard of Publication has been established in antaninople for the purpose of publishing, cheap form, the theological and historical ks put forth by Mohammedan writers. e first publication is to be a popular edi- of the Koran, for general distribution.

A society has been formed in England under the presidency of the Archbishop of Canterbury which has for its object "the Christianizing, simplifying, and cheapening funeral and mourning ceremonial."

Total Abstinence.—Reasons for abstaining from the use of drinks containing alcohol:

I. No man who drinks can be at all sure that he will not, on some occasion, drink too much. There are some, perhaps, who drink all their lives, but never drink enough to visibly interfere with muscular movements or mental operations. Whether there are any such is an open question; but it is certain that the number of those who use alcoholic stimulants at all in this climate and age, and never use too much, is very small, and that no user of them can be sure that he will not on some occasion drink too much.

II. All users of them are especially liable, in time of mental trouble or physical debility, and in the gradual approach of old age, to drink too much. Total abstinence men seldom plunge into excessive drinking in time of trouble. Many Christian professors, having never been total abstainers, on failing in business, or losing wife or child, or meeting a great disappointment, have taken to drinking excessively. Many old men have thus become sots, and some such in the churches are a great mortification to their friends, and a perplexity to the church.

III. All who use them at all set an example to youth, which, if they attempt to follow it, will be the ruin of many of them.

IV. Such persons, if parents, throw their influence over their children on the side of the strongest temptations to which they are exposed.

V. All users of intoxicating liquors as a beverage have practically no influence in preventing others from drinking.

VI. Those who do not use them can never drink too much; will be in little peril of resorting to rum as a remedy for sorrow; set an example to youth which all may safely follow, and which will be the means of saving many from drunkenness; by precept and example they throw the mightiest safeguards around their children, and exert a positive and powerful influence against intemperance.

VII. But those who use alcohol habitually may transmit a constitutional predisposition to their children much stronger than they had in beginning their own lives—a tendency which, with a father's example and the presence of the tempter, may prove practically irresistible. So it often comes to pass that the worst effects of the habit are seen in the second generation.

VIII. The highest form of the Christian life is self-denial for the good of others. Total abstinence, if it be a great sacrifice, should be practised for our own sake, for we are in danger. If it be not a great sacrifice, what ingenuous mind would refuse to make it to save the weak, and to help those who are so earnestly striving to save them.

For these reasons we practise and recommend total abstinence. May we not hope that by what we have said some will be helped to persuade others; and that if any read these reasons who do use these seducing drinks, though, as they think, but sparingly, they will see that it is neither wise, good, safe, nor kind to do so, and at once and forever, on principle, renounce them?—Christian Advocate.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Telephone Talking.—Talking by Telephone has been done with success between New York and Chicago, a distance of 1050 miles. The wire used is of steel, covered with copper. The steel gives strength, and the copper covering gives it increased power of conducting electrical currents. The copper is deposited on the steel by electro-plating batteries, at the rate of 500 lbs. of copper to one mile of wire.

Curious Result of the Wet Season.—The Dorset Chronicle says that the attention of Martin Small, farmer in the parish of Shapwick, was recently called by his shepherd to one of the sheep, all along the back of which grass was springing up. It is conjectured the animal, having been supplied with hay, had lain down on some of it, and the seeds, mixing with the wool, germinated through the sheep having been exposed to rain for a very long period.

Exercise for Little Folks.—Some years ago considerable attention was bestowed on the subject, and several very ingenious devices were suggested by which infants and very young children might exercise their muscles. The "baby jumper" is perhaps the best remembered of these. It was largely advertised, and for the time had a considerable sale, but now one rarely hears of its existence. In considering the form of exercise that might be employed for very young children, it should be borne in mind that at no period in life does the organism exhibit greater developmental activity than during the first years of existence. Hence, it is not advisable that fatigue should be allowed to depress the vital powers, and so interfere with the processes of growth and nutrition. At the same time, it must be remembered that a desire for exercise seems to be inherent in the infant. Sir William Jenner has graphically pointed this out, and compared the spontaneous activity of a healthy child to the quiescence and fear of movement exhibited by a child suffering from the rickets. This can be seen at a glance, for if a young child be stripped and laid on a bed it will appear how ceaseless are its movements, how each limb is brought into play, and with what almost continuous action it seems as if endeavoring to turn itself inside out. This natural exercise ought to be encouraged, and instead of being kept, as is too frequently the case, for the greater part of the day tightly held in its nurse's arms, or confined in its cot weighed down with heavy bed-clothes carefully tucked in, which prevent its slightest movement, it ought for some time each day to be allowed to roll freely on a mattress, lightly and loosely clad, so that it can indulge freely and unrestrained in the natural and instinctive exercise of its limbs. As the infant gets older its desire for exercise seems if possible to increase, and it is never tired of creeping about and making premature attempts to walk. Whilst these efforts should be encouraged, they should never be unduly prolonged. As the child grows older and becomes firmer on its feet, combined movements seem to become its object, and these are best encouraged by the use of a "ball." When the limbs are firmly set, the rocking-horse may be introduced into the nursery, but we should not permit its use till after the fifth year. The seventh year is the earliest at which systematic exercise should be introduced, and then these ought to be of the simplest kind—as ordinary drilling, extension movements, &c.

We cannot approve of the suggestions that have reached us of the use of the trapeze, dumb bells, and the like at so early an age. What seems to be of the most importance, and what is generally overlooked, is the necessity of securing for the young child complete freedom for all its movements in easy clothing, and thus permitting it to engage in spontaneous exercise without let or hindrance.—London Lancet.

Rats in a House.—The rat, says Professor Huxley, has no place in a well-built city house. The mouse is harmless, but the presence of rats means a connection with the rat's place, the sewer. Hence, when he knew that there were rats in the basement of his house, he had the floor of the room taken up, and found an opening into the sewer where the builder had omitted to close up the opening to a side drain, designed, but abandoned before using. During all the years that the house had been occupied, this opening had been in unsuspected existence, and had given open passage to the emanations from the sewer.

Odd uses for Paper and Glass.—Compressed paper doors are declared to be more effective in staying the march of flames than even doors of wood lined with tin, which have now superseded iron doors for this purpose. Glass, in like manner, is being every day put to a variety of uses for which its fragility would seem to make it little adapted. The latest instance of this is glass shingles, now manufactured at Pittsburg, and said to be more durable, stronger and more impervious to rain than slate or any other material.—Phila. Ledger.

Chinese Printing.—A strike in the office of the Chinese-American led to some explanation of the difficulties of his position by the editor Wing-Chim-foo. He said—"The publishing of a Chinese Journal is a much more difficult piece of work than many imagine. The Chinese language is written by means of 60,000 characters, and so type is an unknown commodity. The copy is first made by me in pencil, and by a scribe transferred to the impression paper, from which it is afterwards taken off on stone. Thus every number of our paper must of necessity be lithographed, advertisements and all."

Native Potatoes.—Native potatoes have been discovered in Arizona by Prof. Lemmon. They were found in a cleft of one of the highest peaks north of the Apache pass, under a tangle of prickly bushes and cacti. Eager to know if the Solanum found was bulb-bearing, he carefully uprooted the little tuber, which proved to be an undoubted representative of the true potato family. According to the researches and reasonings of Humboldt, this was the location to look for the home of the species from which our first potatoes sprang. In May last, Prof. Lemmon again set out in search of more specimens, choosing the Huachuca Mountains as his point for exploration.

These mountains have two peaks over 10,000 feet high, with sides furrowed into deep canons, those of the northeast being filled with trees, among which are maple and ash. In July last he discovered the potato plants he was searching for on the southwest side of the range, hidden among the rich bottom soil of a dell in a high valley. A few plants of the white species were found in full bloom, and further on blue blossoms were found. The white-flowered specimens formed tubers on shorter subterranean stems than the blue ones. The blue flowered potato plants sent off their runners from 18 inches to 2 feet. July 12, they were in full bloom.

The blossoms were large, and the white flowered were of a creamy white color, with greenish midribs to its corolla lobes. The subterranean stems were not longer than those of our common potato. The blossoms of the blue flowered are smaller, bright purple, with pale white midribs to the corolla, with fifteen to twenty flowers to a head. They are found at an altitude of about 8,000 feet in Tanner's canon, and some of the plants were 2 feet high. Later in the season they produced potato balls of unusual size, comparatively speaking.

These native species of potatoes which may have been and very likely are the original native stock from which all our potatoes now used have sprung, deserve a fair trial and careful propagation to develop them to the size now attained by our best potatoes. By the 1st of September the blue flowered plants formed bluish colored potatoes, oblong, about 1½ inches long by half as wide, and a third as thick, with from four to ten unmistakable potatoes on each plant. The white-flowered plants produced white potatoes, nearly round, from half an inch to 1 inch in diameter. These potatoes are unquestionably indigenous.

Still another variety was found near the summit of a peak 10,000 feet high, under the shade of fir, pine and poplar trees, growing in soil kept moist during the greater part of the year by melting snows. Its nodding balls of ripened seeds were surrounded by golden-rods and brilliant asters. Their tubers were tinted with purple, and seed balls were either solitary or in pairs. Prof. Lemmon brought back with him over three quarts of these small potatoes, comprising the different varieties, besides some seed balls.

A hermit in these mountains, whom Prof. Lemmon interested in his discovery, has recently written him that in digging up the bed of an old pond he has secured a lot of these potatoes, perfectly white, as large as hen's eggs, which on being cooked tasted well, and have all the appearance of very fine potatoes. Various cultivators have manifested the utmost interest in Prof. Lemmon's discovery, and are making careful preparations to cultivate the specimens he has forwarded them.—Pacific Rural Press.

Curious Habit of the Hornbill.—While staying a day at a village [near Palembang, in Sumatra,] while a boat was being made watertight, I had the good fortune to obtain a male, female, and young bird of one of the large hornbills. I had sent my hunters to shoot, and while I was at breakfast they returned, bringing me a fine large male of the Buceros bicornis, which one of them assured me he had shot while feeding the female, which was shut up in a hole in a tree. I had often read of this curious habit, and immediately returned to the place, accompanied by several of the natives. After crossing a stream and a bog, we found a large tree leaning over some water, and on its lower side, at a height of about twenty feet, appeared a small hole, and what looked like a quantity of mud, which I was assured had been used in stopping up the large hole. After awhile we heard the harsh cry of a bird inside, and could see the white extremity of its beak put out. I offered a rupee to any one who would go up and get out the bird, with the egg or young one, but they all declared it was too difficult, and were afraid to try. I therefore very reluctantly came away. In about an hour a ward, much to my surprise, a tremendous loud hoarse screaming was heard, and a bird was brought me, together with a young one which had been found in the hole. It was a most curious object, as large as a pig but without a particle of plumage on any part of it. It was exceedingly plump and soft, with a semi-transparent skin, so that it looked more like a bag of jelly, with head and stuck on, than like a real bird.

The extraordinary habit of the male plastering up the female with her egg feeding her during the whole time of incubation, and till the young one is fledged, is common to several of the large hornbills, and one of those strange facts in natural history which are "stranger than fiction."—Wallace Malay Archipelago.

Bread Fruit.—Though it grows in several parts of the Malay Archipelago, it is now abundant, and the season for it lasts only a short time. It is baked entire in the hot ovens, and the inside scooped out with a spoon. I compared it to Yorkshire pudding; Chas. Allen said it was like mashed potatoes and milk. It is generally about the size of a melon, a little fibrous towards the centre, but everywhere else smooth and pudding-like, something in consistence between yeast-dumplings and batter-pudding. With meat and gravy it is a vegetable superior to any I know, either in temperate or tropical countries. With sugar, milk, butter, or treacle, it is a delicious pudding, having a very slight and delicate characteristic flavor, which, like that of good bread and potatoes, one never gets tired of. The reason why it is comparatively scarce is that it is a fruit of which the seeds are entirely aborted by cultivation, and the tree can therefore only be propagated by cutting. The seed-bearing variety is common all over the tropics, and though the seeds are very good eating, resembling chestnuts, the fruit is quite worthless as a vegetable.—Wallace Malay Archipelago.

THE FRIEND.

FIFTH MONTH 5, 1883.

It is a blessed thing to walk "in the Light"—in a holy dependence upon, and faithfulness to the guidance and help of the Spirit of Christ, which has been given to all to lead in the way of salvation. This Spirit is a quick witness against evil, and will preserve us out of the snares of death those who are sincerely endeavoring to follow its teaching. For want of watchfulness and obedience to its commands, how often are we led astray into what devious paths have our feet wandered, and what multiplied transgressions the Divine will have been heaped up against us!

Perhaps nothing is more calculated to fill the heart with a love to God, than to feel that His compassion and love are extended even to those who have been rebellious, in whom a hope is begotten in the free and large mercies of the Shepherd of Israel, who, as Isaac Pennington says, "Casteth not off his sheep because of their wanderings, because of their backslidings, because of their infirmities, but

is an unspeakable mercy to feel the ending of his sword and the fire of his ments, destroying the corrupt propensities of the heart, and bringing us into a communion to receive the "oil of his salvation." as the same deeply experienced writer expresses, the Lord "gives brokenness, He eth the heart, that He may be tender rds and embrace it in his arms of reconciliation, and in the peace of his Spirit."

those who in their earlier years have ved too much according to their own wills, whose feet have been turned into the way eace, there sometimes comes a season, in the decline of life, they are in mea-relieved from the pressure of business, he scenes and incidents of the past come eview before them. They may recall evidences of Divine favor,—how the has watched over and preserved them dangers into which their own heedlessness would have led them—and how He has eered their spirits by the fresh visitations s love, and made them willing at times to obey his requirings. The Good Re-brancer may also bring to their minds y things which cause the blush of shame me to the cheek, and the pang of regret e heart. They may recall instances of tfulness or wilfulness, in childhood; of e indulgence of the appetites; of business ections in which they have not acted on golden rule of treating others as they d desire to be treated themselves; and of eat variety of other matters, which the ened conscience sees to have been viola- of the Divine law. All this tends to ble them, and to bring them into that e condition, which enables them to t the language of the poor publican, l be merciful to me a sinner."

nder this renewed baptism of the Spirit, ave felt it safest for them to re-open of the transactions of the distant past; k forgiveness of those whom they had ndly treated, and to make restitution in where they had hardly dealt with others, though the transactions were legal in selves. The remembrance of the rapidly aching day, when "the grasshopper e a burden," has awakened an earnest e, that when health and strength fails, may be nothing left undone to disturb ind, but that they may know all their udged beforehand, and all the duties red of them performed, so that there may othing remaining, but to bear the last al struggles of nature, and through the s assistance to keep the heart fixed on who has redeemed them from all iniquity who they humbly trust will receive them everlasting rest and peace.

J. J. Levick, of Philadelphia, has kindly us a copy of a recent address entitled, "Early Friends and their services in ica."

treats an interesting subject in an in- ing manner—describing more especially the history, character and labors of George Fox, Robert Barclay and William Penn.

After relating the gradual opening of spiritual truth to the mind of George Fox, the author says, that his message may be epitomized in his own words: "I saw that Christ died for all men, and had enlightened all men and women with his divine and saving light, and that no man could be a true believer but who believed in it."

"Not only does George Fox say, 'I saw that Christ died for all men,' but he also says, 'I saw Christ had enlightened all men and women with his divine and saving light.' This, which William Penn calls the characteristic doctrine of the Friends, now appears in almost every sermon, epistle and paper put forth by George Fox. That it was thus prominently put forward was doubtless due to the fact that the great doctrine of the Atonement was generally accepted by the then Christian world, and although the acceptance of it was mixed up with error, there was, relatively, but little necessity for especially pressing it upon men's attention at that time. But this, to them, new doctrine, a living, present Christ, they preached everywhere, and, I may add, almost everywhere 'the common people heard them gladly.' For to these people, in their great unrest, there came with this doctrine of direct access to their Saviour, a sense of rest and peace and companionship, for which they had long earnestly yearned, but to which they had thus far been strangers. No wonder that the people heard it gladly! No wonder, too, that there soon arose that fierce spirit of persecution against those who held it, taught it, and, with and by it, drew away so many from their old forms and places of worship."

"Out of this doctrine of an indwelling Christ came as a natural sequence, all their distinctive doctrines. If He were in every heart,—if men had in them the Real Presence, it followed that all mere types and shadows of that Real Presence were unnecessary. This doctrine, if accepted, at once did away with all need for the rites and ceremonies of the Church, as it is called. The early Quakers recognized the necessity of baptism, but it was a baptism of the Holy Ghost. They loved to partake of the communion, but it was to them an inward and spiritual feast. They recognized the value of a rightly ordained ministry, but they taught that its lessons must be learned in a higher school than Oxford or Cambridge, and that having been freely received they must be freely given.

All that was distinctive in their views respecting the ministry came of the doctrine we have been considering, an inward revelation, qualifying, guiding, directing for this service; not a natural principle like reason or conscience, capable of being cultivated by individuals themselves, influenced by their surroundings, moulded by their education, but a direct gift to their souls, unerring in its guidance, infallible in its teachings,—an emanation from God himself."

"And now there came to George Fox and his associates that fierce storm of persecution which, even though we read the literal account, we fail, I think, to comprehend the full extent of it. By it, in the language of the historian I have quoted, 'everywhere and for long wearisome years, they were exposed to perpetual dangers and griefs. They were whipped, crowded into jails among felons, kept in dungeons foul and gloomy, fined, exiled, sold into colonial bondage. Imprisoned in winter, without fire, they perished from the cold. Some were victims to the barbarous cruelty of the jailers; twice George Fox narrowly escaped death. They braved every danger to continue their assemblies. Haled out-by violence they returned; when their meeting-houses were torn down they gathered openly on the ruins. They could not be dissolved by armed men, and when their opposers took shovels to throw rubbish on them they stood close together, willing to be buried alive witnessing for the Lord."

One whose eloquent voice is now stilled in death, the late Henry Armitt Brown, quotes, in his Burlington address, that wonderful event in their early history when, in one of the darkest hours, their comrades lay languishing in prison, the Friends marched in procession to Westminster Hall, to offer themselves to Parliament as hostages for their brethren. 'In love to our brethren, say they, who lie in Prisons, in dungeons and in many fetters and irons, and have been cruelly beat by the cruel jailers * * and many who be sick and weak in Prison and on straw * * we do offer up our bodies and selves to you for you to put us as lambs into the same dungeons, and do stand ready a sacrifice for to go into their places that they may go forth and not die.'"

Dr. Levick speaks of the spread of the doctrines preached by George Fox; of the conviction of David Barclay and his son Robert, who was made Governor of East Jersey; of the early settlements of Friends in America; of the visit to this country of George Fox in 1671, and his perils and hardships in his wilderness journey; and of the settlements of William Penn. As he looks back over the history he has briefly sketched, he asks the question:—

"Have subsequent results compensated for this fearful expenditure of all that men deem valuable in life,—health, strength, liberty—life itself?"

I think they have, and I include in this expenditure, the frightful persecutions in New England, where three highly cultivated Christian men had their ears cut off; where delicately nurtured women, younger and older, were whipped at the cart-tail from town to town, and where Robinson, Stevenson, Leddra and Mary Dyer perished by the hand of the hangman.

As I read to-day, on every side, the recognition of the great doctrine of an indwelling Christ, hear it preached by Episcopalian, Presbyterian and Baptist, see how it permeates the life of the best men in all our churches, to what results it has already led, and to what higher ones it is leading; when I see, as I daily do, their views on tithes, on oaths, on complete religious toleration, accepted as correct by Christians all about me, I know that these early Friends did not live—did not die—in vain."

Here our friend might have added, what he no doubt regards as too self-evident to require distinct enunciation—that even if no visible results could now be traced from the faithfulness of those witnesses for the truth, yet there was abundant compensation to them in the peace of God which was shed abroad in their hearts, and in the holy confidence with which they were enabled to look for the crown of righteousness reserved for the righteous.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The American Land League, representing the Irish race, met in Philadelphia on the 25th ultimo, and continued its sessions three days. A series of resolutions were adopted declaring that the English Government has no moral right whatever to exist in Ireland; that it is the duty of the Irish race throughout the world to sustain the Irish people in the employment of all legitimate means to substitute for it national self-government; that all the societies represented in the Convention, and all that may hereafter comply with the conditions of admission, be organized into the Irish National League of America, for the purpose of supporting the Irish National League of Ireland, of which Charles Stewart Parnell is President; demanding that the farmers allow the laborers a fair day's wages for a fair day's work; counselling their countrymen in Ireland to buy nothing in England which they can produce in Ireland or procure from America or France, and pledging themselves to promote Irish manufactures by encouraging their import into America, and to use their utmost endeavor to persuade American tradesmen from keeping English goods on sale; declaring that an English Ministry has earned the contempt of fair-minded men throughout the world by imprisoning more than a thousand citizens of Ireland without accusation or trial; that the policy of the English Government in first reducing the Irish peasantry to abject poverty and then sending them penniless to the United States, dependents upon American charity, is unnatural and an outrage upon the American Government and people.

The total exports of the United States for the twelve months which ended 3rd mo. 31st, 1883, amounted in value to $808,726,356, an increase of $17,917,386 on those of the preceding twelve months. Our total imports for the twelve months which ended 3rd mo. 31st, 1883, were $742,442,259, an increase of $41,599,385 on those for the twelve months which ended 3rd mo. 31st, 1882.

The latest advices from the tornado-devastated region of Mississippi say that 83 persons were killed and 300 injured, many dangerously. The loss of property is said to be "unprecedented." Corrected lists of the killed and injured at Beauregard and Wesson give the following figures: Beauregard—killed 31, injured 60; Wesson—killed 22, injured 31. As showing the force of the storm, it is asserted that "a solid iron screw of a cotton press, weighing 675 pounds, was carried by the cyclone 300 yards." Also, that "a piece of scantling, 3 by 4 inches and 10 feet long, was driven through a red oak sapling." Accounts from places in the interior of Georgia, distant from rail and telegraph, which were swept by the tornado, are beginning to come in. In Taliaferro and Lincoln counties, gin houses and cabins were demolished, and in the latter county a man and his son were dangerously injured, and his wife was killed by the demolition of their house. The house of B. J. Roop, near Franklin, was swept off by a sudden rise in the Hillahotchie Creek on First-day night, and all except Roop perished.

A "water spout" in Lenoir county, North Carolina, on the 25th, destroyed forests, orchards and dwellings, in some places changing the face of the country. No lives are reported lost.

It is believed that little or no damage was done to the peaches in Delaware and Maryland by the frost of last week.

One hundred vessels, with 4,250,000 bushels of grain, are lying at Chicago, awaiting the opening of the Straits of Mackinaw.

The Turtle Mountain Band of Chippewa Indians in Northern Minnesota, are reported to be starving. Deputy Customs Collector McCollum and John F. Malo, member of the Canadian Parliament, have written to Secretary Teller that, unless immediately relieved, few of these Indians will be alive to meet the Indian Commissioner in 6th month, as they now anticipate doing. The Indian Agent at Devil's Lake has been directed to use every effort to provide for these Indians at once. The Indian Agent at Fort Totten, Montana, informs the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that he has notified the Turtle Mountain Indians to go to his agency and receive supplies.

The Prohibition amendment before the Michigan House of Representatives failed to pass on the 26th ult. for want of a two-thirds vote. The yeas were 57, the nays 36, with 8 absentees.

In the Senate of Wisconsin, on the 25th, the Prohibition amendment to the Constitution was lost for want of a two-thirds vote, and a local option measure was laid on the table for future consideration.

Justice May, in Steubenville, Ohio, on the 30th ult. decided that the Scott Liquor Law was unconstitutional, because the tax imposed by it was unequal, and because it impaired existing contracts.

The Mayor of Minneapolis has vetoed the ordinance fixing the rate of saloon licenses at $1500. It failed to pass over his veto by one vote.

Statistics collected at Portland, Oregon, show that since 1st mo. 1st the number of people arriving in that section by the two lines of ocean steamers was 19,600. Of the total immigration, 50 per cent. seek homes on Puget Sound, while the rest scatter to the grain districts east of the Cascade mountains.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 378, which was 9 less than during the previous week, and 3 less than during the corresponding period last year. The number of males and females was 189 each; 65 died of consumption; 27 of pneumonia; 18 of diphtheria; 15 of old age; 11 of convulsions; 9 of scarlet fever and 8 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 103½; 3½'s, 103; 4½'s, 120; currency 6's 129 to 132.

Cotton.—There was no essential change to notice in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 10¾ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ a 7¾ cts. for export, and 8½ a 8¾ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in fair demand and steady. Sales of 2600 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.50 a $6.50; Pennsylvania family at $5.12½ a $5.25; western do. at $5.50 a $6.20, and patents at $6.25 a $7.75. Rye flour is quiet but steady at $3.62½ a $3.75 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is quiet but a fraction higher. Sales of 4000 bushels red, No. 2 and long berry, in car lots, at $1.16 a $1.25. Rye is nominal. Corn is in moderate demand, and steady. Sales of 8500 bushels in car lots, at 62 a 66 cts., and a choice lot at 68 cts. Oats are dull and irregular. Sales of 7500 bushels, in car lots, at 48½ a 53 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 4th mo. 25th, 1883.—Loads of hay, 283; loads of straw, 52. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 90 cts. to $1.00 per 100 pounds; mixed, 85 a 95 cts.; straw, 55 a 65 cts.

Beef cattle were in fair demand, and prices were a fraction higher: 2500 head arrived and sold at 5½ a 7½ cts. per lb.; the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were a fraction lower: 10,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 7½ cts. for wool sheep, and 3½ a 5½ cts. for clipped, spring lambs sold at $3 a $7 per head.

Hogs were rather lower: 4000 head sold at the different yards at 10½ a 11½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

FOREIGN.—On the 27th ultimo, Michael Fagan was convicted of the murder of Frederick Burke. Fitzharris, another of the Phoenix Park conspirators, is now on trial.

The Times, in an editorial article, says the Irish Convention at Philadelphia began with claptrap folly and malignity, and closed after the same fashion. The whole scene, it says, would be painful were it not supremely ridiculous. The only practical suggestion made by the Convention for injuring Great Britain is the advice to the people of Ireland to buy nothing from England unless they are obliged to. It is a confession of impotence when Irish malice is driven to such a paltry expedient, which, if tried, would only injure its adopters. The lesson for Great Britain is to ignore Irishmen and abandon the hope of bringing them to a better frame of mind by a continuance of unmerited favors. They have already convinced the world that they are unfit to have national independence, and they must be made to feel the strong hand of the law.

The Standard, in a leading article commenting on the proceedings of the Irish Convention at Philadelphia, says, C. S. Parnell knew that a word from him plainly denouncing the dynamite policy would have produced a deep effect on the Convention; but, it says, he will not speak the word lest he should wound the susceptibilities of some of his friends in America.

On the 24th ultimo, Lord Carlingford, Lord President of the Council and Minister of Agriculture, said the accounts from the distressed districts in Ireland had been decidedly more encouraging during the last few weeks. He said the Government were agreed that emigration was the best and the inevitable remedy for the distress, but they had neither the right, nor was it necessary to force it upon the people. The Government had received a hopeful offer for the removal of a number of selected families across the Atlantic. The offers mentioned by Lord Carlingford are from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and Land Companies interested in the opening of the Canadian Northwest. The proposal of these companies is to settle 5000 families, numbering in the aggregate 25,000 persons, on government lands under the Homestead laws, which give each family 160 acres free. The promoters of the scheme would become security for £1,000,000 to be advanced, interest free, by Great Britain for ten years, to be devoted to loans sufficient to start each family they would become security for £2,000,000 with which they would relieve the crowded districts of Ireland 50,000 persons.

The combined efforts of four policemen were required to carry into the House of Commons on 4th mo. the petition in favor of closing public houses on Monday—one of the largest documents of the kind ever sent to Parliament. It contained 590,332 signatures upon a continuous roll of paper, which was 4832 y long, and weighed 350 pounds.

The French Chamber of Deputies, by a vote of 99, has adopted the first clause of the bill providing for the conversion of the 5 per cent. rentes into 4½ cents., after rejecting Baudry-D'Asson's amendment substituting for the conversion section the reduction of salaries of civil functionaries exceeding 1000 fr. annually. The bill was finally adopted by a vote of 400 to 107.

An explosion occurred on the 25th ult. in a mine at Besseges, in the arrondissement of Alais. Nine bodies have thus far been recovered. At the roll-call it was had after the explosion, 127 miners failed to answer to their names, and it is feared there are more victims.

The National Expedition to Tonquin has produced such excitement in China that it is deemed prudent to retain several French iron clads near Shanghai and Hong Kong. Therefore, only a portion of the squadron in Chinese waters will proceed to Tonquin. It is expected that Captain Kergaradec, French Envoy to Nam, will be appointed Lieutenant Governor of Tonquin, when a protectorate is established. It is stated that the French Minister to Peking, who was ordered to return home, has been instructed to remain at Peking until further orders.

The National Zeitung says the position of Sargent United States Minister, is considered in diplomatic circles to have been shaken in consequence of his opposition to the American Secretary of State on the subject of importation of pork into Germany.

At a recent meeting of the Hawaiian Cabinet, resolutions were adopted "that in view of the influx of Chinese, the Minister of Foreign Affairs be authorized to notify the Hong Kong authorities that the Hawaiian Government protest against the excessive emigration of Chinese men alone."

Locusts have appeared in large numbers at Orizaba, Mexico, and it is feared they will invade the Central Plateau.

Separation.

When the earth was a chaos and the darkness was upon the face of the deep, and the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters, God said: "Let there be light:" and there was light. And God divided the light from the darkness. This was the first separation of light from darkness.

There is another earth or world full of darkness and iniquity, but still the embryo of Light here! This is man in the fall and alienation from God his Maker. In this condition seed sown in him by the enemy has taken root and produced a most abundant crop of thorns and briars—and upon the face of the heart of his heart—there is darkness. The Light shineth in darkness and the darkness comprehends it not. But there is a time when the visitation of the Father of Light cometh, and the voice is heard: "Let there be light in this confused chaos," called man, and there be light. As God in this outward world separated the light from the darkness, so in the heart He will separate the light from the darkness, and the Light will discover the darkness in all its subtle and secret manifestations, and the darkness will be cast out of the redeemed man, and the Light will cover the face of the deep of man's heart. And after the fire has consumed the thorns and briars which have grown during the reign of darkness, there will grow the most fruitful plants of God's heavenly planting; yes, they will flourish and thrive in the rays of the Sun of righteousness with healings on its wings. So man reclaimed by the Lord, and separated from darkness, will consciously live and move and have its being in God, in the Father of the Word, who gave his life as a ransom for the world, and ruleth in the children of obedience. Oh! in the children of darkness, or the children of the Light of truth, the darkness is found no more, for there is nothing left of the old earth of darkness, but the first heaven and the first earth have passed away, and the sea is no more—elements of the new heaven and the new earth are in them. Here is realized the tabernacle of God with men. They have got part of the first resurrection, and they are blessed and holy, and over them the second death has no power. They live as strangers and pilgrims in the tents of Kedar, their lives being hid with Christ in God.

O, consider how the Light of Christ in man, when obediently followed, causes man's heart to be entirely separated and cleansed from darkness and the deeds of darkness, and to become a fit temple for Christ to work in; or we may say: all man's own wills and desires must be submitted to the fiery baptisms of the great spiritual baptizer, Christ, before He works the works of righteousness in man, which is to set up his kingdom in righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. Therefore none can be a minister of Christ, and be owned and recognized by Christ, before his heart has been cleansed and purified by his Spirit; so that Christ himself will work in and through him, wherefore such a minister can say: "Christ, who is in me, does the works, just as Christ said: My Father who is in me does the works."

The truly begotten children of God's incorruptible seed,—the Word, who abideth forever,—are saints indeed. They are the people constituting the true church which is in the wilderness, even in our days of so much high profession of Christ. They are few, but more are formed as in the caves and holes of the mountains, hidden from the world; but in the Lord's time they will come forth in power, and the morning will come for sleeping humanity, and the night and its works will be discovered and judged. The separation of light from darkness will take place—the darkness passing away to the place reserved for it.

There is another sort of separation visible in this world, which is to be judged in the Light. There are in the great city of Babylon often people who, feeling convictions of sins, and in a measure seeing the corruption and confusion there, will feel desirous to separate from the mysterious city of iniquity—and they may do it. Their intention in the first place is good, but coming out mostly in their own wills, and not being subject to the Light and willing to follow it in all its holy manifestations and purifying judgments, as to become perfectly cleansed, and to have the Light and Life of Christ to rule and work, or do works in them and through them; they have never been renewed up to the condition in which Adam was before he fell,—less to the condition in which Christ was, who never fell; therefore all their works are as a defiled garment. They may believe that by quoting the words from the saints who wrote the Scriptures, and from the saints in other ages, they are bringing back the church from the apostacy; but their best orthodoxy cannot do it. It is only the saints in the Spirit and power of Christ, who can do it, for Christ who is in the saints does the work—He is declared wonderful in the saints. This kind of separation seems always to believe that the Scripture of truth is the only rule of faith given for man's salvation, and by studying and expounding the Scripture the people will be safely guided to the Day star. But Christ said, that the Holy Spirit should guide his disciples into all truth, and the prophecy of old was, that all should be taught by God. If Christ does not give to men the key of David to open the Scriptures, they are more likely to lead from God than to God—as the case was in the days of the religious Pharisees, and is now in outward Christendom, where there is no lack of studying and searching the Scriptures, but men have used them in their own wills, for their own wills and purposes and inventions; and professing Christendom has been cut up into hundreds of sects and denominations as a consequence from using the Scriptures without first being in the Spirit which gave them forth. The greatest assailers of Christendom have even well studied or searched the Scriptures. The prince of darkness is posted about the Scriptures too.

Every false and dying religion had a founder, and when that founder passed away, his religion continued by following his instructions and writings left behind him—for which purpose a priesthood was needed to preserve and expound the traditions. As the founder of such a religion did die, so the religion being traditional is dying, having no spirit and life. To such a religion priestcraft has tried and endeavored to bring the Christian religion; in vain, for the eternal gospel of Christ is but all their endeavors have been and will be preached in every creature, and is in Spirit and in truth, and is Spirit and is Life; and Christ has not passed away, but is the Word of God which abideth forever, and the true Light which enlightens every man that cometh into the world. Most true and precious is the experience of the children of light and morning, that their Lawgiver, Redeemer, Light and Life is always present with them, and in them. But to those that follow Christ after the flesh in the tradition of Him, denying his Light as a gift for salvation, the Christian religion is a religion of priestcraft and a dying religion.

Now, in the Light and Spirit of Christ, I feel a commission laid upon me to touch a more tender case of separation, and I hope, what I write down in discernment and in my reader will not impatiently call fault-finding. For more than two centuries ago a people in white garments were gathered by the mighty power of God, and meetings were set up in the power and Spirit of Christ. Men had nothing of their own to do with it—being no organization of men and by men—but in the power of Jesus Christ, in and through the Holy Spirit. These people had received Christ in his Light, and got the Light of Life,—had become saints. They were fed by Christ. They were indeed a multitude, having come out of great tribulation and washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb,—a church that had come out of the wilderness. They remained so for a time, but the enemy came in like a flood, and many left their habitation in the Light and holiness. The reason of this plaintive apostasy is evident to those whose spiritual eyes are opened; it was slighting of the Light of Christ, the Light of the world, who gives the Light of life to those that follow Him; therefore without light no life! The Light will plainly show the faithful and obedient ones what to do. When a majority in a place desires to remain in the truth, and acknowledge the principles of truth, there is great need for them to remain there and be faithful to the truth, and follow the Light in obedience, and the Light will grow upon them, and Christ will establish his kingdom more and more in all that have not come to the unity in faith, (for in such a company or assembly must be people of different conditions of light) according to their obedience to the measure of faith; and children will grow up to strong men, and strong men will grow up and become elders in their respective order, and the Great Head of all will lead them in all truth, and his work in them will, in the Lord's time, put down all the unruly and airy spirits. But if the enemy should succeed to sow a seed of impatience, to draw out a part of that people from the Light, so that they would think that they would do best to separate for sake of doing better, and do it, that would be a very sorrowful and unjust doing, to leave that part of those that had a true desire to be faithful, to contend alone with the airy spirits. Therefore such a separation would not be of the Light, but of men's impatience, and would not bring forth any good fruit,—for it would rather seem in the Light to be a desertion from the witnesses of the Light of Christ, than anything else. But if those from whom they came out, will stand faithful in the Light, the outcomers must own their own offence and return; for if they can show by their lives and conversations in goodness, that they are true saints, then they will help their brethren to put down the airy and dark spirits.

On the other hand, when the majority is fallen from the truth, and there are only few that own the truth; then those few have nothing to do among the unfaithful, but are to heed the voice: "Come out from her, oh my people." Now there is much required from such out-comers to walk in the Light and become saints indeed, and not to be drawn out from the Light with desire to establish meetings and defend the truth in their own will, by proclaiming orthodoxy and true principles. Oh, remain in the Light and grow up to perfect saints in the unchangeable inheritance in the Light, and the Lord will surely, in his day, show forth that He owns his people! It is easier to establish a church, so-called, than to be saints.

Nebraska.

Let none be cast down or discouraged; for greater is He that is for us than he that is against us; and although many are the trials of faith and patience, the deep baptisms, and the tribulations which the Lord's children have to pass through, yet He delivereth out of them all; and He will deliver, and that to the very uttermost, all that in sincerity trust in Him. And how doth He mercifully vouchsafe unto such, in the abounding of his love, a blessed portion of that "peace which passeth all understanding" to sustain them in the way that they should go.—Memoirs of D. Wheeler.

The Mennonites.

The Mennonite reservation, east of the Red River, and about twenty-five miles southeast of Winnipeg, is now as well populated as any district of the province of Manitoba, and the most recent immigration has been directed to a reservation of seventeen townships adjoining the frontier, and extending west of Red river to Pembina mountain. The settlement on the reservation first mentioned, called Rat river, consists of 650 families, and on the second reservation, called Dufferin, 450 families have been settled. In addition, thirty-three families have been settled near Scratching river, and the recent arrival of thirty-five families will go to Dufferin.

Estimating five to a family, the Mennonite settlements of Manitoba contain a population of 5,865, which will doubtless be increased steadily, but by no means with the volume of the past three years. The Mennonites who remain in Southern Russia, though inclined to emigrate in consequence of the termination of the stipulation exempting them from military services, are not prepared to sacrifice their possessions. When they can sell without disadvantage they emigrate. The exodus is, therefore, likely to be gradual, especially as the Russian government, while insisting on the right of conscription, assents readily to special assignments of service in deference to the Mennonite conscience—such as transportation, forestry and hospital service—very much as the Quakers of the United States during the late civil war were subjected to military service, but relieved from bearing arms.*

The emigrating class of Lutheran Quakers, known as Mennonites, are neither the rich nor the poor, but are an intermediate body, who are, however, by no means destitute. —Hespeler estimates that the sum brought into the province by the Mennonite immigration is $500,000, and the recently arrived thirty-five families have not less than $10,000.

There are Mennonite settlements in the Western States, but the land system there enforced does not admit of special reservations, and Manitoba has thus been enabled to present greater inducements for this class of settlers. Here the community can organize itself fully according to its traditions, including the rural village life of the dorf—or dorp, as we believe the word is Anglicised—a custom which has great merit socially and will warrant some fulness of detail.

A group of families—usually sixteen in number—take their homesteads separately, but proceed to throw them together, selecting the most desirable situation for a village or dorf, through which a street two chains wide is laid, and the plat divided into half-acre lots, with assignments for church, school or other public use. A tract most suitable for tillage is then selected in a block, which is enclosed, and within which each head of a family cultivates that portion of his allotment—for there is no communism—that he finds convenient. A hay meadow, held also in severalty, is chosen, and the remainder of the consolidated homesteads is used as a range for cattle and other animals, which are invariably attended by a herdsman who is paid by the dorf. The village lots and other subdivisions are tributed by lot.

The houses—only found in the dorf—comfortable, heated by central brick oven warming three or four rooms. The same usually extends over separate lodgings cattle, although in this respect there is a growing tendency to have different tenements. Each family has a yoke of oxen, two cows and indefinite poultry. The pig is not wanted; and there are five hundred sheep and a hundred and fifty horses on the Rat River Reservation.

The municipal government is a simple democracy. The heads of families annually select a mayor or reeve, who is the chief executive officer, constantly conferring with constituents. Over the whole community a president or elder, selected for five years and who, associated with the mayors of dorfs, form a court for the final adjustment of all disputes and the enactment of all necessary ordinances. The president may act on all matters relating to a separate village in concurrence with the mayor thereof.

The church organization is quite distinct from the civil administration. The people elect a clergyman in each dorf, and a bishop to preside over the whole community for periods of five years. They receive no stipend. The teachers of the schools, one held in each village, are chosen by the people, but are given a moderate compensation. Marriages are free; no allotment is made as formerly among the Moravians, and they are usually contracted early, the pair often remaining with the most prosperous of the parents for a year or two.

An admirable system of mutual insurance against fire prevails under a board of directors elected by the whole community. The insured are not restricted in amount, but contribute pro rata in case of any loss.

The mayor of a dorf, with two assistants constitute an orphan court for the distribution of estates and the custody of the funds of orphans, for which the property of every villager is liable, deducting from the orphan fund whatever contributions for relief of the few destitute orphans may be found necessary.—Winnipeg (British Possessions) Standard.

Card-Playing at Home.—Playing cards "pastime" or as an "innocent amusement" soon becomes a passion, and when once for a man will forego home, family, business, pleasure, and suffer the loss of his all for exciting scenes of the card-table.

That accomplished writer, the late Holland, of Springfield, Mass., said: "I all my days had a card-playing communion open to my observation, and I am yet unable to believe that that which is the universal resort of the starved in soul and intellect which has never in any way linked to its tender, elevating, or beautiful association the tendency of which is to unduly attract the attention from more weighty matters, recommend itself to the favor of Christ's disciples. The presence of culture and genius may embellish, but can never dignify it."

"I have this moment," said Dr. Holladay, "ringing in my ears the dying injunction of my father's early friend, 'Keep your sons and daughters from cards. Over them I have murdered time lost heaven.'" Fathers and mothers, keep your sons from cards in the "home circle."

What must a good angel think of a mother meeting asking prayers for the conversion of her son whom she allowed to remain at home playing cards for "pastime?"

Gather up the Fragments.

Extract from a letter of our late dear friend, Thomas Evans. May the reading of it prove a word in season to those who sow in weakness. "It is sown in weakness; it is raised in power."—1 Cor. xv. 43.

"Philada., 3rd mo. 11th, 1867.

My Dear Friend,—It was grateful to me to receive thy kind letter, and to know of the satisfactory and peaceful termination of your arduous labors among the families of Birmingham Monthly Meeting. I doubt not you were enabled to return to your homes rejoicing and gleaning your sheaves with you—for the Lord's children serve a good and gracious Master, who is a rich rewarder of all who endeavor diligently to do his will. Those who blessed with health and strength act wisely devoting them fully to every required service in the Lord's cause—for even if life is shortened out, the period soon comes when weakness and infirmities of declining years disqualify for active service; and however the will to do may be present, how to perform we find not. How much more consolatory under such circumstances to feel that while we did what we could, than to have to regret that the love of lawful things, or any other cause, hindered us from the full performance of the Lord's will.

Thy notice of your visit to that worthy and honorable mother in Israel, dear Hannah Hobbs, and of her preaching the gospel to me, was peculiarly pleasant to me—I had her much in my thoughts for some time, I was desiring to hear about her—having my small measure felt much near fellowship and Christian sympathy with her. Though she seems long detained from her heavenly mansion, I doubt not it is for some wise and precious purpose to others beside herself, and that when her measure of service and of suffering is filled up, she will be welcomed to her home above with the gladdening salutation: Come, thou blessed of my Father! inherit the kingdom prepared for thee.

The Writing on the Wall.

The massive ruins of Egypt are covered with writings which told to the people of long ago what men had done in the avowed service of the gods, and of what the gods would have them do. And so of the ancient ruins of Nineveh and Babylon. It was in accordance with the even then ancient customs of the world, that the Israelites were told, in the wilderness, to write the words of their God on the posts of their houses, and on their gates, when they should enter into the land of their promised possession; and, again, that Joshua was commanded to set up great stones and plaster them with plaster, and write upon them all the words of the divinely given law, as the centre of their new inheritance. In the Jewish, and in Christian, and in Mohammedan, and, also, in many Pagan communities, in modern times as in the days of old, the walls and gates of temples and dwellings were inscribed with words that are held sacred, and that speak lessons of warning or counsel to those who read them.

Reverent Jews have, it is true, given undue prominence to the letter of God's command to write the words of the law on their doorposts and on their gates; as Christians have unduly exalted the letter of a Divine command above its spirit, in many another matter; but this error, in either case, cannot change the real force of the commandment. The Jews inscribe certain passages of Scripture—such as Deuteronomy vi. 4-9, and Deuteronomy xi. 13-21—on a piece of parchment, which they roll up and superscribe with the Hebrew word Shaddai (Almighty God). This roll they insert in a tube or case of wood or metal or glass, in which is an opening through which the superscribed name of the Deity may be seen; and the case with its enclosure, called m'zuzah, is fastened to the door-post at the right hand as one enters the door. Each room in the house, whether parlor, reception-room, bed-room, kitchen, or cellar, has the "m'zuzah" at its door, in the home of many a devout Jew; and the rabbinical writers attribute peculiar gain to the keeping of this one of "the three great precepts of Judaism." For example, it is said: "Whosoever attends to the m'zuzah, the days of himself and his children will be prolonged; and whosoever does not, they shall be shortened." "By reason of the m'zuzah the destroyer shall have no admittance in your houses." "The Lord is thy keeper; the Lord is thy shade upon thy right hand; for the m'zuzah is on thy right hand on entering thy house." This prominence to the m'zuzah is a testimony to the recognized binding nature of the injunction to keep the words of God before us on the walls in our homes; but it can hardly be accepted as meeting either the spirit or the purpose of that injunction.—S. S. Times.

For "The Friend."

It is cause of rejoicing to find the long-established belief of Friends, as to worship and ministry, supported by the testimony of those of other persuasions. The following extract from the teaching of Geo. F. Pentecost, in treating of Acts x. 30-44, added to that of Bishop Stephens, noted in a recent issue of "The Friend," gives us to hope that the spirituality of the religion of Christ is coming to be more and more recognized by religious professors:

"The True Attitude of a Sincere Inquirer.—This is indicated in [Cornelius'] first words to Peter, after having explained to him how he came to send to him: 'We are all here present before God.' God was not visible to their mortal eyes, but to the eye of faith and sincere piety, He was present. Though they were to hear the message of God through the lips of a man like themselves, yet it was the presence of God (as they believed Him to be) that was the ground of the whole conference. If all hearers of sermons would only take this position, more of them would be converted. The trouble with too many of our congregations is that they are present before men to hear what man has to say to them. Second. 'To hear all things that are commanded thee of God.' He recognized that Peter had no message of his own to deliver, but a message from God.

"Here we see the true business of a minister of the Word: To speak the things he has received from God, and not his own thoughts; and here also we see the true position of the hearer of the Gospel, viz., to listen to what God has to say to him, and not man, and to hear 'all things,' or the 'whole counsel of God.' We are reminded of these scriptures: 'Hear, and your soul shall live.' 'If any man wills to do the will of my Father, he shall know of the doctrine.' 'He that heareth my words and believeth Him that sent me, hath everlasting life.'"

Marshallton, Pa.

The Discerning Teacher.

A teacher having charge of a school in a country town found among her scholars a boy about fourteen years old, who cared very little about study, and showed no interest apparently in anything connected with the school. Day after day he failed in his lesson, and detentions after school hours and notes to his widowed mother had no effect. One day the teacher had sent him to his seat after a vain effort to get from him a correct answer to questions in grammar; and feeling somewhat nettled she watched his conduct. Having taken his seat, he pushed the book impatiently aside, and spying a fly, caught it with a dexterous sweep of the hand, and then betook himself to a close inspection of the insect. For fifteen minutes or more the boy was thus occupied, heedless of surroundings, and the expression of his face told the teacher that it was more than idle curiosity that possessed his mind. A thought struck her, which she put into practice at the first opportunity that day. "Boys," said she, "what can you tell me about flies?" And calling several of the brightest by name, she asked them if they could tell her something of a fly's constitution and habits. They had very little to say about the insect. They had often caught one, but only for sport, and did not think it worth while to study so common an insect. Finally she asked the dunce, who had serenely, but with kindling eyes, listened to what his schoolmates hesitatingly said. He burst out with a description of the head, eyes, wings, and feet of the little creature, so full and enthusiastic that the teacher was astonished and the whole school struck with wonder. He told how it walked and how it ate, and many things which were entirely new to his teacher. So that when he had finished, she said: "Thank you! You have given us a real lecture in natural history, and you have learned it all yourself."

After the school that afternoon she had a long talk with the boy, and found that he was fond of going into the woods and meadows and collecting insects and watching birds, but that his mother thought he was wasting his time. The teacher, however, wisely encouraged him in this pursuit, and asked him to bring beetles and butterflies and caterpillars to school and tell what he knew about them. The boy was delighted by this unexpected turn of affairs, and in a few days the listless dunce was the marked boy of that school. Books on natural history were procured for him, and a world of wonders opened to his appreciative eyes. He read and studied and examined. He soon understood the necessity of knowing something of mathematics, geography, and grammar, for the successful carrying on of his favorite study; and he made rapid progress in his classes. In short, twenty years later he was eminent as a naturalist, and owed his success, as he never hesitated to acknowledge, to that discerning teacher.—Phrenological Journal.

For "The Friend."

Letters and Memoranda of William Scattergood.

To M. T.

"Philada., 2d mo. 5th, 1825.

Thou art perhaps ready to wonder at the long-continued silence of thy generally officious correspondent, and to suppose it may be occasioned by that forgetfulness which is so apt to steal over those whose friendship is not established upon the immutable basis. Thou art often in my affectionate remembrance; more so than thou may suppose. I always feel glad to receive thy letters. They often cheer a gloomy hour, of which, my dear — thy frail friend partakes largely at times.

Encompassed as it is by a cloud of infirmity, my soul still anxiously looks forward to the consummation in my own experience of that excellent injunction which was given by the apostle Paul to his fellow believers: 'Whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to the Father by Him.' And I have thought that I should rejoice in being assured that my occasional writing in this way was not altogether inconsistent with that precious anointing, to follow which in all its leadings, is, I trust, before every other consideration, nearest and dearest to my heart.

In the course now of a few months, should life be allotted me so long, I shall be thrown upon the world as an independent being. It is a period which I have no doubt excites in every mind more or less anxiety. In some, perhaps, pleasure may predominate at the prospect of liberty; in others a different disposition prevails. While too anxiously looking out for temporal advantages, all will be measurably disappointed. I am often asked latterly what are my prospects in relation to business? &c. This question brings the subject to mind more frequently than it would otherwise occur; and it is certainly not unworthy of consideration. Every one almost, in the present state of business in this city, is ready to hold up discouragements. To some who have questioned me upon this subject, I have returned for answer, a portion of our Saviour's address to his disciples: 'How much more are ye better than the fowls.' Nevertheless I have not been altogether void of anxiety even at this apparently distant period. I am measurably aware of the bustle and responsibility to which such a change of life must necessarily introduce me; and, trembling as I do now day by day lest the roaring adversary should prevail in drawing off from the fountain of living waters, the prospect of being brought more and more, as it were, into the vortex of temptation certainly cannot but excite a degree of fear in relation to my getting safely along. Thou wilt say, there is a blessed refuge. I feel sensible of this; and as I have had to experience, in measure, its efficiency in some sore conflicts, I can still look to the holy sanctuary; and my hope and constant prayer is, that He who is able to preserve from falling will condescend to keep my poor soul. But enough; I believe it is not best to dwell too much on the side of discouragement. It is declared that help is laid upon One that is mighty; and I am well assured that as we are faithfully concerned to look to Him, he will be 'strength to them who turn the battle to the gate.' What an anchor to the soul is this blessed faith, which enables us to hold fast the consolations which are in our ever adorable Head. Though the waters may come upon us, yea, the mighty waves of the sea, threatening to overwhelm and altogether to swallow us up, what a consoling thing it is, amid it all, to have our chief interest in Him, to be able to look with holy confidence to this stronghold for deliverance; for He will deliver to the uttermost all them that truly trust in Him. There is, notwithstanding, a propensity in human nature, and in no one perhaps more than myself, to mistrust the Arm that has been often stretched out for our salvation, and to be ready to ask nearly in the language of the Psalmist, Will the Lord be merciful no longer? Well, we are all poor creatures; and the way to the kingdom is declared to be through many tribulations; yet is not a crown of never-fading glory worth infinitely more than we can suffer? especially when we consider our own frailty, and the marvellous loving-kindness of our great and good Master, who gave himself for us that He might redeem us from all iniquity? Should we not receive his chastenings with thankfulness, seeing that they, when properly endured, work for our sanctification; being the means which He makes use of, in order to prepare us for an inheritance undefiled and precious in the mansions of holiness? I can say for my own part, how trying soever to the carnal man it may be, that I desire to be made willing to bear the portion which may be allotted to me; and that by patient continuance in the path of Christian warfare, and under a sense that the excellency of the power is of God and not of ourselves, I may experience a qualification to lay hold on eternal life.

Thou art somewhat aware of the excitement which exists among us in the city. Next Second-day will be our Quarterly Meeting. Many no doubt of those who have to bear the brunt of the battle, look forward with painful feelings to it; and however their confidence may be in the everlasting Arm, yet the sorrowful sense of the weakness of a large proportion of our highly favored Society, must be a source of deep mourning to those who desire Zion's welfare. Our friend, I. Stevenson, who arrived here some time back will be likely to attend it. He is a valuable and solid Friend. He has held several public evening meetings this week, and appears to have given general satisfaction. We have heard of the arrival of Wm. Forster at Charleston, S. C.; whence he will most likely return hither at or before our next Yearly Meeting.

WILLIAM SCATTERGOOD.

Portions of the foregoing letter allude to the period, then near at hand, when Wm. Scattergood was to enter, at the age of twenty-one years, upon the arena and more responsible duties and assailing temptations of life. It is worthy of note, and we would commend young men of like age, to whom this may come, to solidly ponder the ground upon which he, W. S., bases his business prospects; and which moreover, as the sequel will show, proved successful; securing to him a sufficiency of the good things of this life, while at the same time and before all, he endeavored to have his bosom treasure laid up in heaven; whereupon, as said the Saviour, the heart will be there also. He writes: that notwithstanding sore conflicts, "I can still look to the glorious sanctuary; and my hope and constant prayer is, that He who is able to preserve us from falling will condescend to keep my poor soul." The fervent feeling of desire of the writer of this for young men just launching on the treacherous ocean of business life is, that they may strive to carry out the requisitions of our holy religion, and to precepts of Christ our Lawgiver, by seeking first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, with humble reliance on the promise of our heavenly King, that "all things need, will be added."

This wise course while leading in the footsteps of Christ's companions, would also be promotive of that "godliness" which we are assured "is profitable unto all things; having the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." And what more should any ask or desire, than the necessary thing of earth while an inhabitant of it, and the riches of the eternal kingdom, when eventually here must be forever severed? Above all, how would such humble, filial dependence secure the approval and the love of Him whose are the cattle upon a thousand hills, whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain whose mercy, duly regarded, will make sensible of the insignificance of every thing, in comparison with the will of Him whose favor should be more to us than even our natural lives; as it assuredly will be when the latter trying hour of nature comes—"that day in which all other days were made"—and we have none to look to, but the sovereign mercy and saving help of Him, who though Lord of all, had not on this earth, "where to lay his head."

Longing desires are felt to see more of our young men giving themselves first to the Saviour who died for us to be moulded according to His will; and then in simple, childlike dependence upon Him, pursuing whatever line of temporal business He may open to them and direct their foot-steps in. This, so far from being chimerical or a cunningly devised fable, is, on the contrary, in full accord with many such Scriptures as: "Trust in the Lord with all thine heart; and lean not unto thine own understanding. In all thy way acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths." It is greatly to be wished that this highly interesting class, should make a right start in life. And this none can do of themselves; for, "The way of man is not in himself; it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps." And again: "The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord," &c. By the dedication of their hearts and talents to the Lord, He will so direct the efforts of those as to bring glory to himself, and present an eternal peace to all who enlist as scholars in his school, and submit themselves to be taught by Him. This precious choice also, would lead us to appropriate the mercies, the blessings, and the opportunities with which a merciful Father has favored us in the channel of obedience and usefulness designed by Him who giveth "to every man his work," and thus would utilize them (if we may so speak) to the promotion of his kingdom and honor, instead of their being buried in the earth or wasted upon the desert air of this world.

The visitations of the Redeemer's mercy, the calls of his grace, the evidences of his love, it is believed are being sweetly and renewedly extended to the young of the present generation. And how aptly and truly the poet has conveyed the feelings of many hearts as they hopefully dwell upon those young in as was Wm. Scattergood when penning preceding letter, fully believing that if hence but kept pace with knowledge of dear Saviour's will, He would make such princes of the provinces; yea, fruitful field of offering and joyful in the house of prayer:—

virtue with peculiar charms appears, adorned with the garland of life's blooming years."

Business Relations and Obligations.

One of the least difficult lessons in the Christian's course, is to keep the very disproportionate concerns of time and eternity with distinct yet relative importance, in their places. This seems to have been, with disposed effort, in measure obtained in case of Joseph Gurney Bevan, of whom we have an instructive account, in Piety noted, vol. IV. pp. 68, 71. The following is thence extracted:—

In his dealings in trade, he maintained an unimpaired character for integrity of conduct. The fear of violating, in his intercourse with the world, any of the precepts of the Gospel, of acting contrary to its spirit, either for the sake of gain, or to procure outward respect, early subjected him to much thoughts. He exceeded most men in earnestly endeavoring to carry into the daily habits of life the sentiment, that he ought to avoid in any way contributing to that in another, which he was not satisfied to perform himself. He considered that a Christian ought to stand upon principle, and not be deterred from doing right, by any apprehension of consequences; and he was concerned faithfully to observe these rules." It may also be added "Being a man of a tender conscience, entertaining elevated ideas of the purity which becomes a real Christian, and of that candor and sincerity with which he should live towards men, his own life was often that of inward conflict and self-examination."

Cheerful Home.—A single bitter word disquieted an entire family for a whole day. A single glance casts a gloom over the household, while a smile, like a gleam of sunshine, bright up the darkest and weariest hours. Unexpected flowers which spring up in our path, full of freshness, fragrance and beauty, so the kind words, gentle acts and sweet dispositions, make glad the home of Christ's peace and blessing dwell. No matter how humble the abode, if it be thus adorned with grace and sweetened with peace and smiles, the heart will turn longingly toward it from all the tumults of the world; and home, if it be ever so homely, is the dearest spot under the circuit of heaven.

The influences of home perpetuate themselves. The gentle grace of the mother is in her daughters long after her head is laid in the dust of death; and fatherly kindness finds its echo in the nobility and piety of sons who come to wear his mantle and fill his place; while, on the other hand, an unhappy, misgoverned and disordered home go forth persons who shall make other homes miserable, and perpetuate the sourness and rudeness, the contentions, the strifes, the sins, which have made their own early life wretched and distorted.

HOME.

Home's not merely four square walls,
Though hung with pictures nicely gilded;
Home is where affection calls,
Filled with shrines the heart hath builded.
Home! go watch the faithful dove,
Sailing 'neath the heaven above us;
Home is where there's one to love—
Home is where there's one to love us.

Home's not merely roof and room—
Home needs something to endure it;
Home is where the heart can bloom,
Where there's some kind lip to cheer it!
What is home with none to meet,
None to welcome none to greet us?
Home is sweet, and only sweet,
When there's one we love to meet us.

Bear the burden of the present—
Let the morrow bear its own;
If the morning sky be pleasant,
Why the coming night bemoan!

If the darkened heavens lower,
Wrap thy cloak around thy form;
Though the tempest rise in power,
God is mightier than the storm.

Steadfast hope and faith unshaken,
Animate the trusting breast;
Step by step the journey's taken,
Nearer to the land of rest.

All unseen the Master walketh
By the toiling servant's side;
Comfortable words He talketh,
While his hands uphold and guide.

Grief, nor pain, nor any sorrow
Rends thy heart, to Him unknown;
He to-day and He to-morrow,
Grace sufficient gives his own.

Holy strivings nerve and strengthen,
Long endurance wins the crown;
When the evening shadows lengthen,
Thou shalt lay the burden down.

THE FARM.

Creamy and pink, upon the apple-trees,
The blossoms show; the violet's purple bell
In sunny nooks flings wide its dew-filled well,
Whose fragrance lures the golden-dusted bees;
The lilac-clusters open by degrees
Their perfumed chambers, that so surely tell
The spring is here; and in each woody dell,
You meet the white stars of anemones.
Where, through the meadow, rich in tender green,
The bright brooks murmur, there like flocks of gold,
The cowslips shine; and peeping from the brown
Dead leaves of autumn and gray moss, are seen
The sweet arbutus blooms, first to unfold
When bonnie May calls for her floral crown.

After this I went again to Mansfield, where was a great meeting of professors and people; and I was moved to pray. And the Lord's power was so great that the house seemed to be shaken. And when I had done, some of the professors said: It was now, as in the days of the apostles, when the house was shaken where they were. After I had prayed, one of the professors would pray, which brought deadness and a veil over them; and others of the professors were grieved at him, and told him: It was a temptation upon him. Then he came to me, and desired that I would pray again; but I could not pray in man's will.—George Fox.

I am of opinion, respecting many of our youth, that if they had been properly instructed, and carefully watched over; if they could have seen the beauty of holiness shine in the example of their parents, they would not have gone out so widely as they have.

Oh! you parents of both sexes! an important trust is reposed in you! example your children in the practice of piety; example speaks louder, much louder than precept; its influence is far more extensive. And while, on the one hand, you are excited to a faithful discharge of your duty towards them, by the certain hope of a glorious reward; so, on the other hand, the powerful ties of natural affection, the warm solicitude for the happiness of those you love, must stir up to diligence in the work and service appointed you.—Sam'l Fothergill.

In proportion as the heart becomes sanctified, there is a diminished tendency to enthusiasm and fanaticism; and this is undoubtedly one of the leading tests of sanctification. One of the marks of an enthusiastic and fanatical state of mind, is a fiery and unrestrained impetuosity of feeling; a rushing on, sometimes very blindly, as if the world were in danger, or as if the great Creator were not at the helm. It is not only feeling without a good degree of judgment, but, what is the corrupting and fatal trait, it is feeling without a due degree of confidence in God. True holiness reflects the image of God in this respect as well as in others, that it is calm, thoughtful, deliberate, immutable; and how can it be otherwise, since rejecting its own wisdom and strength, it incorporates itself into the wisdom and strength of the Almighty.

Many children amongst us sustain a grievous loss by not being early and properly made acquainted with the principles we profess. For want of this instruction, they become too easy a prey to the customs of the world and its habitudes; and that which would be as a kind of hedge about them, and preserve them from many temptations, is laid waste, and all the allurements of vice and folly suffered to seduce their affections to their ruin. For when they cease to be distinguished from others by their garb and deportment, they too often cease to be distinguished from the world by their morals, and the rectitude of their conduct.—Dr. John Fothergill.

Religious Items, &c.

International Duties of Christendom.—Under this heading Joseph Cook, in the concluding lecture of last winter's course, enumerates several important reforms which he believes can be effected by the growth of Christian sentiment, as the nations come more largely under the influence of Christianity as a living operative principle. He finds encouragement in the rapid spread of those nations which profess Christianity, and in the rapidly increasing number of converts to it, in countries subject to rulers of other forms of religious belief. He quotes some statistics from Dr. Dorechester, who estimates that at the end of 1500 years after the introduction of Christianity, it had 100,000,000 adherents, meaning thereby nominal Christians. In the next 300 years it gained 100,000,000 more—but in the last 100 years it has gained 210,000,000.

Communication among nations is becoming so swift and pervasive that it must gradually lead to mutual understanding and co-operation.

Among the reforms desired is the use of arbitration in the place of war—the complete abolition of the slave-trade on the sea—and the extension of the principles of international law to the Orient, Africa, and all the weakest nations.

A Unique Christian Community.—In the current number of Blackwood an interesting description is given of a singular German community, who have established themselves near Haifa, under Mount Carmel, and elsewhere in Palestine, and who hold that the world is to be converted to Christ, and the advent of the Messiah to be brought near, not by preaching Christianity, but by living Christian lives. Some 300 of this sect are engaged in cultivating olives at Haifa, dealing largely with Nazareth, and living devout lives in a clean and comfortable village. Hoffman, their founder, was a Lutheran clergyman and educator of influence, and at one time a member of the Diet at Frankfort. For some years he conducted a journal, in which he elaborated his peculiar views. The spiritual temple, he maintained, had first to be built, and the kingdom created, before the Lord could come to reign. In consequence of this teaching he was expelled from the Church. He was followed by a large number of those who shared his opinions, and they were thenceforth known as the "Temple Society." In 1867 it was determined to establish the head-quarters of the society in Palestine, about four-fifths of its members, who now numbered over 5,000 persons, remaining, however, in Europe and in the United States "to bear a witness for the new and higher life which they were struggling to realize." The Turkish Government did its utmost to frustrate the attempt to found the colony. It refused to sell Government land, except at exorbitant prices, and it was not until after twelve years that they obtained satisfactory and legal titles to the land they now occupy.

By degrees three other colonies were formed—one in the immediate vicinity of Jaffa, another, called Sharon, about an hour distance from that town, and a fourth in the suburbs of Jerusalem, near the Jaffa gate. Hoffman now resides with the Jerusalem Colony. The united population of the four colonies is about 1,000 souls; a few families are also settled at Nazareth and Beyrout. The colony at Haifa, numbering, as we have said, about 300, consists mostly of Germans, German Americans, Russians, and a few Swiss. They possess over 700 acres, of which 100 are laid out in vineyards upon the slopes of Mount Carmel. They make excellent olive-oil soap, the export of which to America is yearly increasing; they have also a wind grist-mill, and a factory for carving olive wood. A steam-mill is in course of erection. They have their own physician, an architect, and an engineer, while the British, American, and German Vice-Consulates are all held by members of the colonies. Their schools are supported by a two-thirds donation from the German Government, and one-third from the colonists. Their trim little village running back in two streets from the sea to the base of Carmel, with its double line of shade trees, its neat little gardens, and commodious houses, contrasts with the native bazaar, it is said, like some rare exotic transplanted to a foreign soil. Of all the benefits which the German colony has conferred upon the native population, the construction of roads for wheeled vehicles has exercised the most marked influence. Such a thing as a cart was unknown when they first came. Now they are extensively used by the Arabs, and their number is constantly increasing, while between Acre and Haifa, a distance of ten miles, omnibuses driven by natives run every hour. There is a good hotel, kept by a German, in the colony. It is impossible, says the writer of the article in Blackwood, to conceive a more agreeable climate during the winter months than Haifa offers.—Ch. Advocate.

Church Provision in London.—According to R. H. Hadden, of Bishopsgate, there are 61 parish [meeting-houses] in the City of London, whose rectors receive nearly $200,000 per year, while the worshippers at the services, after deducting the officials, and those who only go for what they can get, number but 3,836, and out of that number there are 706 choristers, all of whom are paid. Many of the rectories attached to the [meeting-houses] are rented for commercial purposes by the clergymen, who live at their ease in rural districts, while their parishes are allowed to take care of themselves, except for two or three hours on First-day.

Recent Archaeological Researches.—Two statues bearing the name Pithom, and several fragments inscribed Thukat, or Succoth, have lately been found by the English Exploration party now working midway between Ismalia and Tel-el-Kebir. These are believed to identify the respective sites with the ancient treasure-city mentioned in Exodus i. 11, and the first stopping place of the Israelites on leaving Egypt, Exodus xii. 37. Further Roman remains which have been discovered indicate that, after the imperial conquest, a Roman town succeeded the Israelite city of Pithom. The results of a continuation of the excavations are looked forward to with great interest.

An interesting monument has arrived at the British Museum. It comes from Jerabius, on the Euphrates, the supposed site of the ancient city of Carchemish, and has been some sixteen or eighteen months on the journey. It is of basalt, standing nearly six feet high, having a figure sculptured on one side, and an inscription on the other. The inscription, which is of the class known as Hittite, is believed to be of a religious character, and the sculptured figure to be that of a priest in sacerdotal attire. According to Professor Sayce, a Hittite kingdom or nation extended through Asia Minor to the Aegean Sea. The new monument was examined and copied by the late Mr. George Smith on his last journey to Asia.

Explorations are being pushed at various points in Asia Minor with vigor. $2,500 was recently raised in London to enable W. M. Ramsay to continue his researches. —Dennis has purchased the site of the famous temple of Cybele at Sardis, and great hopes are entertained of interesting discoveries among the ruins. According to the Athenæum, a statue of black granite in the temple of Mut, at Karnak, has been secured for Prussia by Prince Frederick Charles, and certain large monuments at Luxor have been acquired by the French.

A glass object has been found in the Catacombs of Rome showing in gilt outlines the great Temple of Jerusalem. It is considered one of the most precious historical pieces which the Catacombs have so far yielded. The Esquiline Hill continues to yield various numbers of tombs containing antiquities of various kinds. The excavators find cut in the rock, with funeral beds on each side of the central passage, and the door sealed with a slab of stone; caves walled around with rough stones, each layer projecting till two meet at the top; graves in which the corpse was protected by two inclined slabs of stone; coffins made of stone slabs, monolithic, and terra cotta coffins painted with black and red bands on a white ground, in Etruscan style. "The supellex collected from these tombs," writes Lauciani, "number already several thousand specimens of earthenware manufacture, from flint arrow-heads to hand-made shapeless pottery to the fine creations of Etruscan and Eastern art. We have even found those lovely goblets of enameled polychrome glass which are exceedingly rare and costly, even at Vertu and Tarquin."—Chr. Adv.

Sunlight on all Sides of the House.—This is one subject of great importance, from a sanitary point of view, that, so far as my knowledge goes, has received little attention. Every building intended for a residence, if it is rectangular, should be placed diagonally with reference to the cardinal points, or with one corner to the east, and the diagonally opposite corner to the west. So situated, there would be no disagreeable north side to the house, and at noon, the hottest part of the day, the sun's rays would not be beating directly upon the walls of the building. It would be excellent to plot a new town according to the same plan, since in the heat of the day there would always be a shady side to every street, also the glare toward sunset on an east or west avenue would be avoided.

The advantages of sunlight in a hygienic view are very great, and the disadvantages of living on the north side are fully appreciated.—J. H. Stearns, in "The Century."

Worms for Fishing-bait.—Chambers' Journal states that the capture of worms for bait furnishes employment to a considerable number of people, who every favorable night collect them from the meadows. The supply in wet weather is more abundant than in dry, although some sort of a harvest can even then be obtained by watering the ground. The wormers are provided with lanterns, and have to exercise some agility in catching their prey, as if disturbed by any noise they pop back into their holes. After recapture they are placed in common moss, where they become very tough in the course of a few days, and then in good condition for bait; but when first caught they easily break into pieces. They are sold at from 3 shillings 6 pence to 4 shillings per thousand, packed in canvas bags filled with moss.

The Archer-fish.—This small fish is a native of Java, the inhabitants of which island often keep it in a vessel of water as a household pet. When it sees a fly or other insect sitting upon a plant overhanging the water, it approaches to within three or four feet, and spouts a drop of water from its mouth with so much force and accuracy, that it seldom fails to bring its prey down.

Selection by plants.—The ice-plant which grows abundantly on the shores of the Mediterranean, contains a large proportion of soda, potash and other alkalis. It has been gested that it might be cultivated as a means of removing those substances from which are rendered sterile by their presence in excessive quantities.

new test for waste pipes.—A woman in London noticing an offensive odor in her parlour suspected a defect in the waste pipes, and requested the agent for the property to send a plumber to examine it. The agent was inquisitive and refused. To verify the truth of her suspicions, she borrowed two cats from her friends, purchased some oil of valerian, and stationing the animals in the parlour, went up the stairs and poured the valerian into the pipes, and then descended to watch the result. The cats are extremely fond of the odor of valerian, and it was not long before both of them began to sniff the air, and move towards the door of a closet through which the waste pipe passed.

The door was opened for them, and the cats immediately sprang upon a certain shelf, where they remained purring with satisfaction. A plumber was sent for, and on cutting up the plastering so as to expose the pipe, the defect was found completely separated at the place where the cats had indicated.—Scientific American.

Insects as food.—At Lombeck, one of the islands of the Malay Archipelago, "boys were often seen walking along the roads and by the ditches and ditches, catching dragon-flies with lime. They carry a slender stick, with small twigs at the end well anointed, so that the least touch captures the insect, whose legs are pulled off before it is consigned to a small basket. The dragon-flies are so abundant at the time of the rice flowering that thousands are soon caught in this way. The flies are fried in oil, with onions and preserved shrimps, or sometimes alone, and are considered a great delicacy. In Borneo, Celebes and many other islands, the larvae of bees and wasps are eaten. In the Moluccas grubs of the palm-beetles are regularly brought to market in bamboos, and sold for a few cents; and many of the great horned beetles slightly roasted on the embers and eaten with great relish. The super-abundance of insects in these islands is therefore turned to some account by these islanders."—Wallace's Malay Archipelago.

Tame Mole.—One of these animals had got into a garden and was doing much mischief. The gardener, being practical and not aesthetic in his tastes, did his best to kill the mole; but the inhabitants of the house, being practical rather than practical, tried to tame the animal, in which they partly succeeded. The aperture by which the mole usually comes into the open air, was situated under a bush, and near the opening a piece of meat was laid. The delicate organs of the mole soon perceived the supply of food, and the animal, after he had finished his meal, came to look for some more. This was given him, accompanied by the sound of his name, "Bartimeus," an abbreviation of Bartimeus. Some days the mole was too far away from the aperture to hear his name, and in these cases a measured stamp upon the ground was sure to bring him to his meal.—J. G. Wood's Man and Beast.

Friendship Between Animals.—J. G. Wood gives the following illustrations of the friendship that often spring up between animals of different kinds.

Some years ago we had a lamb whose mother died soon after its birth. It was brought up by hand on cow's milk, and for the convenience of the feeder, was kept in the cow-house. It accompanied the cows to and from the field, and remained their companion for two or three years.

"The animal was quite a pet of the man who had charge of the cows, and he kept it with them until ordered by his master to place it with the sheep. After much demur, this was done; but for some days the man complained that 'Donald' was miserable, that he would not associate with the other sheep, and that they beat him. The master at last gave permission for Donald to be restored to his old associates.

"The cows all rushed to meet him, and he ran up to each in turn; but this was only a beginning. After a few minutes a cow went to Donald and began licking him from head to tail. He was then passed over to another, who did the same thing, until all the six cows had shown their affection."

I know of one case where affection was exhibited in a very curious manner. A little kitten strayed, when very young, into the house of one of my friends, and was adopted by a cat who brought it up together with her own young. This kitten became a great frequenter of the stables, and made two rather odd friends, namely, a pony and a lame bantam. It was a curious sight to see the kitten and the bantam curled up asleep on the pony's broad back, where they would spend hours without being disturbed.

Another odd instance of friendship occurred in the house of one of my friends. He had a fine Newfoundland dog, which took a fancy to a brood of young ducklings, and constituted himself their protector. They were quite willing to accept him in this capacity, and followed him about just as if he had been their mother. It was a specially interesting sight to watch the dog and the ducklings taking their siesta. The dog used to lie on his side, and the ducklings would nestle all about him.

THE FRIEND.

FIFTH MONTH 12, 1883.

In order to keep our readers informed of the more important and interesting events that are transpiring in the limits of our Society, we called attention at the time to the separation caused in Canada Yearly Meeting a year or two since, by the adoption of a new Discipline with which many of the members were dissatisfied.

The Friends in the neighborhood of Bloomfield made an arrangement by which the advocates of the New Discipline met in the morning of First-day, and the adherents to the Old Discipline (who are the more conservative part of the meeting) met in the afternoon; and the two companies convened on different days during the week. This arrangement continued until near the close of last year, when those who met in the afternoon were notified that the house would be locked against them. On going to meeting on First-day, 12th mo. 24th, they found the threat had been carried out; but they obtained entrance by lifting the door off its hinges. A subsequent attempt to prevent their occupancy of the house was baffled by the use of sufficient force to obtain admission. The matter was then taken into Court by those who had before tried locks and bars in vain. The Court met a few weeks ago, and after hearing testimony, the Chancellor ruled that the Plaintiffs in the case had no cause of action as Trustees. This was based on his belief, that the New Discipline had not been rightly adopted, and that no officers appointed under it are officers in fact. The Plaintiffs obtained leave to amend their pleadings so as to sue as individuals and representing those in sympathy with them—and the case was allowed to go over. In the meantime, the court gave directions, that all parties should have the use of the house at the regular hours prescribed by the old Discipline, and that the Defendants might move for an order to "restrain the Plaintiffs and others from teaching doctrines and using practices in the building at variance with the trusts contained in the deed of 1835."

A letter from a Friend in Canada, from which this information, as to the action of the Court of Chancery, is derived, says:—"The Chancellor said that the Yearly Meeting held at Pickering, in the Yearly Meeting-House under the Discipline of 1859, under which Canada Yearly Meeting was opened in 1867, was the true Yearly Meeting of Friends in Canada; and that the one held at Norwich under the New Discipline was the false one, and that all business done under it was illegal, as it had been irregularly adopted."

It is satisfactory to learn that, a check has been given to the effort made to deprive these Friends of the use of the meeting-house. Yet the ruling of the Chancellor, that they should go back to the old hours and times has exposed them to some annoyance, from the two bodies being thrown together in their meetings, while their views of the proper manner of conducting Divine worship do not coincide. As an illustration of this annoyance, the letter already quoted from mentions that Luke Woodard had been there, and had "read in the Bible every meeting, although several Friends objected to it." On the subject of Bible-reading in our meetings, the writer makes these judicious remarks:—

"The truly baptized minister has to follow the leadings of the Holy Spirit, well knowing that He who is the great Head of the Church is the Leader of his own people; and if they speak from inspiration, He will be unto such as these mouth and wisdom, tongue and utterance; and it will have that unction from the Holy One of Israel, that will carry a witness with it to the hearts of the bearers. It will not be in a lifeless form, but will come forth in the power and life; and these need not the open Bible before them to expound from. It may be well in some places and some cases, but I fail to see the need of it in a Friends' meeting. To me, it seems to keep the mind from settling down to the true place of waiting, and turns the mind of man outward instead of inward to the true Teacher, who teacheth as never man taught."

There is one caution which Friends, situated as those in Canada now are, have need to observe; and that is, to keep a watch over their own spirits; so that while contending for their rights and property, and testifying against errors in doctrine and practice, they may keep in the pure and peaceable spirit of Jesus. This remark is made, not to reflect upon the steps which have thus far been taken; but from a belief that, as it is the Lord's works alone that can praise Him, so it is only as we move in his counsel and act in his power, that we can truly promote his blessed cause among men.

We have received a copy of "The Biographer" a periodical containing 35 short sketches of persons in whom a present public interest is excited. Published at 23 Park Row, N. Y.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement for 4th month shows a decrease of $2,851,492. The coinage of the United States mints during 4th month amounted to 7,811,000 pieces, valued at $4,645,600. Of the standard silver dollars 2,350,000 were turned out, and of the five cent nickels, 2,666,000.

A letter received in El Paso, Texas, from General Crook's office, confirms the report that he crossed the Mexican border on the 2d inst., the Indian trail being found.

Information is received from Fort Apache that 1200 San Carlos Indians have left the agencies and are settling in the mountains around that post, and demand corn and small seed. The commanding officer has issued 6000 pounds of corn and asked the Secretary of the Interior for small seed.

The great strike of the railroad coal miners in the Pittsburgh district began on the 1st inst. The reports received show that the strike is general, all the mines except one or two being idle; and there is a possibility that the river pits may yet be affected by the movement. The strike is against a reduction of $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per bushel. It is asserted by the men that they are "prepared to hold out," while the operators declare that they "will see their mines idle until next fall" rather than forego the reduction.

Thomas A. Edison and others, representing $2,000,000 capital, have filed articles of incorporation at Albany, of the Electric Railway Company of the United States. The object is "to develop electricity as a motor for the propulsion of railroad trains."

Light rains in California have increased the favorable prospects of the wheat crop. It is believed the State will have 1,000,000 tons of wheat for export next year.

A tow-boat left Helena, Arkansas, on the 2d instant, for St. Louis, with three barges laden with 1,000,000 feet of ash lumber from the Helena mills. The timber will be distributed by rail throughout the Northwest, and similar shipments will follow once a month during the summer.

Statistics of the winter's trade of the State of Indiana in domestic furs, shows an aggregate of 173,000 pelts, of which 34,000 were muskrats, 32,000 coons, 12,000 mink, 12,000 opossum and 10,000 skunk.

The past season in Jacksonville, Fla., though rather short, has been the most prosperous in the city's history. A careful investigation shows that 44,167 tourists have visited the city during the past winter.

At a recent meeting of the Boston Society for the Suppression of Vice, Anthony Comstock said that "during the past ten years such societies had destroyed over twenty-five tons of villainous literature, and over seven tons of gaming instruments."

The City Council of Danville, Illinois, has raised the saloon licenses from $400 to $600. There are sixty saloons in Danville.

At a conference of the Executive Committee of the State Temperance Alliance at Des Moines, Iowa, resolutions were adopted declaring that the ratification of the prohibitory amendment rests as a moral obligation on the Legislature, regardless of the technical objection of the Supreme Court, and that the next General Assembly should re-enact a prohibitory law in harmony with the expressed wish of the people.

The saloons in Des Moines, Iowa, have been closed because of the action of the City Council raising the license to $1000.

The proposed Broadway underground railroad in New York is one of the greatest engineering projects yet announced. The plan is to excavate the entire width of Broadway to the depth of twenty feet, and make a new Broadway under the present one, with ample sidewalks, with four tracks for passenger and freight business (the trains to run at night,) and with an accessible conduit for all the iron pipes, water, gas, &c., now under the street. The upper (or present) roadbed is to rest on iron girders, sustained by brick arches covered with concrete, asphalt and sand, on which the pavement is to be laid, thus making a roadbed which will never need to be torn up until worn out, and will be greatly superior, so far as drainage, durability, &c., are concerned, to any modern pavement. The plan provides for quick transit from the Battery to Harlem river, with two branches from Madison Square to accommodate both sides of the city and connect with the regular lines north and east from Harlem river. Two of the tracks during the day will be for through trains, which will run from the Battery to Harlem river in twenty minutes, while the other two tracks are for way trains, and their time will be as fast as those of the elevated roads. If built as proposed the expense will be greater per mile than any road ever constructed in America.

The Pennsylvania Schuylkill Valley Railroad is the name of the new company into which the Pennsylvania Railroad's new lines in the Schuylkill valley have been combined. Its capital is $4,500,000.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 388, which was 10 more than during the previous week, and 2 more than during the corresponding period of last year. Of the above 190 were males, and 198 females: 66 died of consumption; 43 of pneumonia; 28 of diphtheria; 18 of convulsions; 18 of old age, and 15 of scarlet fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 103 $\frac{1}{2}$; 3 $\frac{1}{2}$'s, 103 $\frac{3}{4}$; 4's, registered, 112 $\frac{1}{2}$; coupon, 113 $\frac{1}{2}$; 4's, registered, 119 $\frac{3}{4}$; coupon, 119 $\frac{1}{2}$; currency 6's 129 to 131.

Cotton.—Prices are firmer. Sales of middlings are reported at 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 11 cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 7 $\frac{3}{4}$ cts. for export, and 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 8 $\frac{3}{4}$ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour and Meal.—Flour is quiet but steady. Sales of 2600 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at \$5.50 a \$6.50; Pennsylvania family at \$5 a \$5.25; western do. at \$5.50 a \$6.25, and patents at \$6 a \$7.75. Rye flour is steady at \$3.62 $\frac{1}{2}$ a \$3.75 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is dull and unsettled. Sales of 4400 bushels red, in car lots, at \$1.17 a \$1.27. Rye is nominal at 70 a 72 cts. for Pennsylvania. Corn is unsettled and lower. Sales of 10,000 bushels in car lots, at 58 a 66 cts. Oats are dull and weak. Sales of 9500 bushels, in car lots, at 51 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 55 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts.

Beef cattle were a fraction lower owing to the large receipts: 2700 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5 $\frac{1}{4}$ a 7 $\frac{1}{4}$ cts. per lb.; the latter rate for a few choice.

Sheep were dull and unsettled: 12,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 7 $\frac{1}{4}$ cts. for wool sheep, and 3 a 5 $\frac{1}{4}$ cts. for clipped, and \$3 a \$7.25 per head for spring lambs.

Hogs were a fraction lower: 4500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 10 a 11 $\frac{1}{4}$ cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—In the House of Commons on the 3rd, Evelyn Ashley, Under-Colonial Secretary, stated that the Governments of New South Wales, Victoria and South Australia, approved the annexation of the Island of New Guinea to Queensland.

In the House of Commons the Affirmation bill was refused a special reading by a vote of 292 to 289. The Times, referring to the vote by which the Affirmation bill was defeated, says the authority and power of the Government have received a shock. This, without doubt, the Ministers will recognize themselves. The spell of their success is broken. As a consequence of this action of the House of Commons, Charles Bradlaugh has decided to visit his constituents and to formally tender his resignation as their elected representative.

The cab-driver Fitzharris, who was placed on trial on the charge of being one of the principals in the Phoenix Park murders, has been acquitted. A few days later, the Grand Jury returned true bills against Tynan, Walsh and Sheridan for murder, and against Fitzharris as an accessory after the fact. It is understood that the Government will demand their extradition from America.

Patrick Delaney and Thomas Caffrey, two more of the men charged with participation in the murders of Cavendish and Burk, in Phoenix Park, on the evening of the 6th of 5th mo. last, have also been arraigned for trial. They created a sensation in the court-room by pleading guilty to the charge against them. They were both sentenced by Judge O'Brien to be executed.

At a conference of members of the Irish Nationalist party held in London, it was resolved to organize a fund for the relief of the families of persons who have fled the country or have been arrested in connection with the murder trials in Ireland and generally under the Crimes act. It is computed that 600 families have been rendered destitute by the flight or incarceration of their bread-winners. An address will be issued to the Irish Nationalists in America and the British colonies, appealing for contributions to the proposed fund, and delegates will be sent thither to set forth the need of speedy assistance.

The steamer Oregon, which sailed from Liverpool on the 4th instant, for Quebec and Montreal, to part of her burden 500 emigrants, who came from 'tiana, Hamburg, Gottenburg, Copenhagen, and various parts of England.

Challamel-Lacour, French Minister of Foreign Affairs, in his remarks in the Senate on the 1st instant, answer to the question of the Duc de Broglie as Government's position in regard to the triple alliance said he believed in the sincerity of the declaration of Mancini, the Italian Foreign Minister, and Tisza Hungarian Premier, that no idea of aggression against France was entertained. He believed that the alliance would not, in any way, change the relations of France with the powers. France, he said, must be prudent with a vanquished country which is regaining its strength and which is condemned to maintain a large defensive force, must not be surprised to find itself exposed to jealousies and distrust.

It is believed that the authorities at Moscow have been invested with power to arrest a number of persons who have been acting suspiciously in that city, and detain them until after the coronation of the Czar is taken place. Much ill-feeling exists in some of the regiments of the army owing to the fact that they are being offered to the men to induce them to denounce any of their comrades who are known to be nihilists.

A document which urges a speedy rising against the oppression of Russia, is being circulated through Bulgaria.

A dispatch has been received from Tabreez, Persia, reporting that that city has been visited by an earthquake, which destroyed a great many houses and caused the death of a large number of persons.

The stock inspector of New South Wales is authorized by the statement that the pest of rabbits has almost cost the colony of Victoria between $20,000,000 and $25,000,000, and is still spreading.

Honolulu advices state that the large Chinese immigration is the absorbing question. At the rate the Chinese are now arriving they will soon outnumber the natives. Meetings of protest are constantly being held.

The sugar crop of Cuba this year will probably be deficient, as will also that of San Domingo, which fall considerably short as compared with that of last year, but the quality will be superior. The receipts of Havana thus far have been 92,000 tons, and the probable receipts during the balance of the season, estimated upon the receipts of last year for the corresponding period, will be 48,000, thus making a total of 140,000 tons at Havana. At other points of the island based on the same estimates as above, 280,000 tons will be yielded, making the aggregate Cuban yield 420,000 tons, as compared with 600,000 last year, showing probable deficiency for this year of 180,000 tons.

According to a telegram from Ottawa, Prof. Macune, of the Geological Survey, "has declared before the Committee of Immigration that the whole region from the Gulf of St. Lawrence to the Mackenzie river might with draining be made productive for wheat."

To M. T.

"Philada., 5th mo. 22d, 1825.

There are perhaps few things which so properly claim our admiration and respect in a world of depravity and indifference, as to some endeavoring to fill up their allotments in life, and to fulfil the design and object for which man was certainly created, that of glorifying his adorable Creator and Redeemer. However, there is most assuredly bound to this admiration; and it ought to be recollected, too, that the creature has nothing to boast of, as those who are brought to experience the work of sanctification in their hearts, will and always do acknowledge that excellency is not of themselves, but must be attributed to Him who worketh in us both to will and to do of his own good pleasure. I wish then for myself, when there is any disposition to exalt the creature, and I thank it for thee and for others, that we may refer to the only Fountain from whence flows good; and while we respect virtue, not overlook its source; but rather be stimulated thereby to seek for a closer union and communion with that holy Power, which we perceive to produce in others such astonishing results. Is not this the effect which ought to be produced by bright examples of virtue and godliness? What other effect should it be? * * * *

As regards the circumstance of my visit to —, with that of my own advantage or disadvantage, I have but little to say; but I have a hope that not much occurred that would leave an ill savor in the mind of any individual, or bring condemnation upon myself. It is no light matter, I can assure thee, for so young and so boyish in every respect as I am, so to maintain the holy watch as to avoid the multitude of snares, which the untried adversary is continually laying for the inexperienced and childish steps of such one as I feel myself to be. But notwithstanding the frailty of human nature, I do believe it possible to be brought to a state of vigilance, watchful and constant dependence upon the strong arm of Him who is mighty to save, and which even sinful thoughts can have no dwelling place. This is the attainment to which my soul I humbly trust is aiming; and though far behind, it can look forward with confidence and hope, that He who has begun a good work in me will perfect it even though it should be through deep tribulation.

There is nothing, perhaps, in which I am so likely to err as in excessive conversation. Well might the apostle say, 'The tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity.' For I think it may be acknowledged that 'If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body.' This circumstance is one that renders me fearful of venturing into much company where there are none, whose establishment in the Truth renders them capable of restraining the impetuosity of youth. I confess it was not without trembling and fear on this account, that I set out on my visit to the country; and although, for my own part, I believe I have seen little that was absolutely sinful in itself, yet there is an apprehension that amid so much conversation there must have been wanting grace and the seasoning of salt. * * * *

Wm. Forster attended Arch St. Meeting on Fifth-day; and, I hear, held forth encouraging prospects in relation to the future; saying that he believed there would be those raised up, who should be qualified to support the blessed testimonies of Truth; and as it was in former days when Moses was commanded to strip Aaron of his garments and put them on Eleazar his son, so in the present, the garments of the elders and the fathers would be given to the children, and that the holy cause should not fall to the ground. * *

We are not yet, my dear — a forsaken people. The promise given of old time, still stands sure to a remnant in Israel: 'I will not leave thee nor forsake thee.' There are those that can firmly and reverently confide in the care and protection of Israel's unslumbering Shepherd; and although they may see thousands fall at their side, and ten-thousands at their right hand, yet can they say, the Lord is our banner and our shield; and though the prospect before us may be deeply discouraging, these can still look to Him who in his own good time will command deliverance for Jacob; who is indeed glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders. With the salutation of love, I bid thee farewell."

To the same.

"Philada., 2d mo. 10th, 1826.

My dear — has been so feelingly brought to remembrance this evening in looking over thy last letter, that perhaps I may be justified in endeavoring to convey once more the renewal of the assurance of my continued regard and affectionate remembrance of thee, and the earnest solicitude which I have often felt and continue to feel, that both thou and myself may be more and more diligent in our endeavors to obtain an establishment upon the unchangeable foundation, and to become as lively stones incorporated with the building which is termed 'a spiritual house;' that we may be not only hearers of the word but doers, and faithful laborers and burthen-bearers in the great work appointed for the present day. * * * Poor as I am, yea the poorest of the poor, my heart is at times, through mercy, enlarged in that pure feeling of universal love, which comprehends within its wide embrace every member of the human family. Sensible as I am at such seasons, of my own unworthiness, and how much I stand in need of the mercy and infinite condescension of our great Creator and Redeemer, living desires are, I trust, begotten, that all my fellow-creatures might be gathered into the quiet fold of the great Shepherd of the sheep. * * *

Prone as we are to the earth and to the pursuit of carnal enjoyments, if our hearts are ever raised to heavenly things, it must be through the lively operation of Him who led captivity captive and gave gifts unto men; it must be under the sanctifying influence of his blessed Spirit, which being sent forth into the hearts of all his truly devoted children, crieth, 'Abba, Father.' * * It is to me at seasons a source of unutterable consolation to reflect upon the declaration of Holy Scripture that, 'God so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son, that we might live through Him.' And now when this grand and fundamental doctrine of the Christian faith is so often called in question, it is at seasons made very dear to the hearts of those, who find that of themselves, they cannot think a good thought; and who rejoice in that there is a High Priest who, having himself partaken thereof, is touched with the feeling of all our infirmities. Oh, my dear —! it is a precious and glorious attainment to feel that we have an interest in so great and powerful a Redeemer, and to feel our hearts bound with the cords of his love. And inasmuch as He is the Head of the body, the Church, the members thereof severally united to the living head do find it a source of sweet enjoyment to feel the influence of the holy oil of unity and fellowship one with another. This is a picture I love to dwell upon; and could I but view it to its full extent in our religious Society, professing as we do to make this our distinguishing badge, how bright and how beautiful would Zion appear! But oh, the sad reverse! and when we bring to mind the extent of the desolating spirit which is now laying waste all our beautiful and pleasant prospects, how sad, how moving is the consideration!

When I look at the state of things among us, I am almost ready to fear that the walls of the Holy City will never be rebuilt! But still there is encouragement in the belief, that there will be some raised up among those who are in the younger walks of life. Well, I have desired that we may be found among those who are rightly espousing the cause of our Lord and Master; and let us endeavor to be strong in Him and in the power of his might, learning first to be valiant against the enemies of our own houses, whereby we shall become qualified for waging a righteous warfare with those who unmistakably manifest that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ.

Thou hast, perhaps, before this heard that I have got settled in business at the place I proposed when thou wast in town; and having thus commenced the cares and difficulties of the world, have need closely to keep my eye upon the Leader and sure Director of those who so feel themselves unqualified to direct their own steps. I may here say, that in the course taken I have found, and it is an unspeakable favor to find and feel myself under the care and protection of a Friend and Father in heaven. I think I can with gratitude acknowledge, that He has been graciously near in the needful time; and I would, with earnest solicitude, invite others to taste and see that the Lord is good. Although in the course of our Christian journey we may often be brought very low, and in the present day especially may be allowed to eat but little pleasant bread, yet the promise does remain true: 'Though the Lord give the bread of adversity, and the water of affliction, yet shall not thy teachers be removed into a corner any more, but thine eye shall see thy teachers, in the day of necessity. Let us then press forward unto a nearer acquaintance with this blessed Teacher. Let us learn to bow our necks to his yoke, not only as individuals, but also as concerned members of the deeply depressed church militant in the earth.

Farewell, my dear —. Thou canst understand me in what I have written, not as supposing myself to have attained any thing; but as a poor pilgrim and stranger in the earth, calling to those whom I feel to be near and dear to me, to place themselves under the guardianship of One, who does wonders for his people, and will assuredly redeem them with a strong hand and with a stretched-out arm; who does bless with the best of his blessings all those that trust in Him. May we commit our ways unto Him, that He may establish our goings."

Business Maxims, Bad and Good.

BY W. F. CRAFTS.

Everything one reads makes some impression, for good or ill, upon him; but there are some authors that enter into his very soul with destiny-shaping power. Thus came Cotton Mather's Essays To Do Good into the early life of Franklin, and made it his highest ambition to be "a doer of good." Emerson's book on Nature came into Tyndall's life "like an influence," and made him a naturalist. Thus came Ruskin's works to Henry Ward Beecher, to teach him the secret of seeing. Thus the book of Proverbs, used as a first reader in the public schools of Scotland, has made its people terse in speech and "canny" in action.

On the other hand, the records of crime show that sensational stories of vice have come into many lives as a destiny-shaping influence from hell. Such reading stands only second to rum among the devil's recruiting officers. Shop-windows filled with tempting pictures that poison the mind ought to be prohibited, as surely as those filled with bottles of alcoholic poison for the body.

Not only books and papers, but even single sentences, often serve, like a railroad switch, to turn a life into the right or wrong track. A maxim or motto has come into many a life like an influence. That watchword of Christian society, "The greatest good of the greatest number," which caught the eye of Jeremy Bentham in early life, made him a great political economist, seeking to work out this motto in society. Similar illustrations of the power of proverbs are given in the replies I have received from hundreds of prominent men to the question, "What maxims or watchwords, if any, have had a powerful influence on your life, and helped to your success?"

Two-thirds of those replying to the circular of inquiries recognize no watchword as worthy of being called a special influence in their lives; but from the others a very interesting list of such mottoes has been collected, mostly the old ones which have been so long the true "common law" of the respectable elements of society,—proverbs that are more powerful than parties; maxims that are mightier than magistrates.

At the Jewish feast of Pentecost, when the young people are received into full religious membership, they are each given a confirmation certificate, inscribed, with an appropriate Scripture motto, which they are to cherish and follow through life,—a good custom.

One of our Brooklyn doctors says: "When I was quite a lad, I heard a speech where the speaker took for his text, 'Aim high. If you don't hit the mark, you may come somewhere near it.' The speech from that text has, I think, had a strong influence upon my whole life." A New York publisher says: "When a boy of nine years of age, my teacher gave me a book entitled No Such Word as Fail. I have felt the effect of it ever since." A Western ex-governor ascribes similar power to the proverbs of Solomon and of Franklin, which his father frequently quoted to his children.

In one of the replies to my inquiries about mottoes, a prosperous Brooklyn manufacturer tells how a single watchword made him wealthy, besides helping him in his character. When a young man, he started for Australia, in a sailing vessel, intending to go into business there; but he became very weary of the slow and stormy voyage, and half determined to leave the ship at a South American port, and return home. He asked advice in this matter from an old man, who was one of his fellow-passengers. The counsel he got was: "If you undertake to do a thing, do it." He took the advice, and the motto also. In Australia, he soon acquired twenty-five thousand dollars, which he brought to this country, and greatly increased by fidelity to the same ever-present watchword. The motto has also helped him as a Christian in holding on and holding out. Edmund Driggs of Brooklyn, gives, in his reply, a motto that came into his life like an influence, and greatly helped him toward success. At the age of fifteen, he left home to engage with an older brother in the freighting business on the Hudson River. The first duty he performed on board the vessel was to go aloft to reeve the pennant halliards through the truck on the top of the topmast, which was forty feet above the top of the mainmast, without any rigging attached thereto. The sailing-master arranged the halliards over the boy's shoulder, with a running bowline under his right arm, and then he ordered him aloft. The new sailor looked at the sailing-master, and then aloft, and asked the question, "Did anybody ever do that?"

"Yes, you fool!" was the answer; "do you suppose I would order you to do a thing that was never done before?" The young sailor replied, "If anybody ever did it I can do it." He did it. That maxim has been his watchword through life,—"If anybody ever did it I can do it."

Let me now give, with nothing more than passing comment, some of the other mottoes which I have gathered out of the replies. One who has been a faithful governor, a general, and is now a college president, has the motto, "Fidelity to every trust."

Neal Dow's motto is, "Res, non verba—that is, Deeds not words. But he is good both. He has also two other mottoes: "Always be on the side of right, always against the wrong;" "No man has a right to do anything that, if the world should follow his example, would produce more harm than good."

A distinguished professor flies the motto, "Wisdom is the principal thing." An editor of one of the leading Chicago papers has for motto, "Industrious perseverance and integrity insure success." Another editor's motto is, "Honest industry and hard work will win." Those who "dash off" articles for the paper would do well to ponder these editorial mottoes, and save, by adopting them, their articles from being "dashed off" into the wastebasket.

The mottoes of one of Brooklyn's doctors are: "Cautious, but thorough;" "Do your best every time, even in small matters." Several business men have similar mottoes: "Everything well;" "Whatever is worth doing at all, is worth doing well."

But a thoughtful professor puts beside such mottoes of well-doing one which he believes and defends, which is, indeed, the other half of the same truth,—"Never do anything half well." We are not to put as much pains in making a box as into the statue which it is to contain. He believes that many men waste their lives in doing trifles too well. It is not worth while to butter your cow's hay, throw pearls to swine with their corn. "We can be done with little, need not be done with much." And then that kindred motto of business men, "If you want to have anything well done, do it yourself," is to be limited by the other watchword, "It is better to set ten men to work than to do ten men's work." And the varied calls upon our time, we are not to do things of even secondary importance to the exclusion of more important ones.

Other mottoes, given by professional business men, are as follows: "One thing at a time." "Business before pleasure." "Work, economize, persevere." "A purpose or fixed, and then victory or death." "Never be idle." "Never give up one job until you get another."

The man who flies that last motto began life as a schoolhouse sexton. When appointed a teacher, he kept the old job until sure success in the new one; and so on, until he now the superintendent of schools in one of our largest cities.

Yet other mottoes of business men are the following: "Never make a promise which you cannot perform." "Incur no responsibility which you cannot meet without distress." "Never fail to keep a promise." "Make every engagement to the minute." "When you say you will do a thing do it" (a motto implying perseverance as well as fidelity).

always pay one hundred cents on a dollar." "Don't tell what you are going to do until you have done it." "Make every article sale." "Every tub must stand on its own bottom." "Paddle your own canoe." "Every man's life a plan of God." "Buy nothing unnecessary, however cheap." "Spend less than you earn every year." "Save a portion of every dollar earned." "Be honest whether ducats come or go." "A man gets only what he earns." "Eternal vigilance is the price of success." "Faithful in least, faithful in much." "Make your employers' interests your own." "Make yourself indispensable." "Be sure you are right and then proceed." (A new version of that proverb is, "Be sure you have a loaf and not a stone before you bite.") "Pay as you go." "Never lend a dollar until you have it." "Another gives, "Remember the Sabbath to keep it holy," as a business motto. It is a good one; for the successful men of our age are mostly those who have rested in body and mind, every week, by observing the rest-day.]

Let other business mottoes, of value for all worlds, are; "Be a whole man." "Not selfish in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord." "Commit thy way unto the Lord, and he shall direct thy paths." "Trust in the Lord and do good." "Do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God."—S. Times.

For "The Friend,"

Ride Through the Streets of Philadelphia.

Philadelphia has not only long been, but is a highly favored city. How many Christians, humble, self-denying, men and women are in this Quaker settlement of brotherly love!—the more than "ten righteous"—enough to have saved a far guiltier city. These are the preserving salt. These maintaining the daily sacrifice* will help stay the wide-spread "abomination that maketh desolate;" and help, too, to keep back tears like those which a Saviour shed over unfaithful, but beloved Jerusalem. Moreover, how many compassionate charitable efforts there are in thee, seeking to ameliorate the condition of their kind, is proved by the numerous benevolent institutions for soothing and relieving the sorrows, the sicknesses, calamities of others, as well as sending up to distant suffering districts! Such alms-deeds, when unassociated with "Charity's" and other things which seem much "doing evil that good may come" so rebuked by the apostle; and when perked from a sincere love to Jesus our Saviour, who has said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me;" are no doubt, as in the case of Cornelius of old, "had in remembrance the sight of God" by whom actions are weighed, as well as motives scrutinized.

Notwithstanding all these humanitarian impulses and sympathies, so worthy of commendation, how much to an observer this city, on the other hand, seems given up to the greed for gain; the pursuit of amusement and pleasure; the love of worldliness; the desire to make a display—in personal ornament, in equipage, in expensive dwellings, in rich and costly furniture! These are the stains and blemishes more likely, without great watchfulness, to increase than to diminish with years. These show an undue attachment to the perishable things of earth and its glittering vanities. These tend to draw away the heart and affections from Him who gave himself for us, and is jealous of his honor. These like "the cares of this life, the deceitfulness of riches, and the love of other things," represented in the parable of our Lord, choke, in the hearts of their votaries, the good seed and render it unfruitful. Does not experience prove, that an accumulation of the world's wealth, too oft, begets an increase of desire for the world's luxuries? While as these obtain a hold upon us, indifference and lukewarmness respecting the soul's welfare in the infinite beyond, proportionably prevail? Due thoughtfulness for our eternal salvation, with a sense of our accountability, amid all the temporal blessings a kind Providence strews around us, tends to keep the mind in proper ballast, while it no less stamps vanity on fortune, power, talents, popularity, and all beside, which have not God and a happy eternity for their principal and ultimate aim.

The great number of liquor saloons in this far-famed City of Brotherly Love, is one of the very painful and dreadful evils which strikes the eye and arrests the mind of every thoughtful person, who scans the numerous sign-boards inviting to "the cheerful glass," to intoxication, to revelry, to profanity, obscenity, debauch, and sometimes murder itself. In view of such dreadful results, and in view, too, of the immense breweries especially for the milder drinks—but which are but stepping stones to those which more notoriously intoxicate—who can help the query, Can nothing be done to stay this desolating plague, this hydra-evil which lies, perhaps, at the root of seven-eighths of the mischief and misery, the sorrow and crime, which blacken the city's records, and so largely help to fill its prisons, its almshouses, its hospitals and asylums; which also so greatly multiplies the enormous taxes for the sober and industrious poor to help pay?

Second to this, perhaps, the most demoralizing agency in the hand of the enemy of all righteousness, is the licentious literature, the undraped paintings and statuary, the obscene and licentious pictorial representations, with the whole multiplied round of indelicate, wanton, dissolute, morals-corrupting exhibitions, which make modesty blush, and exert an evil influence on the observers, especially the young; and, like the "race obscene, spawned in the muddy beds of Nile, came forth;" so that

"Nor palaces, nor even chambers seap'd;

And the land stank, so numerous was the fry."

Next to these, it may be, as promotive of evil in this professed Christian city, come the circuses, the theatres, the dance-houses, the balls and concerts; with the lesser herd of ways and places for dissipation, designed or calculated to catch the unwary of every age, to drown thought, beguile time, waste money, and greatly to lead away from thoughts of Him, and accountability to his laws, who governs the world, in whose hand our breath is, and whose are all our ways.

It is not clear, then, that "this Queen of cities though fair may yet be foul?" and that it behooves all duly to consider and appreciate the Scriptures: "Righteousness exalteth a nation;" and not the influx of wealth, or grandeur, or pleasure. One thing, the writer dares to presume, is greatly needed by the more respectable classes, both on their own account and that of others; and that is, an example and walk consistent with their religious profession—doing nothing hurtful to others, prejudicial to their own peace, or derogatory to the Saviour's honor. Decision of character—not being afraid nor ashamed to do right, neither to manifest a true-hearted allegiance to Christ our Master upon all occasions—is greatly to be desired; and this is especially important in those who control the literature of the day. While to do this with Christian fidelity may call for some holy resolution and self-denial, and an indifference to the opinions of our fellow worms, such will secure a reward in the approbation of Him in whose "favor is life," which far surpasseth the commendations of men, and which the world can neither give nor take away. Of such it may be said:

"The world o'erlooks him in her busy search
Of objects more illustrious in her view;
And occupied as earnestly as she,
Though more sublimely, he o'erlooks the world.
She scorns his pleasures, for she knows them not,
He seeks not hers, for he has proved them vain."

And again:

"Perhaps the self-approving, haughty world,
That as she sweeps him with her whistling silks
Scarcely deigns to notice him, or if she see,
Deems him a cypher in the works of God,
Receives advantage from his noiseless hours,
Of which she little dreams. Perhaps she owes
Her sunshine and her rain, her blooming spring
And plenteous harvest, to the pray'r he makes,
When Isaac-like, the solitary saint
Walks forth to meditate at eventide,
And think on her who thinks not for herself."

Would that those in more elevated positions might see to it, that their talent of influence, both by example and by precept, is what it should be; and that with all, a more whole-hearted and thorough turning to the Lord, with repentance and deep humility, as in the case of the people of Nineveh, might be witnessed to the praise and glory of Him, the God and adorable Author of all our sure mercies, the beneficent Giver of every good and perfect gift. Thus would the wide-spread dissipation, the lewdness, the iniquities, and the sin, which so separate from that loving Saviour who came to save us from them through a godly sorrow and sincere repentance, be turned from and washed away through his precious atoning sacrifice, and by filial obedience to his reproofing light and all-sufficient grace. Hereby we might entertain the hope that the feet of the many now traversing the broad way to destruction, would be arrested in their prodigal course, turned from the wages of sin which is death, and brought to exclaim with the jailor and Publican formerly: "What shall I do to be saved?" "God be merciful to me a sinner." So that the Lord, from whom all blessings flow, may continue to favor this city with spiritual and with temporal increase; and that the language addressed to Ephraim of old—the Lord's "pleasant child"—may never become applicable to Philadelphia:—"How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? how shall I deliver thee, Israel? how shall I make thee as Admah? how shall I set thee as Zeboim?"—"Cities which the Lord overthrew in his anger, and in his wrath."

Christ's cross is Christ's way to Christ's crown.—W. Penn.

Gather up the Fragments.

In a recent conversation with an aged Friend, who, though about 90 years of age, retains her love of the Truth, and her memory of the events of former days, she related an anecdote of Rachel Wilson, of England, who paid a religious visit to this country, more than one hundred years ago. The anecdote was told her by Jane Peirce, of Philadelphia, and referred to a ministering friend of Robeson meeting, a woman of the name of Dickinson, of whom Jane was a relative.

When Rachel Wilson was in that section of the country, this minister was spoken of to her as one possessing a valuable gift; but it was thought her usefulness in the church and the world was marred by some of the weaknesses of human nature,—probably by the want of more mildness and suavity of manners in her intercourse with others. Rachel's informants thought that she might exert a good influence over the friend by suitable advice, and thus be helpful to her and to the good cause in which all concerned were laboring. These views had an effect on the mind of the visitor, who retired for the night with the intention of having a conversation with the minister, when a suitable opportunity presented.

But in the visions of the night, she seemed to be walking in a beautiful garden, where was a tree laden with golden fruit, greatly to be admired. As she gazed upon it, she observed some unsightly snags, or crooked limbs, which marred the comeliness of the tree; and she determined to remove these so as to make it more perfect. With this intent, she took a knife from her pocket, and went towards it. Just then the gardener approached, and asked what she was about doing. She replied, that she intended to remove those things which were a blemish on the beauty of the tree. He then told her, that tree was one of his own right hand planting, and that when it required pruning, he would attend to it himself.

When she awoke in the morning, the instruction conveyed by her dream was freshly in her mind; and she declined interfering, under a conviction that she was not commissioned to use the pruning knife in that case.

It is no doubt often a duty to extend counsel and even reproof to others; but as all good comes from the one Eternal Source, this will only be effectual as it is done under his authority and with his help. So that there is need of care on both hands—neither to withhold more than is meet, nor to run into services unbidden.

On one occasion, Mary Wright, of England, was at a meeting where a very large number of Friends were assembled. She felt a strong impression of duty to appear in supplication, but so great was her fear of disturbing the solemnity which prevailed, that she forbore for some time. As the command to yield obedience was still extended to her, she finally knelt, after offering a silent petition to her Heavenly Father, that the company there collected might be prevented from rising to their feet, as is customary on such occasions, in our meetings for worship.

Her request was granted, and not a person rose from their seat.

When her supplication was ended, the accuser of the brethren began to fill her with fears lest she had done foolishly, and urged upon her mind the fact that all had remained in their seats, as an evidence that unity had not been felt with her offering. When the meeting broke, she hastened to her home in much distress. Soon she saw some of the elders approaching, which seemed a confirmation to her of the truth of the enemy's insinuations; and she thought they were coming to censure her for what she had done.

When they reached her house, one of them, who sat at the head of the meeting, said, that they had come to see her because they feared she might be under discouragement on account of what had occurred—that when they first heard the sound of her voice, they did not know whether it was in testimony or supplication—and when the nature of the offering was apparent, the solemnity over the meeting was such that they feared to dissipate it by rising.

For "The Friend."

I stood beside a bed of bloom,
In spring-time's early morn;
The song of bird, and breath of flower,
On balmy air was borne;
While "face of earth" again renewed
Told not of cold and storm.

My thoughtful gaze met smiling eyes,
Of varied shade and hue;
They took me back to early days,
To pleasant paths and true;
And faces lifted to the skies
Woke joys and sorrows too.

Oh! beauteous flower,—whose language tells
More than the pen can say;
What depth of thought thy presence sheds,
To cheer life's toilsome way!
Though weak of heart, we still shall know
Strength needful for the day.

Some lovely faces, drooping low,
Are raised with careful touch;
They sweetly, humbly say to me—
That, when we feel so much
The head is bowed in silent prayer,
"Our Father" heareth such.

Dear eyes of loving gratitude,
So tender, true and deep;
Your constancy will help the heart,
Its earthly faith to keep;
From us, you never are estranged;
And death is only sleep.

And while you live, you "sing his praise,"
Whose glory shines for aye;
"The Lord rejoices in his works"
That praise Him day by day.
Oh! happy hearts who yield Him all,
And with the Psalmist say—

"My meditation shall be sweet,
I will be glad in Thee,
The Heavens are thine, the earth is thine,
Thy way is in the sea.
Bless, oh! my soul, the Lord of life,
Praise Him continually."

He holds within His sovereign hand
The blessing and the blight;
And close upon the shadow fall
The beams of Heavenly light;
Some messenger of mercy sent
To make our pathway bright.

To Him all aching hearts may come,
Mid trial, grief and care;
And when life's choicest gifts are ours,
He hears the grateful prayer,
That rises to his throne, to find Celestial Heartsease there.

"There is no grove on earth's broad chart,
But hath some bird to cheer it—
So hope sings on in every heart,
Although we may not hear it,
And if to-day, the heavy wing
Of sorrow is oppressing,
Perchance, to-morrow's sun will bring
The weary heart a blessing."

Out upon the restless ocean
There is one we dearly love;
Fold him in thine arms of pity,
Spread thy guardian wings above.

When the winds are howling round him,
When the angry waves are high,
When black, heavy, midnight shadows,
On his trackless pathway lie,

Guide and guard him, blessed Saviour,
Bid the hurrying tempests stay;
Plant thy foot upon the waters,
Send thy smile to light his way.

If it please thee, Heavenly Father,
We would see him come once more,
With his olden step of vigor,
With the love-lit smile he wore.

* TO AN EARLY PRIMROSE.

Mild offspring of a dark and sullen sire;
Whose modest form, so delicately fine,
Was nursed in whirling storms,
And cradled in the winds.

Thee, when young Spring first questioned,
And dared the sturdy blusterer to the fight,
Thee on this bank he threw
To mark his victory.

In this lone vale the primrose of the year,
Serene thou openest to the nipping gale,
Unnoticed and alone,
Thy tender elegance.

So virtue blooms, brought forth amid the storms
Of chill adversity, in some lone walk
Of life, she rears her head,
Obscure and unobserved.

While every bleaching breeze that on her blows,
Chastens her spotless purity of breast,
And hardens her to bear
Serene the ills of life.

For "The Friend"

Convincement.

In the valuable journal left by John Churman, there are mentioned in close connection the cases of two persons who had become members of the Society of Friends, but under different feelings.

When visiting meetings on the East Shore of Maryland, he took for a guide John Browning, "who," he says, "some time before had been convinced of the blessed truth by the inward operation of the Holy Spirit without any instrumental means. He had been a member of the Church of England and for his sobriety was chosen a vestryman but after a time felt a scruple in his mind about taking off his hat, when he entered church-yard, so-called, fearing it was a superstitious adoration of the ground, from its supposed holiness; but would take it off when he entered the worship-house, and walk uncovered to his pew. But after a time he could not uncover his head, until what they divine service began; which, as he kept attentive to the scruple in his mind, became valueless to him, who was inwardly seeking substance and life. He therefore withdrew from it, and after some time went to our meetings, rather out of curiosity than expecting any good, but felt himself owned, had a taste of the peace which the world cannot give, and from that time became a constant attender of our meetings.

We had a meeting at Queen Ann's, among a people who for want of keeping to the form of religion, had almost lost the form. In conversation at a house in the evening, I asked a Friend whether she was a Friend's child convinced of our principles. Her reply was, that when she was young, she lived at a friend's house, and took a notion of going to meeting with them, which she had done ever since. Alas! when notion changes the will, it is not that faith which works by love to the purifying of the heart, the religion is without form, empty and dead."

Another incident in connection with the subject is related in John Churchman's account of his travels in England. He says: "We rode to Cornwood, in Northumberland, and lodged at the house of a man who had been for several years of a disorderly conduct, much given to the excessive use of strong drink, until he had very much impaired his constitution. But it pleased the Lord to open his understanding, and make him acquainted with his blessed truth, whereby he was made free from that evil, and received strength to seek his old companions. His joining with us was a great grief to his wife, who informed me, that through prejudice for a time, he would rather he had continued his former course of living, than to become a Quaker, although observing the sweetness of his temper, and the recovery of his health in some degree, by a solid and sober conduct, she was made to believe in the power by which he had won such a victory, and joined herself in the same religious profession; they appeared to be steady Friends. I would to God that the tipplers and drunkards would turn to that at which the Prophet who is in Israel, that they might by Him be cleansed from that leprosy in!"

It was the "sweetness of temper" and the "solid and sober conduct" of this man that was the means of convincing his wife of the utility and blessed power of the religion he professed. And we believe there is no other agency so effective in spreading the religion of our Saviour in the earth as the godly lives of those who are truly under its influence. A man of more than average mental ability, and who was sceptical as to the truths of Christianity, said: "I have read a great many books on the evidences of Christianity, and most of the arguments in them I can answer satisfactorily to my own mind. But when I change I have seen in the life of my little daughter, in the year or two past, I cannot explain. There is evidence of some power working in her which I cannot understand." Various are the ways and means which the Lord makes use of to convince people of their sinful condition and of the truths of his gospel.

Jacob Ritter thus relates how he was convinced of the unlawfulness of war, while in the battle of Brandywine, during the revolutionary war. Though he had before had no sense of the horrors of war, yet he had joined the militia when about 20 years of age through the influence of a clergyman of the Lutheran denomination to which he belonged. This man preached the propriety and necessity of standing in defence of our country against her enemies; "so," he says, "I was persuaded against my better judgment, to join the army; and taking up my musket I entered the American service."

The company and battalion to which I belonged marched down to Brandywine at General Mifflin's order, and joined the army under the command of Washington and Lafayette. We were ordered to work day and night to erect batteries, &c., in order to resist the progress of the English army.

"After several days hard labor, we became so drowsy that nearly all the men except the sentinels fell asleep. General Washington stood in the midst of our camp, and called out to us with a loud voice: 'Boys, get up—but be silent, the enemy is nearly upon us.' About daylight the alarm gun was fired by the British; then all our army made ready for battle.

"General orders were given for every company to maintain its ranks, and each man to keep his place. An awful pause preceded the engagement, and some of us stood in solemn silence. I then remembered what I had seen and felt of the mercies of God, and was afresh convinced that it was contrary to the Divine Will, for a Christian to fight. I was sensible in my own heart that I had done wrong in taking up arms, and the terrors of the Lord fell upon me. I then secretly supplicated the Almighty for preservation, covenanting that if He would be pleased to deliver me from shedding the blood of my fellow-creatures that day, I would never fight again. Then the love of God was shed abroad in my heart, and all fear of man was entirely taken away; and throughout the engagement I remained perfectly calm, though the bombshells and shot fell round me like hail, cutting down my comrades on every side, and tearing off the limbs of the trees like a whirlwind; the very rocks quaked, and the hills that surrounded us seemed to tremble with the roar of the cannon.

"It happened that the standing troops were called into action before the militia, of which the brigade that I belonged to was partly composed. Towards evening, (for the battle lasted from sunrise to sunset,) our battalion was ordered to march forward to the charge. Our way was over the dead and dying, and I saw many bodies crushed to pieces beneath the wagons, and we were bespattered with blood. But no orders were given to use our small arms, and thus I was enabled to rejoice, that though I was provided with sixty cartridges, I did not discharge my musket once that day. Forever magnified be the God of my life that I was mercifully delivered from spilling the blood of any of my fellow-creatures.

"As we had to march directly under the English cannon which kept up a continual fire, the destruction of our men was very great, and Washington called out to us: 'Men, retreat; it is not worth while to sacrifice so many lives.' It was now drawing towards night, and we retreated as well as we could. I took shelter in the woods, and having found a thick grape vine, crept under it, and worn out with hunger and fatigue, fell sound asleep.

"The next morning I crawled out of my hiding place, and a sense of my forlorn condition covered my mind. I knew I had sinned in entering into the war, and no man going to execution could have felt more remorse. I went along till I came to a little cottage where dwelt a Dutch woman. I entered at a venture and begged her to give me a little broth, for I had not tasted a mouthful of food for two days. She took pity on me and gave me some, but I had scarcely done eating it, when a party of Hessians came in and took me prisoner. War-worn and weary as I was, they marched me before them, beating me most unmercifully with the butts of their guns, and occasionally placing their bayonets at my breast; they swore they would kill me on the spot because I was a rebel. In this trial I experienced heavenly Goodness to be near, and again all fear of death was taken away.

"They took me to the Hessian general, Count Donop, who, after much rough language, ordered me to be put under the provost-captain; and, with a number of other prisoners of war, I was marched to Philadelphia and lodged in prison.

"The number of American prisoners in jail at this time was about nine hundred. During the first five days of our confinement, most of us had nothing to eat, and many died from want. One poor fellow who had been, as far as I can remember, five days without food, got at last a little piece of dry bread, which he devoured greedily, and then leaning his head back, immediately expired!

"I had been three days without a mouthful to eat, when an aunt of mine got leave to see me. She gave me a small quantity of food and then left me, and in a day or two after she sent her son with some more; and thus, under Providence, saved my life. Ah! when I have seen the tables of Friends in Philadelphia loaded with all the luxuries of wealth, it seemed as if I could weep over them, remembering the days of my famine, and fearing that the day of plenty was not enough valued.

"While I was thus suffering under this cruel imprisonment, I remembered the impressions of my mind on the day of the battle at Brandywine, and feeling myself as a poor worm of the dust, I used to go out every evening after dark, into the jail yard, and throw myself prostrate with my face upon the ground, in deep abasement of soul, and supplicate the Lord for mercy.

"This sense of my undone condition lasted for a considerable time, until at length the voice of Divine compassion passed through my mind, that my prayers were heard and that I should experience deliverance from my troubles. I arose from the ground with gladness of heart."

J. R. was soon after released from prison, and returned to his father's house in safety.

How a Fly Walks on the Ceiling.—To walk head downward on a floor turned topsy-turvy would puzzle a great many, and the wisest men were for a long time unable to explain how the fly walked so easily on the ceiling. Some supposed that the foot of the fly was formed to act like a sucker, which by exhausting the air would enable the insect to attach itself firmly to the ceiling. Others fancied that this foot might be furnished with little hooks to grasp the inequalities of mortar. A third supposition was that the foot was a sort of gumbottle, provided with a sticky fluid, and by help of which the fly was kept from falling.

But the best idea of all was to examine this portion of the insect's limb. By the aid of that wonderful instrument, the microscope, people can now see instead of being only able to guess, as in olden times. The microscope magnified the leg of the fly so that it appeared as large as that of a horse, and its foot as broad as a horse's hoof. This little foot was then seen to possess all the good qualities above mentioned. The all-wise Creator had indeed formed the fly's foot as a sucker, furnished it with a set of hooks, and also moistened it with a viscid fluid.—Selected.

Religious Items, &c.

German name for Heretic.—It is thought by some scholars that the teutonic use of Katze (Ketzer) for heretic has its ground in the association of cats with witches. A witch and a black cat were invariably thought of together. The early Protestants (like the early Christians) were believed to be bewitched, and to practise witchcraft. In popular German imagination the Waldenses, the Albigenses, and even the Templar Knights were credited with worshipping a large black cat, and this association of ideas resulted in the word Katzer or Ketzer for a heretic. It was once the custom in France every "St. John's Day," with hymns and anthems and processions of priests, to throw twenty-four live cats into a fire, kindled by the bishops and clergy in the public square; the practice was strictly in keeping with the ceremony of burning heretics. It is a good illustration of the bewildering cruelty of ignorance.

Wealth and Aristocracy in the Church.—John Wesley said once: "Beware how you invite rich men into your churches until you are sure they are Christians. Beware how you manage your churches in such a way that rich men will become a necessity to you. If your church buildings are so luxurious that you need an enormous income, wealthy men will be necessary to you, and they will rule you, and then you must soon bid farewell to Methodist discipline, and, perhaps, to Methodist doctrine." A wiser thing was never said. A more unpopular thing, perhaps, could hardly be repeated at this hour; but the truth is, that even in Republican America and especially in the wealthy and fashionable society of cities, there are a great many luxurious churches, that do not want poor men as members. An unexpressed feeling that some men are too poor or too corrupt in their past connections and too low in their present social standing to be attractive persons in a luxurious [church.] I call a luxurious church that is not ready to receive membership from any quarter of the population a social reserve, and not a church.

The two worst evils of our time inside the domain of Christendom are probably luxurious living among Church members and loose thinking among religious teachers. And when the two go together, and we have a religious club instead of a church, a club in which, of course, it would be uncourteous to suppose that there are any sinners, a club that has forgotten that all men are brethren, and that the business of the Church is to stand between the living and the dead.—Jos. Cook.

A Literal Cross.—An English clergyman preached a sermon lately from the text, "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ," and defended the use of the crucifix as an aid to devotion. The Bishop of the diocese was present, and before the audience was dismissed rose and made a public and earnest protest against the bold perversion of the text.

Nebula in Orion as seen through the new telescope made for the Russian Observatory at Pultowa.

"The little wisp of cloud haze visible to the naked eye is transferred into one of the most glorious visions that ever breaks upon the entranced eye of the observer. The most wonderful nebula the northern sky reveals lies before us, filling the whole field of view. The delicacy of the celestial glow that pervades the scene is beautiful beyond comparison. The central point of interest is the famous trapezium, consisting of four bright stars and two smaller ones. Around this sextuple group radiate what seem to be the head and branching horns of some huge animal, the trapezium occupying the open mouth, and surrounding a space of sky, within which reigns the blackness of darkness. Spiral curves of nebulous haze fill in the field of view, the radiating mass being of a delicate green tint, while dotted over the shadowy haze are many brilliant stars, throwing an element of life into the formless void and helping to light up this scene of loveliness and grandeur which no pencil may paint nor pen describe.

Where but in the heavens shall we find such an exhibition of majesty, vastness, and celestial grace as is symbolized in the great Nebula of Orion, beaming with suns, peopled with ghostly shadows, and glowing with light that is hundreds of years in reaching us!"—Scientific American.

The Great Russian Telescope.—The Public Ledger, of Philadelphia, publishes the following account of the manufacture of the lens used in the instrument referred to in the above description of the Nebula in Orion.

"One of the interesting events of the past month has been the completion, by Alvan Clark & Sons, of the great 30-inch object glass of the telescope for the Russian Observatory at Pultowa.

This is the largest lens ever manufactured, and its successful completion may be justly regarded as a triumph of American skill and patience. The lens consists of two pieces, one a double convex, and the other a plano-concave lens, fitted in a cell and separated a few inches from each other. This separation is for the purpose of allowing a circulation of air, by which, after a hot day, the lenses are made more quickly to partake of the surrounding cooler temperature of night.

The surfaces are so ground as to destroy the tendency to create blurred images, or images surrounded by fringes of color. This grinding has to be done with great care, and, during the latter part of the time, is entirely accomplished by rubbing the glass with the finger, covered with a fine polishing dust called rouge. After a few strokes of rubbing the effect is tested by allowing light to be passed through and noticing the clearness of the image. These fine touches take an immense amount of time, and make all the difference between a good and a worthless glass. To apply them with judgment and success requires an amount of tact and skill rarely possessed. There are probably not twenty men in the world who can make a first-class object glass.

This 30-inch glass is the largest in the world. The next in size are (1) the 27-inch glass of the Vienna Observatory, made by Grubb, of Dublin, about two years ago, and now lying unused for want of a dome of sufficient size in which to mount it; (2) the 26-inch of our Washington Observatory, in successful operation; (3) a 25-inch glass belonging to a private gentleman in England, and, so far as is known, not of much value for scientific purposes; (4) the 23-inch of the Princeton Observatory, now in constant use by P. Young. The second and fourth of these were made by the Clarks, who have now nearly completed a 26-inch glass for the University of Virginia, and have also a contract for what will be the mammoth lens of the world, 48 inches in diameter, for the Lick Observatory on Mount Hamilton, California.

It will thus be seen how large a part of one firm has had in the manufacture of large telescopes. Alvan Clark, now an octogenarian, recently told the writer the history of his start in telescope making. He had been a portrait painter, but photography had deprived him of a large part of his remuneration. To assist his son, whom he detected making a concave mirror, for a reflecting telescope, he made a study of the problems involved and soon created a number of lenses. Among these was a 7-inch, and with it he discovered the duplicity of certain stars, which had escaped the keen eyes and large telescopes of Wilhelm Struve and other great astronomers. These discoveries he sent abroad, and very soon he had an order from the English astronomer Dawes for several telescopes for himself and friends. From this beginning his work grew on his hands, and when too old for manual labor himself he found his sons ready to continue it. And now the son of Wilhelm Struve, himself one of the first astronomers of the world, sends on from Russia for the most delicate and important part of the great telescope of the world. He is now in this country testing the completed lens, and if satisfactory, takes it home with him.

Rapid Formation of Mineral Veins.—Fleitmann has lately remarked that the formation of mineral veins is far from requiring the length of time generally supposed to be necessary. About two years ago he filled a trench with common clay containing iron, and having occasion to again clear this trench he found, to his great surprise, that the clay had entirely changed its character and become white; while at the same time it was traversed in several directions by narrow fissures which were filled with compact iron pyrites.—Scientific American.

Mexican Jumping Seed.—The seed of a Euphorbiaceous plant found in Sonora possesses the remarkable property of jumping. This is due to the larvæ of a small species of mite which occupy the central portions of the seed, finding in it both food and home. The movements of the larvæ when disturbed cause motion in the seed.

The Paradise Fish.—This is a small species kept as pets in China. Benecke states that having received a pair he placed them in a vessel of water. In a few weeks the male commenced building a nest. For this purpose he would come up to the surface of the water, take his mouth full of air, thrust it under the water, forming small bubbles of film-like substance; and continue thus to build a layer of the bubbles hanging quite firmly together, adding new layers until it was completed. In two or three days after spawning, the young fish escapes from the egg. So long as it needs parental care the male devotes himself to it. As soon as a young fish starts away, he harkens after it, seizes it with his mouth, and spits it out into the nest of foam. The young subsist at first upon the foam of the nest.

Communication of Ideas between Animals.—The following anecdotes have been sent me by a London physician, and forcibly illustrate the faculty possessed by animals of communicating ideas to each other.

While I was living in the country with a dog, a most interesting incident was observed in the history of the dog.

My friend had several dogs, two of which were a special attachment to, and an understanding with, each other. The one was a black terrier, gentle and ready to fraternize with all honest comers. The other was as fierce as a mastiff. He was fierce, and required acquaintance before you knew what gentleness and kindness lay beneath his fierce and savage-looking exterior.

These two dogs were often observed to go to a certain point together, when the small dog remained behind at a corner of a large field, while the mastiff took a round by the other side of the field, which ran up-hill for nearly a mile, and led to a wood on the left. Game was often hunted in those districts, and the object of the dogs' arrangement was soon seen. The terrier would start a hare, and chase it up the hill towards the large wood at the summit, where they arrived somewhat tired. At this time, the large dog, who was fresh and had not labored after his walk, darted after the animal, and he was usually captured. They then ate the hare between them, and returned home. This course had been systematically carried on for some time before it was fully understood.

A relation of mine in Dumfriesshire had a dog and a cat which were attached to each other in an extraordinary manner, and both were great favorites in the household. The dog, however, was not intended to sleep in the house, and was carefully put out every night; but, strange to say, he was always found in the morning lying before the fire, with the cat by his side.

One evening the master of the dog heard a sort of rap at a back door leading to the garden, and saw the sagacious cat spring up and strike the latch, while the dog pushed open the door and entered in triumph. This cat must have long been carried on, and when it was discovered, I need not say how interested were the members of the household in these intelligent and really wonderful creatures."—J. G. Wood.

FIFTH MONTH 19, 1833.

The Quaker Invasion of Massachusetts, by Edward P. Hallowell. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

We have received a copy of the above work, from the publishers, through the hands of B. Lippincott & Co., of this city. The object of the volume is "to correct popular errors and to assign to the Quakers their proper place in the early history of Massachusetts." In the Appendix are placed a number of the colonial laws and other documents which afford valuable confirmation of the correctness of the statements and views advanced in the body of the book.

The charges brought against the early members of our Society in New England have been refuted in the pages of this Journal elsewhere; but they furnish so convenient cover for the inexcusable intolerance and hostility of the magistrates and clergy of Massachusetts colony, that perhaps it is scarcely to be wondered at that they are revived from time to time by historians and essayists who are either careless writers, or who are not willing to fairly look at unpleasant truths.

The recent re-issuing of old calumnies seems to call for a fresh statement of the facts of the case, which has been satisfactorily performed in the present volume.

The truth is, that the officers of the Massachusetts colony made no pretence to toleration, and were quite prepared to exclude by force all whose views of doctrine differed from their own; and in effecting this object were not restrained by the principles of either justice or humanity. When Ann Austin and Mary Fisher arrived at Boston in 1656, there was no law in the colony which referred to Quakers, and they had a perfectly legal and moral right to land there, and attend to the business on which they had come. Yet these inoffensive women were seized, shamefully entreated, put in prison where they were harshly used for a number of weeks, and then shipped to Barbadoes. To those who know the self-sacrificing spirit of our early Friends; and the manner in which they were made instruments in extending political and religious liberty, by faithful protest and patient endurance of injustice, it will not seem surprising that these women were followed by many other messengers whom the Lord sent to proclaim the gospel among that highly-professing, but sadly-blinded people.

The barbarous treatment which these messengers received,—imprisoned, beaten and hanged, even women being stripped to the waist, tied to the tail of a cart and cruelly scourged through the streets—could not fail to deeply affect the minds of those beholders who sympathized with them; and in a very few cases there is some reason to suppose that they led to mental unsettlement and to an imitation of the ancient prophets who often symbolized the condition of the people in a manner which would not accord with our ideas of the proprieties of life. It is not important at this day to determine whether those who so acted were rightly led, or whether they were influenced by an excited imagination; but their acts can furnish no palliation of the cruelties practised by the ruling powers of the Massachusetts colony, because they did not precede but followed after them.

One of the interesting points brought out in this work is the fact, that a considerable portion of the settlers in Massachusetts and the adjacent colonies did not approve of the course of their rulers, and that their natural humanity was not overpowered by religious fanaticism.

In the introductory chapter, which treats of the rise of Quakerism, we find the assertion, that the "doctrine of the Inner Light was the corner-stone upon which Fox builded, and upon which Quakerism rests." It would have presented a fuller view of his doctrinal system, to have stated, that he and our early members relied for salvation on what Christ had done without them in the prepared body, and what He did for them by his Spirit in their hearts. John Banks, speaking for himself and his brethren, says, "We as truly believe in that same Christ, who laid down his body and took it up again, as in his Light within; and we have benefit to salvation by the one as well as the other; and of both, they being one." Yet it is true that "the Light of Christ, as God's gift for man's salvation" was very largely and fully proclaimed by these ministers, and for the reason that it had been too much lost sight of by the professors of Christianity, who still owned the divinity and atonement of Christ.

There are temptations adapted to every position in which we may be placed, and even those who are actively engaged in promoting the Lord's cause by pen or tongue, are not freed from the necessity of maintaining the holy watch, and constantly resorting to the inexhaustible fountain for spiritual nourishment for themselves, and for preservation from the snares that beset their path. It is very possible for such to become so much absorbed in the work before them as to neglect the daily seeking for spiritual food in humble dependence on the all-bountiful Giver. Where this neglect continues, there will gradually grow up a dependence on their own abilities and efforts, spiritual pride in some of its multi-form ramifications will be allowed an entrance, and the Divine blessing will be withdrawn, while the poor deluded instrument may still think he is doing service for the Lord.

George Fox relates in his journal that at a meeting at John Crook's in 1658, he was moved to declare and open divers things to those Friends who had received a part of the ministry. Among the cautions then delivered was the following:—

"There is great danger too in travelling abroad in the world. The same power that moves any to go forth, is that which must keep them. For it is the greatest danger to go abroad, except a man be moved of the Lord, and go in the power of the Lord."

"And every one feeling the danger to his own particular in travelling abroad then the pure fear of the Lord will be kept in. For though they that travel may have openings when they are abroad, to minister to others; yet as for their own particular growth, they must dwell in the life which doth open; and that will keep down that which would boast."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The total number of immigrants who arrived in the principal customs districts of the United States during the ten months which ended 4th mo. 30th, 1833, was 417,689 against 544,601 during the corresponding period of the previous year.

Sitting Bull and his band arrived at Standing Rock Agency, Dakota, last week from Fort Randall. They are to engage in farming hereafter. On the journey to Standing Rock four deaths occurred.

The Standard Oil Company's Works, in Jersey City, were struck by lightning early on the morning of the 10th, and the larger portion destroyed by fire. Six men perished in the flames. The loss on property is estimated at $1,500,000.

The great bridge, connecting New York City and Brooklyn, is to be opened to the public on the 24th instant. The trustees have fixed the toll for foot passengers at one cent, the fare on the cars at five cents, for one horse and man at five cents, one horse and vehicle 10 cents, two horses and vehicle 20 cents, each additional horse five cents, and sheep and cattle five cents.

The idea broached at the New York Chamber of Commerce, of placing New York and Brooklyn under one and the same government is one that is likely to grow. As a mere matter of economy, people are beginning to see there is no reason in having two civic administrations for communities that, with the completion of the East River bridge, are substantially one. There are many considerations in favor of the step and scarcely any against it. It costs New York nearly ten million dollars per annum for official salaries alone, and Brooklyn pays in about the same proportion; the saving by the proposed combination, therefore, would be an advantage.

The Treasurer of Boston, in his annual statement, reports the debt of that city on the 30th of 4th month, 1883, at $41,184,358, an increase during the year of $1,105,000.

The New England Homestead, of Springfield, Massachusetts, publishes reports of the crops from all sections of New England, which indicate a large yield of hay and grain.

The Ohio Board of Agriculture has received official despatches from other States, giving the following probabilities for acreage and condition combined, of winter and spring wheat in the States named: Kansas, 93; Minnesota, 76; Indiana, 90; Iowa, about 80; California, 87; Michigan, 64; Ohio, 56; Kentucky, about 66. From these and other data, Secretary Chamberlain, of Ohio, estimates a probable total shortage of 100,000,000 bushels from the last crop of 500,000,000 bushels.

The Agricultural Department of Illinois has completed a report of the crops covering 1500 townships of the State. The winter wheat crop will not exceed 40 per cent. of that of 1882.

Official reports promise a full average peach crop in Maryland. The trees were in full bloom on the 26th ult., about fourteen days later than usual, and the lateness of the blooms prevented damage by frosts. For other fruits the prospect is unusually good.

The receipts of cotton at Galveston this season have reached 800,000 bales. This makes it the second cotton port in the United States.

Our exports of petroleum for the nine months which ended 3rd mo. 31st, 1883, amounted in value to $32,023,373, against $38,207,257 for the corresponding period of the previous year.

The "Lake Superior and Northwest Railroad Company," with a capital of $5,000,000, has been organized in Duluth. The road is to run from Duluth to Red River at the mouth of the Red Lake River, and is to have several branches.

The Cleveland, Akron and Columbus Railway is experimenting with a novel system of storm signals, to be used on the running trains. The purpose is to notify farmers of the probable condition of the weather.

A trestle work now being constructed for a railroad across Lake Pontchartrain, Louisiana, is to be 21½ miles in length. This distance comprises 13½ miles from People's Avenue Canal to the Point, 5¼ miles across the lake, and 2-4-10 miles from the north shore. All of the piling along the southern shore, with the exception of about one mile, has been driven, and this division will be completed by the 1st of 7th month. Of the piling in the lake, two and a quarter miles have been driven, and one mile of the work is completed. The trestle on the north shore has been finished some time, and the rails are laid nine miles. The piles average 60 feet in length, and are driven about 40 feet. It will, when completed, be the longest bridge of the kind in the U. States. More than 15,000,000 feet of lumber, outside of the piles, will be used in its construction.

A tornado, in southwestern Missouri, on the 13th instant, caused great havoc in Kansas City, Oronozo, Liberty, Joplin, and elsewhere. At Kansas City three persons were killed and twelve or thirteen injured. At Oronozo six were killed and over thirty injured. The loss of property is very great.

The damage at Denver, Colorado, by last week's hail storm, will probably amount to $75,000. Scarcely a building in the city escaped injury. The fruit trees were greatly damaged. The loss to ranchmen around Denver is very heavy.

A telegram from Lockport, New York, says the aphids has been discovered in nearly every apple orchard in Niagara county.

An epidemic of measles, including many cases of the "black" or malignant type, prevails in Wheatland, about ten miles from Lockport, New York. There are now 40 cases under treatment, and five deaths have occurred. The disease was introduced by an immigrant from Germany.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 354, which was 34 less than during the previous week, and 2 less than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing 193 were males, and 161 females: 48 died of consumption; 23 of pneumonia; 18 of old age; 12 of scarlet fever; 12 of diphtheria; 12 of bronchitis; 10 of croup, and 10 of convulsions.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 103½; 3½'s, 102½; 4½'s, registered, 112½; coupon, 113½; 4's, 119½; currency 6's 129 a 132.

Cotton.—There was no essential change to notice in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported at 11½ a 11¾ cts. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7¼ a 7¾ cts. for export, and 8¼ a 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour continues dull, but prices were without essential change. Sales of 2000 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.50 a $6.50; Pennsylvania family at $5 a $5.25; western do. at $5.50 a $6.20, and patents at $6 a $7.50. Rye flour is steady at $3.62½ a $3.75.

Grain.—Wheat is in moderate request and a fraction higher. Sales of 5300 bushels red, in car lots, at $1.16 a $1.26. Rye is nominal at 70 a 72 cts. Corn is quiet but firmer. Sales of 10,000 bushels in car lots, at 55 a 65 cts. Oats are steady. Sales of 11,000 bushels, in car lots, at 49 a 54 cts.

Beef cattle were in fair demand, but prices were a fraction lower: 2700 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5½ a 7¼ cts. per lb.; the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were a fraction lower: 10,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5 a 7 cts. for wool sheep, and 3 a 6 cts. for clipped. Spring lambs sell at $3 a $7 per head.

Hogs were a fraction lower: 5000 head sold at the different yards at 10 a 11 cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—On the morning of the 12th instant, although the sky was lowering and there were dashes of rain during the day there was a very large attendance at the opening of the International Fisheries Exhibition, at South Kensington, London. The approaches to the temporary buildings were packed with carriages and foot passengers at an early hour of the morning, and long before noon the 23 acres of buildings were filled with spectators from all parts of the world.

The third trial of Timothy Kelly, who was charged with participation in the murder of Cavendish and Burke, was concluded on the 9th. The jury found a verdict of guilty against the prisoner, and he was sentenced to be executed.

Joseph Mullett, who was indicted on the 3d inst. for complicity in the attempt on the life of Juror Denis Field, has been tried and convicted and sentenced to penal servitude for life.

It is stated that telegrams have been sent to the Duc D'Anmale and the Duc De Chartres informing them that the Comte De Chambord, the Bourbon representative to the French throne, is dangerously ill.

The imports into France during the first four months of the present year show an increase of 34,000,000 francs as compared with the same months in 1882. The exports during those months decreased 4,500,000 francs as compared with the corresponding period last year.

La France says that Brun, Minister of Marine, has received a despatch from de Brazza stating that he has taken possession of the village of Loango and the adjacent territory in the name of the French Government.

There is an almost open rupture between Prince Bismarck and Scholtz, the Minister of Finance. The Prince declares that the recent vote on the question of the budget will have convinced the Emperor of the impossibility of carrying out social reforms with the present Reichstag. Prince Bismarck is becoming daily more emaciated, and his physicians have informed him that the worst may happen if he does not abandon all State work for the present.

On the 9th inst., in the Reichstag, Johannsen, a Danish deputy, gave notice that he would question the Government in regard to the execution of the ordinance requiring the people of North Schleswig to choose between German and Danish nationality. The debate on the subject was fixed for the 22d inst. The house adjourned until that date.

The treaty between Germany and Madagascar is based on the mutual recognition of the most favored nation principle. Germany has done or said nothing offensive to the sensibilities of France, but the Malagassy envoys consider that their mission has been a complete success.

The net immigration into Canada from 1st mo. 1 to 4th mo. 30, 1883, was 22,255, against 15,373 during the corresponding period of 1862.

During last month there were 38 deaths from yellow fever in Havana. Seven deaths from the disease were reported in that city during the week ending 5th month 4th, and 14 deaths last week.

Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, Applications for the Admission of Patients made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Managers.

DIED, at his residence in Moncton, Vermont, on 2nd of 3d mo. 1883, DAVID F. KNOWLES, a member and minister of Starksboro Monthly Meeting, eighty-nine years, eight months and nine days. I year 1813 he was married to Jemima Hoag, dau. of Joseph and Huldah Hoag, with whom he seventy years, lacking eight days. He stood firm unwavering to the principles of early Friends through the divisions which occurred in his day. In his sickness, when suffering with severe pain, he frequently break out in praising the Lord for his mercies toward him. His friends and neighbors calling in to see him, he often told them that his had nearly come, that he did not fear death, but willing to suffer until the Lord should see fit to him to himself. The day before he died, while suffering severe pain, his daughter said to him, if she would be willing to bear the pain a part of the he said, "No, thy help is needed, I am willing to it all, it will be but a short time; I shall soon be Praise the Lord, praise his holy name, all the earth praise Him." He was patient through sufferings, and passed away like one going to rest, and, we trust, into that rest prepared for the right.

—, at her residence in Haddonfield, New Jersey, 3rd mo. 10th, 1883, SARAH ANN COX, a member and elder of that Monthly Meeting, in the 70th year of age. In a memorandum penned in 1873, she says: "may the remaining years of my life be more devoted to a preparation for the end, and my daily prayer be a guard on the door of my lips that I may not sin with my tongue; so help me, O! blessed Saviour, for mercy's sake." For many years she had given evidence of her love to God in humble obedience to his precepts; and this love also flowed forth to those of her household of faith, including the young, who were near to her heart. She was kind and charitable to the sick and afflicted, frequently visiting such, and offering sympathy to the lowly. Her last illness was a suffering one, but endured with patience; and she could during this period, "My Saviour will take care of me." "Let me go, do not hold me." On being asked if she knew she was nearing her Heavenly home, she replied, "I do, I do." The work of salvation had been done the day time, we fully believe, and those who suffer have the consoling assurance that she is now loved ones who have gone before her to the bliss, and is with them praising Him who loved and redeemed them to Himself.

—, at her residence in Ercildoune, Chester Co., on the 27th of 4th month, DEBORAH HUNT, in the 70th year of her age, a member of London Grove Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, at her residence in Chester Co., Pa., on the 4th month, MARGARET, widow of Benjamin M., aged 77 years, a member and elder of London Grove Monthly Meeting of Friends. She was greatly beloved by many to whom the cause of Christ is precious, a sense that the love of her Redeemer so filled her heart as to flow out to others. Of her funeral it was said, as was testified of a faithful servant of the Lord, in an eminent manner, overshadowed the assembly, and that the praise and glory of all was attributed to "that divine grace and holy Spirit of God, by through which, she was what she was."

To the same.

No date.

"Alas! my dear S., thou hast no idea of the situation thy poor friend W. S. has brought himself into. Whilst thou art affectionately hoping for the day of deliverance and change to come, I fear that the unwillingness which too much prevails to take up the cross and follow Him who was meek and low of heart, will finally procure that sentence (if it has not already done so) passed upon the slothful servant: 'Take from him the talent, and give it to him that hath ten talents.' Indeed the hope which I once had, seems to be gradually wasting away; and although I sometimes think not yet quite gone, yet when revived appears only to arise to throw light upon my destitute and forlorn condition.

What can I say to thee, my dear friend?
What account can I give of the cause of this defection from the King of kings? Shall I charge it to one act of my life, or rather one omission of duty? or shall I charge it to the weakness of human nature, and the deep de-ceitfulness of the heart of man? I am not yet, I humbly trust, hardened against conviction, nor yet given up of a long-suffering and gracious God. My tears are often shed in secret places, but alas! my prayers pass not through the cloud and thick darkness, which surround my soul; and when as in the closet
I would bend my knees to the Father of spirits, I find myself driven back unheeded and not comforted. True, I have looked in our solemn assemblies upon a door, which seems as if it might be opened; but which I shrink back from and say, I am not fit for this—my heart is defiled and I am a back-slider—my shame is apparent, and I shall be counted but an intruder into that which now manifestly does not belong to me, whatever I may have heretofore known. I sometimes look at it and think, that if under right feeling I could publicly bow my knees in the as-semblies of the Lord's people, that I should feel healing virtue to flow into my wounded, captive, and sometimes sorrowful spirit. But I fear this is an experience which I shall never know; and my soul sinks within me, when I look at the prospect before me of being cut off from the Divine favor, and made to feel the force of that sentence, 'Depart from me, ye that work iniquity.'

If thou canst yet pray for me, still bear me in thy remembrance; and may that which has subsisted between us never cease to exist;
or rather, I should say, may that feeling which thou hast had for me, not be suffered to die away. To say I can reciprocate it fully would be saying too much. I am fearful of late of being an intruder upon thee, feeling as I do—for I sincerely desire that thou mayest hold on thy way—like a spot, and a blemish, and a hindrance to good in others, and am almost tempted to hide myself forever from the sight of those to whom (may I speak it with humility) I seem to have been anointed in a remarkable manner to comfort, strengthen, and exhort; but to whom now I must be a stumbling-block and a mere empty professor.

If thou feelest at any time any thing which may tend to revive me, or which may be the means of drawing me to faithfulness and humiliation, do not spare it. I am not yet unwilling to bear the rod, and sometimes am ready to beg for it, if it might be the means of redeeming me from what I now know to be a state of destitution and death.

Thy affectionate

W. S."

Some expressions in this and the previous letter evidencing deep exercise of soul, seem like the pouring out of a chastened and full heart, as was that of W. S. at the age of about twenty-three years, into the sympathizing bosom of a similarly exercised, though more advanced sister, in like religious training in the school of deep proving and baptism.

These humiliating experiences—in a word the pangs of the new birth—all who enter the kingdom of God must in greater or lesser measure, realize for the dear Master's sake who appoints them. But, in infinite mercy, our tender High Priest is by no means unmindful of what his faithful children are passing through; but sitteth by the furnace in order that the heat may not be too great, knowing their frame, and remembering that they are dust. He has, moreover, left the precious promises: "My grace is sufficient for thee; for my strength is made perfect in weakness." "In the world ye shall have tribulation: but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world"—and the crowning consolatory assurance, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

Part of this chastening, purifying discipline was, no doubt, a portion of the preparation for the great work of becoming an ambassador for Christ; as he conveys, "Bowing the knees in the assemblies of the Lord's people," and lifting up the voice also in ministerial sacrifice which service afterwards, as the sequel will prove, he entered upon.

While it would rejoice the heart of very many who are bearing the burden and heat of the day, to see more of those young in years and gifted for service, passively yielding themselves to that discipline of the cross of their dear Saviour, which would fit them, through a partaking of His cup and baptism,
for this or any other service in the Church,
it does not seem expedient to leave testimonies to such afflictions and tribulations as are meted to the heaven-bound pilgrim, and of which our blessed Lord and Lawgiver has made such frequent mention, too much or wholly out of sight. In corroboration of which, a valued minister of this Society has left the record: "I have never had unity with a certain species of fleshly wisdom, which in endeavoring to enlist soldiers under Christ's banner, adopts a mode very similar to those who keep out of view the hardness which must be endured, and seeks to allure by temporary gratification."

On the Desert.

THE PENINSULA OF SINAI.

This is the title of a work by Henry M. Field, describing his journey in the wilderness of Sinai, in the track of Moses and the Israelites of old. Numerous as have been the descriptions of the country and its inhabitants by successive travellers, the subject is one which seems to continue fresh in its interest. The present volume is pleasantly written, instructive, and entertaining.

H. M. Field had an agreeable fellow-traveller in Dr. George E. Post, Professor of Surgery and Botany in the Protestant College at Beirut, who was desirous of studying the flora of Sinai and the Desert, and who had long been acquainted with Arabian language and customs. On him devolved the preparation for the expedition—which involved no little care and labor. Our author says:

"One must choose his dragoman, and draw up a formal contract, which has to be signed and sealed before the consul, in which every item is specified—the number of camels and tents, the days of marching, and the provisions of every kind, even to what we should have for breakfast, for luncheon and dinner, and to the number of our sheets and towels. Travellers in the East may be pardoned if they are sometimes lifted up with vanity when they see that it takes almost as much to set them in motion as to get a ship under weigh. Though there were but two of us, it required a considerable outfit for a month in camp. Everything had to be carried on the backs of camels—our tents, iron bedsteads, mattresses, table, and camp-chairs—a stock of household furniture sufficient to begin housekeeping; to which must be added stores of canned meat and fruits, boxes of eggs, and even a hencoop full of chickens! Even when thus provided, we could not have a single meal except as we carried sacks of charcoal to cook our food. And not less important than what we were to eat, was what we were to drink, of which we must have a large supply: for though the camels could go four days without water, we could not. This had to be carried in casks, which were slung on the backs of camels. Altogether an Arab sheik, with his patriarchal family, could hardly make a more imposing caravan."

Going by railway from Cairo to Suez, the travellers there joined the camels and men who had gone on before, and commenced their desert journey. The lower part of the peninsula between the gulfs of Suez and Akaba, (the two northern arms of the Red Sea) is a wilderness of granite mountains. There is not one long chain like the Pyrenees or the Appennines, of a general average height and forms, but innumerable peaks, sharp and pointed, as if piercing the sky, while other summits are broad and dome-like. They are unlike the mountains of other countries in being more barren and desolate; and they rise abruptly from the plain, looking more like columns than pyramids.

Between these mountains, and winding round among them in countless turnings are the wadies—river beds, through which, in the time of rains and storms, there pour furious torrents, which as quickly pass away to the sea. These wadies wind and wind, turning hither and thither in endless confusion.

The view from the summit of Mt. Serbal is thus described: "We saw beneath us a panorama as extensive as that seen from the Righi; only, instead of the smiling cantons of Switzerland, with green fields and waving forests and crystal lakes, we saw only the barrenness of utter desolation, yet in such awful forms as produced an impression of indescribable grandeur. All round us the horizon was piled with mountains."

The scene naturally brought to the mind, the events which had occurred there in ages past; and of these H. M. Field remarks:

"That Gulf of Suez was the sea across which Moses led the Israelites; on the Gulf of Akaba sailed the fleets of Solomon; while turning northward the eye rested on a long line of white cliffs—the escarpment of a table-land which was the Great and Terrible Wilderness in which the Israelites wandered forty years. Thus a wonderful nature was chosen for a wonderful history. It is this mingling of the moral sublime with the sublime in nature which makes the great interest of the Peninsula of Sinai. Beyond all the stupendous altitudes of the mountains, beyond the Alpine heights and fathomless abysses, in power to stir the soul with awe, is the human history that has been enacted amid these great forms of nature. Serbal is clothed with such associations as with a garment. Long before the Exodus of the Israelites—long before Moses fed the flocks of Jethro by Mount Horeb—Serbal was an object of patriotic and superstitious veneration, the centre of a nation and the centre of a religion. Here were lighted fires to give warning to the tribes of the Peninsula, as fires were lighted on Monte Cavo near Rome, as signals to the tribes of Latium. The Peninsula then was doubtless far more populous than now, many tribes dwelling in yonder valleys, within full view of this mountain height, so that when the beacon-fire was lighted here in the darkness of night, it shone in thousands of eyes which glared fiercely at the sign of battle. Nor was it patriotism alone which fired those warriors of the desert. Serbal, as its name imports—the palm-grove of Baal—was a mountain devoted to that idolatrous service; it was the highest of all the 'high-places' set apart for that cruel and bloody worship. Here the priests of Baal erected their altars. On the top is still a rude cairn of stones, which may have stood here from the remotest times. This may have been one of their altars, which smoked with human sacrifices. Who could believe, when standing on such a spot, amid such scenes, so grand and yet so still and peaceful, that man could thus defile the noblest works of God; how, unawed by such grandeur, he was capable of deeds that thrill us with horror—deeds of such cruelty and crime! When I reached the top, I threw myself down upon a shelf of rock, in which there was a slight indentation, a hollow such as is sometimes worn by the action of water, which seemed as if made on purpose to receive the head of a poor pilgrim. This I took for a pillow, and here, stretched at full length, gave one long, steady gaze up into the blue sky. Hard indeed was it to realize that this very rock had borne up the bloody altars of Baal, and that these tranquil heavens had heard the shrieks of human victims. The very memory of such things still brings a shadow over the scene, like the shadows of the clouds that were at that moment sailing across the heavens above. Well was it that Moses invaded these mountains and valleys, to extirpate not indeed a race, but such a religion. The descendants of the Baal-worshippers are here still, their worship, like the worship of Moloch, perished forever."

"When we first looked down from the summit of Serbal, it seemed as if we were looking into the burnt-out crater of a volcano, where animate existence was extinguished. But it was not utterly destitute of life. With a telescope, one could detect the signs of human habitation. In the foreground was the camp which we had left at daylight in the morning, and sprinkled here and there among the palms of the Wady Feiran were the tents of Arab Bedawees. Turning to points still farther away, to the very ends of the wadies, one could see little black patches in the yellow sand, which had learned to recognize as Arab villages. Strictly speaking, the Arab has no village; he is a nomad, whose only house is a tent, who camps wherever he can find a stream of water, or a little pasturage for his camels, and when that is gone, 'folds his tent and silently steals away.' How can human beings live in such frightful solitudes? 'Why do you leave this desolate region,' said Dr. Post to one of our guides, 'and go to Suez or Cairo, where you can find the companionship of men?' 'Oh, no,' said the Arab, 'we can leave our mountains and valleys.' 'And you really love them?' 'Oh, yes,' he answered with all the fervor of a Swiss mountaineer in exile, sighing for the cowbells of the Ranz Vaches. The doctor was standing on the topmost rock of Serbal, with his spy-glass in hand, following the winding wadies as they swept round and round the base of the mountains. The guide was watching his movements, and observing the instrument pointed in a certain direction, he followed it with eager curiosity. Noticing the expression on his countenance, the doctor put the glass to his eyes, pointing it to the valley. A moment passed, and a smile stole over the swart face of the Bedawee—an expression of wonder and surprise and pleasure. He had recognized the village of his people. There were the little flocks of black goats dotting the hillside. He saw the tents of his tribe, and the children sporting in the sand:

'There were his young barbarians all at play! What wonder that he loved the spot? Poor and wretched as it was, it was his home, and he would not part from it for all the delights of civilization.'

"But it is not only the feeling of home, but the feeling of liberty, that attaches the Arab to his mountains and deserts. He loves the freedom of the wilderness, which is more to him than soft raiment and kings' houses. From long wandering there is a restlessness in his very blood which cannot be tamed. 'Every kind of beasts is tamed, and hath been tamed, of mankind,' man himself alone remains untamable. One might as well think of taming the wildest Comanches as the Bedawees. They are an untamable race. The children of Ishmael, they have roamed the deserts three thousand years untouched by civilization."

For "The Friend."

Gather the Fragments.

The late David Cope was remarkable for a store of anecdotes relating to incidents that had occurred in our Society. These he related in a very original and graphic manner, which rendered them exceedingly interesting to his hearers. About 35 years ago I heard him describe a scene, the account of which had received many years before. It was as follows:

At the commencement of a Yearly Meeting, Nicholas Waln arose and made quite a long speech discouraging young persons from taking up the time of the meeting by unnecessary and uncalled-for remarks. When he sat down, that eccentric man, though able minister, James Simpson, who sat just below him, stood round, and said in a voice loud enough for Nicholas and those in the immediate vicinity to hear: "And after all thy long harangue, thou hast offered an unclean beast. I read that neither a lion nor a dog were to be offered in sacrifice. I have no unity with thee." After the meeting was over, James told Nicholas that he had aimed his blow at people who jumped up to speak without any right authority for doing so. But thy dart did not touch them. Now there are here many tender young Friends, who feel an honest concern, and perhaps are a little burthened. Thou hast prohibited these in unburthening their minds; but the forbidden ones, at whom thou aimed, will not heed thee at all."

It is not important at this day to determine which of the two good Friends was in the right on that occasion. Nicholas may have been rightly commissioned to deliver his message; and if so, there is reason to believe that the same power which inspired it would seal instruction by it on the minds of some of those for whom it was intended. Or he may have spoken in his own will, influenced by a previous witnessing of the evil he was testifying against; and in this case he would be committing the very fault he was warning others against. Even those who have long been warriors in the Lord's army, need to stand and watch for the word of command from their Leader, or they may mar the work they would fain promote.

At one time James Simpson received a summons for religious service, and left home to fulfill the duty required of him. Coming to Philadelphia, he met with his friend Nicholas Waln, and told him of the prospect before him. Nicholas discouraged James and advised him to return home, which he did.

Some time elapsed, and James again came to the city, and calling upon Nicholas, said: "There was once a king who gave one of his servants a message, and ordered him to deliver it at a certain place. The servant left me to do so; but on his way he met with another servant who told him he was mistaken, and so he turned back. The king afterwards met him and asked him if he had delivered his message. He said, no, he had not. The king wanted to know why he had not. The servant replied, that he had met with one of his fellow-servants who told him he was mistaken and so he had turned back. The king then told him to go and deliver his message. But what, said he, if I should meet with my fellow-servant again. I will talk to him, said the king." "He has, He has," interrupted Nicholas, "Thou may go on thy way, James."

The lesson which it seems to me may be learned from this incident, is the danger of rash judgment as to the concerns of others, and the need of having so much faith in the Lord's care over his servants as to be willing to trust them in every engagement which is really of Divine appointment.

It is related of Richard Jordan that having business in Philadelphia, he came to the city from his farm in his working clothes. Seeing some persons going to Pine St. Meeting-house, he felt drawn to go also. When he entered the house, Nicholas Waln came down from the gallery and met him with the salutation, "I have been praying since 12 o'clock last night, for thee to come and preach a wedding sermon." Richard was led to speak, and so impressively, that the company assembled were greatly affected. At the close of the meeting he was urged to go and dine with the newly-married couple; and his objection, that he had "no wedding-garment," was overruled, and he went. Here also he found a service for his Master, and the company were favored with a baptizing religious opportunity.

When Elizabeth Coggeshall was in England, she was at one time eight months without hearing from home, and, as she had left an infant behind her, she became very uneasy. In meetings she was able to enter into religious exercise, but as soon as she came out of them, she would be plunged again into anxiety and distress. One day she went to a Friend's house, and as she entered the door, a little child was trotting around the room, repeating the verse:

"Patience is a very good thing
For old and for young;
It makes the mind easy
And bridles the tongue."

The lesson thus taught was heeded, and her mind was relieved of her anxious feelings.

The High Places of the Bible.

The expression "high places" occurs very frequently in the Old Testament, and is the usual translation of the Hebrew word bamoth (plural, bamoth.) It was originally a designation of any eminence, and is in one case used of the "heights of the clouds" (Isa. 14: 14,) and in another of the "waves of the sea," or, as it is given in the margin, in the latter passage, heights of the sea (Job 9: 8,) but it is specially employed to designate high ground, hills, or mountains. Saul was slain upon the high places; that is, the hills (2 Sam. 1: 19.) In these three passages, the Hebrew word is the same, bamoth.

In time the term came to be applied in a technical and limited sense to eminences on which worship and sacrifices were offered either to false gods (Num. 22: 41) or to Jehovah. There was still another step in the progress of the meaning of the word. It became the designation of a sanctuary, or any place where sacrifice was offered. The idea of elevation was still retained, but attached to the altar rather than to the ground. Altars in the valley, as those in the valley of Hinnom, were called high places (Jer. 7: 31, &c.) as also altars in cities (2 Kings 17: 9.) That the term thus became a current expression for a shrine is further apparent from the fact that the high places are distinctly described with the characteristics of structures, and are said to have been built, removed (2 Kings 18: 4,) thrown down (2 Chron. 31: 1,) broken down (2 Kings 23: 8,) and burned (2 Kings 23: 15.) From the isolated notice in Ezekiel 16: 16, it is to be inferred that in some cases these shrines, or "houses," as they were sometimes called, were richly furnished.

The Trojans sacrificed on Mount Ida. The Greeks placed the habitation of their divinities on Mount Olympus, and the Persians on Albordeh. This custom of worshiping on high places prevailed to a large extent among the neighbors of Israel, the Moabites (Isa. 16: 12, &c.) and the Canaanites (Deut. 12: 2, &c.) It was to the high places of Baal of the Moabites that Balak conducted Balaam, and Baal-Peor was one of the mountains sacred to him (Num. 23: 28.)

In studying the history of worship on high places among the Hebrews, there are clearly three periods. The first period extends from Abraham to Solomon, and is marked by a very infrequent mention of high places. The patriarchs built altars wherever they pitched their tents (Gen. 26: 25, &c.) but they also had resort to eminences. The Israelites found the Moabites practising their idolatrous worship on high places, and were commanded to "pluck them down" (Num. 33: 52.) In the times of the Judges, high places are not once mentioned, although in that period of anarchy and transition the offering up of sacrifices was not confined to the tabernacle (Judges 2: 5, &c.) In the time of Samuel, one high place is made prominent as a place of sacrifice (1 Sam. 9: 12;) and it is to be noticed that the prophets, as it would seem, had their dwelling-place there.

During this period of Jewish history before the construction of the temple, the notices of high places are remarkably few when we take into consideration the use of them by the surrounding nations.

The second period in the history of high places in the Old Testament dates from Solomon to Hezekiah. Here we are confronted with a sudden and unusual development of this particular form of local worship. In order to satisfy his foreign wives, Solomon built a high place for "Ashtoreth, the abomination of the Zidonians; for Chemosh, the abomination of the Moabites; and for Milcom, the abomination of the children of Ammon" (1 Kings 11: 7, &c.) Gibeon and Bethel were amongst the principal of these sanctuaries, and it was accounted one of Solomon's great sins that he burned sacrifices on high places (1 Kings 3: 3.) In spite of the construction of the temple, the idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam. Under some of his successors, some of these shrines were removed, those that were allowed to remain presumably being the ones on which sacrifices were offered to Jehovah. At a later period, they greatly increased in "every city" (2 Kings 17: 9, 11, &c.) It is difficult to determine how far this worship was idolatrous, and how far it was offered to Jehovah; but it is evident that the writers of the Kings and Chronicles regarded it as illegitimate, and we constantly read the depreciating criticism, "But the high places were not taken away." (2 Kings 12: 3, &c.)

With Hezekiah begins the third period in the history of the high places. This king, in his endeavor to centralize the sacrifices of Israel at one altar, declared war upon the shrines on high places (2 Kings 18: 4, &c.) He was only partially successful. His successor, Manassah, overthrew his policy; but Josiah, under the pious impulse which the discovery of the Book of the Law had inspired, completed the work of his great predecessor (2 Kings 23: 8.) After the exile, they were not revived; and the need of local places of worship, in addition to the temple, was supplied by the synagogues.—D. S. Schaff in S. S. Times.

Evil-Speaking and Harsh Judgment.

It is very difficult for us to ascertain whether the faults of others are presented to us without exaggeration. So little do human beings understand the motives of others, that actions may be blamed by men, which the recording angel exalts, as he writes in the pure record of Heaven. Yet if we are sure that those whom we hear censured are quite as guilty as they are represented, is not the call on us rather for pity than for punishment?

Surely no class of our fellow-creatures are more in need of pity, than those who have fallen into error, and are suffering its consequences. "Consider," says the excellent Caroline Fry, "the dangers, the sorrows, that lie in the path of all, to their eternal home—the secret pangs, the untold agonies, the hidden wrongs. Thus the heart will grow soft with pity towards our kind. How can I tell what that censured person suffers? That fault will cost dear enough, without my aid. So you will fear, by a harsh word, to add to that which is too much already, as you would shrink from putting your finger into a fresh wound."

From the dangers of evil-speaking there is for you, my dear young friends, many sources of protection. Education has provided you with a shield against this danger. The wide circle of the sciences, the whole range of literature, the boundless world of books, open for you sources of conversation as innumerable as they are sublime. Subjects to which your mothers were strangers, are as familiar to "your lips as household words." You have no need to dissect character. You have no excuse for confining your attention to the frailties of your associates. * * * What a paucity of judgment, what a perversion of intellect does it discover, to cast away the treasures of education, and place yourself on a level with the neediest mind. It is like parting with your birthright, and not receiving even the poor payment of a "mess of pottage." If there has ever been just cause for this serious charge of a love of calumny upon our whole sex, it behooves the young females of the present generation to arise and wipe it away. In those places where danger has been discovered to exist, apply the remedy. Avoid, as far as possible, all personal conversation. But when character is necessarily the subject of discussion, show yourselves the gentle excusers of error, and the advocates of all who need defence. It was once my happiness to associate with some young people, who were in love with goodness and in fear lest the habit of evil-speaking might unawares gain victory over them. They said: "We will form ourselves into a society against detraction. If we asperse any person, or if we neglect to defend the absent when they are defamed, we will pay a fine, to be appropriated to the relief of the poor." Truly, the purse for the poor flourished, and so did the virtues of those lovely and kind-hearted beings. The mother of one of them inquired, for she had not heard of the existence of such a society, "What is the reason that C. never joins when any one is blamed, but tries so constantly to excuse all, or when that is impossible, says nothing?" A sweet comment upon their institution. It so happened that it was organized on the shortest day of the year, and if its effects on all its members were as happy as on this individual, they will have cause to remember it with gratitude to the longest day of their lives. It is not proposed that you should surrender a correct judgment, or attempt to applaud the vicious. Yet do not testify too much complacency in the condemnation even of those who deserve it. You cannot compute the strength of their temptations, or be positive that you would have offered a firmer resistance. Be tender of the reputation of your companions. Do not suppose that by detracting from their merits you establish your own. Join cheerfully in their praises, even should they be called forth by qualities or accomplishments in which you are deficient. Speak with severity of none. The office of censor is hardly safe for those who are themselves "compassed about with infirmity." "Slander," says the excellent Saurin, "is a vice which strikes a double blow, wounding both him who commits, and him against whom it is committed." Those who possess the deepest knowledge of human nature, are the least violent in blaming its frailties. Be assured that you testify your discrimination more by discovering the good than the evil among your fellow-creatures, so imperfect are even the best, so much alloy mingles with earth's finest gold.—L. H. Sigourney.

DRAWING NEARER.

Selected.

"For now is your salvation nearer than when ye believed."

Nearer? Yet we felt it not
Mid the rushing of the strife,
As we mourned our changeable lot,— Toiled beneath our shadowed life,—
By each step our worn feet trod,
We were drawing near to God.

When the day was all withdrawn,
And we walked in tenfold night;
When we panted for the dawn
Of the ever-blessed Light;
In these hours of darkness dim,
We were drawing near to Him.

When beneath the sudden stroke
All our joys in life went down;
When our best-beloved broke
Earthly bounds to take their crown;
By the upward path they trod,
Nearer drew we to our God.

In those days of bitter woe,
When we saw their smile no more;
When our hearts were bleeding slow,
Stricken—stricken—oh, how sore!
While we lay beneath the rod,
We were nearer to our God.

When upon our lifted eye
Gleamed a vision of our home;
When we saw the glory high,
Flooding all that spotless dome,
In that hour of raptured sight,
Pressed we nearer our delight.

Through the long and vanished years,
Doubting, struggling, and depressed,
Shrouded with the mists of tears,
We were passing to our rest,
Tempest-tossed and current-driven,
Ever drawing nearer Heaven.

DISCIPLINE.

A block of marble caught the glance
Of Buonarroti's eyes,
Which brightened in their solemn deeps
Like meteor-lighted skies.

And one who stood beside him listened,
Smiling as he heard,
For "I will make an angel of it,"
Was the sculptor's word.

And soon his mallet and chisel sharp
The stubborn block assailed,
And blow by blow, and pang by pang,
The prisoner unveiled.

A brow was lifted high and pure,
The wak'ning eyes outshone,
And as the master sharply wrought,
A smile broke through the stone.

Beneath the chisel's edge the hair
Escaped in floating rings;
And plume by plume was slowly freed
The sweep of half-furled wings.

The stately bust and graceful limbs
Their marble-fetters shed,
And where the shapeless block had been,
An angel stood instead.

O blows that smite? O hurts that pierce
This shrinking heart of mine!
What are ye but the Master's tools
Forming a work divine?

O hope that crumbles to my feet,
O joy that mocks and flies,
What are ye but the clogs that bind
My spirit from the skies?

Sculptor of souls! I lift to thee
Encumbered hearts and hands;
Spare not the chisel, set me free,
However dear the bands.

How blest, if all these seeming ills
Which draw my thoughts to thee,
Should only prove that thou wilt make
An angel out of me!

For "The Friend."

George Fox in Prayer.

The following testimony of William Per concerning George Fox in prayer, especial "the fewness and fulness of his words," who thus engaged in prostrate vocal offering unto a heart-seeing God "with reverence and fear is commended to the close attention of a who may feel that access is granted them plead as at his holy footstool:—

"But above all he excelled in prayer. The inwardness and weight of his spirit, the reverence and solemnity of his address and behavior, and the fewness and fulness of his words, have often struck even strangers with admiration, as they used to reach others with consolation. The most awful, living, reverent frame I ever felt or beheld, I must say, was his in prayer. And truly it was a testimony I knew, and lived nearer to the Lord than other men; for they who know Him most will see most reason to approach Him with reverence and fear."

For "The Friend."

Incidents and Reflections.

GOOD MAN'S STEPS ARE ALL ORDERED OF THE LORD.

There are many evidences that the Almighty does condescend to influence the minds of his children so as to guide them even to the outward business in which they shall engage. Thomas Story relates that he was created for the practice of law, but after he had been divinely visited, and taken up a sacred resolution to seek first the kingdom of heaven and the righteousness thereof, he said: "I clearly perceived the practice of law, and to be frequently in the suits and tests of the world, would be inconsistent with divine peace in my own mind, expose me to many temptations, and confine me so that I could not follow the Lord in that wherein I understood He was leading, and proposed to bring me forward; that not only in sanctification and justification of my own salvation, but also in a public ministry of that holy and powerful Word of God, by which the Lord of his own free will and grace had called me; and to that end, I was working in me qualifications suitable to his own purpose thereby: And therefore secret concern was how to get rid of that great and dangerous obstruction; well knowing it would very much oppose my father's wishes."

Duty to the Almighty, and the will and serene views of my natural parent becoming opposite, I remained not long in suspense as to do; for, as through grace I had been enabled to take up the cross of Christ in confiding his holy name, in the dispensation of God to his people at that time; so, by the same grace, I was likewise enabled, to overcome the displeasure of my father, to close my doors from all worldly views, and to stop my ears forever, from hearkening to any preferences there; and being furnished with a full resolution in my mind to decline the practice of the law, though the only thing designed as a means of life, accordingly the next persons who came to employ me in business of that kind, I refused in my father's presence; and when they were in his hearing, that I should not undertake business of that kind any more."

Thomas Story's subsequent experience justified his trust in his Heavenly Father; for in intervals between the journeys which he formed in spreading the gospel tidings of salvation, he found such openings for business to appear to have supplied his needs.

There are many testimonies to the watch-care of our Heavenly Father, and many proofs that his ear is open to the cries and prayers of his people who look to Him in the hour of distress even as to outward things. A recent declaration, "This poor man cried to the Lord and he heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles," is applicable to many in the present day. Not long since, at a meeting in New York, a man arose and said:—

"Yesterday forenoon a man came to my house and paid me forty dollars in bills, which I took and put in my pocket instead of in the drawer. When I was making up my account and deposit in the bank in the afternoon, I put the hand into my pocket to take those bills along with the other deposits, but something suggested to my mind to leave those bills in my pocket, and I did so, without thinking of any good reason why I should do so. This morning, on my way to my store, I came past the store of a friend, and an impulse seized me on the instant to go in and see him. I went in and met him in his front store, and without any knowledge on my part that he wanted money, I said to him, 'George, would you like to borrow forty dollars this morning?' Said he, 'Come into the counting room, I have something to say to you?' We went in there, and my friend continued: 'Yesterday, in looking over my bills payable, I found I had a note coming due to-day for one hundred and fifty dollars. I went home and told my wife that I could not raise that sum, and between us we raised one hundred and ten dollars, but where to get another dollar we did not know. So we both knelt down and earnestly prayed that God would in his own way send help to avert the impending calamity; and we prayed again this morning for the needed deliverance. I came to my store trusting in God, and I had no sooner got here than you came in and volunteered to lend me the exact sum I needed. Why, to my mind, this is an absolute demonstration that God not only hears, but answers, prayer. To his name be all the glory.'"

On another occasion the following incident was related:—

"A friend in business in this city told me a few days ago of an answer to prayer in his own case. Said he: 'I had certain bills to meet, and tried every resource I had, but could not get the money. As the time approached, and my ability to meet my obligations seemed out of the question, I went to God with my troubles, and poured out my soul in earnest prayer to Him to send me help. The morning of the day when my obligation became due arrived, but the help had not come. I went to my store, and soon after a gentleman came in whom I had known for some years, but not intimately. He greeted me kindly, and then asked after my business, and if I had plenty of funds, &c. I frankly told him the truth, and that I was quite short of funds for that day. He asked me how much I needed, and I told him. Without another word he drew a blank check from his pocket and filled it out for the sum I had named, and handed it to me, saying I could repay it when I became easy again.'"

In the latter part of last century a Friend belonging to Wilmington Monthly Meeting, Delaware, was appointed on a committee set apart to pay a religious visit to its families. In reference to this he has left the following memorandum:—

"I believe it right to mention a circumstance that occurred some days before we set out on this family visit, and which brought me into deep concern, so that I thought I could not go. Being called upon for a sum of money very unexpectedly, I knew not where to obtain it, (although I made many efforts,) and to take it out of our small stock, would prevent us from going on with our business to much purpose. While I was under great concern and anxiety about it, a stranger who was not a member, spoke to me at the close of our meeting on this wise; 'I want you to come to my house in the morning about ten o'clock.' I accordingly went, when he said to me, 'I have a sum of money which I have a mind you should have on loan, and that without interest.' I was filled with admiration and gratitude, and could but look upon this as a providential act of favor to me. Surely I have cause reverently to bow before God; his continued care and kindness toward me are great. He casts up a way, even marvelously so, where no way appeared. Surely there is no occasion to distrust his all-sufficiency; for He will not leave nor forsake those that put their trust in Him. My mind being thus relieved, I felt perfect liberty to proceed on the visit."

The Christian must be prepared to sacrifice all his worldly prospects for the sake of peace of mind and the favor of his Creator; and be willing to give up even life itself if the sacrifice is called for; knowing assuredly that the joys of Heaven will abundantly compensate for all the trials he may meet with here. Yet the Lord is often pleased to open the way before his faithful children even in worldly matters, to their comfort and rejoicing. At a meeting in England, a physician named Bernards, related the following incident as an illustration of the effect of religion:—

"A costermonger, who used to sell shrimps and periwinkles and whatever was in season, came to me and brought his three tin measures, and said: 'I can't sell any more with these.' Then he showed how each of them had a false bottom, so as not to hold more than half a measure. He said: 'I don't know what to do. I can't use these; and I can't make a living by giving honest measure.' I thought it over, and said to him, 'Put up this card: "I have got religion, and I give honest measure; but I charge more for it." So he did. For a few days, it went very hard; but presently the women found out that it was better to buy of him and get honest measure; and now he has a cart and a little shop of his own, and is doing very well."

A laborer, who believed it wrong for him to work on the First-day of the week, was told by his employer on a Seventh-day evening, when he received his week's wages, that he must be on hand the next morning to push forward some machinery that was to be sent to South America by a given time. He replied that he could not conscientiously work on that day. What followed is narrated in his own language, as published in the Christian Advocate of New York:—

"That is nothing to me," said my employer. "You may stick to your principles, but my work must be done, and if you cannot do it I do not need your services any longer." "But, Mr. —, have I ever disobliged you before? and have not I done your work well?" "That is nothing here nor there," he replied, "you need not come back again."

This blow came upon me in the dullest season of the year, and my wife and children were sick; the shops were everywhere discharging their men. But I went out, and for eleven days diligently sought for work. On the evening of the last day, while crossing the ferry, I lifted my heart to God in prayer, saying, "Now, Lord, I have done all I can; thou hast promised that my bread should be given to me, and that my water should be sure." I went home and told my wife. The next morning came. After working-hours began who should enter my home but my old employer, asking if I had any work yet. I answered, "No. But I do not suppose you want me?" "Well," said he, "I think you were very stiff in your opinions, but I want you to take up that job where you left it." "But you know I cannot work on Sundays. I will work until mid-night on Saturdays, but then

I must stop." "Well," he replied, "say nothing about that." I went to work, and discovered that he had placed a man in my position who had damaged the work, and set it back two full weeks. He was a drunkard and wholly unreliable. Five years have passed since then, but I have not been called upon to work on Sundays, and have had constant employment."

"The Lord our God is a Sun and Shield." Therefore "no weapon formed against us can prosper." The men of this world may "frame mischief against us by law; and Satan and all his hosts may exult;" "yet is God with us—and the weakest saint with God is mightier than they all."

Oh! how secure is that one who hath opened the door of his heart to the Master's knock, and admitted Him as his friend and abiding companion. Love with its heavenly fervor will cheer him—while a God-given faith, as a flaming torch, will enlighten his pathway. The angels themselves will become his companions—"all heaven is truly with him"—because God himself is with him.

"I Was Going To."—Children are very fond of saying, "I was going to." The boy lets the rats catch his chickens. He was going to fill up the hole with glass, and to set traps for the rats; but he did not do it in time, and the chickens were eaten. He consoles himself for the loss and excuses his carelessness by saying, "I was going to attend to that." A horse falls through a broken plank in the stable and breaks his leg, and is killed to put him out of his suffering. The owner was going to fix that weak plank, and so excuses himself. A boy wets his feet and sits for hours without changing his shoes, catches a severe cold, and is obliged to have the doctor for a week. His mother told him to change his wet shoes when he came in, and he was going to do it, but did not. A girl tears her new dress so badly that all her mending can not make it look well again. There was a little rent before, and she was to mend it, but she forgot. And so we might go on giving instance after instance, such as happens in every home with almost every man and woman, boy and girl. "Procrastination is" not only "the thief of time," but it is the worker of vast mischiefs. If "I-was-going-to" lives in your house, just give him warning to leave. He is a lounge and a nuisance. He never did any good. He has wrought unnumbered mischiefs. The girl or boy who begins to live with him will have a very unhappy time of it, and life will not be successful. Put "I-was-going-to" out of your house, and keep him out. Always do things which you are going to do.—Youth's World.

That common apprehension,—that they may be children of God while in a state of disobedience to his holy commandments; and disciples of Jesus, though they revolt from his cross; and members of his true Church, which is without spot or wrinkle, notwithstanding their lives are full of spots and wrinkles; is, of all other deceptions upon themselves, the most pernicious to their eternal condition.—Wm. Penn.

Extracts from a letter of our late dear friend, James Emlen:—may it be a word in season for all those of the class alluded to.

"It is very cheering to find some among the young people who, having tasted for themselves the preciousness of the truth, seem willing to trust it, and to hold on to it amid all our shakings, not stumbling at the stumbling blocks that are in the way, nor disposed to risk the loss of what they have and have known, for any new, untried and uncertain path. How often do we feel sensible that the truth changeth not, but is still the same that 'was and is and is to come.'—may nothing be permitted to shake our steadfastness.

3rd mo. 2nd, 1859."

Can Christ be thy Lord and thou not obey Him? Canst thou be his servant, and never serve Him? Be not deceived, such as thou sowest, shalt thou reap. He is none of thy Saviour whilst thou rejectest his grace in thy heart, by which He should save thee. Come, what has He saved thee from? Has He saved thee from thy sinful lusts? thy worldly affections, and vain conversations? If not, then He is none of thy Saviour. For though He be offered a Saviour to all, yet He is actually a Saviour to those only, that are saved by Him; and none are saved by Him, that live in those evils, by which they are lost from God, and which He came to save them from.—Wm. Penn.

I rejoice to see my children delight in the company of the worthy and the good: it is a sign that the dispositions and inclinations of the inward man are rightly modelled and turned! Such intimacies add strength to strength, they are safe, they are salutary, they are honorable; but a confederacy with the raw, the irreligious, those who are in the spirit of the world, and enemies to the cross of Christ, manifests unsoundness in the spiritual constitution, by the vitiated taste of desiring and relishing food that is not fresh, plain, and wholesome! Tis dangerous, and destructive to the tender precious life.—Richard Shackleton.

Presbyterian Confession of Faith.—This ancient document, it is now proposed by some of the Presbyterians to revise. If this is done, it is probable the strong expression of Calvinistic doctrine will be somewhat softened. It is said that the majority of the younger men now being introduced into the Presbyterian ministry do not fully hold the views designed to be set forth in it. At a late meeting of the London Presbytery, Oswald Dykes stated that he did not believe it. The Presbytery adopted the following overture:—

"Whereas, The Westminster Confession of Faith, while held in high and deserved honor in this Church as setting forth the system of doctrine which this Church with unabated firmness teaches and maintains, is found to be no longer so well suited in form and expression as it was in former times to the actual conditions and wants of the Church, it is hereby humbly overtured by the Presbytery of London to the Synod indicted to meet on the 30th of the present month, to take the relation of the Church to this subordinate Standard into careful consideration, with a view such prudent and timely action as to its vdom may seem meet."

Dr. Chambers, Principal of the College, Monro Gibson, and other members of Presbytery supported this overture, and was finally carried, though twenty-one members voted against sending any overture the subject up to the Synod.

Waldensian Missionary in Italy.—From report of one of these Missionaries for Thmo. last, the following incident is taken:—

"Giovanni Besso embraced the Gospel five years ago. His friends did all in their power to induce him to give up his new religious convictions, and at last drove him from his home. Giovanni went to Cantoncello, in the Val Brosso, and supported himself by his labor. He married, and led his wife and her relatives to abandon their Romish superstitions; and his influence is so much felt in the neighborhood that when the evangelist from Trause visits the locality he is sure to find a numerous and attentive audience. At the beginning of the year Besso heard that his mother was seriously ill; he immediately set out to visit her, not without anxiety as to the reception he might meet with. To his great consolation, his mother welcomed him with affection, without referring to the past. One evening, when they were together, she took his hand and said:

'You love your mother, do you not?'

'More than I can tell.'

'I am dying; promise me that you will do what I ask; and before you answer me, this of it as the last request of your dying mother.' 'Mother, I will do all that is in my power for you; what is it?'

'No, I do not want a conditional promise. assure me that you will do what I ask.'

'I can only repeat that I will do all in my power.'

'Very well; to-morrow morning I will tell you what I expect from you.'

The next morning the mother renewed her conversation in these terms:

'The priest is coming in an hour to give me the communion; I ask you, as a last favor, to recite the prayers with me.'

Poor Besso was cut to the heart.

'O, my mother you know that I cannot do that.'

'Then go away, and do not appear before me again,' and she turned her face to the wall.

'Mother, mother!' exclaimed the son, in anguish, 'ask for all that I have; ask for my blood, and you shall have it, but do not ask me to deny my Saviour, in offering to continue the worship that belongs only to him.'

'Go; you are no longer my son.'

Full of grief, Besso left the house, and wandered about, finding comfort only with Him who could deliver him from this trial. Toward evening he felt impelled to return to the house; and venturing with much hesitation to enter the room, his mother held out her hand to him saying:

'Be my son; I will respect your convictions, and you will respect mine, and stay with me and close my eyes.'—Chr. Adv.

A Temperance Town.—The town of Pullman, a suburb of Chicago, of ten thousand inhabitants, built and owned by the Pullman Car Co. has no saloons. An anti-prohibition paper in Chicago thus describes this abode of workers: "Their homes are large, roomy and clean; their furniture and carpets new a ful; the air they breathe is pure, from all and physical standpoints; there is absolutely no drunkenness; their children are fed, well clothed and healthy; the men and their wives are well dressed and seem contented. They have no police, jail, widow, and no saloon-keeper to cheat children of their food, clothing and education. Can this be said of the homes of the kingmen in any city of saloons on the earth?—Christian Evangelist.

Ant's Relics.—The Pope has ordered all in the Roman Catholic Church to send to Rome the bones and ashes of saints and martyrs purporting to have been taken from ancient tombs, especially such as have been received since 1874. The records, bills, and other particulars are to be sent to authenticate their genuineness.

Loon, or Great Northern Diver.—While on Lake George last summer, I observed an interesting trait in the loon.

On turning one evening to our camp, we only reached an open space, where immediately ahead, I observed a family of loons sporting themselves in the water; they had recently sighted us first, and for a short time appeared to be discussing the situation, but to resolve was quickly made and speedily acted. My companion had followed a question to measure our paddles with theirs, though we knew that to pursue them in a was hopeless, and expected they would make off in the usual manner. Their eyes were, however, somewhat different on occasion, as they had their young to look for.

When we were well on their track all disappeared simultaneously, and shortly after another loon came up with her young in the middle of the lake, and began sculling slowly to the opposite shore; but wholly to surprise, paterfamilias rose to the surface in his former position, and there awaited approach.

On the impulse of the moment, I sent a few rods after him when about a dozen rods off, fortunately they only ruffled the water where he had disappeared, and in a moment was up again uninjured. Instead of reacting at this signal, as might have been expected, he rather assumed the offensive, and dared to challenge assault by coming nearer occasionally giving an ironical laugh.

He continued about our boat, sometimes in our reach, for several minutes, diving periodically and immediately returning to surface. Whenever he balked us successfully, he celebrated the event by uttering a familiar sort of howl.

He was evidently sacrificing himself for the safety of his young and mate, as he must be known, if his ruse worked, it would be extreme personal risks.

He two young presented an interesting sight, swimming side by side in front of the bird, and probably also at her direction. It was somewhat singular, we did not get a glimpse of them after they first disappeared, all they well over to the opposite side. When well out of harm's way there was a loud and long was the laughter of the whole family.

His strong instinct, which prompts a bird to preserve its offspring at all hazards to itself, is always admirable.—F. H. Hendrick, in Scientific American.

Foot Disease of India.—The foot disease of India is now well known to be due to attacks of a fungus much like the common bread mould. The spores of this fungus, which is very common in India, find a resting place on the skin of the human foot. They there grow deep into the flesh until this and the bones become a diseased mass, full of canals and round cavities. Even the bone is filled with round holes where the fungus flourishes until nothing but amputation above the ankle can save the sufferer's life.

An Artificial Aurora Borealis.—Laboratory experiments have frequently been resorted to to produce the aurora in miniature, and the resemblance to the original has been extremely close, but an artificial aurora on a large scale and with no electrical machinery has lately been effected by Prof. Lemstroem. He selected a station just within the Arctic circle, in North Finland, where there were two mountains close together and having altitudes of 2,600 and 3,600 feet. In accordance with the well known fact that electricity gathers upon points, two hills having clearly defined conical summits were selected.

He believed that aurora was the result of an endeavor on the part of certain forces to establish an equilibrium, and assumed that electricity was passing from one hill top to the other. Reasoning that if by any means this interchange could be hastened the effect would become visible, the summits were connected with their bases by a network of copper to serve as a conductor. Immediately an arch of the aurora appeared, estimated to be at least 360 feet above the top. An examination of the currents produced in the wires showed them to be positive. The spectroscope clearly revealed the well known lines of the aurora. Although the display was only of short duration, there could be no doubt of its genuineness or of the success of the experiment.

Dynamite Explosions.—A very reassuring letter on the subject of nitro-glycerine and dynamite appears in the London Times from the manager of Nobel's Explosives Company. The writer points out that the popular belief as to the destructive qualities of these explosives is a great delusion. The effect of explosions of nitro-glycerine is intensely local—"the power exerted on surrounding objects is in the inverse ratio of the cube of the distance from the point of the explosion." Hence, if a ton of nitro-glycerine were fired in the middle of the Strand, it would wreck the houses immediately opposite, but its effect would be strictly confined to a very small area. At a distance of 60 yards bystanders would not be injured, except by falling glass, and the explosion, instead of destroying all London, would hardly be heard over the metropolitan area. The scare, therefore, as to the possibility of blowing up any of our great cities is entirely baseless. Dynamitards, even with tons of nitro-glycerine at their disposal, "cannot lay a whole city in ruins—not even a street. They may injure special buildings, but that is the most they can do."

Swallows.—A writer in Science Gossip relates the following anecdote:

"I saw a hare running across a large park by the wayside, and was looking about to see what had started it, but could not imagine what it could be, as neither man nor dog was in sight. It started again (for it had stopped and sat in a listening attitude), and then I saw that the disturbers were a flight of swallows, who were following it up like a pack of hounds; now one and now another skimming past the hare's ears along the ground, while the poor timid creature was putting its best leg foremost; but all to no purpose, for its relentless tormenters seemed to take pleasure in its fright, and to enjoy the sport of teasing it."

"I will close my epistle with an anecdote related by Philip Skelton, as having come under his own observation.

"I have entertained a great affection and some degree of esteem for swallows, ever since I saw a remarkable instance of their sense and humor played off upon a cat which had, upon a very fine day, rested itself upon the top of a gate-post, as if in contemplation; when ten or a dozen swallows, knowing her to be an enemy, took it into their heads to tantalize her. One of these birds coming from behind her, flew close by her ear, and she made a snap at it with her paw, but it was too late. Another swallow, in five or six seconds, did the same, and she made the same unsuccessful attempt to catch it; this was followed by a third, and so on to the number just mentioned. The whole number, following one another at the distance of about three yards, formed a regular circle in the air, and played it off like a wheel at her ears for near an hour, not seemingly at all alarmed at me, who stood within six or seven yards of the post. I enjoyed this sport as well as the pretty birds, till the cat, tired out with disappointment, quitted the gate post."

THE FRIEND.

FIFTH MONTH 26, 1883.

In The Gospel Expositor for "May 11th," the Editor, Dougan Clark, refers to a report which had been circulated, "that he was hired as a minister at a stated salary;" and makes the following statement: "We never, so far as we know, have received a single dollar as a compensation for preaching the gospel. We have, however, no doubt, received small sums of money, at different times, which we should not have received if we had not been a minister. We are, at this time, receiving, not by a fixed contract, but by mutual understanding, from Friends in Cleveland, a little—and but little more than our necessary expenses—and this, not as pay for preaching—but to keep soul and body together while we are preaching."

He adds, as an expression of his views on the subject, in connection with some further remarks: "When an individual who is called of the Lord to the ministry, feels it right to abide for a length of time at one place, we see not the least objection to his receiving from those among whom he labors, a sufficient support; and this may be just as properly furnished in the way of a fixed salary or a stipulated sum, as in any other way."

In the former history of our Society there are many cases recorded in which ministers among us felt it a duty to move their place of abode and reside for a longer or shorter time in a neighborhood towards which their minds were drawn. But in such instances they were expected to enter into business for their own support, as their circumstances might require; and not to regard their position as ministers as exempting them from their proper share of the ordinary duties and struggles of life. The ministry which they had received as a Divine gift from the Head of the Church, they were concerned to exercise freely, as He required them. They felt no necessity to spend the intervening time in preparing themselves for meetings, by studying out sermons which were to be delivered on those occasions; but went to the place of worship willing to speak or be silent, as the Lord might direct.

The "mutual understanding" between Douglass Clark and the "Friends in Cleveland," by which his necessary expenses are to be paid, "while we are preaching," seems to us to involve in both parties a rejection or want of appreciation of the principles of Friends as to worship and ministry. It implies, that the members of the meeting feel they must have regular vocal services, and are unwilling to undergo the spiritual exercise of restraining the wandering thoughts and drawing near to the Lord in a silent travail of soul; and it also implies, that the preacher will so prepare himself that he can meet this demand of the people, and speak when they are assembled.

This is the position taken by most other Protestant denominations; and the payment of the preacher is almost a necessary consequence. Our objection is primarily to the departure from the views of Friends, as to the spiritual nature of true worship, which is involved in this arrangement. Nor do we see any difference, except in matters of detail, between this "mutual understanding," and that "hiring ministry" against which our Society has testified for many generations.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President has appointed Walter Evans, of Louisville, to be Commissioner of Internal Revenue. He is a lawyer by profession, and well-known in the politics of Kentucky. In 1879 he was the Republican candidate for Governor of that State, and in 1880 was a delegate to the Chicago Convention.

By order of Secretary Teller, twenty-seven Ute Indian children from the Southern Ute Reservation, in Colorado, have been sent to the Indian School at Albuquerque, New Mexico. This is looked upon as an important step towards Indian civilization, as heretofore the Ute Indians have protested against sending their children to school.

The steamer Silesia arrived at New York last week from Naples, with 1118 Italian passengers.

On the 15th instant, a dead-lock was caused in the Illinois House of Representatives by the opponents of high license. On the next day morning enough friends of high license rallied to break the dead-lock long enough to pass an amendment fixing beer licenses at $250 and whisky licenses at $500.

The Prohibition Amendment to the State Constitution was defeated in the Senate at Harrisburg on the 18th, for want of a constitutional majority.

The first week of free canals in New York—5th mo. 7th to 14th—shows a clearance of 216,109 tons, against 147,104 tons for the corresponding week of last year.

The Tennessee Legislature recently created a railway commission. The act by which the office was instituted provides that all of the railways in that State shall furnish free transportation to the commissioners. As a personal courtesy the several railroads have given annual passes to the three commissioners, but the officers of the various companies decline to acknowledge the right of the Legislature to dictate as to who shall ride free over their lines.

The Secretary of the State Board of Agriculture of Kansas reports that the farmers of that State hold over 5,000,000 bushels of old wheat and over 37,000,000 of old corn.

A tornado passed south of Indianapolis on the night of the 14th inst., doing much damage to property. At Southport several dwellings were wrecked and two meeting-houses were demolished. Hailstones of unusual size fell at Mound City, Illinois, on the same night, and much glass was smashed. Some of the stones measured 9 inches in circumference and weighed 6½ ounces. A terrific thunder storm visited Jamaica, Long Island, and its vicinity, the same night. A house was almost entirely demolished by lightning, which split it in two and tore the roof to pieces, some of which were afterwards found at a distance of five hundred yards. The owner and her daughter were in bed, but escaped with a severe shock, from which they were recovering at last accounts. Heavy hail storms prevailed the next day in Prince Edward county, Virginia, and also at Nottoway Court House and other points along the Norfolk and Western Railroad in that State. Vegetation was damaged and telegraph poles were levelled.

A special despatch from Ferrell, Texas, says a terrific hail storm occurred there on the 14th. "Some of the stones penetrated roofs. One of the stones was brought to town two hours after the storm, and it weighed half a pound."

The tornado in Racine, Wisconsin, at one o'clock on the morning of the 19th, is now known to have destroyed 150 houses and caused a loss of about 16 lives. Brick as well as frame buildings were levelled in its path. It is the first storm of the kind in the history of Racine. Despatches from various portions of Illinois visited by the tornado of Sixth-day night, estimate the number of persons killed in fourteen counties at 61 to 63.

A primeval red-wood forest has been discovered in San Luis Obispo county, Cal., near the head waters of the Rio Sisquoe. Also a magnificent waterfall, where the waters of the Sisquoe pour over a precipice six or seven hundred feet in height.

Many prominent citizens of Auburn, N. Y., have signed a petition in favor of the nomination of three women to the office of Commissioner of Schools in place of three men whose terms are about to expire.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 344, which was 10 less than during the previous week, and 14 less than during the corresponding period last year. Of the above 190 were males, and 154 females: 43 died of consumption; 35 of pneumonia; 18 of convulsions; 13 of diphtheria; 12 of marasmus; 10 of old age, and 10 of bronchitis.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 103¾; 3½'s, 103¾; 4½'s, registered, 112¼; coupon, 113¾; 4's, 119¾; currency 6's, 129 a 132.

Cotton.—There was no material change to notice in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported at 11½ a 11¾ cts. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7¾ a 7½ cts. for export, and 8¾ a 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour continues dull, but prices were weak. Sales of 1700 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.50 a $6; Pennsylvania family at $5; western do. at $5.25 a $6, and patents at $6 a $7.50. Rye flour is firm at $3.87½ a $4.

Grain.—Wheat is quiet but firmer. Sales of 4200 bushels red, in car lots, at $1.15 a $1.25. Rye is firm at 70 a 73 cts. Corn is in good request and stronger. Sales of 10,000 bushels in car lots, at 60 a 68 cts. Oats are dull but steady. Sales of 9000 bushels, in car lots, at 47 a 54 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 5th mo. 19th, 1883.—Loads of hay, 318; loads of straw, 62. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 95 cts. to $1.05 per 100 pounds; mixed, 85 a 95 cts.; straw, 60 a 70 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in fair demand, and prices were a fraction higher: 2500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5¼ a 7½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

Sheep were in demand at an advance: 10,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 6½ cts. for clipped, and spring lambs at 6½ a 11 cts. per lb., as to quality.

Hogs were dull and rather lower: 5000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 10 a 10½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

FOREIGN.—The trial of Fitzharris, the cab-driver, as an accessory after the fact to the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Burke, was concluded on the 16th inst. The jury returned a verdict of guilty against him, and he was sentenced to penal servitude for life. On the 17th, James Mullett, Edward O'Brien, Edward McCaffrey, Daniel Delaney, William Moroney and Thomas Doyle, all of whom had pleaded guilty to the charge of conspiracy to murder, were arraigned in court for sentence. The first five mentioned were each sentenced to ten years' penal servitude, and Doyle to five years' penal servitude. The crown decided to drop the criminal charge against McCaffrey of having participated in the murder of Burke.

The Paris Gaulois says that at a meeting of the Suez Canal Company, to be held on 6th mo. 4th, a proposal will be made to construct a canal parallel with existing one, at a cost of 125,000,000 francs.

Figaro publishes a letter from Count de Lesseps asking that the Suez Canal Company propose to cut a second canal across the isthmus.

A small force of French troops have landed at Novorossiysk, on the African coast, and taken possession in name of the Government.

Berlin, 5th mo. 21st.—The village of Neuen Kirmse was totally destroyed by fire to-day. Even the trees and the "wooden crosses in the churchyard" were burned. The entire population, numbering 1300, rendered homeless.

The Pope, in his circular to the Irish Bishops, said: "Whatever Parnell's object may be, his followers have not adopted a course openly against the rules of the Church. Pope's letter to Cardinal McCabe and the instructions sent to the bishops, which were accepted at their meeting in Dublin. While it is lawful for the Irish to seek redress for their grievances and to strive for their rights, they should, at the same time, seek God's justice and remember the wickedness of illegal means in attaining even a just cause. It is the duty of the clergy to curb the excited feelings of the people, and to bring about justice and moderation. The clergy are not permitted to depart from these rules and join and promote movements inconsistent with them. Collections to relieve distress are permitted, but subscriptions to inflame popular passions are condemned. The clergy must hold a just balance when it is plain that by such movements hatred and dissension are aroused or distinguished persons insulted and when crimes and murders go uncensured, and when patriotism is measured by the amount subscribed, the people are thereby intimidated. Therefore Parnell's fund is disapproved, and no clergyman should recommend subscriptions thereto or promote it."

The emperor and empress of Russia have given a reception to the foreign embassies which have arrived at Moscow to attend the coronation. The weather is fine. The city presents a brilliant and picturesque scene. Many delegates have arrived from countries of Asia. The windows from which a view may be had of the principal ceremony on the day of the coronation are being rented at prices ranging from 100 to 1000 roubles each. The police require the persons hired to give satisfactory evidence as to their character and will permit no one to occupy a window on the day of the coronation until proof has been furnished that he has no suspicious articles on his person. They have even forbid the carrying of oranges into buildings from which a view may be obtained, as they fear such articles containing dynamite and intended for use in bombs may get into the houses and be used against the Czar.

It is announced that the Peking Government has decided to establish a Chinese Consulate in Chicago, for the protection of its subjects in that city, about 700 in number. The consulate will consist of two members, one Chinese, the other American.

Twenty-two deaths from yellow fever were reported in Havana last week.

A Temperance meeting will be held by the Temperance Association of Friends, in the Meeting-house, Coulter St., Germantown, on Fifth-day, 5th month, at 8 P. M.

Friends are cordially invited.

"Philada., 12th mo. 4th, 1826.

My dear friend. * * * * I rejoice to find my mind more and more impressed with the great responsibility, which attaches to the position of a minister of the gospel; and although as regards myself, I can of course say but little to say, yet I have sometimes thought I could feel somewhat of the weight of obligation which rests upon those who are called upon to speak in the name of the Lord; as thou hast mentioned the perplexity, doubts, and fears, into which thou hast often brought, it brings to my own remembrance many past seasons of deep exertion of mind wherein I have had to exclaim: How long wilt thou forget me, O Lord? for how long wilt thou hide thy face from me? And I remember, too, in the days of early visitation, some feelings which arrested my mind in regard to the proper qualification for the office of a minister of Christ. It occurred was, that as it was necessary under the Mosaic dispensation that the ministers of the sanctuary should be purified, before entering upon the exercise of their functions, so it is abundantly necessary under the present higher or more glorified spiritual dispensation, the ministers of the Lord should be sanctified, inwardly, by washing of regeneration, and by being engaged time after time into deep and heart-renewing baptism. Let us then consider times of darkness and desertion as the chastisements of a kind Father, who would try and purify our faith, and qualify us to partake of the joys of his love; and let us remember, too, that if we suffer not his chastenings, then are we not his sons and not sons.' For my own part, I have often had occasion of latter time, to look back of the two lines in thy favorite hymn:

'Far more the treacherous calm I dread,
Than tempests bursting on my head.'

And the Lord knows best what is good for us and if we can but feel more and more like vessels in the hands of the heavenly Potter, patiently resigned to be any thing or nothing as may be his will, we shall feel the reward of peace flowing as a river, and our righteousness as the waves of the sea.

I copy for thy perusal the following from an Indian sermon, of which I was speaking a little before thou left us. There is something so simple and so excellent in it, that I think it must warm the heart and excite the admiration of all those who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. Among the converts to the Christian faith in one of our Indian tribes was one whom they distinguished by the title of 'Good Peter;' and who with a truly apostolic spirit, used to preach the gospel to his poor, benighted brethren. He one day addressed them in language to this effect: 'My brothers, the Great Spirit loves all his creatures. He loved them so much, that He sent his own Son to bring them home to Him. But his Son was so bright—brighter my brothers than yonder sun—we could not look at him. Therefore He wrapped himself in a mantle of flesh (wrapping his blanket around him) that He might live with us, and that we might see Him. The good Saviour has showed us the way to his Father, and lest we should lose the path, He has marked it with his blood.'

My friend asks what interests me? and judges rightly when he supposes that the one great and good cause lies very near my heart. And although I at times feel unworthy to be counted among those who can feel rightly for the defections that exist among us as a religious Society, yet the consideration of the darkness, and wickedness, and infidelity, which surround us, often presses upon me with a sense of the awfulness of Divine retribution; for the Lord will visit for these things. When I look around among those who are young, my companions in age, and consider the example they have before them, the prospect is truly moving, and the complaint of the prophet well applies: 'The tongue of the sucking child cleaves to the roof of its mouth for thirst.' But I sometimes, nevertheless, feel animated with hopes of better days; and that Zion will arise and put on her beautiful garments, and that there may not be occasion for others any more to say, that that Society which has always so dwelt in peace, should now be in the midst of contention and strife.* But in the midst of all, I believe that a remnant has been preserved; and that, although a poor and afflicted people, yet having placed their 'trust in the name of the Lord,' they can still look up to Him with confidence and faith, in the full persuasion that in his own good time He will command deliverance for his oppressed seed. Truly, may it be said, 'Except the Lord of hosts had left us a very small remnant, we should have been as Sodom, and we should have been like unto Gomorrah.' But my prayer is, that the Lord would raise up instruments to proclaim his great and excellent name; and that by the powerful operations of his love, he would gather children to himself—sons from afar and daughters from the ends of the earth.

* * * My heart seems to flow towards thee, my dear friend, with a measure of that love which knows no limit; and in the feeling of it, 'I commend thee to God and to the word of his grace, which is able to build thee up, and to give thee an inheritance among all them that are sanctified.' Farewell.

"Philada., 2d mo. 16th, 1827.

I am well aware, as thou hast remarked, that there is no standing still in the exercise of Christian duty; and it abundantly bespeaks the necessity there is for a steady, persevering endeavor by constant prayer and diligent watchfulness to be found advancing forward. Although there may be seasons in which we may seem to stand still, or even to be losing ground, yet it is not for us to cease our earnest intercession, with our close examinations, that we may fully ascertain what the cause may be; for these are the times when the blessed Head of the Church communicates instruction of the most useful kind. Well for us if, upon such occasions, we are found humbly endeavoring in patience and faith steadily to keep our eyes fixed on the Rock of everlasting salvation; for oftentimes when we may least expect it, streams of heavenly consolation are found flowing from the Saviour's bosom. In connexion herewith, I have often thought there was a state of lowliness, of deep humility and simplicity, in which the glorious Lord would condescend to dwell more eminently with the soul, and in which there might be far more of heavenly enjoyment than is experienced by most in the present day. It is a state, I can truly say, that I long for; and when looking towards it, and considering my great distance from it, earnest petitions often arise that I may be enabled to press after it with redoubled vigor. But in consideration of what deep probation and entire renunciation of all self-pleasing, it calls for, I often fear it is an attainment to which I shall never arrive; nevertheless, having through unmerited mercy, been favored to see that 'The fear of the Lord is a fountain of life, to depart from the snares of death,' I am made willing, I trust, to count all things as dross that 'I may win Christ and be found in Him,' &c. * * * *

It is through unspeakable mercy, my dear —, that any of us have been preserved from joining in with the deceiver; let us then prize our privilege, and show by a consistent life and conversation, that we are truly and not merely nominally the followers of a crucified Redeemer. * * * We are advancing in life; and as in temporals so in spirituals, greater strength is gained by unity of heart and design; especially is this the case in the latter by a constant desire to provoke one another to love and to good works. Let us then con-time to love one another with a pure heart fervently; and possibly under the blessing of our common Redeemer, we may be made instrumental in building one another up in the blessed faith of the Gospel.

It is certainly a very glorious privilege to which poor frail man is admitted, to have intercourse with the high and lofty One who inhabiteth eternity, and whose name is Holy; which condescension claims from our hearts the utmost gratitude. But it is with those only He condescends to dwell, who are poor and of a contrite spirit, and who tremble at his word; for the proud He knoweth afar off. May we then, my dear —, ask in childlike simplicity from the mighty Helper, strength for the battle, and yield our hearts in the day of visitation a willing sacrifice at the footstool of mercy; for if we do this, He has promised to blot out as a cloud our transgressions, and as a thick cloud our sins."

The Ten Tribes.

[The following notice of some theories respecting the descendants of the Ten Tribes of Israel, have been sent to us by a correspondent, who judiciously applies to them the advice of Paul to Timothy, "Lay hands suddenly on no man;" and who thinks, it is the safest way to heed another admonition of the apostle, "Prove all things and hold fast to that which is good."

The subject is one of some interest, on which the readers of "The Friend" can form their own conclusions—but we feel like withholding our assent, until stronger evidence of the truth of the theories propounded is produced, than we have yet seen.—ED.]

Ever since the commencement of the Christian era, or about that time, the ten tribes of Israel have been thought to be a lost people, mixed up with the rest of mankind; although the Bible repeatedly mentions them as a distinct people who are to be known as such in the latter days, and are again to possess the land of their fathers (not as a whole but as representatives,—one of a city and two of a family,) (Jer. iii. 14), and repeatedly spoken of by the prophets as the house of Israel, and specially mentioned in many passages as a distinct people from the house of Judah, (Jer. iii. 18.) And now in these days of searching and researching, it is rather remarkable that so many of our learned men, both in England and America, have come to the conclusion that the lost ten tribes are now found in the Anglo-Saxon race, and try to prove it from the Bible-history and tradition.

Some tell us that the original of the word Saxon means Isaac's sons, and thus fulfils the saying of the Lord to Abraham (Gen. xxi. 12) for in Isaac shall thy seed be called; and also the blessings given to both of Joseph's sons by his inspired blind father was never realized by them in the land of Canaan, but are being realized to-day by the Anglo-Saxon race, and is especially noticeable in England and the United States. Putting the first for Ephraim, who has branched out in a multitude of nations: (See Gen. xlviii. 19; also xlix. 22;) and the second for Manasseh, who was also to be great: (Gen. xlviii. 19; Deut. xxxiii. 17;) and also they take this verse to apply to England, (Deut. xv. 6): "For the Lord thy God blesseth thee, as he promised thee: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow; and thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee."

And, again, they make it appear that the Israelites had neither voice nor hand in crucifying the Lord Jesus. This was done entirely by the Jews and Gentiles, as Israel was far removed at that time into other countries. And a mark was set on Judah which was not put on Israel. (Isaiah iii. 9.) And now in these last days the light of the Gospel shines out in a brightness from the Saxon race, so that in Israel's seed to-day all nations are being blessed.* And with these Scripture proofs they give us history and traditions.

It is shown from Bible-history that to the south-west of Canaan was joined the country of the Philistines; and Moses in directing the people before his death said, in Num. xxxiii. 55: "But if ye will not drive out the inhabitants of the land from before thee; then it shall come to pass, that those which ye let remain of them shall be pricks in your eyes, and thorns in your sides, and shall vex you in the land wherein ye dwell."

And now these antiquarians tell us that these Philistines or Phenicians were a seafaring people; as also was Dan, or that part of the tribe that had its possessions in the south of Canaan (Judges v. 17); and that both these peoples traded with Tarshish, in Spain, (said to be) and as tin is mentioned as some of the merchandise, and it was not known to have been found any where at that time but in England, they conclude that they also went there. As also the history of Ireland (aided by tradition) shows that it was settled by these two races—the Phenicians in the South and the Danites in the North—as they are yet to this day; whilst by the Danites, too, was the South and West of Scotland also peopled.

But there was a part of the tribe of Dan who were somewhat dissatisfied with their portion originally allotted them by Joshua, who emigrated to the north of Canaan, and conquered a new possession for themselves: (See Judges xviii.) Now these investigators tell us that these Danites had emigrated westward long before the other tribes were carried captive into Media; and they find that these northern Danites were never subjected to any other power. It was they who after long journeyings, eventually settled in Denmark and its boundaries, and became the dreaded mighty Norsemen. They appear to have always venerated their father, Dan, and kept his name in honorable remembrance by naming many places after him, from their first movement from the south of Palestine, to the north where they built a city and called it Dan, after the name of Dan their father: (See Judges xviii. 29.) After this we find the river Danube, and lastly Danmark in like manner named after their father, Dan; and in like manner these investigators have traced the other tribes who were carried by the king of Assyria into Media (2 Kings xvii. 6), until they conquered England for a possession,

* [Whatever force there may be in this allusion to the promise of the Almighty to Abraham—"In thee shall all families of the earth be blessed"—there can be no doubt that the prediction referred primarily to our Holy Redeemer, who as to the flesh was descended from Abraham. This is distinctly stated by Paul in his Epistle to the Galatians, 3d chapter, who affirms that Christ is the seed of Abraham.—ED.]

where they are to-day; and in them now being fully fulfilled all the promises made to Joseph's son, even to Ephraim.

Gather the Fragments.

In looking over an old note book, I find record of an incident related more than thirty years ago, by that worthy elder, Will. Walter, of Chester Co., Pa. When he was young man there were two ministers living in that section of country. One of these was a man of active and lively disposition, and sometimes neglected to keep a sufficient strict guard over the tendencies of his nature, and thus occasioned himself more trouble than he thought fell to the lot of his fellow minister. As they were sitting together one day, he remarked, that his spiritual journey would be much smoother and easier if he could have the even, sober temper of his companion. His friend reflected for a minute or two, and then asked the significant question: "Dost thou not think it is as hard for a calf to tread as a lion?" Thus calling attention to the dispensable necessity of knowing our own wills brought into subjection to the Divine will; a step from which human nature always shrinks, whatever may be our peculiar characteristics.

The humility which accompanies true religion is well illustrated by a memorandum made in the fall of 1852, respecting Mary Jefferis, who then resided at West Chester and was drawing towards the close of a lengthened life, which had been spent from her youth in the fear of the Lord, and during which she had been spiritually helpful to many. At that time a visit had been recently paid to the families of West Chester Preparative Meeting by Mary Kite.

Martha said, that in the morning before the visit was to be paid to her own house, she felt a desire that Mary might be faithful, and speak plainly what was given her to communicate. She did not wish to be deluded by any false peace; but if, after striving to do what was right from her youth up, she had lost ground, and was going backward in old age as to her spiritual condition, she was desirous to be plainly dealt with; for that might be a means of helping her out of such a declining state.

When Mary Kite did come, she had a message of that kind to deliver; but her communication was one of encouragement to the aged saint.

It was interesting and instructive to this dear friend, green in old age, thus led to try the foundation on which she stood, and prevented from relying on a long life of deception as a substitute for continued watchfulness and fresh supplies of spiritual food.

Quite in contrast with this, but instructive in its line, is a memorandum bearing the same date as the preceding, respecting a young woman, a member of our Society, who had deceased in that vicinity not long before.

Though pleasant in her social relations, she was gay and thoughtless. Her illness lasted not quite two weeks. She believed from the beginning that she should not recover, and was brought into deep exercise on her own account. She said that she was unprepared for death; and that, on looking back over her life, she could not remember one good thing.

What ever done. At one time she asked her parents, if they really thought her as she felt herself to be. To a minister friend, P. R., who visited her in her affliction, she said that the pain of body she suffered was great, but her mental suffering was far greater. Towards the close of her illness her mind became more quiet and comfortable; and having experienced her sins to be beforehand to judgment, there is reason to believe that her end was peace.

What a sad mistake it is to defer a preparation for eternity to a bed of death, when the body is under suffering and the mind distressed by pain!

Among those who attended the meetings of Friends at Fourth and Arch Sts., Philadelphia, who was subsequently received into membership in our Society, was a very worthy, elderly man named George Stites. Under the date of 11th mo. 4th, 1852, I find a memorandum respecting him, which says that he was formerly an active member among the Methodists. His residence was in the District of Kensington. Like many others of that profession, his time was much absorbed in religious preaching, attending class-meetings, prayer meetings, First-day schools, &c. But at a time, he became sensible that he was sustaining a loss for want of more inward reformation, for which his various engagements did not give a suitable opportunity—his own soul lacked spiritual nourishment. He believed it right for him to cease from that activity which he had before practised, and to spend more time in waiting on the Lord in silence.

Our holy Redeemer, when personally on earth, often retired alone for quiet meditation and communion with God; and on one occasion he told his disciples, "Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place and rest awhile."

"Gladly we catch the tender sound,
Which bids us come and rest awhile;
Come, breathe with me the desert air!
Come, breathe to God the secret prayer!
We come! we come!—the harass'd soul
Longs to escape this war of words,
The clouds of care which round us roll,
And rest with thee, thou Lord of lords!
And once again, the bark refit,
Ere we the quiet haven quit!"

On the Desert.

THE PENINSULA OF SINAI.

On the approach to Mt. Sinai, our traveller said:—

We were now to cross a rugged pass, which leads over into the broad valley or plain at the foot of Mount Sinai. It is called the Pass of the Winds, since it seems as if all the elements—not only winds, but floods and storms, and tempest in every form, with thunder and lightning—had been loose to work the wildest ruin and confusion. It is narrow and steep, and so piled with rocks that it is quite impassable for baggage-camels, which have to be sent round the other way, that is longer by some hours' march. Our camels had quite enough to do to carry us. Slowly and wearily did they struggle upward. As it was impossible for us to keep side by side, we straggled on one after the other, separate and silent. My spirits were such as might have been expected in a sick man, till after two or three hours we rose to the summit of the pass, when I heard behind me the voice of the dragoman shouting 'Jebel Mousa!' That cry cured me in an instant. If it did not drive away the fever, it made me forget it. Instantly the tears rushed into my eyes, and all personal feeling was lost in one overpowering thought: There was the Mount of Moses, the Mount of God! On that domed summit the Almighty had descended in fire to give His law to men."

The party found shelter in the convent of St. Catharine, situated at the base of the mountain—and afterwards ascended to the summit of Sinai. Here H. M. Field says, "I sent the guides away to a little distance, for there are moments when one must be alone to get the full force of sacred associations, and here where Moses talked with God, one feels that he is face to face with his Maker.

"Coming to such a height of vision, one feels as if he had come to a point in his own life, and a personal feeling mingles with that inspired by the scene, so that one flows into the other. As I looked down from the top of Sinai, I saw not only the deep passes winding away into the mountains, I saw the winding course of a lifetime that had at last brought me to this spot; and how could one who felt that he was but a pilgrim, tarrying not even for a night, but only for an hour, help breathing a prayer to Him who of old led His people across these deserts and through these mountains, that He would guide his wandering steps aright! And then somehow there came into my heart and to my lips the words of the Twenty-third Psalm, and standing there alone with uncovered head, I found myself repeating the blessed assurance, in the strength of which I shall go all my days: 'The Lord is my shepherd: I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: He leadeth me beside the still waters. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me.'

"The spell was broken by shouts down the mountain, and presently Dr. Post appeared with the other American party, and all together we studied the features of the mountain and the plain as related to each other. Looking over the edge of the cliff, we could see how perfectly it answered to the description of 'the mount that might be touched,' for the plain came up to its very base, and at the same time there were low-lying mounds at the foot, which seemed to mark where bounds had been set against too near an approach. As to the extent of open space, wide as it was, Dr. Post reported that the other peak which he had climbed commanded a view still wider; that, while it was in the very axis of the plain of Er Rahah, it took in also a wady on the other side, which furnished standing ground for perhaps half a million more. Hence he inclines to the opinion that this was the peak which Dr. Robinson ascended, as it answers more exactly to the description he has given. But after all, the question whether it was this or that, does not seem very important, for the whole group, is comprised under the general name of Sinai, and the Divine manifestation may have included them all. 'The mountain was altogether on a smoke,' and to the multitude that looked upward it may have seemed as if all were wrapped in the volume of dense, rolling cloud. Those who have witnessed an eruption of Vesuvius from the Bay of Naples, remember that at times great masses of smoke roll down the mountain side, and then clear away, and flames shoot up to a vast height, reddening the sky, while at the same time they are reflected in the faces of a multitude of spectators white with terror, as if the Dies Irae had come and the very heavens were on fire. If amid this scene, the grandest and most awful that Nature ever presents, a voice were heard issuing out of the cloud and rolling down the breast of the mountain, we might form some faint conception of the mingled majesty and terror of the sight when the Lord descended upon Sinai."

From Sinai they journeyed northward, passing over a plain which bounds the mountain region of Sinai, and scaled a mountain range of a thousand feet in height, and so steep that the cliffs look like the battlements of a walled city. This was the southern boundary of a "vast plateau or table-land, in outline not unlike one of the steppes of Asia. It is not however an unbroken plain, but crossed by mountain ranges, not so grand as those of the lower part of the Peninsula, but still of considerable height, between which are broad spaces of desert furrowed by water-courses. Scarcely had we left the edge of the cliff before we dropped down into one of the gullies by which this vast tract is seamed and scarred, and kept moving on from one to another, as we had traversed a succession of wadies in going to Sinai. Sometimes we rose on an elevation, from which we took in a more extensive view, and saw mountains in the distance. These smaller hollows worn by streams, like the affluents of a river, finally merge into the Wady el Arish (which we entered in the afternoon,) which is to the Desert of the Wandering what the Wady es Scheikh is among the mountains of granite and sandstone, and which bears the great name of the River of Egypt—a term which, as used in the Bible, does not designate the Nile, but this mighty wady, which keeps its course to the sea, coming out near Gaza, and forming the boundary between Egypt and Palestine."

Of course the chief interest of this desolate region is that it is none other than the Great and Terrible Wilderness, in which the Israelites passed all but three of their forty years of wandering. It has always been the tradition, that the march from Egypt to Sinai took about fifty days; and scholars reckon the time of the encampment in the region of Sinai at one year, lacking a few days; when the host of Israel moved northward, and crossing the sandy belt which we passed over yesterday, climbed into this great upland. When they entered it, they could not have intended to remain there, for Moses would not have chosen such a desolate region for a long encampment. They took it on the march to the land promised to their fathers, and advanced nearly through it, when they were driven back by the fierce tribes that inhabited the country. Thus repulsed, they withdrew and pitched their tents in the wilderness, moving from place to place, but never crossing its boundary for more than thirty-seven years, when they turned south to the head of the Gulf of Akaba, and passing round the mountains, came up through Moab, on the east side of the Dead Sea, to Nebo, where Moses died, and from which Joshua, shortly after, led the tribes across the Jordan."

"This long desert life of the Israelites raises the question, often suggested before, but never so pressing as now, as to the means of their subsistence. How could two millions and a half of people find bread in the wilderness to keep them alive for thirty-seven years? Leaving for the moment the question of the miraculous supply of food, the problem may perhaps be solved in part by considering both the mode of life of the Israelites and the greater fertility of the country at the time of the Exodus in comparison with what it is today. The children of Israel were not unaccustomed to the desert. The patriarchs lived on it before they went down into Egypt. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were 'dwellers in tabernacles,' that is, in tents. They were nomads as truly as the Bedaween of the present day. They lived by their flocks and herds, moving from place to place, wherever they could find pasturage. When Joseph's brethren stood before Pharaoh, and he asked them of their occupation, they said 'Thy servants are shepherds.' For that reason he appointed them their place of abode not in Memphis, the capital, nor in the other cities of Egypt, but in the land of Goshen, where they could follow their accustomed occupation. They lived in Goshen, as they had lived on the desert, with their flocks of sheep and herds of cattle; and so when they came to go up out of Egypt, it was the dictate of self-preservation to take their flocks and herds with them as their means of subsistence. For them to go out into the wilderness did not involve the same hardship as it would have been for the Egyptians, for they only went back to the mode of life of their fathers. They pitched their tents on the desert, and once more dwelt in tabernacles, as the patriarchs had done before them. The Exodus for them was simply going back to their old, wandering life.

"But how was subsistence found for their flocks and herds? This can only be explained by supposing that the vegetation was much more abundant then than now, of which there is ample proof. In the wadies which we passed through in going to Sinai, there were signs that at one period the mountains, if not covered with forests, yet had by no means the bare look which they now have; while the wadies, which are burnt and dry, may have been as green as the deep valleys that one finds nestled in the recesses of the Alps. All writers bear witness to the constant and suicidal practice which has been going on for centuries among the Arabs, of denuding the mountains, not only of trees but of brushwood, for their camp-fires and to burn for charcoal. This of course has caused the little mountain springs to dry up, and the vegetation to become more scanty. But still with all that man has done to destroy vegetation, there is enough in the wadies and on the hillsides to support flocks of goats; and as we advanced northward, we found large herds of camels spread over the hills. In the wilderness it is not probable that the Israelites were all in one camp. They may have been spread over a tract as large as an English county, in which were a hundred spots that could yield a temporary sustenance for their flocks and herds. But with all these alleviations of their lot, still the Israelites found this waste over which we are now passing, a Great and Terrible Wilderness. A country in which they could find no abiding place—where they were kept moving from one pasture ground to another, eating up the land before them, and leaving a desolate wilderness behind them; in constant danger, if left to themselves, of perishing by famine or by pestilence—was not a country through which millions of people could make their way unguided and alone. I repeat what I have said before, that the more I see of the desert the more the miracle of the Exodus grows upon me. How the Israelites lived through it, is a mystery which no resources of their own can explain, without the help of Him who was their Guide and Protector."

HOW THE WOMEN WENT FROM DOVER.*

The tossing spray of Cocheo's fall
Hardened to ice on its rocky wall,
As through Dover town, in the chill, gray dawn,
Three women passed, at the cart-tail drawn!

Bared to the waist, for the north wind's grip
And keener sting of the constable's whip,
The blood that followed each hissing blow
Froze, it sprinkled the winter snow.

Priest and ruler, boy and maid
Followed the dismal cavalcade;
And from door and window, open thrown,
Looked and wondered gaffer and crone.

"God is our witness," the victims cried,
"We suffer for Him, who for all men died;
The wrong ye do has been done before,
We bear the stripes that the Master bore!"

"And thou, O Richard Waldron, for whom
We hear the feet of a coming doom,
On thy cruel heart and thy hand of wrong
Vengeance is sure, though it tarry long.

"In the light of the Lord, a flame we see Climb and kindle a proud roof-tree;
And beneath it an old man lying dead,
With stains of blood on his hoary head."†

"Smite, Good-man, Hate-Evil!—harder still!"
The magistrate cried, "lay on with a will!
Drive out of their bodies the Father of Lies,
Who through them preaches and prophecies!"

So into the forest they held their way,
By winding river and frost-rimmed bay,
Over wind-swept hills that felt the beat
Of the winter sea at their icy feet.

The Indian hunter, searching his traps,
Peered stealthily through the forest gaps;
And the outlying settler shook his head,—
"They're witches going to jail," he said.

* The following is a copy of the warrant issued by Major Waldron, of Dover, in 1662.

To the constables of Dover, Hampton, Salisbury, Newbury, Rowley, Ipswich, Wenham, Lynn, Boston, Roxbury, Dedham, and until these vagabond Quakers are carried out of this jurisdiction.

You, and every one of you, are required, in King's Majesty's name, to take these vagabond Quakers, Anne Colman, Mary Tomkins, and Alice Ambrose, and make them fast to the cart's tail, and driving the cart through your several towns, to whip them upon their naked backs, not exceeding ten stripes a piece on each of them, in each town; and so to convey them from constable to constable, till they are out of this jurisdiction, as you will answer it at your peril; and this shall be your warrant.

RICHARD WALDRON.

Dated at Dover, December 22, 1662.

This warrant was executed only in Dover and Hampton. At Salisbury the constable refused to obey it. He was sustained by the town's people, who were under the influence of Major Robert Pike, the leading man in the lower valley of the Merrimac, who stood far in advance of his time, as an advocate of religious freedom, and an opponent of ecclesiastical authority. He had the moral courage to address an able and manly letter to the court at Salem, remonstrating against the witchcraft trials.

† Many years after, Major Waldron was killed by the Indians.

At last a meeting-house came in view;
A blast on his horn the constable blew;
And the boys of Hampton cried up and down,
"The Quakers have come!" to the wondering town.

From barn and wood-pile the good-man came;
The good-wife quitted her quilting frame,
With her child at her breast; and, hobbling slow
The grandam followed to see the show.

Once more the torturing whip was swung,
Once more keen lashes the bare flesh stung.
"Oh, spare! they are bleeding!" a little maid cried
And covered her face the sight to hide.

A murmur ran round the crowd: "Good folks,"
Quoth the constable, busy counting the strokes,
"No pity to wretches like these is due,
They have beaten the gospel black and blue!"

Then a pallid woman, in wild-eyed fear,
With her wooden noggin of milk drew near:
"Drink, poor hearts!" A rude hand smote
Her draught away from a parching throat.

"Take heed," one whispered, "they'll take your
For fines, as they took your horse and plow,
And the bed from under you." "Even so,"
She said. "They are cruel as death I know."

Then on they passed, in the waning day,
Through Seabrook woods, a weariful way;
By great salt meadows and sand-hills bare,
And glimpses of blue sea here and there.

By the meeting-house in Salisbury town,
The sufferers stood, in the red sundown,
Bare for the lash! O pitying Night,
Drop swift thy curtain and hide the sight!

With shame in his eye and wrath on his lip
The Salisbury constable dropped his whip.
"This warrant means murder foul and red;
Cursed is he who serves it," he said.

"Show me the order, and meanwhile strike
A blow at your peril!" said Justice Pike.
Of all the rulers the land possessed,
Wisest and boldest was he, and best.

He scoffed at witchcraft; the priest he met
As man meets man; his feet he set
Beyond his dark age, standing upright,
Soul-free, with his face to the morning light.

He read the warrant: "These convey
From our precincts; at every town on the way
Give each ten lashes." "God judge the brute!
I tread his order under my foot!"

"Cut loose those poor ones and let them go;
Come what will of it, all men shall know
No warrant is good, though backed by the Crown,
For whipping women in Salisbury town!"

The hearts of the villagers, half released
From creed of terror and rule of priest,
By a primal instinct owned the right
Of human pity in law's despite.

For ruth and chivalry only slept,
His Saxon manhood the yeoman kept;
Quicker or slower, the same blood ran
In the Cavalier and the Puritan.

The Quakers sank on their knees in praise
And thanks. A last, low sunset blaze
Flashed out from under a cloud, and shed
A golden glory on each bowed head.

The tale is one of an evil time,
When souls were fettered and thought was crime,
And heresy's whisper above its breath
Meant shameful scourging and bonds and death!

What marvel, that hunted and sorely tried,
Even women rebuked and propesied,
And soft words rarely answered back
The grim persuasion of whip and rack!

If her cry from the whipping-post and jail
Pierced sharp as the Kenite's driven nail,
O woman, at ease in these happier days,
Forbear to judge of thy sister's ways!

How much thy beautiful life may owe
To her faith and courage thou canst not know,
Nor how from the paths of thy calm retreat
She smoothed the thorns with her bleeding feet.

Incidents and Reflections.

MINISTRY.

The exercise of true Gospel ministry is in the ability which is received from the extension of Divine help; and without sensible evidence of that help, the true minister will not venture to enter upon this sacred work, however much he may have been favored in his communications at other times. Hence there are many such ministers who often pass the time of meetings for worship in a silent wrestling for the arising of a new life; or, it may be, in the enjoyment of the sense of the Lord's goodness and mercy. If this has often been the case with those who are travelling on the Gospel errand, when the Lord withholds his command, they do not speak to the people, lest the reproval language should be sounded in their spiritual ears, "Who hath required this at my hands."

When Job Scott was visiting the churches in Pennsylvania and adjacent parts, in the year 1786, he passed through such an experience, which he relates to his wife in a letter written from Philadelphia. In this he mentions that he had been out in the country, and that at the first eleven meetings after leaving the city, he was shut up in profound silence, except a very few words at the close of the first; and he makes the following comments: "I now know that when [the Lord] opens none can open. I read it and believed it, and in good degree felt and experienced it before; but now I know it in the depths, in a manner past all human penetration or natural apprehension; and what is more than all that, I rejoice in it too; yea, I greatly rejoice that it is so, and that I have thus exercisingly obtained it so. For, by thus fully learning this part of the lesson, I have been led feelingly, to my great admiration, to dip far deeper than ever into a clear experience of the other part, that 'when He opens none can shut.' I, blessed be his holy name, after I gave up, and, not daring to shrink back, condescended to go on, and be a fool, a spectacle and a sign, in dumbness and silence, or whatever pleased, I felt the word of his power, and the eternal influence of his Divine life to arise in my soul, in majesty and mighty dominion: in the fresh openings of the vision of light, the trumpet was prepared to sound; and the sayings being indisputably clear, great was the confirmation; yea, and consolation also; it was like a resurrection from the dead. I, indeed, a good, honest old woman said after meeting, 'I am glad I was at thy resurrection to-day.'"

Many, my dear love, were the kind Friends who sympathized with me in my baptism into the life; and how could they but rejoice with me in the aboundings of that which was evidently felt to be 'the resurrection and the new life.' My way has been opened and good things given in every meeting since, save the experience of Job Scott as above related, that after he had submitted to appear as a fool, he felt the influence of the Divine life to arise in his soul, brings to mind the action made by another minister. As he approached a house where many persons were gathered, in the expectation of hearing him preach, when he saw the number who had assembled, an earnest desire sprang up that he might not be disappointed. As he sat in the meeting under this feeling, many texts passed before his mind, but he could feel no spiritual life accompanying any of them. Finally, he was enabled to settle down with this conclusion—that if the Lord had any service for him to perform in that company, He would show him what it was; and if He had nothing for him to do, he would remain quiet. After arriving at this state an exercise spread over his mind, under which he was enabled to minister to the congregation.

Job Scott says of himself, in a letter written to his wife in 1789: "I find it is only as I know nothing and attempt not to do anything, but simply as it is immediately impressed and opened, that I find peace, or get at the state of things; and am thankful that I find myself more and more unable to move in my own time, being emptied of all."

One of the great objects of true ministry is to turn the attention of people to the Light of Christ in their own hearts, the great Teacher, to guide them in the way of salvation; and as the apostle says, "to stir up the pure mind in them." This purpose may be effected and substantial benefit derived by the hearer who yet may sometimes be unable to retain in his memory any thing that the preacher has said, or even the subject on which he spoke. Bishop Hoskyn, of old times, says:

"I have heard of one who returning from an affecting sermon, highly commended it to some; and being demanded what he remembered of it, answered: 'Truly, I remember nothing of it at all; but only while I heard it, it made me resolve to live better; and so, by God's grace, I will.'"

There is a story to the same purpose of one who complained to a holy aged man that he was discouraged from reading the Scriptures because he could fasten nothing upon his memory. The hermit bade him take an earthen pitcher and fill it with water. He then bade him empty it again and wipe it clean, that nothing should remain in it. This being done, "Now," said he, "though there be nothing of the water remaining in it, yet the pitcher is cleaner than it was before; so, though thy memory retain nothing of the word thou readest, yet thy heart is cleaner for its very passage through."

To the above may be added the following of a later date:

"What a sermon we had last Sunday!" said a poor woman, who kept a small shop, to a neighbor.

"What was it about?" asked her friend.

"I don't remember," she replied.

"What was the text?" she was then asked.

"I cannot quite think," she replied; "but I know that when I got home, I took and burned up my bad bushel."

The spiritual benefit to be derived from reading the Scriptures, or from hearing the gospel preached, depends on the willingness wrought in the reader or hearer to yield himself to the convictions of Divine Grace which may accompany these outward ministrations; and to co-operate therewith. Without this religious exercise, the mere listening to a sermon or reading a portion of Scripture, will not profit. Yet to the humble, submissive, seeking soul, a blessing is often extended in connection therewith.

The exercise of soul, which sometimes covers the mind when seated in silent meetings for Divine worship, is attended with a similar blessing. If the mind is brought to feel the good presence of the Lord and to partake of spiritual refreshment from his heavenly table, it matters not whether the blessing is immediately communicated, or through an anointed instrument. In either case the hungry soul is satisfied. That experienced Christian, Richard Shackleton, in writing to one of his daughters, says: "I seldom find any opportunities, of a religious kind, more deeply and solidly beneficial to my spirit, than those which I meet with in my seasons of private retirement at home. To this assiduous, diligent waiting for, and seeking after, the resurrection of a divine life, inwardly stirring in their own minds, I, above all things, recommend my dear children, as the surest way to be preserved, as well as to grow and thrive in religious experience."

Jacob Ritter, who was brought up as a Lutheran, and joined the Society of Friends in early life, through conviction of its principles, many years after related his experience as follows:

"When I was a little boy about ten years old, I used to like to go to meetings sometimes. One First-day morning I asked my father if I might not go with some of my comrades, neighboring boys, to Quaker meeting. He said, 'For what would you go to their meeting?—they don't have any preaching, they just sit still.'"

But still I wished to go. "Well," said he, "go; but mind and behave yourself." So I set off, and walked about five miles barefooted. When I came to the meeting, it was late; all the people were in. I went in, and sat down behind the door. I looked around; the people seemed so serious and solemn, that it brought good feelings to my mind, though there was no preaching. Oh, the good feelings I experienced! So that when meeting broke up, I felt as if I could sit still an hour longer.

"If the children, the dear children, would but be still and try to wait on the Lord in the truth, He would in mercy draw near to them; for He loves little children, and sometimes graciously visits them, I believe at a very early age. When I came home, my father said, 'Well, did the Quakers preach?' I said, 'No, but there are good feelings amongst them that are better than preaching; we have no such good feelings in our meetings.'"

The experience of Jacob Ritter was similar to that of Robert Barclay, who says: It was "not by strength of argument or by a particular disquisition of each doctrine, and conviction of my understanding thereby, I came to receive and bear witness of the truth, but by being secretly reached by this life; for when I came into the silent assemblies of God's people, I felt a secret power among them, which touched my heart, and as I gave way unto it, I found the evil weakening in me, and the good raised up, and so I became thus knit and united unto them, hungering more and more after the increase of this power and life, whereby I might feel myself perfectly redeemed. And indeed this is the surest way to become a Christian, to whom afterwards the knowledge and understanding of principles will not be wanting, but will grow up so much as is needful, as the natural fruit of this good root."

It is this "power and life" of the Lord which only can turn the sinner from the error of his ways, and thus effect his conversion; and it is only as any labor in the strength of this "power and life," that they can be spiritually helpful to others. This essential requisite for successful labor is sometimes overlooked by persons whose zeal exceeds their experience. On one occasion, such an one remarked to Jacob Ritter, that the world of mankind had lapsed into a state of great degeneracy; that many thousands were hurled into the vortex of eternal ruin; that the Lord had a harvest, and the harvest was great, but the laborers were few. The few, he said, were too idle; it was high time they should be up and a doing, up and a doing, doing, doing! that he saw clearly the blood of the ruined would be upon the heads of the idle laborers.

"Ah!" replied Jacob, "we are in great danger of running where we are not sent; of doing that which we ought not to do; and of leaving undone that which we ought to do. Our salvation depends upon a true and living faith in the Son of God, who said, 'Ye are my friends if you do whatsoever things I command you.' He surely knows best what we should do, and when we should do it: this has always been the doctrine of Friends. Now suppose the Lord of the harvest calls a man to reap in his harvest on a given day; but he who is thus called thinks it is a weighty matter, and has a great many things to do first, and, like Martha, is cumbered about much serving; so he lets the right time slip. By and by, he shoulders his sickle and goes out into the field after harvest; what is he then to do? He can only reap stubble. But suppose he is a very doing man, and he takes his scythe and cradle, and goes into the field before the Lord of the harvest has told him to go, and he dashes into the wheat before it is ripe, he does mischief, and the Lord says to him, 'Where are thy orders? Who hath required this thing at thy hands?'"

For "The Friend."

I was interested in seeing in an essay in "The Friend" of 5th mo. 19th, entitled, "A Ride through the Streets of Philadelphia," the allusion made to the two great evils of our day—Intemperance in dram-drinking; and intoxication from reading exciting and licentious novels. It may be added to what is there stated, that one affects the head, intoxicating the brain; the other no less fatally corrupts the heart by undue excitement of the mind and affections. The former is most common to men; the latter affects both sexes. While the slaves of strong drink are more easily seen by their fellowmen to be in the road to destruction; the equally to be pitied, if more hidden, slave of the dissolute novel or romance is no less in danger of shipwreck in the gulf of licentiousness; which Plato denominates "The god of fools." Well might the query be put to manufacturers and venders as well as consumers of both,—Which is the greater evil, to administer poison to the head, or poison to the heart? when both will sooner or later taint or destroy moral purity and the true life of the soul. We were recently made acquainted with the fact, that a conscientiously reclaimed novel-reader, who had in early life indulged this passion till the habit had become deeply rooted, said: that the desire for this stimulating kind of reading had become so inveterate, and she so weakened by indulgence in it, that upon seeing a work of this character, she had to flee from the seductive snare, as the reformed inebriate did from his tempting and destroying beverage.

In this relation the writers of many books, and publishers of many newspapers and other periodicals, incur an amount of responsibility which it is fearful to contemplate. We have lately been told of a vender of pernicious literature, who, on his attention being called to a newspaper which he had on sale, with a reference to its deleterious influence, said: "Yes, the publisher of that paper ought to be put in the penitentiary." While we think he was not out of the way in condemnation of the author of such corrupting reading matter, must not every one wonder how he could lend his influence to the furtherance of such evil by essaying to gain through lust of lucre by the sale of it?

The author has often been pained at seeing in the miscellaneous matter of what are called our best newspapers, advertisements of theatres, circuses, horse-races, &c., &c., which are practically invitations to go to these sinful places of amusement. Is it not so? and can such editors wash their hands from such misleading influence, and complacently assume that they are clear? We apprehend the two "great shows," which have recently been on exhibition in our large cities, are of the character herein alluded to. And yet they are noted by some of the most reputable journals of Philadelphia, as for instance:—"Barnum's Great Show—its Great Attractions," &c. These advertisements captivate the multitude, particularly the young; and where does the accountability, in measure, attach?

Not greatly differing from the subject in hand, and to which we would allude in this running comment, is the degrading exhibition recently witnessed in New York, of two pugilists pounding each other. This insult to civilization is said to have been patronized by 10,000 people at $2 a ticket. Of this number, in one of the front boxes, it is reported, a former lawmaker and ex-senator, to his thorough disgrace and shame, had his seat. One woman only is said to have been present. Would that their gentle refining influence was more put forth and more extensive over the other sex; so that such brutal scenes might be left to the by-gone age of gladiators, prize-fighters, bull-baiters, &c., which characterized the blindness and ignorance of uncivilized nations and periods.

As surely as there "is a God that judgeth in the earth," so surely will those who persistently pursue after these corrupting pleasures and pass-times—polluting others, particularly the young, by their example and influence—have to mourn deeply because they did not mourn sooner. Like Solomon of old, they may have to look with grief and remorse upon the work of their hands, exclaiming with him: "All is vanity and vexation of spirit." He continues: "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter; Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Slates Bad for Eyes.—Professor Cohn, of Breslau, believes that the use of slates by school-children tends to injure the eyes; and he recommends as a substitute either pen and ink, or an artificial white slate with black pencil, which has been introduced into a German Schools.—Sci. American.

Explosives.—Gun-cotton is prepared by mersing cotton in a mixture of nitric sulphuric acids. In the air it burns with flash; when exploded in a confined space force is variously estimated as from two eight times that of ordinary gun-powder.

Nitro-glycerine, one of the most powerful and dangerous compounds of this class produced by treating glycerine with a mixture of strong nitric and sulphuric acids at a low temperature. It is a heavy, yellow, oily-looking liquid, freezing at a temperature between 50 and 55 degrees of Fahrenheit powerfully explosive on the least friction, concussion, and is said to have a destructive power ten times as great as the same weight of gun-powder. Many accidents, involving loss of life and property, have occurred from its use.

Dynamite was the discovery of Nobel Swedish engineer, who found that by mixing nitro-glycerine with some inert matter, such as a porous earth found in Germany, it was absorbed by it, and rendered much safer for transportation, without losing those explosive powers which render it so valuable in mining operations. In blasting with gun-powder after a hole is bored in a rock, and the powder introduced, it is necessary to carefully tamper the hole, that is, to fill it with stones, clay or other material, tightly rammed, so as to prevent the force of the explosion being lost through the hole. But no such care is needed with nitro-glycerine or dynamite, which simply introduced in suitable cases, and a fuse attached with a small quantity of gun-powder in contact with the compound. When the fuse is fired, and the fire reaches the gun-powder, its explosion causes a concussion which explodes the dynamite or nitro-glycerine, as the case may be.—Chambers' Journal.

Italian Malaria.—The clearing away of the forests and other causes have tended in latter years to extend the area of the pestilential marsh diseases of Italy. Out of about 5000 miles of railway in Italy, it was calculated that about 2350 miles were within the area known as malarious. On these portions of the railway system, night service is often impracticable, as the officials have to be conveyed at sunset to a spot not subject to the fatal exhalations. A recent investigation made by the government showed that out of the provinces of Italy, 15 are to a great extent rendered uninhabitable from that cause. According to statements recently published there are, on an average, 17,000 cases of marsh-fever annually among the soldiers of the Italian army.

A proposition has been laid before the government to extend inducements in different ways for the reclaiming of the marshes.

Female Hallucinations.—Recent circumstances have directed attention to certain remarkable delusions to which females of unstable nervous equilibrium are subject, either through hysteria or through similar disorder of the nervous system. Dr. Legrand du Saulle, physician to the Salpêtrière, Paris, describes in his standard work Les Hystériques some remarkable cases of hallucination, where females labored under the belief that they had been struck or stabbed by others, even after having inflicted blows and wounds upon themselves. In one instance a young woman was found by her husband lying on the floor

er room in a fainting fit, her face covered blood. On reviving from her swoon stated that she had been attacked by ed men; the Paris newspapers related the and within three weeks two similar ts occurred in the French metropolis, all e cases were proved to have been fabri- d by the supposed victims. A young wounded herself slightly with a pistol, gave the police authorities the most min- details about an imaginary assassin who, dding to her account, fired the weapon, she was found to be highly hysterical, it was proved that she had wilfully nded herself. In a third case, in Dr. du le's experience, a young woman was found railway carriage, stabbed in the left side. incident caused great excitement, but it proved, contrary to her assertions, that had inflicted the wound herself, and was ysterical subject. A house-maid was d lying behind a door, bound, gagged, covered with bruises. She stated that had been brutally attacked by two burg- with blakened faces, but she was a highly ical woman, and there appears to have strong evidence that she had contrived e her own hands and to gag and bruise elf. Perhaps the strangest case of all oed in M. Tardieu's practice. A young wished to make herself an object of pub- interest by passing as a victim of a political piracy, which she pretended to have dis- red. One night she was found in a state e greatest mental perturbation at the f her apartment. She could not talk, stated in writing, that she had been at- ed outside her own house by a man who attempted to garrote her, at the same striking her twice with a dagger. Only dy's clothing was injured, and the body r dress and her corset were found to be hrough, but at different levels. She tried ke out that the attempt at strangulation caused dumbness. M. Tardieu remarked, er hearing, that this infirmity rapidly ppeared when produced under circum- ces of this kind. She soon managed to in her speech; and in a short time, ad- ed that the whole narrative had been de- ped out of her inner consciousness. The tant fear of molestation from enemies, icially if based on reasonable grounds, is icularly liable to predispose nervous or stable subjects to extraordinary delusions is kind.—The British Medical Journal.

Tame Rat.—The following incident ys how expressive and intelligible is the uage of gesture. A gentleman living in t had a fancy for taming animals, and ng others had some rats, which were on most friendly terms, and used to run at him as he sat in his room. One of his had a litter of young, and, in order to re their safety, they were placed in a cage and hung on the wall. One night, after their master was asleep, as awakened by something patting his ck, and found it was one of his tame rats. tried to sleep again, but the animal would allow it, and was evidently disturbed t something. As soon as he obtained a t, the rat went to the door, and looked at as if it expected him to follow. He did and it led him down the stairs into his n, and took him to the spot where one of young was lying, having fallen from its e.—J. G. Wood.

THE FRIEND.

SIXTH MONTH 2, 1883.

When George Fox and his fellow-laborers went forth into the world to proclaim the glad tidings of the Gospel, and to turn the attention of the people to that Light, Grace and Spirit of Christ in their own hearts which would bring them salvation, the marvellous success which attended their labors was largely due to the fact that the Lord had before been operating on the hearts of thousands of people in Great Britain, awakening earnest desires for purity and holiness, and for a sense of peace and acceptance with God. They were like a well-tilled field prepared to receive the seed of the kingdom of Heaven, which grew and multiplied in this soil. When the way of salvation was declared to them, through turning to the Spirit of Christ which had showed them their fallen state, and which would give them power to forsake all sin; they were ready to receive the message with joy, and to testify: this is that we have long waited for, we will be glad and rejoice in this salvation.

William Dewsbury declares, that after he was convinced of the truth by the openings of the Spirit on his own mind, and his thoughts were turned towards his countrymen, whose eyes had not yet been opened, he was divinely instructed to forbear entering on this work for some years. It was shown him that the harvest was not yet ripe, and that a time would come when there would be more of a preparation to receive his message.

It is on the Spirit of the Lord working on the hearts of the people, either immediately or through his chosen and prepared instruments, that we must rely for all good results. It was in accordance with this that our blessed Redeemer instructed his disciples to pray unto the Lord of the harvest that He would send forth more laborers into his harvest—a petition which often rises up at this day in the hearts of those who earnestly long to see the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ; and who mourn over their poor deluded brethren absorbed in temporal pleasures and pursuits. It was for the pouring forth of this Spirit upon them that the apostles waited at Jerusalem before entering upon their public ministry.

It was this preparation of heart, that enabled Cornelius, the Centurion of Cæsarea, to receive the preaching of Peter; so that the apostle was constrained to bear witness,—“Of a truth I perceive God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation he that feareth Him and worketh righteousness is accepted with Him.”

Among the discouragements of the present day, as regards our own Society, where so many are departing from the principles of Truth of which Friends in the beginning were convinced, is there not reason to hope that the Lord is secretly at work on the hearts of many hidden ones who know little of us or of the profession we make; and that He is bringing them under conviction of the same blessed truths by the immediate working of his mighty power? By his inward judgments upon the evil nature, and by the comfort and peace which He administers to those who yield obedience to the convictions of his Spirit, is He not preparing them to accept the Light of Christ as their Leader and Guide into that salvation, which He came in the flesh to purchase for them? And may we not hope that the day is approaching when the fundamental principles of our Society will be far more extensively recognized as being pure Primitive Christianity revived?

Though many may desert this standard, and as a people we may be still more humbled and brought low, yet the cause of vital religion belongs unto the Lord, and He will care for his own cause. If those who were bidden to his feast shall prove themselves unworthy, He will bring in others as from the highways and hedges. There are some cheering evidences that such a work is even now going forward; and it may greatly increase in the lifetime of some who are now living. We are reminded of the dying testimony of a dear aged servant of the Lord not very long ago, who, in looking forward to the greater prevalence of our principles among men, thought it probable that the future Society of Friends would be largely composed of those brought into its ranks by conviction from other professions.

The facility with which a legal dissolution of the marriage contract may be obtained in some parts of the United States, has long been a source of uneasiness to thoughtful lovers of their country. Experience has shown that the enjoyments and the restraints of home-life conduce to the public welfare and safety; and that therefore it is the part of true statesmanship to strengthen rather than weaken the defences which the law has placed around the institution of marriage. Christianity, or the teachings of its founders, which may justly be regarded as the most perfect embodiment of statesmanship as well as of religion (for it is righteousness that exalteth a nation) concurs with experience in this reprobation of an easy severance of the marriage tie, and the consequent family unsettlement.

It has been with satisfaction therefore that we have read the remarks of R. E. Pattison, Governor of Pennsylvania, in his veto of a bill which had passed the Legislature:

“I herewith return without my approval House bill No. 147, entitled ‘An act authorizing married women and their husbands living separate and apart under a deed of separation or mutual agreement, to sell and convey their separate real estate free and clear of rights of dower and courtesy and other interests.’ Legislation and judicial interpretation have already gone a long way towards impairing the sacredness and weakening the strength of the marriage relation. If this bill should become a law, marriage in Pennsylvania would be little more than a temporary contract, of the most serious rights and solemn duties of which the parties might relieve themselves at their mutual pleasure.

“The bill seems to proceed upon the theory that separations between husbands and wives are to be expedited rather than retarded, and when once taken place are to be made perpetual. It would almost close the door to all hope of future reconciliation between the parties by removing every material consideration that might possibly invite a resumption of marriage relations. Under its provisions a husband and wife, unhappily influenced by momentary disagreement and signing articles of separation, are instantly divested of all legal restraints, and may immediately dispose of their respective estates as freely as though the marriage tie had never existed. They are abandoned by this bill to the full effects of their immediate prejudices, and passion is given full vent to work its most serious evils and destroy all vestige of home or mutual property. The fruit of their union, the innocent children of wedlock, are exposed without shield or guardianship from the law to the worst consequences of the intemperate dispositions of their parents.

"The soothing influence of time and the returning reflections of cooler moments and sober thoughts are given no opportunity for their healing work. The destruction of home having begun, this bill invites its complete desolation. This ought not to be, and it is to be hoped never will become the policy of our law.

"That policy should be to conserve and not facilitate the extinction of the marriage relation. The restraints upon alienation of the wife are not an impediment but a protection alike to her and her offspring.

"Instead of advancing, it is doubtful if it would not be better if our law retraced a step or two in the relaxing of these restraints. A married woman in Pennsylvania enjoys to-day every legal right conducive to her happiness and consistent with her dignity and security. The limitations with which the law still guards her are beneficent and salutary rather than obstructive and burdensome.

"They protect her as well from the amiable weaknesses of her affection as from those less commendable traits of our common humanity to the intemperate exercise of which this bill would expose her. The sacredness and security of its homes are the glory and strength of a State, 'a fortress at once and a temple.' It is to be devoutly hoped the law may never relinquish its brooding guardianship over them. For these reasons I return the bill without my approval.

ROBERT E. PATTISON."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—General Crook who has been absent several weeks in Mexico, where he went in pursuit of hostile Indians, has not been officially heard from. Rumors of a massacre of his command are discredited in Washington.

The total values of the imports of merchandise into the United States during the twelve months which ended 4th mo. 30th last, amounted in value to $733,177,431, an increase of $25,153,004 on the amount imported during the preceding twelve months. Our exports of merchandise during the twelve months which ended 4th mo. 30th last, were valued at $811,641,354, against $777,875,781 for the preceding twelve months, an increase of $33,765,573.

The steamship Strasburg arrived at Baltimore last Seventh-day from Bremen, with 1474 emigrants.

The formal opening of the great Brooklyn Bridge took place on Fifth-day the 24th ult. There were present the President of the United States, Secretaries Frelinghuysen, Chandler and Folger, Postmaster General Gresham and Attorney General Brewster; Governors Cleveland, of New York; Ludlow, of New Jersey; Littlefield, of Rhode Island, and Fairbanks, of Vermont, and a number of other prominent persons. The number of foot passengers increased until on Sixth-day at noon those passing each entrance was estimated at about 100 per minute or 6000 per hour. The greatest deflection caused by the crowd on the bridge during Fifth-day's opening ceremonies is stated by Engineer Martin to have been only three inches.

A firm in Lansingburg, N. York, has nearly finished "a paper steamboat" for a Pittsburg company. The vessel is 20 feet long, can seat 25 persons and carry three tons. Its sheathing is a solid body of paper, $\frac{3}{4}$ inch thick. A bullet from a revolver, fired at the sheathing from a distance of only four feet, neither penetrated nor abraded it.

A cotton mill is about to be built at Oakland, opposite San Francisco, to work up the cotton now being raised in Southern California. It is said sea island cotton can be successfully grown there.

The first consignment of New Zealand apples has arrived in San Francisco. Apples ripen in New Zealand in the months corresponding to our spring.

It is said that the Indians of Alaska do not belong to the same race as the North American Indians, but that they are probably an offshoot from the Japanese or Coreans. The missionaries who have been laboring among them say that in many respects their conceptions of moral law are better than those of civilized nations.

Five thousand dollars worth of seized gambling apparatus was burned in bonfires on the public square in Nashville, Tenn., recently, by order of the Criminal Court. It is asserted that at least 500 gamblers will be driven out of the city by the enforcement of the new act of the State Legislature making gambling a felony.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 374, which was 30 more than during the previous week, and 49 less than during the corresponding period last year. Of the above 200 were males, and 174 females: 69 died of consumption; 28 of pneumonia; 14 of scarlet fever; 14 of convulsions; 13 of old age; 12 of typhoid fever; 12 of diphtheria, and 11 of marasmus.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 103 $\frac{1}{2}$; 3 $\frac{1}{2}$'s, 103 $\frac{1}{2}$; 4 $\frac{1}{2}$'s, registered, 112 $\frac{1}{2}$; coupon, 113 $\frac{1}{2}$; 4's, 119 $\frac{1}{2}$; currency 6's, 129 a 132.

Cotton continues quiet, but prices were steady. Sales of middlings are reported at 11 $\frac{1}{4}$ a 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. for export, and 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour was quiet and steady. Sales of 2000 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.40 a $6.50; Pennsylvania family at $4.90 a $5; western do. at $5.25 a $6.20, and patents at $5.90 a $7.50. Rye flour is steady at $3.87 a $3.90.

Grain.—Wheat was a fraction higher. Sales of 4600 bushels red, in car lots, at $1.11 a $1.26. Rye is nominal. Corn is quiet and steady. Sales of 8500 bushels in lots, at 60 a 68 cts. Oats are dull and lower. Sales of 10,000 bushels, in car lots, at 45 a 52 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 5th mo. 26th, 1883.—Loads of hay, 346; loads of straw, 54. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 90 cts. to $1.00 per 100 pounds; mixed, 80 a 90 cts.; straw, 55 a 65 cts. per 100 pounds.

The cattle market was dull. About 2500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5 $\frac{3}{4}$ a 7 $\frac{1}{4}$ cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were also dull: 14,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts., and lambs at 7 a 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. per lb., as to condition.

Hogs were a fraction lower: 5000 head sold at the different yards at 10 a 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. per lb., according to quality.

FOREIGN.—Only one agrarian outrage against the person occurred in Ireland during Fourth month.

The Suez Canal Company have announced that they propose to begin the cutting of a parallel canal across the Isthmus forthwith, and have applied to the English Government for their support in obtaining the necessary concessions of land from the Khedive. A second meeting of influential ship owners in favor of the construction of another canal across the Isthmus of Suez was held in London 5th mo. 21st. The meeting raised £20,000 for preliminary expenses, and resolved to notify the Government of the project.

An official telegram from Tonquin states that the commander of the French forces in Tonquin, has been killed while making a sortie from Fort Hanoi. In the French Chamber of Deputies, Brun, Minister of Marine, read a telegram from Tonquin, stating that 14 men were killed and 20 wounded in the sortie. Hanoi is surrounded by a numerous force of Annamites. Two companies of French troops have been sent from Saigon to that place, and other troops will speedily follow.

Advices have been received from Madagascar that a French detachment landed and carried several military posts which had been erected by the Hovas on Sakalava territory in defiance of French rights. It is also stated that Admiral Pierre has occupied the Custom House at Majunga, thus securing the road and waterway leading to Tananarivo, the capital of the island. It is semi-officially stated that the object of the French expedition to Madagascar is to obtain the payment of sums due the French Government from Madagascar, by holding the custom houses there as security for the amount. If the Hovas continue to resist, France will impose a treaty placing French subjects in Madagascar on the same footing with English subjects.

The State Department is informed that a treaty of peace has been signed by Chili "and General Ingles for Peru."

A despatch from Lima, dated 5th mo. 26th says: Congress was convened at Arequipa on 5th mo. 20th. 5th mo. 22d, Montero sent in a long message treating the gloomy outlook before the country, praising loyalty of Bolivia to the alliance, arraigning Chili aggressive, and declaring unjust the offers of peace which Peru cannot accept. The message closes with expression that little hope of peace is entertained present.

Intelligence from Senegal states that a French column under Colonel Desbordes has succeeded in driving the hostile natives back a distance of sixty kilometers and that tranquillity has been established on the bank of the Niger.

Advices have been received in London from Mozambique that Portugal has declared war against Makalo and other chiefs on the Schire river. A Portuguese gunboat and troops have been despatched from Mozambique to the scene of hostilities.

The Cologne Gazette has published an article which attracts much attention, pointing out that Germany, Austria and Italy can together muster 1318 battalions of infantry, 740 squadrons of cavalry and 4464 field guns, while the forces of France and Russia together amount to 1339 battalions of infantry, 620 squadrons of cavalry and 4840 field guns; but, it says, the last two States can only operate with divided forces. The tripartite alliance can thus outweigh the whole remainder of Europe.

The Emperor and Empress of Russia were crowned in the Kremlin at Moscow, on First-day the 27th ultimo, with great pomp and ceremony. Representatives from Asia and each of the provinces of the empire were present; also from foreign governments. Great enthusiasm was manifested by the people, and no expressed dissent appeared. In the evening the Emperor drove through the streets without an escort to witness the illuminations.

A letter from Havana, dated the 19th of last month reports an unusually severe drought over a great portion of Cuba. At Caibarien, a demi-john of water, for drinking, sold for 15 cents in the town. At Puerto Principe the damage to the pastures and drying up of the water were causing fears that the cattle would perish in large numbers for want of sustenance. The drought, however, was favorable to sugar making, as the plantations could keep on grinding all the cane in hand. The latest estimates of the sugar crop gave a falling off 25 per cent. from the yield of last year.

It is believed that the Mexican Congress will make an extensive revision of the tariff. Among the financial suggestions is one for the funding of the "legitimate" Mexican debt in $250,000,000 of forty or fifty year bonds, making them the basis of a national banking system, whose notes should be legal tender. The Mexican Government is perfecting a plan for the encouragement of immigration to Mexico, beginning with the Northern States.

For "The Friend."

Letters and Memoranda of William Scattergood.

These humbling seasons and fiery baptisms are portrayed in the following letter, are related to teach man his own impotency and entire dependence upon the one saving, lasting Arm of sufficiency, grace and mercy. It is by such chastening discipline—of Heavenly love—that the inward eye is fresh anointed to see, and the spiritual ear enlarged by Him, who thus bringeth the soul into filial subjection and closer union to himself; who also leadeth captivity captive, and giveth gifts unto men. Hereby also are realized the force of the teaching little word, "Prayer answered by crosses:"—

"These inward trials I employ,
From self and pride to set thee free,
And break thy schemes of earthly joy,
That thou may'st seek thy all in me."

Truly precious, in this relation, are these words of the apostle Paul: "Blessed be God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies and God of all comfort; who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God. For as the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so our consolation also aboundeth by Christ."

"Philadelphia, 1827.

My very dear friend, * * * Thy letter reached me just emerged from a season of the deepest darkness and distress, which my mind ever experienced; and though it was only for a short season, 'the terrors of death' were said to have 'compassed me about.' I could convey to thee, my friend, the agony of my soul at that period, thou wouldst, with thyself, have trembled at the consideration. Thou hast ever known a state of mind in which every hope, all faith, all vision or remembrance of comfort had departed or was far from thy view; if thou hast had the exciting sinfulness of sin and the backslidings of my own heart set before thee as it were in the language of condemnation, thou canst form the idea of the torrent of feeling that seemed threatening to drown my soul in the depths of unspeakable perdition. A circumstance in which I feared I had not acted as I ought, led or rather my mind seemed from that led to take a review of my past life; how I had acted my part in relation to my Heavenly Father! my many backslidings, and my multiplied deficiencies in the prosecution of my proper duty; and the retrospect was awful indeed. I am persuaded that words are too feeble to convey the prospect that opened to my view—eternal misery, with the trembling, horror, and anguish that await those who know not the Lord. All these—their interminable extent, and the sureness with which they follow the impenitent and ungodly soul, being brought home to myself—left an impression which, I trust and hope, may never be forgotten: because, too, it has brought home to my soul the value, the inestimable value of that mercy and grace which come by Jesus Christ our Lord. I have always, or at least during my profession of religion, been a believer in the doctrines of the atonement, the mediation and intercession of our blessed Redeemer; but never did the truth, ah! the necessity, the indispensable necessity of these things, come home with such unspeakable and convincing energy. * * * *

I have gone more into this subject than I expected to, but it is one of such infinitely interesting importance that I trust thou wilt feel responsively with myself in relation to it. It does appear to me, my dear friend, upon looking seriously into the subject, as if it was only by a practical and experimental knowledge of the things of God in ourselves, that a right qualification is found to speak to others of the Divine mysteries of our holy religion. Vain will be all reading even of the best of books, or of the best commentaries upon Holy Scripture; vain will be all our contrivings and suppositions of its meaning, except we experience in ourselves those things which pertain to salvation, and of which we speak to others. When this is the case we can say, in our measure, with the apostle: 'That which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the word of life—that which we have seen and heard, declare we unto you.'

* * * I have been prepared to see myself and some of our highly professing people in a little different point of view than formerly. I believe that there are testimonies given us to bear; and that in a conscientious conviction of their truth, we are bound to be faithful in their support. But if while professing clearer views of Christianity than others, we are found not living up to that profession of them, greater will be the condemnation of such in the day of final retribution, and greater is the reproach to the Lord's cause. I confess I often feel weak and wavering in some particulars; and almost wish to be excused from appearing so much like a fool in the eyes of the world; but I do at times feel such living consolation in the belief that this is the path of duty, that hard things are made easy, and crooked things straight, also that very bitter cups are made sweet in the experience of the approbation of a good and kind Father and Friend.

Vain would it be for me, on such an occasion as this, to undertake to tell all I feel at times in contemplating the ways of "Heaven's Eternal King"—his glorious goodness and his free salvation to the sons of fallen Adam; and blessed be his name in that He hath called me, as I humbly trust He has, poor and unworthy as I am, to be a partaker in the riches of his unsearchable love. Well, my friend, let us labor more and more to be found watching; let us endeavor to walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called with all lowliness and meekness; endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit, which is the bond of peace. This will afford us true consolation amid all the fluctuating scenes of time; and though many trying conflicts may be our portion, the Lord who is infinite in goodness will maintain and support us through all, to the praise of his own great and excellent name.

Thy remarks upon the subject of waiting upon God, thou mayest well suppose met my warmest approbation. I have known the benefit arising from this in times of great weakness, as well as when the Sun of Righteousness has arisen with healing in his wings. Yes, my friend, the promise is still to those who wait upon the Lord, that they shall renew their strength. They shall truly mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint.

I know not what thou wilt think of this letter, but my heart has felt full of that affectionate warmth, which breathes 'Peace on earth, and good will towards all men.' In this feeling I must draw towards a conclusion; and once more bid thee God speed on thy heavenly journey.

Thy affectionate friend,

W. SCATTERGOOD."

To E. Comfort.

"Philada., 8th mo. 17th, 1827.

* * * I cannot well convey nor present to thee, the great variety of solemn, and, to me, deeply interesting feelings which have been and are continually passing in my mind. Indeed I have thought that words could not convey them. * * * I know not how these things may terminate! whether by a right abiding under the refining hand of the Most High a vessel may be prepared for the Master's use; or whether, as I am sometimes almost ready to fear, the work may not be marred upon the wheel, and I east, poor and empty and comfortless, as it were, among the lumber of the Lord's house, unprofitable and unworthy. I feel that I stand upon very awful ground; and as though, if ever I needed or dare claim the prayers of the faithful, I might now do it. Although the all-sustaining Arm has been sensibly near, and although in retrospect, I may with humility say, that I have endeavored, according to my measure, to be found filling up the allotted portion of suffering; and feel revived in believing, that the promise is true to us of the present day as it was of old: 'As thy day, so shall thy strength be.'

I have felt very affectionately solicitous, that in the prosecution of the solemn engagement which we have entered upon,* and which involves, as I believe, consequences of the highest importance both to our present and future well being, that we might experience the hand of the Lord to be near, and also a being built upon the everlasting foundation individually; and so find true unity in the bond of peace. There is nothing short of this can give any true stability to our love, or firmness and comfort in our connexion together. But in this, and under the uniting power of Divine love, we feeling that our Heavenly Father hath truly joined us together, shall become one flesh; and under this feeling can travel onward through time, with the sweet evidences of His tender care and regard for us.

Many and various are the turnings and overturnings, the ebbings and flowings, which we have to experience. At seasons we may be enabled to partake of the sensible evidences of our Heavenly Father's love in a remarkable manner; while at others, his presence may be veiled, and our souls plunged into the very pit of sorrow and conflict. To be enabled at such seasons feelingly to support one another, and strengthen each other in the most holy faith, seems to me, as a very prominent and important feature in our earthly connexions. Then, although the storms and tempests of time may beat and rage, our hearts being from time to time replenished with living virtue from the fountain of all excellency, we shall be prepared to soar above the little trials of mutability, having our eyes fixed upon that period when we shall be united to and centered in the Source from whence we sprung. Let us cultivate, therefore, those sentiments which, from season to season have been begotten in our hearts, whereby we shall be led to trust in Him 'who, (to use John Woolman's words) is greater than earthly princes;' and whose tender compassion is extended to all the workmanship of his hands. It is well remarked by the same excellent and devoted man, that 'the care of the Almighty Creator for his creatures, far exceeds that of the most tender earthly parent.' And I believe, however prone to misgiving and doubt myself, that He continues from generation to generation to be the support and strength of his children and people, in all their varied trials and difficulties.

With truth and sincerity I again salute thee, in a feeling of the most unfeigned love; and remain thy faithful friend, W. S."

The prayer, or praying, of the Orientals is not usually very noisy, but their reading is a continual sound. They study aloud, read their sacred books aloud, and rehearse their lessons aloud, to an extent that is not seen among the Occidentals, nor enjoyed by an Occidental listener. When there are many together, the babel is astonishing. The idea that it might disturb any one never enters their heads. But the Orientals do many things with noise which we of the West prefer to do with quietness. Our talking seems painfully low and still to them, as theirs seems painfully loud and noisy to us. Yet the Orientals are not very much beyond the ordinary Italians in that respect.—S. S. Times.

For "The Friend."

On the Desert.

THE BEDAWEEEN OF THE DESERT.

"In reading the story of their wanderings, we wonder not that they often fainted, and that their hearts died within them. Forty years! that is more than the lifetime of a generation. In that time old men died, and young men grew old; wives and children were buried in the sands of the desert. What a trial for the wisdom and the firmness of their great leader to keep any control of millions of people, who were at times almost starving, and often in a state of mutiny! Moses himself was sometimes ready to despair! but he withdrew into the wilderness, and alone he knelt upon the rocks or sands, and cried to Heaven for help, and then returned, with new courage in his heart, to inspire the faint and strengthen the weak, and to lead them on, until at last he brought them to the Promised Land.

"We camped in the Wady el Arish. It was a bitter night. The wind blew so that we feared it would blow down our tents, and the men had to keep a sharp lookout, driving in the tent-pins to hold them fast. At the same time the temperature was almost freezing. The same lime-stone surface which reflects the sun by day, radiates the heat rapidly as soon as the sun goes down; so that while the days are very hot, the nights are very cold. We have to wrap ourselves up warmly, piling blankets and over-coats upon our camp-beds, and then are sometimes almost frozen. Yet while it required our utmost efforts, even under shelter, to keep our blood stirring, the Arabs slept in the open air, with only their thin covering, and such warmth as they might get from their camp-fires."

"The camp-fire is the delight of the Bedaween. No sooner are our tents pitched, and our wants attended to, and the camels fed, than the men scatter about, pulling up little shrubs and brushwood that grow on the desert, which make a quick fire. These they pile on until the ground is thoroughly heated, and they have a glowing bed of coals. Meanwhile one of the Arabs pours out of a sack perhaps a peck of meal upon a piece of coarse cloth, much the worse for wear, and adding a little water and salt, kneads it into a dough, which, when of the proper consistency, is flattened out like a huge pancake, looking very much like the chipatties in India. Then the bed of coals is raked open, and the cake laid carefully upon it, and the glowing ashes raked over it. While this is going on, observe the faces of the Arabs gathered around the fire! Every step of the process is watched with great interest. How their eyes glisten in the firelight. Talk of a dinner prepared by a French cook; it is nothing to the feast of these children of the desert, to which they come with appetites sharpened by hunger. As I watch them night after night, I think how much more they enjoy their supper than we do ours, since they have the pleasure of preparing it as well as of eating it. We, who partake of our meals only when they are placed before us, do not know the exquisite delight of those who enjoy feast beforehand by witnessing its preparation. This is one of the things which give keen a zest to gypsy life, and which civilized folk try to imitate in a poor way by getting up a picnic. They find that the same food tastes much better when a whole party, sitting on the grass under a tree, than if were served on a table. This free outdoor life our Arabs have every day, and their evening meal is one prolonged enjoyment from the time the camp-fire is blazing."

"As we were getting farther north, the country was not so utterly uninhabited. Now and then we descried in the distance party of Bedaween, mounted on their camels coming towards us at full speed. As they came up out of the horizon, like ships out of the sea, Dr. Post would exclaim 'There come the Midianites!' for indeed I suppose these men of the desert, in race, and costume as in the beasts they rode, were not very unlike the Midianites who bought Joseph of his brethren and sold him into Egypt. We met also several parties of the Tawarab tribe returning from Gaza, loaded with grain, in sacks to a camel, each sack containing several bushels. Their appearance was such as to suppose that of the sons of Jacob to have been when they went down into Egypt to buy corn. Probably they took the old caravan route from Syria to Egypt—a journey they need not have taken more time than twenty-four days now required for the same pace from Sinai to Gaza and back again.

"It is one of the chief pleasures of the desert travelling, that it brings before us vividly the mode of life of patriarchal times for the world does not change on the desert, and men live now as they lived thousands of years ago. Abraham was a sheikh—not a character like the one from whom we have just parted, but in appearance perhaps not unlike a sheikh who may be seen now at Jerusalem, aged and venerable, with long white hair, and a snowy beard falling on his breast. He was prince of the desert, rich in camels and asses, and flocks and herds, and men-servants and maid-servants. The custom by which he held his servants is the same which exists to this day. One of the men that accompanied me from Nukhl was a black who belonged to a sheikh—yet not a slave, as the dragoman was careful to explain, but 'a servant born in a house,' and entitled by usage, if not by written law, to certain privileges, which date from the earliest times."

H. M. Field describes the Bedaween of the Sinai Peninsula as a light-hearted, though less race, who proved reliable and faithful guides and attendants.

"The Arab knows the desert as the Indian knows the forest. Indeed he is made to the desert as truly as the camel. His physique fits him for long marches. His body is light and his step is springy, yet he has not even shoes on his feet. The sole protection to the foot when going over the fire sands, or even jagged rocks, is a pair of sandals so thin that I wondered how he could keep them on. Yet thus shod, or even with bare feet, he will spring up the rocks like a goat, or climb to the top of the highest mountain. It is true he goes in very light marching order. His limbs are naked, and he carries not an ounce of superfluous flesh on his bones. In all my acquaintances with t no might of my own! This being a daily occupation, and a continual care arising that the account might be kept clear, day after day would pass as wave rolls on wave, till we were borne to the everlasting shores of eternity. It behoves us to be wise and consider our latter end; to consider the example of our dear Lord who, tempted in the wilderness, passed whole nights in prayer unto God, the Father. The sea shore, the mountain and the garden were witnesses to his devotion, recorded for our example. In this manner should we be prepared to join the hundred and forty-four thousand of the redeemed of Israel, who stand on the sea of glass mingled with fire, ascribing all the praise, the honor, and the glory, unto the Lamb, forever and ever.

After the sermon he knelt down to pray. My heart was tender, my eyes overflowed, and my spirit was in unison with his in the work of prayer, thanksgiving and praise. His prayer I cannot attempt to fully put on paper, but it was on this wise:

"O, thou celestial Spirit, who of old didst rest between the cherubim, redeem and sanctify our hearts more and more; take away these hearts of stone, and give us hearts of flesh; and to render obedience to thy law, bring home those who are now wandering from thy fold of rest and peace; and let their steps be again with the flocks of thy companions. Strengthen the aged, and those who in a long course of life have acknowledged thee for their Lord; leave them not in their grey hairs; but be with them, and be their rock for ever. Draw the young and rising generation to see thy glory revealed in Christ; show them the veil of the temple rent from top to bottom; and disclose to their view the richness, the mercy and the magnitude of redemption through Him. Finally, precious and adored Jehovah, give us unitedly to rejoice in the assembly of the blessed before thy throne; where we may sing hallelujah! hallelujah! to Thee, and the Lamb for evermore, amen."

There are not many left that heard how he pleaded with all present to choose the Lord for their portion, and not to seek great things for themselves, but to endeavor to keep in the straight and narrow way that leads to peace and happiness.

To-night there is a storm at sea;
I hear the breakers roar;
There comes across the grassy lea
The thunder of the shore,
And pity burns within my soul
For those upon the deep,
Kind Saviour Christ, do thou control
The waves, and bid them sleep!
A week ago, one walked alone
Across yon sandy beach,
And close beside a rocky stone,
Out of the billows' reach,
He found, washed up, mid weeds and shells,
These letters, stained and worn—
Sad records of some heart that dwells
All lonely and forlorn.
Some sad-eyed woman dwells remote
From the tempestuous sea,
And months ago these letters wrote—
An aching heart had she;
Her sailor-husband far away
Bore in his faithful breast
Those lines of hers which speak to-day
Of home, and love, and rest.
She tells him of her lonely life,
And how she prays that he,
May not forget his loving wife
While on the stormy sea;
And how she asks that God would keep
His vessel from all ill,
And, as of old, make winds to sleep,
And furious waves be still.
Alas! a schooner on our shore,
By stormy billows tossed,
Went down amid the tempest's roar,
And every soul was lost!
So still, a woman, heavy-eyed,
Lay wait in hope at home
For him whom neither wind nor tide
* Shall help across the foam.

*
Ah, me! the wind blows loud to-night,
Christ save poor souls at sea!
Burn brightly, beery beam-light
Wherever ships may be.

to sight by removing a cataract from his eye, and who was yet too poor to buy himself a pair of spectacles; and yet neither his poverty nor his rags could make him forget the blood that flowed in his veins. No scion of a royal house could be more proud of his kingly birth. In other cases he had known emirs who were regular traps. One such used to come around to beg, mounted on a brood mare worth a hundred and fifty pounds! He had a servant with him, whom he sent in to prefer his request for alms, and who pleaded the high rank of his master as a reason why he could not work. To judge from the tone of both master and servant, it was an honor conferred on the giver that he might bestow his charity on one of such long and proud lineage. I judge from the tone of the language of our Lord to his immediate followers, those who in his name had worked miracles, had healed the sick, raised the dead, and cast out devils, was beautifully simple; showing them their weakness, as poor, fallen, helpless creatures. "What I say unto you, I say unto all, watch." And yet we find for our warning and instruction, that one of these his followers, denied his knowledge of Him, even in the presence of his Lord and Master. While I am engaged in preaching the gospel unto others, and endeavoring as much as in me lies to turn your attention to the alone Rock of safety and strength, I feel my own weakness; I feel, dear friends, that I stand on a sea of glass mingled with fire; I feel many times poor and helpless, occupied with unprofitable thoughts, and, in vain endeavoring to disengage my mind from them, forced to acknowledge that I am a poor creature; Lord, have pity on me!

Ab, friends, in such a state as this there is no room for little bickerings and disputes; no room for the loftiness of man's proud heart; but rather, a prayer for the daily bread; and may it be reverently adopted, "Our Father," &c. Our Lord has made it a standing condition, that if we forgive not men their trespasses neither will our Heavenly Father forgive us our trespasses. We should have no room for any thing but Divine universal love without distinction.

How did he press the consideration of these subjects upon the minds of all present, more especially the young and rising generation; affectionately and tenderly recommending them, since good and evil were set before them, to choose the good and thus be preparing for the last day! He wished all to adopt the practice of drawing near to God every morning, and thus reviewing the actions of the day which was past; thanking Him for his protecting care during the night hours of rest; and craving his help to meet the various temptations and occurrences of the coming day. This silent introspection might not always be of the most agreeable kind, but perhaps as profitable and instructive. It might occur to the mind, and naturally would—"what was I doing yesterday?" It might be, I was at meeting, and my mind very unsuitably occupied for the occasion. Perhaps I was visiting, and drawn into lightness. And, knowing this, we should acknowledge, Lord, help me for the time to come! for, give me, for I am a poor creature; I have times in which men were seeking after truth, the truths of the gospel were promulgated. He mentioned the simple language in which meekness and humility.

The following was delivered by Samuel Bettie, Sr., in the old Meeting-house at Merion, on First-day, 11th mo. 16th, 1823: S. B. opened his discourse with a query, which had rested on his mind since his silent sitting amongst us, whether in any case worship could be acceptably performed unto God unless the mind was previously prepared by the aid of the divine Spirit. He concluded that it could not; that a previous preparation of heart was absolutely necessary in order to offer an acceptable offering unto the one God, and invisible God; and that our blessed Redeemer had pointed out the way in which the qualification might be obtained, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst."

Our minds, he said, were variously occupied when convened together, but it did not require great depth in religion to comprehend that, when met together, a short mental prayer, an aspiration or sigh unto God, was accepted as worship; and through many besetting temptations hindered us from approaching in the manner we wished, yet the object of worship regarded the heart—the sincerity of the desire. He instanced the proud Pharisee, who dared to offer his good deeds to the Holy and Invisible One, as an act of worship; and thanked, yea arrogantly thanked God, that he was not as that poor Publican, who, standing at a distance, sensibly of his own weakness and unworthiness, scarcely dared to lift up his eyes, and instead of the pompous language of pharisaical righteousness, could only smite on his breast and say, "God be merciful to me a sinner." I could, said he, follow him to his house, and see in his conduct that the answer of peace had been bestowed upon him and received with meekness and humility.

He mentioned the simple language in which meekness and humility.

And how are these arrangements made? "If a man of the tribe applies for the hand of a woman, he makes a bargain as if he were giving a sword or a gun. The father exacts compensation, which varies according to the wealth of bridegroom and the rank of the bride. The price is generally reckoned, in money, but in camels, which constitute almost the only wealth of the desert. The suitor be one of the maiden's own relations or near friends, a single camel may be sufficient compensation, where two camels or near friends, a single camel may be expected from a stranger."

"In fixing the value of a bride, I suppose I regard is paid to beauty?"

"Not at all. Beauty scarcely enters into account. The supreme consideration is rank of her family. The Arabs are very proud of their family, and she who can boast belonging to the first of her tribe is more than she who is only fair to look upon."

"This took me quite by surprise. I could understand how the consideration of rank place among those benighted children of the desert. They all seemed to stand on a common level of poverty, was like an aristocracy among beggars. Dr. Post assured me that it was so—distinctions of rank are as marked among them as in the nobility of any country in Europe. He said the Arab families traced back their line through generations, I were proud of their long descent—a de which survived even in the lowest descendant of worldly estate. He had among patients a descendant of the great Saladin, who fought with Richard Cœur de Lion; and whom he restored to sight by removing a cataract from his eye, and who was yet too poor to buy himself a pair of spectacles; and yet neither his poverty nor his rags could make him forget the blood that flowed in his veins. No scion of a royal house could be more proud of his kingly birth. In other cases he had known emirs who were regular traps. One such used to come around to beg, mounted on a brood mare worth a hundred and fifty pounds! "What I say unto you, I say unto all, watch." And yet we find for our warning and instruction, that one of these his followers, denied his knowledge of Him, even in the presence of his Lord and Master. in New York congregations expended 1000 last Easter for flowers. Certainly same amount of money might have been in ways that would more largely have contributed to the welfare of mankind.

Moral Influence of the Press.—At a "ministers' meeting" in Chicago, held 4th mo. 30th, resolution was considered with reference to city Press. While appreciating ability, manifested in the boldness, independence, strength of editorials, and its enterprise in gathering of news, and not unmindful of its prosperity in giving currency to matters which interested Christian people, they re- sulted the Press to exclude from their columns, whether as advertisements or news, anything of an immoral tendency, every- thing that can corrupt the minds of youth or contaminate the already fallen to the further commission of evil deeds.

Natural History, Science, &c.

American Earthquakes.—The American Journal of Science gives an enumeration of the earthquakes felt in America during the year 1882—numbering 72 in all; of which 13 are considered doubtful. These tremors of the earth were distributed as follows: 6 in Canada, 1 in New England, 6 in the Atlantic States, 1 in the Mississippi Valley, 19 on the Pacific coast, 18 in Mexico and Central America, 7 in the West Indies and South America. Albumen Paper.—Three factories in the United States are said to consume nearly 1,000,000 eggs annually in making albumen paper for the use of photographers.

Food of the Holothurians.—A writer in the Illustrated Naturalist says: These sea-slugs feed by seizing particles of sand, or broken coral or shells, with their tentacles and introducing them into their mouth. The shell-sand, gravel and other debris lying under water within the range of the light, are more or less completely covered with a thin pellicle of microscopic animal and vegetable growths. These minute organisms are digested by the stomach of the Holothurians from off the sand or shell which they adhere, and form a part of their supply—the sand itself being voided in excrements.

Another writer in the same Journal, says that at Bermuda two kinds of these animals were found exposed in shallow water. "I went to wade along shore carrying a fishing-net and a landing-net, and one day as my net was full, I put a couple into the landing-net to carry home. As their skins were so hard I thought they would travel well. After handling, I found my hands smarted, and the irritation lasted till bed-time. When I was going home, I found my holothurians were literally melting away; long streams of colorless gelatinous substance were hanging between the meshes. Of course I threw these nasty things away, and had a dreadful time to get the net clean. I attributed my misfortune to the sun, and another day I put a couple comfortably at the bottom of my basket, which is very closely made. After an hour or two I was horrified to find the streamers hanging down from the basket with the same substance. They had literally melted to pieces again, and spoilt everything in the basket. Shortly after, I left for Jamaica, where I took out a wide-mouthed bottle, and brought one home in triumph. Being engaged that evening I left the Holothurian in the bottle all night. Next morning the creature was all there, but he had cleared out the whole of his inside; his intestinal canal and the beautiful tree-like organ were perfect. The latter was still alive and waving about in the water in the prettiest way. Altogether it was a most interesting sight; but my poor Holothurian was only a tube. I did not know at the time that he could grow a complete new inside."

Curious Case of Ignition.—One fine morning recently, as two ladies were standing together in the drawing-room of a house, smoke was observed to rise from the dress of one of them. This was found to be due to ignition by the solar rays focused on her dress by the lens of a graphoscope which stood on the table.—Nature.

THE FRIEND.

SIXTH MONTH 9, 1883.

In The Gospel Expositor for "May 4th," there is a notice of the late Yearly Meeting of Friends held in Philadelphia, in which the editor says: "There can be no unity between Philadelphia Yearly Meeting and those individual Friends, either inside of its own borders or outside of them, who are earnestly laboring for the conversion of sinners, the sanctification of believers, and the spread of the Redeemer's kingdom."

Some light is thrown on this extraordinary statement, by the succeeding editorial of the same issue, which speaks of the impression made on the editor's mind, while sitting in that assembly—"It appeared as if the general sentiment now is,—that it was well, when things were as of old—when there was no 'silver speech' to break the 'golden silence' of Friends' meetings—no singing, no Bible-reading, no testifying, no Scripture schools, no revivals, and very little praying or preaching."

The issuing by the Yearly Meeting of the "Address" in which it so clearly and strongly reaffirmed its adherence to the original principles of Friends, and bore testimony against some modern departures in doctrine and practice; as well as the general tone of its proceedings, probably satisfied the mind of the editor of the Expositor, that it had not unity with that system of measures with which he is identified, and by which, we charitably hope, he expects to promote the spread of the Redeemer's kingdom. We have no personal controversy with him or others, and could let them work in their own line of labor, were it not that they still claim the name of "Friends," and thus render the Society responsible in the eyes of others for proceedings at variance with its principles.

The assumption contained in the sentences above quoted,—that those who disapprove of the revival methods which are now favored by many, have no unity with earnest labor "for the conversion of sinners, the sanctification of believers, and the spread of the Redeemer's kingdom,"—is fallacious and incorrect. Its truth depends on the false position that there is no other way of laboring effectively in the cause of religion than that which the editor of the Expositor has adopted.

We believe there were many who attended our late Yearly Meeting, who were very conscious of the overshadowing presence of the Head of the Church, and who went to their homes refreshed in spirit, and animated with a renewed zeal to labor in the cause of religion. To some who were thus brought into feeling, it may seem strange that any who were present, and who might reasonably be supposed to have had some true religious experience, should be insensible of that feeling and influence which were so strikingly apparent to them.

The absence of Bible-reading, and singing, and the disuse of sensational methods in our meetings would not cause these to make the great mistake of supposing there was no religious activity in our midst. Many of these would recall to mind the abundant labors in our meetings and families, during the past year, of the committee appointed by the previous Yearly Meeting; and the evidences that attended of the Lord's power accompanying them—they would remember the labors of our ministers in other quarters; the schools which are conducted, not only for the benefit of our own children, but for the poor of others, both white and colored; the Shelter for Colored Orphans; the Houses of Industry for the employment of the industrious poor; the sewing societies for the clothing of the needy whether in our midst or in various parts of the South and West; the labors of the Bible Society, of the Tract Association, of the Book Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings, and of individual members, in publishing and distributing annually many thousands of tracts and books designed to show the doctrines of the Christian religion, and to lead the readers to submit their hearts to the operations of the Spirit of Christ; and other benevolent or religious movements in which our members are employed.

It is with some hesitation we refer to these things—we trust in no spirit of self-congratulation; for the servant of the Lord must ever feel that his time, his talents and his earthly possessions belong to his Master, and are to be used as He commands and wills,—that it is a mercy and favor to be employed in the service of the King immortal, and that the praise does not belong to man. But the charges made against Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, seemed to call for some such statement, lest Friends at a distance might form a mistaken conception of the real condition of things in its midst. It is sadly true that there are some of its members who are living too much at ease as respects true religious exercise and labor—but there are others who are laboring for the welfare of Zion, nearly up to the limit of their strength, and to whom nothing is more dear than the experience of the Lord's power in their own hearts, and the evidence that the Redeemer's kingdom is spreading among others.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The national debt, less cash in the Treasury, on 6th mo. 1st was $1,569,189,408, and the decrease during 5th month $4,890,476.

The State Department has been informed by telegraph that the ratification of the treaty between the United States and Corea have been exchanged at the Korean capital.

White Wolf, Big Bow and Sun Boy, of the Comanche and Kiowa Indians, have arrived in Washington to confer with the Secretary of the Interior in regard to the boundaries of their reservation. Chief Bushyhead, of the Cherokees, is in Washington to confer with Secretary Teller in regard to the $300,000 appropriated by Congress to pay for lands ceded to the Government in the Indian Territory. The Department holds that, under the treaty of 1866, a portion of the money approprized should be paid to the Shawnees and Delawares, and that the colored freedmen living among the Indians are also entitled to a share. The Cherokees contend, however, that they have the exclusive right to determine how the money shall be divided, and Bushy-head will support their claim.

A terrible disaster occurred on the afternoon of the 30th ult., at the New York anchorage of the Brooklyn Bridge. The bridge was crowded with people, and a crush occurred at the head of a flight of stairs leading up to the plank walk of the span between the anchorage and tower. Men, women and children were trampled by the throng and thrown down the steps in a mass. Twelve persons were killed, and 26 injured, while several others are missing.

On the 29th of last month, the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company took possession of the railroads, leased lines, ferries, real estate, property, plant, traffic and business of the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey, under a lease and contract.

The members of the Amalgamated Association of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and West Virginia, with their families, making in all 12,000 persons, celebrated the settlement of the wages question on Seventh-day by a picnic, at Beaver, thirty miles west of Pittsburgh. There was no speech making.

Rhode Island has adopted a State flag, and it was hoisted on the State House for the first time on Third-day last at the assembling of the Legislature. It consists of a clear blue ground, on which are a golden anchor and 13 golden stars.

The spread of Mormonism in portions of North Carolina is causing much excitement among the people. In Gaston and Rutherford counties, 17 missionaries are engaged in the work of proselytism, and have made 37 converts within a short time, 15 of whom have gone to Utah.

Water works, with a capacity of 4,000,000 gallons per day, have been completed at Knoxville, Tennessee, at a cost of $150,000. On the 30th ult. water was turned into the mains with imposing ceremonies. There are twelve miles of mains. Next night the bottom of one of the reservoirs dropped out, emptying in five minutes, four hundred thousand gallons of water into a cave beneath. The existence of the cave was not previously known. The remaining reservoir is not damaged.

The Capital Commission of Dakota met in Fargo, on Seventh-day last, and selected Bismarck as the capital of the Territory.

The greatest rain storm ever seen in Western Iowa, visited Council Bluffs on Fifth-day night, last week, and flooded Indian creek, which flows through part of the city. Bridges and dwellings were swept away—the number of buildings wrecked is estimated at 75—but no lives were lost. The loss on property is estimated at $500,000.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 340, which was 34 less than during the previous week, and 13 less than during the same period last year. Of the whole number, 159 were males, and 181 females: 50 died of consumption of the lungs; 18 of scarlet fever; 13 of convulsions; 13 of pneumonia; 18 of diphtheria; 11 of typhoid fever, and 10 of cancer.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 103 $\frac{3}{4}$; 3 $\frac{1}{2}$'s, 103 $\frac{1}{2}$; 4 $\frac{1}{2}$'s, 112 $\frac{1}{2}$; 4's, registered, 118 $\frac{1}{2}$; coupon, 119 $\frac{1}{2}$; currency 6's, 126 a 130.

Cotton.—There was very little movement, but prices were unchanged. Sales of middlings are reported at 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 11 $\frac{3}{4}$ cts. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 7 $\frac{3}{4}$ cts. for export, and 8 $\frac{1}{4}$ a 8 $\frac{3}{4}$ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in good demand and firm. Sales of 3000 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at \$5.50 a \$6.50; Pennsylvania family at \$5 a \$5.12 $\frac{1}{2}$; western do. at \$5.25 a \$6.25, and patents at \$6 a \$7.50. Rye flour is steady at \$3.75 a \$3.85.

Grain.—Wheat is quiet, but firmer. Sales of 4700 bushels red, in car lots, at \$1.12 a \$1.26. Rye is nominal at 70 a 72 cts. Corn is in fair request and a shade firmer. Sales of 9000 bushels in car lots, at 62 a 66 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. Oats are quiet but firmer. Sales of 10,000 bushels, in car lots, at 47 a 52 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 6th mo. 2nd, 1883.—Loads of hay, 333; loads of straw, 42. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 85 to 95 cts. per 100 pounds; mixed, 75 to 85 cts.; straw, 55 a 65 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were dull and prices were a fraction lower: 3500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 7 cts. per lb., as to quality.

Sheep were a fraction lower: 12,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. per lb., and lambs at 7 a 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. per lb., as to condition.

Hogs were dull and 4c. per lb. lower: 4300 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 9 $\frac{3}{4}$ a 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. per lb., as to condition.

FOREIGN.—Davitt, Healy, M. P., and Quinn, who were sentenced last 2nd month to confinement in Kilmainham Jail for six months for making inflammatory speeches, were released from prison on the 4th instant. James Carey and the other informers, who testified at the trials of the Phoenix Park murderers, have been notified that they must indicate the places out of the country to which they wish to be sent. Carey, in reply, protested that he would remain in Dublin, but the authorities pointed out to him that he would receive no police protection, and that on no condition would he be allowed to remain in Ireland. It is inferred from this action that the extradition proceedings in the case of Walsh, Sheridan and Tynan, will be abandoned.

Lord Derby, the British Colonial Secretary, in reply to a deputation, said the Cabinet would defer their decision relative to the annexation of New Guinea to Queensland, until they had received a full report on the matter from the Queensland Government.

The contributions of Peter's Pence have continued to decrease so rapidly during the past few months that an appeal, addressed to all the Bishops, is being prepared by the Pope, urging them to awaken the faithful to the necessity of providing funds for the use of the See.

The Voltaire says that the French commander in Madagascar has been instructed to withdraw his forces from that country only after Queen Ranavalona has recognized the French protectorate specified by the treaties of 1840 and 1841. The Admiral will insist on the right of Frenchmen to own land in Madagascar, and will claim an indemnity of 1,500,000 francs for the cost of the expedition.

It is stated that the Hovas have made overtures with a view to coming to an understanding with France.

The Temps estimates the number of troops who are to be sent to Tonquin at once from Cochinchina, at 1200. This force, it says, will enable Gen. Bouet, the French Commander, to maintain his position at Hanoi until the arrival of the force to be sent out from France. The latter are expected to reach Tonquin about the 10th of Seventh month.

The French have bombarded two ports on the north-west coast of Madagascar, causing great destruction of British and other merchandise. The French man-of-war Forfait, and the British war sloop Dryad have left the harbor. The Malagassy authorities are pressing forward their military preparations.

There is to be held in Paris this year, from the 1st to the 22d of Seventh month, an insect exhibition, organized by the Central Society of Agriculture and Insectology. It will include (1) useful insects; (2) their products in the raw state and in the first transformations; (3) apparatus and instruments used in the preparation of these products; (4) injurious insects and the various processes for either counteracting their ravages or for destroying them, and (5) everything that may be of interest to the student of insectology.

The Paris Temps says: "The object of the recent journey abroad of De Giers, the Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs, was to inform the Powers that Russia was compelled to seek in Armenia an equivalent for the British occupation of Egypt. Gladstone by taking Egypt not only lost the good wishes of France, but reopened the Eastern question, and furnished Russia with a pretext for effecting her immense projects, the last step in which will be the conquest of British India."

At a banquet to Portuguese and Spanish statesmen, given in Madrid on the evening of the 1st instant by the Vice President of the Chamber of Deputies, Castelar made a speech in which he advocated a union between Spain and Portugal. Viscount Amenginha, a Portuguese, in reply pointed out the obstacles to a union between a tranquil nation like the Portuguese and an agitated country like Spain.

An official telegram has been received, stating that the last obstacle to the conclusion of a treaty between Spain and Chili has been removed. The Marquis De La Vega de Armijo, Minister of Foreign Affairs, has informed the Senate that he believed the treaty has already been signed, and that its conditions are honorable to both countries.

The manifesto issued by the Czar on the day of his coronation has created an unfavorable impression in St. Petersburg. A riot occurred on the evening of the 28th ult., among the crowds of people who had assembled in the streets. The mob assaulted the Director of Police, who was endeavoring to restore order. A detachment of Cossacks was called out and dispersed the rioters, one hundred of whom were arrested. The riot did not arise from political causes. The mob was composed of drunken men, who capsized every private equipage within their reach, and tore down and trampled upon the Imperial colors. It was in consequence of this that illuminations were prohibited in St. Petersburg Third-day night, last week.

The health of Prince Bismarck has improved so he is now able to drive and walk out.

In a debate on the customs tariff in the Reich Chamber of Deputies, most of the speakers urged reduction of the land tax, in order to aid agricultural interests, which they said were too greatly threatened by American competition.

A Committee of the Mexican Congress has reported a bill, and it has passed first reading, authorizing President to liquidate the national debt, excepting debts of the Empire, those of the Miramon and Zuloag Governments and claims already rejected. Claims admitted by the Mexican and American Mixed Commission and those for railroad subventions are not affected by the proposed settlement. The Executive is authorized to issue bonds bearing three per cent. interest, be receivable for Government lands, adjudicated property and letters patent, the debt to remain national. The details of the settlement involving the amount cognized are left entirely to the Executive.

In the Argentine Republic there are now about 10,000 miles of railroads in course of construction. There are 10,000 navvies, who are nearly all European emigrants, employed on these extensive works, and it is stated that in no former period of the history of the country has there been such feverish activity in the building of railways. The Roca Government is carrying out a policy which will eventually change the face of the country and give immense development to the interior provinces. The Government of Buenos Ayres has followed in the wake of the Roca policy, in this province alone there are over 2000 kilometers of railway in course of construction.

To E. Comfort.

"Wilmington, Del., 9th mo. 2d, 1827.

My dear friend,—(After allusion to some humbling crosses and exercises which seemed to be in the line of duty, W. S. thus proceeds:) However we may be persuaded that high and important concerns are dependent upon faithfulness in little things, yet it is difficult often to persuade others and particularly superficial observers, that this can be the case. There is some effect produced which is foreign to our natural senses. I do feel very full of laying too great stress upon my own sins, or attributing them to a higher motive than that of my own begetting; yet when I find in myself a constraining influence which, while it contradicts my own private views of things and my own inclinations, yet draws to the performance of any service and makes it manifestly my duty, feeling at the same time those strong consolations which abound to the soul when in the Divine presence, flowing in and covering with the spirit of supplication and deep humiliation, I cannot conclude that this influence is supernatural and from above. But oh! I write tremblingly, in view of the awful responsibility it involves. What solemn professions are these! What prospects open! Indeed, when at times I have viewed the subject, and when I looked at the profession I am making, I have been ready to shudder at myself, and to ask, can this be reality? I think there are some who can be aware of the state of my mind; and when looking myself into it, and considering the strange and new scenes which have opened before me, and the pressure of things which seems to lie continually upon me, I scarcely know what to say. I am not melancholy. I do not feel sorrowful, except our poor and stripped Society comes in view. It is not dullness; but it is a feeling of awfulness and solemnity which covers my mind and oftentimes settles in my countenance. I feel like one whose every earthly tie was broken up (that is as regards selfish attachments;) and like a sojourner to remain ready for some heavenly vocation.

With what freedom do I speak! but indeed, my dear friend, what else could I say? These are the subjects upon which my meditations day and night; and they are such as I cannot dissipate without doing violence to my best judgment. Well, pray for me, that I may be humbly devoted and wholly dedicated to Him who gave me life and being, who has manifested himself to me in the powerful visitations of his love, and whose tender mercies are over all the workmanship of his hands. Pray too that I may be preserved from the delusive manifestations of him who is the prince of the power of the air, and who is ever ready to devour and destroy. O! I think I have truly desired that in all my steppings along I might be preserved from the snares of this father of lies; he is laying wait for us every moment, and unless we are steadily concerned to have our habitation in the Rock of ages, great is our danger; great is my danger if once the heavenly habitation is left. Well, my soul is humbled in believing that the everlasting Helper of his people is still near them, and that He does hear and answer those who sincerely cry unto and wait upon Him from day to day. In this conclusion I sometimes find consolation, peace, and rest." * * *

To Sarah Hillman.

"10th mo. 20th, 1827.

* * * I think thou wilt understand and believe me when I say, that in considering the deep conflicts, the humbling baptisms and afflictions, which those who are called upon publicly to proclaim the day of the Lord have to endure, both on their own account that their vessels may be kept clean and prepared for the wine of the kingdom and fit for the Master's use, and also on account of a backsliding and perverse generation,—I say I think thou wilt believe me if I tell thee that I would gladly withdraw from partaking in these bitter cups of sorrow and from the travail and labor and trial which to these abound. But earnestly desirous as I feel of delivering my own soul, and being made willing at seasons, and indeed desirous of promoting the cause of my dear Redeemer, who hath delivered me out of much adversity, I dare not for a moment entertain the thought of fleeing from these things; but rather to desire that I may be purged from the dross and tin of transgression, and in this way be more and more prepared rightly and with clean hands to compass and to offer acceptable sacrifices upon the altar of the Most High. O, for the accomplishment of this, how have my prayers and tears been poured out of latter time with strong crying to Him who seeth in secret! How have the secret pollutions of my own heart been laid open before me! and how have I had mournfully to deplore the infirmity and defection which I have found there! Farewell. Remember me in thy approaches to Him who is able to keep us from falling, and to present us faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy, to whom be glory and honor forever and ever; saith thy affectionate friend and brother (I hope) in the bond of the gospel. W. S."

To E. C.

"Philadelphia, 3d mo. 13th, 1828.

* * * I think I shall not be unsafe in saying, that there remains to be an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast, in the hope that does prevail that I shall one day see the salvation of God. My prayers and tears are poured out day by day for preservation; and that if I am at all favored to come up out of this sorrowful condition, and to witness an establishment in that which is eternal, it may be with added stones of memorial to the everlasting loving-kindness of the great Shepherd of the sheep. If these seasons, wherein faith and patience are tried to the very uttermost, prove but a preparation for an exceeding and eternal weight of glory, I pray that I may be enabled to hold out to the end, so as in the close of life to say: 'I have fought a good fight, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which fadeth not away.' * *

* * * And now I may affectionately bid thee farewell; and although my mind is brought very low at seasons, which I have endeavored to give thee some idea of, even the kind of food I subsist upon, yet at this moment, as well as at some other times, when I remember the days at the right hand of the Most High, I can reverently acknowledge his mercy; and, in the sensible feeling of it, desire to commit and recommend thee with my own soul to his blessed care and keeping. There is surely in the great Creator of all, mercy and forgiveness to be found; and if we can but lay hold by faith on this, I sometimes believe there is no moving the soul thus established from its anchorage; but that it will remain unmoved amid all the tempests of time, and finally, through exceeding mercy, obtain an eternity of bliss."

To the same.

* * * Our friends George and Ann Jones* arrived this day a week ago. I had intended to call upon them soon after their arrival, but I really felt so poor and worthless and unworthy of their notice, that I was afraid to go to their place of tarriance lest I should not be a desirable visitor. But on Second-day morning, having business down town, I made J. Paul's† in my way; though I did not know when I had felt so destitute of everything like good as upon that occasion. When they came in, dear Ann gave me the enclosed communication of sympathy and tender solicitude on my account, which she had written on First-day saying: 'If it is not too late.' Their tenderness to me affected me much; and after sitting a little time with some conversation, we had a religious opportunity together alone; which I hope thankfully to remember. The stream of gospel love drew her into the expression of near and tender sympathy and unity with me in a way of which I cannot but think myself utterly unworthy.

How precious, how enlivening, and how extensive in its influence is Divine love! What an inexhaustible fountain! How pure is that which is opened in the blessed and holy Redeemer, who died for us and rose again for our justification! Very deep and earnest have been my desires that I may know more of this heavenly substance which nourishes up the soul unto everlasting life, and whereby we have good hope through faith in Him. O, I have panted after Him; my soul has and does pant and thirst after God, after the living God; and in many seasons when I have felt my distance from Him, the plaintive language has arisen from my heart in groans that could not be uttered.

May both of us experience more and more of a willingness to go down into the valley of Achor, and to pass under the operation of the fire and the sword of the Lord's Spirit, that so we may become fit for members of the spiritual household, who shall show forth the praises of Him who hath called us out of darkness into his marvellous light; and who if we hold fast to the end will make us partakers of an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled and which fadeth not away."

For "The Friend."

Concerning Household Games and Gambling.

One evening, several months ago, after reaching home from my place of business, I became spectator—or, rather, auditor—of a little game of my children, which was one entirely new to me. There was involved in it, as the most conspicuous feature, the frequent repetition of four words, the use of which seemed quite devoid of the element of good sense or of any sense, and only calculated to fill a child's brain with a meaningless and profitless iteration. My fear as to the injuriously-persistent effect of this exercise was quickly and curiously verified; for, as I was dressing the following morning, my little boy of eight, suddenly awaking, sprang quickly out of bed, and began to repeat the four words of the game as though he had left off saying them but a minute before.

We are not to look for old heads on young shoulders; yet, even in the choice of their childish entertainments, we may not be forgetful of the endeavor to aid the little ones to order their conversation aright. It was said of Elizabeth Fry, I think, that from the time of her seventeenth year, her first waking thoughts were invariably directed toward the Father of lights,—a beautiful and convincing proof, we may say, of the being of a Creator, and of the immortality of the soul of the creature. It were not well, therefore, to bind foolishness in the heart of the child, and to so saturate his mind with words without meaning, as that his first thought of the morning will assuredly not be one which shall wing its way upward.

When being driven to a station in a mountain locality, several summers ago, I was much edified by the remarks of the farmer-driver, a Primitive Methodist or Wesleyan elder, upon the subject of children's games,—a careful scrutiny or oversight of which, by the parents or care-takers, he believed to be of the utmost importance. His remarks were afresh brought to mind upon reading an article on "Household Games" in a late issue of that excellent family paper, The (Boston) Christian. A sad circumstance, of which the following is a brief abstract, is there related.

"The parents of an only child, being sincerely desirous of keeping him from the contaminating example of his gay and careless associates, adopted the plan of bringing into their home the same amusements he might have had outside, and to join with him in them. Card-playing, of all amusements, was his choice, and being fully indulged in this to the extent that nearly every evening was given up to it, the Bible was necessarily neglected, and, indeed, almost forgotten. The lad became quite expert at all games, and soon had a reputation for skill and quickness of thought. His father dying when the boy was about fifteen years old, the mother's company was forsaken for the gambling saloon, and her property was taken by him and squandered. Finally, straying into a saloon when he had obtained almost her last dollar, he laid the money upon the gaming table with the words, 'My money or death.' The game was played and lost; then, with a look of despair he raised his hand, struck his opponent violently upon the temple, and killed him instantly. Being arrested, tried, and condemned to death, he requested the privilege of meeting the young men of the place and all his acquaintances, to whom he earnestly and pathetically spoke upon the peril of learning amusements that could be turned into tools for the devil's work. To his pale and greatly distressed mother, who sat by his side supported by some friends, he desired not to use the language of reproach, knowing her kind and loving heart, yet, that other fathers and mothers might take warning, he judged it his duty to refer to that mistaken lenity which had fostered the desire to indulge in card-playing and other games, which had made easy the way to the gambling-saloon, and had now brought him to the unenviable place where they now saw him. The convicting and heart-changing power of the Spirit had worked powerfully with him while in prison, and it was believed that, in God's merciful providence, he died not without hope."

Accordant with the foregoing is the testimony of Dr. Holland: "I have this moment ringing in my ears the dying injunction of my father's early friend, 'Keep your son from cards. Over them I have murdered time and lost heaven.'"

An anxious mother, not long ago, wrote the following letter relating to "Gambling in the Parlor," to Dr. Prime, editor of the New York Observer:

"While I am writing, the children, with two or three of their young friends, are at play in the parlor. The word play does not mean what it did when I was in my teens, as my children are now. Nor will I undertake to say that the plays of my younger days were more innocent and less dangerous than those now enjoyed by young people. I was brought up to regard the game of cards with decided aversion, as always associated more or less intimately with gambling. If every one playing cards was not actually gambling, it was supposed to lead to it, and if boys and girls became fond of the game, there was every reason to fear they would fall into that vice by and by. But now it is common to see card-playing among the amusements of the evening in the best families. At summer hotels all sorts of people, which must include good people, play cards all day long, especially when the weather keeps them in the house. I observe that they play for small sums of money, so very small as not to make it unpleasant to lose, and not large enough to excite any great anxiety to win. The young people in the parlor at home, or in little circles in one another's houses, are in the habit of playing for 'favors,' trifling articles which they freely give and take in other social pastimes. Now they win or lose them in a game of cards. My children and their young friends are playing for 'favors' now while I am writing; am very anxious about it; they have grown so much wiser than their parents, that they are sure there is no harm in it. They tell me that the children of ministers play in the same way; and what I say seems to be of no use. Do you think it is right? Will it be too much to ask you to give your opinion in one of your letters?"

The editor says, in reply, that the danger of indulging in games of chance or skill, owing to the forfeit, irrespective of size, whether it be a "favor" or a fortune; and that he is convinced that nine instances out of ten—perhaps nineteen out of twenty—wrong doing by clerks, bank-tellers and cashiers, treasurers, speculators, and others, may be traceable to the first step of a game of cards played for a mere trifle,—perhaps secretly in the barn or up in the attic, hiding from parents who, they know, would forbid the practice. "It may be a total misapprehension on my part," he says, "but I think cards have wrought more evil in the world than any other device of the Evil One to tempt men to their ruin." If we include Mohammedans and Buddhists in the category, I think the estimate of the above writer is probably accordance with the truth.

There is more of turpitude in the offering of him who is a well-dressed patronizer of "bucket-shops," or who frequents the stock exchange with speculative intent, than attaches to the ragged penny-pitching newsboy or boot-black, whose surroundings and who opportunities to follow the right, have been so inferior. But, while the former are not disturbed by the law, it would be vain to believe or hope that the street Arabs' gambling ventures for a cent or a dime, played in back streets nigh the newspaper publication house, will be checked. The writer has frequently felt a sympathy for this degraded and terrible exposed class of our great city's population, inveterate patronizers of low theatres, music-halls as so many of them are, and, while they are able to read, partaking so generally of that which simply stimulates to lives of license and crime. Inquiry of the Chief of Police elicited the statement that the lads of this class are frequently arrested—three, four or half-a-dozen at a time—for indulging their gaming propensities, but, after a short detention in the station-house lock-up, they are usually dismissed with a sharp reprimand. A query has hence often arisen with me, as to whether those of us who are measured alive to the need of constant parental control in our own families and neighborhoods, are wisely in encouraging the employment of y young in pursuits so morally hazzardous, removed from responsible guardianship, as those of the newsboy and boot-black. The hands of modern civilization seem very pressing and imperative, and the lowly avocations spoken of have a place and will not be relinquished; yet it ought not to be too much to expect of a State aiming to be Christian, that it should impose such limitations as age, place, and manner of carrying on or participating in the business, by minors, as would relieve it from some of the perils which surround it.

J. W. L.

Richard Hall.

From The Annual Monitor we condense the following account of this dear friend—who, though personally unknown, was a valued correspondent of the Editor. His letters need not only religious feeling, but also a richness of judgment, and a correct appreciation of the condition of things in our Society of the character of the influences operating to lead away from the original principles of Friends.—Ed.]

He was an Elder, residing at Wigton, Cumberland, Eng., and deceased 17th of 10th mo. 1835, aged 66 years.

He was born at Alston, on the 3d of 5th mo. 1769. At about the age of nine years he was sent to Wigton School, to which institution his father and mother shortly followed, and he held the offices of superintendent and housekeeper from 1826 to 1829. Many have been the testimonies to their great kindness to those under their care, and to the deep concern for their welfare which they manifested. On leaving the institution they settled at Waverton, about a mile from the school, in which he retained a lively interest. From this time till a few months before his decease, Richard Hall resided at Waverton, and kept up not only the same interest in the school, but also a most active service in various ways to the benefit of the institution, of which he was Treasurer for many years, his Christian counsel and help being much valued by those connected with it.

Under date Fifth mo. 3d, 1835, his journal records: "I am twenty years of age to-day. I may very aptly say, 'few and evil have been the days of the years of my life.' For though I have been preserved in great measure, especially for the last six or seven years, from many of the evils so extensively prevalent among men in our days, and have endeavored to keep my conscience clear of offence in the sight of God and man, walking before Him in sincerity and uprightness, yet I find abundant cause for sorrow and deep contrition for a frequent neglect of a close and diligent watch being kept, thereby, perhaps, losing some portion of divine enjoyment which otherwise I might have been made partaker of."

But if it be the will of God that I should live another year, I humbly desire that I may be kept more watchful, and dependent on his leadings and instructions, whether it be through a state of deep probation and chastisement, or the more encouraging disabatement of his light and love."

In 1838 Richard Hall was married to Mary Williamson, of Allonby. In reference to this, he says, "The earnest prayer of my heart is that we may be preserved to walk in his fear the days of our lives."

In reference to the opening year, he writes

(First month 4th, 1843): "Though I may safely say it is the chief concern of my mind, and my desires are fervent at times to be preserved from things offensive in the Divine sight, yet the weakness and frailty of human nature is so great that it requires a constant and earnest watch, as becomes the humble follower of a meek and crucified Redeemer."

He was a diligent attender of all our meetings, and reverent in waiting on the Lord therein; and humble as were his views of himself, he became qualified for service in the Church in no common degree. He often represented his Quarterly Meeting at the Yearly Meeting, and in the various conferences held in London, giving up his time freely to the service of truth.

In 1856 he was appointed an elder as well as overseer, in reference to which he writes: "Oh, how I desire and crave that I may be helped to discharge my various duties in the wisdom which is of God, and be enabled to dwell in his fear."

First month 4th, 1858.—In reference to the Quarterly Meeting, he writes: "It was an interesting meeting, though there is at present much to discourage. Our friend — was largely drawn out in the language of earnest exhortation to individual faithfulness. He seemed animated with a hopeful feeling that if faithfulness was abode in, a revival would yet take place amongst us, and a bright day succeed. How ardently I desire this. May I be found faithful on my part to what may be called for at my hands, although I often feel so utterly weak as if nothing could be expected from me: yet there is no lack of strength with Him who ought to rule and reign in our hearts. May I wait reverently for his help, and be willing to be anything, or nothing, as He may think meet."

It is believed that the desire above recorded was answered. He was often introduced into lively exercise on behalf of his friends and the Society of which he was a member, and when utterance was given, his communications in the line of the ministry, though brief, were accompanied with much solemnity; their heart-tendering effect on the hearers evincing the source from whence they were derived.

Fourth month 22nd, 1865.—R. H. records the decease of his eldest daughter, a young woman of great promise, who died in her 24th year. "It is with deeply sorrowful feelings I now record the departure of our dearly loved daughter Ann, after a tedious and at times very painful illness, during the changes of which the tendency was greatly towards increased weakness and prostration. * * The dear creature was, on Fourth-day evening last, about eight o'clock, gently liberated from further trial and suffering, and fell asleep in Christ her gracious Saviour. She bore her sufferings with great meekness and patient resignation which was very teaching to us all. A sweet feeling always surrounded her as a heavenly atmosphere. Her desires were evidently fixed on celestial things, faithfully obeying and yielding her heart to the moulding, transforming operation of Divine grace, so that a comfortable assurance is vouchsafed us, in great mercy, that an entrance is granted her into the realms of eternal bliss, evermore to be with her Lord and Saviour, and in the company of purified spirits, blessing and praising his ever excellent name. She has been an excellent example in our family, and her memory will be long cherished with loving interest by us all. The powers of articulation failed her for the last twelve hours, except to express a few words of comfort to me, and her feeling of resignation to the Divine will."

R. and M. Hall were soon called upon to resign another of their family, their youngest son dying the following month. In reference to this he writes (Fifth month 20th):—

"It is a very great trial to us thus to part with our dear children, but it is our earnest desire to submit with quiet resignation to the will of our Heavenly Father, who, we know, does all things well. We cannot doubt but it is in his great mercy that He is gathering home these dear lambs, secure from all future trials and temptations. And in depriving us of those whom we so tenderly love, I reverently trust it is the Lord's gracious design that we, their parents and near connections, should henceforth place our thoughts and affections on heavenly treasure, and submit to this as a refining discipline; believing that it is not in anger that He thus deals with us."

That a deep, earnest wrestling after heavenly good for his children and others was often the covering of his mind is evinced by the following entry:—

"Tenth month 16th, 1871.—Our dear son thus leaving the parental roof to mingle with the world, and be perhaps even more than formerly exposed to its many temptations and snares, has been cause of no small anxiety to us, his parents. We feel our inability to control the fallen nature in our children, or others over whom we wish to exert an influence, unless the All-powerful One is pleased to work on their hearts by his convincing and converting power, giving them to feel their obligations to Him as well as to their earthly parents, and enduing them with ability to serve Him faithfully. May this be the case with our dear —, he being preserved from evil on the right hand and on the left, and being willing to own Christ before men."

"Twelfth month 21st, 1871.—The attendance at our Quarterly Meeting was larger than sometimes (for mid-winter), and towards the conclusion I thought we were favored with the solemnizing influence of Divine Power. Oh, how precious is this tendering, solemnizing influence; and how thankful we ought to be when favored therewith; and how careful to walk consistently with its guidance."

In the Twelfth month, 1879, having for more than twelve months been afflicted with shortness of breath, he was advised to try a short residence at a locality at a high elevation above the sea. With this view, Richard and Mary Hall spent some weeks at Alston. This visit to the home of his childhood was very interesting and pleasant to him, though not productive of permanent improvement in his health.

In the Third month, 1880, he was appointed a member of a Committee of Holm Monthly Meeting, to visit its members and attenders. After entering on the service, he says:—

"The duty imposed upon us by the meeting feels exceedingly weighty to myself, and, I think, to some others. May we be preserved in faithfulness to what we may be entrusted with as the Divine requiring, and be rightly restrained from offering anything in our own will and strength. Above all, may we each be concerned honestly to examine ourselves, and see whether in all things we walk consistently with our high profession."

The temperance movement had his ready and constant practical support, and he was much interested in disseminating its principles amongst his neighbors. The cause and principles of peace were also dear to him. In upholding his testimony against all war, he felt it right to refuse payment of the addition to the income-tax, made to defray the expenses of the Abyssinian war.

Though thus faithful in practice, no one could be more deeply sensible of his own unworthiness. He felt that he had been forgiven much, and therefore he loved much. A minute of his Monthly Meeting testifies of him that, "With simplicity and deep humility he strove to serve and honor the Lord, both in the exercise of his office as an elder, and in the discharge of the daily duties of life. He was through Divine grace an example to the flock of watchfulness in conduct and conversation, and of firm allegiance to the cause of Truth."

The close of his life came on gradually, though his strength failed rapidly towards the last. Feeling his end approaching, he gave a message of "love to all Friends far and near." He frequently advised his children to live in "the fear of the Lord, which is as a fountain of life, preserving from the snares of death." On being asked if he felt that he was accepted, he said, "Yes; unworthy as I am, by the mercy of God through Christ Jesus." He also said, "I have endeavored to love the Lord with all my heart, with all my soul, with all my mind, and with all my strength." His voice gradually failed, and after bidding his wife and children, separately, "Farewell!" he passed most peacefully away.

Red Cloud's Gold Mine.—Only the other day Red Cloud, once the terror of the frontier, sent word to Washington that he had found a gold mine on his reservation, and did not wish to be disturbed for ten years in working it.

Yet it would be an extraordinary change in Indian policy were Red Cloud really allowed to work his gold mine in peace. That his tribe holds its reserve by a title as sound as any estate in fee simple in the city of New York can hardly be questioned. But the practice of our country has been that, whenever the land of Indians is found to be specially covetable, by coaxing or coercion it must be transferred to white men. As this has been the experience of the Sioux, no less than of other tribes, Red Cloud feels it to be necessary to formally request to be let alone. Only a year or two ago about a million acres were taken from the Utes, because the land was valuable for agriculture; but when a vein of precious metal is found on a reservation, nobody waits for negotiation to get rid of the Indian owners, but there is a general rush of prospectors and diggers upon territory which the Government has solemnly pledged its word to keep free from invasion. No power has ever been able, under such circumstances, to keep the red men from being driven out. Red men have hitherto had no rights in gold mines which whites felt bound to respect.

The last Sioux war arose out of the intrusion of gold hunters into the Black Hills, and the origin of Chief Joseph's war can be traced back to the removal of the Nez Percés from their homes because gold was found on their lands. The course sanctioned by precedent would therefore be for prospectors to rush upon the Ogallala reservation, in consequence of Red Cloud's perilously frank announcement. Trouble would come at once; the troops would be called upon to aid the cause of civilization, and to save our countrymen from savage foes; war would follow, and after the customary expenditure of money and blood we should get Red Cloud's gold mine, and, perhaps, send him and his most bitter warriors to the Dry Tortugas.

As it is now, Indians may be found starving who once owned ore of almost boundless wealth. Instead of looking upon this last as the source of support for the Indians, and a prospective means of filling their country with everything that would attract them to civilized life, it has hitherto been made to illustrate the Scriptural paradox that from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath.—*N. TO A SWALLOW BUILDING UNDER OUR EAVES.

These lines were written by Jane Welch Carlyle, wife of the well-known Author, after she had been in London and Edinburgh, and returned to the quiet and seclusion of the Scottish moors.

Thou too hast travelled, little fluttering thing—
Hast seen the world, and now thy weary wing

Thou too must rest.
But much, my little bird, couldst thou but tell,
I'd give to know why here thou lik'st so well
To build thy nest.

For thou hast passed fair places in thy flight:
A world lay all beneath thee where to light;
And, strange thy taste,
Of all the varied scenes that met thine eye—
Of all the spots for building 'neath the sky—
To choose the waste.

Did fortune try thee? was thy little purse
Perchance run low, and thou, afraid of worse,
Felt here secure?
Ah no! thou need'st not gold, thou happy one!
Thou knowest it not. Of all God's creatures, man Alone is poor!

What was it, then? some mystic turn of thought,
Caught under German eaves, and hither brought,
Marring thine eye
For the world's loveliness, till thou art grown
A sober thing that dost but moan and moan,
Not knowing why?

Nay, if thy mind be sound, I need not ask,
Since here I see thee working at thy task
With wing and beak.
A well-laid scheme doth that small head contain,
At which thou workest, brave bird, with might and main,
Nor more need'st seek.

In truth, I rather take it thou hast got
By instinct wise much sense about thy lot,
And hast small care
Whether an Eden or a desert be Thy home, so thou remain'st alive, and free
To skim the air.

God speed thee, pretty bird; may thy small nest
With little ones all in good time be blest.
I love thee much;
For well thou managest that life of thine,
While I! oh, ask not what I do with mine!
Would I were such.

"To the sunny soul that is full of hope,
And whose beautiful trust ne'er faileth,
The grass is green and the flowers are bright,
Though the winter storm prevaileth.

Better to hope, though the clouds hang low,
And to keep the eyes still lifted;
For the sweet blue sky will soon peep through
When the ominous clouds are rifted.

There was never a night without a day,
Or an evening without a morning;
And the darkest hour, as the proverb goes,
Is the hour before the dawning."

CALLING THE SPRING FLOWERS.

The sun looked forth one day in spring,
When merry winds were blowing,
And shouted, "Winter, haste away!
Soft streams, begin your flowing.

"Lift up, lift up, fair flowers, your heads,
Each in your destined order;
In forest aisles, in garden beds,
In meadow, lane, and border."

Beneath the dead leaves of the past,
Under the snows departing,
A stir began. O, glad and fast
The listening flowers were starting.

Anemone and Liverwort
Rose in their woody places,
With soft, white mantles on their heads,
Veiling their tender faces.

Arbutus, "best beloved of spring,"
Shook off her snowy cover,
And laughed to hear red robin sing—
The brisk, courageous rover!

She spread her waxen garments wide,
And touched with fragrant fingers
Meek Violet, sleeping near her side,
"My dove-eyed sister lingers."

Blood-root, with pallid cheeks, arose,
And Star-flower, pure and tender,
Shone out from cool, damp shelters, where Soon bloomed Wood-sorrel slender.

Then yellow Cowslip hasted on,
With tufts of wholesome bitter;
And golden King-cup marched along,
Rank after rank a glitter.

But first came laughing Dandelion,
Arcturus of the meadow;
Till suddenly his golden plumes
Changed to a wingéd shadow.

Sweet Violet awoke and smiled,
With Innocent beside her;
Waiting for Wildrose, fair as wild,
For Violet must guide her.

On the Desert.

ARAB LAW—CONVENT OF ST. CATHERINE.

"I was curious to know about the form of Government, of which the sheikh could speak by authority. It is patriarchal, just as it has been from the earliest times, and passes from sire to son through many generations. Our friend who was sitting before us could trace his line for hundreds of years. His power had come down from former generations, and from him would pass to his descendants after him."

"But how about the administration of justice in a country where there is no law, at least no written code, no lawyers or gentlemen of the jury, and even no prison or place of execution? Yet there must be some kind of rude justice, or society could not exist. The sheikh explained that in offences against property, one who steals from another must restore not only the amount, but many-fold. If the thief runs away, the man whom he has robbed need not trouble himself, for he has only to levy on his nearest relations. Anybody belonging to the family will do. He may seize the property of a brother or cousin who in turn must look after his rascally kinman. This is better than all the laws in the world against stealing, at least all laws which could be administered against the Arabs of the desert, for it enlists the family feeling which is stronger than the sense of right or wrong, or even the fear of individual punishment. A man who commits a theft brings tribution on his whole household, who must suffer if he escapes, while in any case his act ends with them with disgrace.

As to offences against the person, there is a rigid and inexorable law—a law older than Roman law, for Moses found it on the desert more than three thousand years ago; it is the lex talionis—blood for blood, life for life.

We questioned the sheikh very closely regarding to the blood feud, of which we had heard so much. He answered without any reserve, that by the immemorial laws of the Arabs, if one of the tribe killed another, the brother of the murdered man could take the murderer into his own hands, and kill the murderer. Not only was he at liberty to do so, but he must do it—it was a point of honor, neglect of which would be a disgrace. If the murderer ran away, then the slayer need not go in pursuit of him. There is no ‘law’s eye’ on the desert to prevent his taking his vengeance. If he cannot find the murderer, he may kill the murderer’s brother, or his cousin. I believe the license of revenge does not go farther than to this degree of relation; but within this range of consanguinity the avenger may exact life for life. To this extent indeed he must go. Some life he must take. The blood of his brother cries from the ground, and must not go unavenged. But if he kills the brother or cousin, he cannot come and kill the murderer, for the law of revenge is satisfied. One life has paid for another life.

This seems a terrible law—that of blood for blood; and yet it is perhaps the best law on the desert, for the restraint it imposes on the passions of the people. The Arab knows that the shedding of blood will bring on a family feud, that will not end till the hands of his victim’s brother are imbrued in his own blood; and that from the instant he sheds blood, there is a mark upon his forehead like that of the forehead of Cain, giving license to whoever meets him to kill him—a retribution hanging round him from which he cannot escape. Though he mount the swiftest mule, and flee across the desert, though he hide in the mountains, the avenger of blood is on his track, and sooner or later he must pay the penalty of his deed. The knowledge of this is the most powerful preventive of crime.

Our travellers became quite attached to their guides, but on their arrival at Nukhl, were compelled to part with them in submission to one of the Bedaween customs. At that point they entered the territory of another tribe, and these claimed the sole right of levying tribute on travellers who passed through their country. Their old servants were unwilling to part from them, and offered to divide with the new tribe whatever they might receive. But the Bedaween of Nukhl were inexorable. To furnish mules and camels for travellers was the special privilege and perquisite of the tribe in whose territory they were, which they would not surrender. Taking advantage of the necessities of the travellers, who must have their mules and camels, they compelled them to pay a large sum beyond the regular price for conveying them to Gaza. Our author thus truly philosophizes on the transaction.

Perhaps some may think we felt great anger and indignation at the sheikh and his rascals who cheated us so roundly. On the contrary, we thought ourselves extremely fortunate that they had not cheated us still more. We had fallen among thieves, and they acted after their kind. They might have asked us a hundred pounds too much instead of thirty—or five hundred, for that matter—and we could not have helped ourselves.”

The tribes among whom they were going are much more given to robbing, and making marauding excursions into the territory of other tribes, than the more gentle Bedaween of Sinai. Field and his companions had a narrow escape from being stripped owing to their imprudence in going too far in advance of the company. To steal as a thief, would be disreputable, but robbery is regarded much in the same light that the profession of arms is in civilized countries.

When at Sinai, the party were entertained at the Convent of St. Catherine, famous as the place where Tischendorf discovered the Sinaitic manuscript—one of the oldest and most valuable copies of the Bible that is known to exist.

“The convent does not stand, as I had supposed, high up on the side of Mount Sinai (I had imagined it perched on a cliff overlooking the valley below), but at its foot, and not in front, but on one side between two mountains, where indeed it fills up almost the whole pass, leaving but a few rods more than room for the camel-path that winds around it. In this confined space the monks have made a paradise in the wilderness. As we approached, we were delighted with the sight of blossoming trees. To be sure, there were a few funereal-looking cypresses, which seemed in harmony with the general desolation. But mingled with this dark foliage were trees in full bloom—the almond, the cherry, the peach, and the apricot, the olive and the orange, with a single fine specimen of the carob tree, which yields ‘the husks that the swine did eat,’ and which (though its pods be destined to such an ignoble use) is really quite a majestic tree. Around and among these trees were extensive gardens, carefully cultivated, and yielding fresh vegetables in abundance. Was there ever a sight more grateful to the eyes of weary travellers, after a long journey on the desert?”

“The convent is a range of buildings grouped in a quadrangle of such extent that hundreds of pilgrims could easily be lodged within its numerous courts, and which thus suggests the idea of a huge Eastern caravanserai, and at the same time of a fortress, for its very construction tells plainly that it was built long ago, in times when it was a post of danger, to be held against attack. Its walls are like ramparts, with port-holes and watch-towers, and a strong gateway like one that opens into a fort. Indeed not fifty years ago strangers who found shelter here were not admitted by an open gate, but were drawn up in a basket, and swung into a window in the third or fourth story. The great rope still hangs outside in token of its former use, and we afterwards amused ourselves by putting it round us and taking a seat as in a swing, while the monks above lifted us from the ground. But this danger has passed away of later years, since Russia has taken the convent under its protection; and now it has an arched portal, through which a party mounted on camels can ride into an outer court. Into this we rode, and dismounted in front of the heavier and stronger wall of the fortress. Entrance farther is obtained only by a letter from the Greek patriarch at Cairo, which we had brought with us, and sent by an attendant to the Prior of the Convent. The walls are seven feet thick, quite sufficient to resist any attack but that of modern artillery. The postern is just high enough for a man’s head, and the passage so narrow that it admits but one person at a time. The door which shuts this entrance is like the door of a prison, of massive oak, barred and spiked with iron.”

(To be concluded.)

For “The Friend.”

Persons can scarcely be said to be in a state of mind to judge rightly upon any important subject, or as to the propriety of any great undertaking, whose minds are so much under the influence of their inclinations as to have no ear to hear any reason or argument which comes from the other side, or any desire to hear.

Experience of life teaches that this state of eagerness to carry out any project, however seemingly disinterested we may be, should be passed safely through, as a stage of mental disorder, before we can be in a condition rightly to decide upon any course of action.

For “The Friend.”

Religious Items, &c.

Temperance.—The African M. E. Zion Conference, on 5th mo. 18th, adopted a resolution binding its members to abstain from the use of intoxicating liquors, and to do all in their power to persuade others to abstain from them.

Falling from Righteousness.—The Boston Transcript thus sarcastically alludes to the exultation with which every slip from right is noted and commented on by the public press and by many private individuals:

“In heaven, we are told, there is more joy over one sinner that repenteth than over ninety-and-nine who have never gone astray. It is just the other way here below. There is more joy over one righteous man who goes astray than over ninety-and-nine thousand sinners who have kept at it all their lives.”

Judicial Oaths.—The bill introduced into the British Parliament to substitute an affirmation for the oath now required of its members on their admission, was defeated by a majority of three only in a total vote of 581. This indicates the probability that the measure will probably become a law in the future. The London Guardian says: “The vice of the present test is that it is at once useless and profane—useless in that it lets Atheists in; profane, that it drives them to swear by a Deity in whom they do not believe.” The Ledger of this city remarks on the subject of oaths in general, “It is an old proverb, that the man who will deliberately lie, will swear to it.” “Official oaths are of but little value as checks on badly inclined men, and they do embarrass good men now and then.”

Relative Cost of War and Education.—Donnat, a Belgian statistician, has collected some figures, showing the comparative amounts expended by European nations upon war and education. Russia presents the greatest contrast. That nation spends $2.50 for war and three cents per head for education. The unsettled state of that country in comparison with Switzerland is a powerful argument for education, for the latter country expends on its army only about the same sum as for education. For the army, $1.16; and for schools, $1 per capita. France spends $4.84 for the army, and only thirty-four cents for schools, per head. The other figures stand:

	War.	Education.
England, . . .	$4 50	$0 74
Holland, . . .	4 32	76
German States, .	11 10	2 44
Denmark, . . .	2 08	1 07
Italy, . . .	1 80	16
Belgium, . . .	1 62	27
Austria, . . .	1 60	30

The comparison is a dismal one in the best figures for education, but in each case the statistics cover only the outlay of the central Governments.—Chr. Adv.

Von Schleumbach's Labors in Berlin.—Von Schleumbach is a Methodist preacher who has been laboring principally among the poorer classes in Berlin—renting halls and inviting the people by hand-bills to attend his meetings in them. The character of the State Church and the law prohibiting any one from preaching who had not passed a regular theological examination, threatened to obstruct his course. So much success attended his labors that he was encouraged to purchase for a Christian Association Hall a large dance-hall, which had been a notorious haunt of vice. The emperor gave $500 towards the Association, and this royal patronage opened the way of Von Schleumbach and removed the opposition to which he had been exposed.

Congregational.—The Congregationalists of Great Britain have raised a million dollars as a Jubilee Fund.

The Congregational Union of England and Wales has just closed its Annual Meetings, and indicates unusual prosperity.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Pearls.—Pearls are produced by shell-fish, the inner layer of whose shells present the same iridescent appearance, and is often called Mother-of-pearl. The shell is composed of two parts—an epidermis or skin of a horny texture which secretes the shell, and the shelly part proper, which is composed of carbonate of lime with more or less animal matter which binds it together. The pearly lustre is caused by the action of light on the minute layers of which the shell consists. These layers are microscopically wrinkled, and their edges meet the rays of light and decompose them as do the drops of a rainbow, producing the play of colors. This has been proved in two ways; first, by digesting mother-of-pearl in acid until all the lime is dissolved. A pellucid membrane, representing the animal matter, still remains, and if undisturbed still shows the iridescence. But if pressed flat so as to remove the wrinkles, it also loses its pearlyness. Again, similar corrugations have been engraved on the polished surface of a steel button, with the result of producing the pearly play of colors; a process which would have proved commercially valuable could the engraved buttons have been kept from tarnishing.

Pearls consist of the same material as that composing the shell layers, and are deposited around some irritating particle which has found entrance between the valves of the shell-fish. Layer after layer is added until sometimes they become of considerable size.

Fresh-water pearls are mostly obtained from the Northern hemisphere, and require clear streams containing a certain proportion of lime. In Saxony the fishing for them has long been under government regulation—and the beds are examined once in about 10 or 15 years. The valves are pried open and if no pearls are found the animal is restored uninjured to the water.

The artificial production of pearls is sometimes attempted by introducing foreign bodies into the animal, so as to stimulate a deposit of shell about them. In China, the monks of one of the Buddhist monasteries insert small images of Buddha stamped in tin foil between the mantle and the shell at the front end of a large species of muscle. The animal is then placed in an aquarium or tank, and in two or three months a coating of pearl is found to be deposited over the images, which fastens them to the inside of the shell, while the embossed features of the image stand out in relief. The monastery reaps a handsome income from their sale to Buddhist pilgrims.—From a Lecture by W. H. Dall in American Naturalist.

Poison of Mosquito.—Dr. Diermock says: "After having experimented a large number of times with the living mosquito, I am convinced that there is use made of a poisonous saliva. When the insect is allowed to draw its fill on the back of my hand, the subsequent swelling lasts from 40 to 48 hours; and the amount of poisonous effect upon me, as proved by numerous experiments, is in direct proportion to the length of time which the Culex has occupied in actually drawing blood." If these observations are correct, they indicate the wisdom of the natural impulse to drive away these insects when their bite is felt.

Remarkable Fall of Pine Pollen.—"On the 18th of April of the present year, in gathering some water plants from a prairie pond in Central Iowa, I noticed an abundance of what turned out to be pine pollen on the surface of the water. Now there are no native pines in this part of the State, the only pines being those planted for ornamental purposes. None of these however were in bloom, neither were the pine forests of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan and northward. For some days prior to the finding of the pollen, strong southeasterly, south-westerly and westerly winds had prevailed. Doubtless these brought the pollen, but how far it was carried cannot at present be made out. However, it is certain that the distance could not be less than 300 or 400 miles."—C. E. Bessey in American Naturalist.

Research in Sanitary Science.—The Grocers' Company of London, one of the oldest of the city guilds, has created an endowment to promote "original research in sanitary science." This includes three scholarships of £250 a year each, to maintain persons while engaged in work in endeavoring to ascertain the causes of important diseases and the means by which the diseases may be prevented. Candidates for these are expected to state the researches they propose to make. A "Discovery prize" of £1000 is also to be given once in four years, designed to reward original investigations.

A Curious Case of Ignition.—"When serving in H. M. despatch vessel Psyche, 1862-66, we were moored in Port Napoleon, Marseilles, on a bright summer day. A strong smell of burning was traced to the saloon skylight. On bursting open the door of the saloon it was found that a scuttle glass (a plano-convex lens) through which the solar rays were admitted and focused on a rep curtain (which was smouldering) had been substituted for a broken one, but through an oversight had not been ground on the plane surface, usual."—B. Gwynne in Nature.

Tally-sticks.—It is hard to realize that down to the year 1824 the English government gave the taxpayer a notched-stick for a receipt. It is one of the facts that sets out striking form the changes of this century Sir John Lubbock, writing in the Nineteenth Century on the "National Balance Sheet" says:

The old Exchange tallies, for instance, for one of the most curious illustrations of the survival of old forms and customs. The tally was a willow stick, about five feet long, and roughly squared, each side measuring about an inch. On one side the amount was indicated by notches; a notch one and a half inch wide stood for £1,000; one inch £100; three eighths of an inch £10; half of such a notch £1; three-tenths of an inch a shilling; a still smaller one a penny; and a halfpenny by small round hole. A single cut of a notch stood for half the amount. The stick was then split in half through the notches, and one-half of it was given to the person making the payment, the other being kept by the Government. A large number of old tallies were deposited in the vaults under the House of Commons, and the fire by which it was destroyed is said to have been mainly due to them.

Charity in a Dog.—We knew a dog named "Bijou," a thoroughbred Spitzbergen. The house in which he lived was one of a terrace with a verandah running throughout its whole length, only separated by a wooden railway at each house. This verandah was Bijou's favorite resort; here he carried his chicken bones, and here contemplated the proceeding of his neighbors.

One day, a half-starved dog spied one of his bones lying about, carried it to the mat at the door of the next house, and began eagerly to devour it. Bijou saw the thief from the window, sprang out with a threatening growl, carried off the bone and replaced it on his own mat.

"His mistress, who had been watching the action of the dogs, said to him, 'O you greedy dog! You can eat no more, and that poor dog is starving.' Bijou at once picked up the bone of contention, carried it to his starving fellow, laid it before him, and retired to his own house, from the window of which he contemplated, with a benign aspect, the disappearance of the bone."—J. G. Wood's Man and Beast.

THE FRIEND.

SIXTH MONTH 16, 1883.

The Christian Worker, formerly published at New Vienna, Ohio, has passed into the hands of a stock company called the "Publishing Association of Friends," and is now issued from Chicago, in an enlarged form, and under new editorial management. The present proprietors are using much exertion to extend its circulation, and to make it the representative paper of the Society of Friends in the West.

It is with much regret that we observe, in the numbers issued since this change has been ted, the open and unreserved support of these measures which have been for years disturbing the harmony of our Society, causing divisions among us. It refers with approval to the use of "singing" in our meetings, "mourners' bench," "inquiry-room," "place of prayer," "calling for persons to rise, otherwise give a test of their personal standing in reference to salvation," the holding of special meetings for revival services.

These things, it says, "have the almost unanimous sanction of our Western Friends, to a large extent of our Eastern and Southern; and every minister who has any success in revival work uses them." It reads this modern revival movement as similar to the wonderful conviction that attended the labors of our early Friends, when many ministers were raised up and sent forth to proclaim the glad tidings of salvation. At all these points, it confirms the correctness of the remarks on Periodicals, on p. 33 of the Address lately issued by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting: "The zeal and activity shown in these things have so captivated the writers, that they seem blinded to ulterior consequences."

The Address referred to is being widely circulated throughout the Society of Friends, and all who desire copies for themselves, or for distribution to others, will be freely supplied by calling at the Book Store, No. 304 Arch St., Philadelphia, or by addressing a postal card to the Agent, Jacob Smedley, at that place. The object of the pamphlet is to bear a renewed testimony to the principles taught by our Early Friends, and to show the consistency therewith of those doctrines and practices advocated and used by the leaders in the modern revival movement in all borders. As this is clearly set forth in the pages, it does not seem needful at this time to enter fully into the subject in our columns. Those who are convinced that the doctrines of the Friends are true, ought to have such faith in their principles and in the government of Christ in his Church, as to believe that they will most effectually promote the spread of the kingdom, by following in the path which the Friends point out, and doing the work which He gives. It was a marked characteristic of our early members, that they were jealous of themselves, lest they should enter unbidden into the Lord's work. They were fully convinced, that unless the Lord's blessing attended, their labors would be useless, if not injurious. Hence they waited for the feeling of the Divine requiring, and even when out of religious service, felt the need of a fresh anointing and requisition for every exercise the gift intrusted to them. It may be sufficient on this point to refer to the experience of our dear friend Claridge alone—though many other cases could be cited. After having been some time a minister among the Baptists, he was convinced of the principles of the Friends as held by Friends, and a gift of true gospel ministry was conferred upon him. It is recorded of him, that he was "very watchful over himself, lest at any time he should be carried forward, and by that means insensibly again into what he had formerly been engaged for, viz: Preaching and praying in his own will and wisdom. Though the word came upon him with great power, "I have made thee a minister and a witness of the things which I have in hast seen, and of those things wherein I will appear unto thee; yet the impression also attended, "the time is not yet come, the vision is yet for an appointed time; but at the end it shall speak, and not lie; though it tarry, wait for it." Being preserved in this filial dependence on the Lord, and relying on his power, His blessing rested on the labors of those faithful servants. Their principal message was to turn the attention of their hearers to the Light of Christ in their own souls, convicting them for sin, and leading them (as they submitted to it) to repentance and amendment of life, so that they might experience forgiveness through the atoning blood of Christ, and receive power to walk in the highway of holiness. The duty and blessing of waiting upon God as He reveals Himself to them by his Light, was earnestly pressed, and practised, not only in their seasons of solitary retirement, but when met for Divine worship. The converts who were trained up under this teaching and discipline, having learned to look within to the great Teacher of teachers, became firmly established on Christ, the alone sure foundation, and were not dependent for the maintenance of their religious zeal on the exciting ministry of revival preachers—for they had come to the experience of the blessed condition of which the Apostle John testifies: "The anointing which ye have received of Him, abideth in you; and ye need not that any man teach you; but as the same anointing teacheth you of all things, and is truth, and is no lie, and even as it hath taught you, ye shall abide in Him."

The effect of the sensational methods of awakening sinners, which have been adopted by the revival preachers, is naturally evanescent. The mental excitement produced by the singing and other appliances, and the sympathetic feeling which often pervades crowded assemblies, is followed by a reaction, in which the last state of the person affected may be worse than the first. Experience shows that this is often the case; and indeed it can scarcely help being so, unless the mind is turned to the Light of Christ, and the individual learns to look within for the teaching and help of the Saviour.

As an evidence of the correctness of this view, we quote from a letter received within a few days from a friend in one of the Western States, who has had the opportunity of witnessing the effects of these so-called revival movements, and was for a time laboring in harmony therewith. He mentions that two of the "Evangelists" spent a month at the place where he resides; and that a statement was published in the Christian Worker, that "549 souls were converted and reclaimed." He adds, "The 549 conversions, &c., referred to is just about the population of our village. In three weeks after the manipulators left, not a vestige of their work could be relied upon. One young man said afterwards, that he honestly wanted to do right, and honestly thought that was the way to start, but he was so bemuddled, that he believed infidelity was preferable."

This testimony as to the superficial and unreliable character of the good results which are claimed to flow from this kind of work, accords with the information we received a few years since, when visiting in a neighborhood which may be regarded as one of the head-quarters of this system. It was the concurrent testimony of several friends that their usual meetings for worship were smaller than before the revival measures were introduced, notwithstanding the numbers that had been received into nominal membership.

We have no controversy with zeal and earnestness, and no sympathy with that case-loving spirit which would gladly dwell in quietness, and would be troubled by the influx of new converts from the world. It would be cause of unfeigned rejoicing to see many anointed laborers sent forth into his harvest-field by the Lord of the harvest—and it would be most pleasing to be able to record the fruits of rightness which the great Husbandman might be pleased to cause to spring up under their culture. But we have no confidence in merely human efforts, which are undertaken without Divine direction; nor do we believe that they will be successful in building up the Society of Friends, but will rather tend to scatter it.

A recent article in one of our exchanges says: "There are few wrong methods in religious work which cannot be seemingly justified by a skilful parade of the things that are commonly seen;" in illustration of which it refers to the practice of auricular confession as defended by the Roman Catholics. We think the revival methods favored by the Christian Worker, furnishes an additional illustration of the truth of the same remark. From the article referred to we quote the following (condensed) statement of the question:

"It may be that we are asked to help in some grand scheme for the evangelization of a particular class. The plan is explained to us; from some of the methods we feel bound to dissent. But a table of claimed results is spread before us. Here, are so many acknowledged conversions; there, are so many drunkards restored, as sober men, to their families. * * * It may be that, afraid of seeming to fight against God, we allow these undoubted successes to override our scruples; and under the plea of judging the tree by its fruits, we become uneasy supporters of a policy which in our hearts we condemn. But is such a course of action always justifiable? Have we any right to let mere surface statistics take the place of reason and conscience? So many halls in which the gospel is preached, so many religious services held, so many tracts given away, so many adherents won over to the right,—these are the things that are seen; but what may be the things that are unseen? What if the devil has been silently using the improper or questionable measures of these mistaken zealots, as an argument whereby to confirm in skepticism many honest souls in whose eyes religion is compromised by the methods used in its support? What if those who have been turned away from seeking Christ be a great army in comparison with those who have found Him through, or in spite of, the peculiar methods in question?" To this we add,—What if these "claimed results" should prove to be greatly overestimated, and what are deemed the good fruits, such as quickly decay?

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Pennsylvania Legislature met on the 7th in extra session, at Harrisburg, to consider the apportionment bills, and adjourned until the 19th inst.

A courier from Mexico has arrived in Tombstone, Arizona, and reports that General Crook is encamped thirty miles northeast of Vacori, and sending scouts out in all directions. Up to the time the courier left he had not succeeded in finding any signs of Indians.

Advices from Port au Prince to 5th mo. 24th, report that the people of three villages in Hayti had rebelled, and it was believed other uprisings would follow.

At a meeting of the Chinese firms of Victoria, British Columbia, on Fifth-day of last week, it was resolved to advise the Chinese Government to allow no more Chinese to emigrate to that province at present. It was said at the meeting that 2000 Chinese laborers had died during the last year from the effects of exposure, accidents and the sudden change in their diet.

The Joint Special Committee of Councils has decided to report with a favorable recommendation the ordinance providing that "all the Almshouse property in West Philadelphia, bounded by South street, Spruce street, Thirty-fourth street, Vintage avenue, on the southern boundary of the city property, and thence to the Schuylkill river, be and is hereby set apart for the purposes of a public park."

"Metallic red" has been selected by the Postmaster-General as the color for the new two-cent postage stamps. The vignette used on the stamp is copied from the life cast for Houdin's statue of Washington.

The first competitive examinations in Washington, under the new Civil Service law, will be held about the 10th of 7th month in the rooms of the Civil Service Commission.

The Interior Department is informed that "a large area of coal is now on fire near Crow Peak, in the Black Hills." The representative of the General Land Office at Deadwood, has been directed to examine into the condition of the mines.

It is reported that the wheat crop in Berks county, Penna., will be reduced one-third by the ravages of the Hessian fly.

In boring a well for a brewery at Troy, New York, a mineral spring was struck, at a depth of 250 feet. The water, it is said, "very much resembles that of the Saratoga springs."

The steamer Austrian arrived at Boston on the 7th inst. with 842 steerage passengers from Ireland, many of whom will go to work in New Hampshire mills.

The number of pedestrians entering Fairmount Park during last month was 370,102.

A company has been organized in New York to lay two new cables between this country and Europe. It is said the enterprise is in strong hands, and that there is no doubt of its success.

The canker worms have appeared in large numbers in the vicinity of Concord, New Hampshire, and the farmers say they fear the destruction of the fruit crops.

The remains of John Howard Payne, author of "Home, Sweet Home," were re-interred on Seventh-day last, with much ceremony, in Oak Hill Cemetery, near Washington.

It is stated that the number of cars loaded with strawberries shipped over the Delaware railroads on Second-day of last week, was the largest ever made in one day in the history of the roads, being a total of 127. Last year the largest shipment in any one day was 103, and the year before 96.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 338, which was 2 less than during the previous week, and 7 less than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number, 158 were males, and 180 females: 43 died of consumption of the lungs; 19 of pneumonia; 25 of diphtheria; 10 of scarlet fever; 10 of typhoid fever, and 3 of small pox.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 103½; 3½'s, 103½; 4½'s, 113½; 4's, registered, 119; coupon, 120; currency 6's, 128 a 131.

Cotton.—There was no essential change to notice in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported at 11 a 11½ cts. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ a 7¾ cts. for export, and 8½ a 8¾ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour.—There was very little movement, but prices were steady. Sales of 2000 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.25 a $6.50; Pennsylvania family at $5 a $5.50; western do. at $5.25 a $6.25, and patents at $6 a $7.50. Rye flour is steady at $3.75 a $3.80.

Grain.—Wheat was dull and prices a fraction lower. Sales of 3900 bushels red, in car lots, at $1.12 a $1.25. Rye is nominal at 70 a 72 cts. per bushel. Corn is in moderate demand. Sales of 10,000 bushels in car lots, at 55 a 64 cts. Oats are dull. Sales of 9000 bushels, in car lots, at 46½ a 51 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 6th mo. 9th, 1883.—Loads of hay, 315; loads of straw, 45. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 85 to 95 cts. per 100 pounds; mixed, 75 to 85 cts.; straw, 55 a 65 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were dull, unsettled and a fraction lower: 3600 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5½ a 6¼ cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were dull and lower: 13,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 5½ cts. per lb., and lambs at 5 a 9 cts. per lb., as to condition.

Hogs were dull and lower: 3600 head sold at the different yards at 9 a 10½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—The health of the Queen has been rather poor during the past week, but is now thought to be improving.

A despatch to the Standard from Sierra Leone, states that King Koffee Kalkall, the author of the late war in Ashantee, has been forcibly restored to his throne. A British envoy has been sent to Coomassie to endeavor to arrange a peaceable understanding of the difficulties.

The returns issued by the Board of Trade show that during the 5th month British imports increased, compared with that month in last year, by £321,000, and that the exports during the same period decreased £548,000.

In the House of Lords on Second-day last, the bill legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister passed its second reading by a vote of 145 to 88.

Great preparations were made for the John Bright celebration at Birmingham, which began on Second-day last, and will last a week. The celebration is to commemorate the services of John Bright as representative for Birmingham in Parliament for over a quarter of a century.

Friends residing in Ireland have lately distributed, in County Donegal, 270 tons of seed potatoes, thus relieving the distress of three thousand families in that county.

Timothy Kelly, who was convicted of participation in the Phoenix Park murders, was hanged in Kilmainham Jail on the 9th inst. He was the fifth man hanged for those murders, and was the last one convicted thereof.

The Emperor Francis Joseph opened a new observatory at Vienna on the 6th inst. It contains a refractor an inch larger than the one in the observatory at Washington.

The agent of the Liberian Republic has just negotiated with Spain a convention providing for the repeal of the law prohibiting the introduction of free black laborers into Cuba. Two hundred thousand slaves in Cuba will become free in 1888. The labor question then will become a serious one. Spanish statesmen and Cuban planters are already examining plans for the introduction into Cuba of free African negroes or Chinese or Indian coolies. The rainy season has set in in the greater part of the Island of Cuba.

There have been several post-coronation ceremonies in Russia. Last Seventh-day an extensive review took place on Petrofisky Plain. On this, as on other similar occasions, the emperor and empress were both present. Wherever they go they are received with much enthusiasm. On the evening of the 9th inst. they left for the imperial palace at Peterhof. It is supposed that the riots which occurred during the coronation were merely the drunken excesses of the lower classes. The collection of the poll-tax from the poorest portion of the peasantry will entirely cease from 1st mo. next, and the tax to be collected from the remainder of the people will be reduced by one-half.

Tonquin has remained in a threatening condition during the past week. Both China and France claim a right to interfere in its affairs, and it is feared that these two powers may be led to resort to hostile measures, although their policy is not yet matured. The Marquis Tseng, the Chinese representative at Paris, London and St. Petersburg, recently stated that diplomatic relations between France and China would certainly cease if the former operated in Tonquin without having previously arranged with China. A despatch from Toulon, France, dated the 8th inst., states that 6000 men are in readiness to embark for Tonquin if their services should be needed.

The Porte of Constantinople recently informed General Wallace, the United States Minister, that the commercial treaty between Turkey and America would terminate on 3rd mo. 13th, 1884. The Turkish tariff expired on the same date of the present year. No steps have yet been taken by the United States toward a renewal of the treaty.

A force of Albanians has captured near Scutari a Turkish convoy. Nine battalions of Turkish troops have been sent to chastise the Albanians.

Several fights have taken place in the mountains between the Albanians and Turks, resulting in heavy losses on both sides. Sanguinary fighting has also taken place in Albania between the Turkish troops and a body of Castratis.

Victoria and the other Colonies are taking steps to urge the Imperial Government to annex the New Hebrides, the Solomon Islands and other groups of Isl in the Pacific.

Work on the Buenos Ayres and Pacific Rail under the superintendence of the contractors, C Brothers, is being actively proceeded with.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

A Stated Meeting of the General Committee is held at the school on Fourth-day, the 20th inst. 8 A. M.

The Committee on Instruction and Admissions met at the school the preceding evening, at 7 o'clock.

The Visiting Committee, meet at the school Seventh-day, the 16th inst.

For the accommodation of the committee, conferences will be at Street Road Station, on Seventh Third-days, the 16th and 19th inst., to meet the train that leave the city at 2.49 and 4.55 P. M.

—, suddenly, on the 12th of 4th month, 1883, the residence of her son-in-law, Hamilton Hain SUSANNA KAIGHN, widow of the late Joseph Kaighn in the 70th year of her age, a member and overseer Haddonfield Monthly Meeting of Friends. "Bless are the pure in heart for they shall see God."

—, at his residence in Pennsylvania, Morgan county, Ohio, 4th mo. 27th, 1883, RICHARD PENROSE, aged nearly 82 years, a beloved member and elder of Pennville Monthly and Particular Meetings of Friends. A short time before his close he remarked to an intimate friend, that he believed his end was near, and exclaimed "Oh the mercies of my Redeemer." This dear Friend stood firm to the principles of Friends during all trials the Society has been permitted to pass through. He was charitable to the youth, and when any miss their way, he labored to restore in a spirit of love. He bore a lingering and protracted illness with Christian patience and resignation; often expressing, what favor that he did not suffer more. He remained sensible to the last—supplicating fervently near the close. Thus evincing to his many friends and relatives a consoling belief that his end was peace. "Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God."

For "The Friend."

Letters and Memoranda of William Scattergood.

From Ann Jones to W. S.

"Philada., 4th mo. 13th, 1828.

My dear friend, W. S.,—I have many times regretted the want of leisure whilst in New York, to acknowledge the receipt of thy truly welcome lines, and can assure thee it would have been quite a gratification to us to have seen thee there; we were disappointed by thy tarrying on the journey.

I had pleased myself with the hope of seeing thee soon after our arrival here; and I now assure thee that I do wish to have an opportunity of conversing a little with thee. My health is not in a state to allow of my going out whilst it is so damp, or I should have made an attempt to see thee and thy dear family collectively.

On a perusal of thy very touching letter, I feel grieved at myself that I did not earlier make an effort to tell thee that nothing new has befallen thee, dear W., in all thy sore afflictions. I can well understand the language of thy heart and pen; and much do I desire that whilst these sore afflictions and temptations are passing over thee, in order I fully believe to prepare thee in the fulfilment of thy gospel mission to enter into the states of others, that Satan, the enemy of all righteousness, whilst permitted to sift and to buffet thee, may not tempt thee to cast away thy shield, as though it had not been anointed with oil, or in any way to remove thee from the stability of the Truth—the steadfastness of the gospel. Thou art not the first that he has desired to have in his power to sift as chaff; but oh! remember the Divine Intercessor; strive to keep close in the spirit of thy Lord and unto Him who said to Peter, 'I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not; and when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren.' Peter was made an instrument of God to many, after he had denied his Lord, which thou hast not done; and as thou endeavors to keep near to Him, He will keep near to thee. * * *

I do believe that dear Elizabeth is designed to be to thee a helper and a stay. I have no expectation that you will get along without difficulties and trials of various kinds; these are good for us; something like wholesome medicine designed to prove and to strengthen; and as they are accepted in submission to the Divine will, a blessing will attend them.

In reading that part of thy letter in which thou alludes to the wickedness of the human race, and the difficulty of reconciling the state of things with the different concurrent testimonies of Scripture, a few words occurred which in Infinite Kindness were spoken to Isaac Penington when beset with similar reasonings: 'Leave those things to Me;' and thus, I believe, we poor, frail, short-sighted mortals must do. And what an unspeakable consolation it is to reflect, that as we endeavor to be faithful in that which is committed to our trust, we shall be accepted of Him who seeth not as man seeth. We are called to walk by faith not by sight. Oh then, let us endeavor to cast all our care upon Him, for He careth for us,—to be careful for nothing, but in every thing by prayer and supplication, making our requests known unto God.'

Thy letter reminds me of thy honored grandfather; and I do not apprehend that thy provings and conflicts are greater than what he had to endure. Then be of good cheer; and when thou gets a good wife, I shall hope to visit you, and to see you enjoy each other. Accept my tender sympathy and affectionate solicitude for thy well-doing every way, in which I am thy friend,

ANN JONES."

To E. C.

"4th mo. 19th, 1828.

(After alluding to the foregoing communication of Ann Jones, he proceeds): It of course helped me, and although it must become and be to me as the manna of yesterday, yet I cannot but think that the sympathetic, feeling communication which passed on Second-day may be remembered with thankful acknowledgment to the bountiful Giver of every good gift in that He takes notice of me, a poor unworthy worm of the dust.

Well, my beloved friend, let us press forward toward the mark, for to him that overcometh the promise remains to be sure, that the Lord Jesus himself will make such an one a pillar in his temple which shall go no more out. He will write upon him the name of his God, and the name of the city of his God, and he will write upon him His own name. But there is a fight of afflictions to endure; there are baptisms many, and deaths oft. We must know a being dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, from all its maxims, and all its policy, and come into entire dependence upon Him who is all in all to those who look unto Him and cry unto Him, and depend upon Him for every thing which pertains to life and godliness: for surely I have seen that He is the alone Mediator between God and our souls, that it is only and alone through Him that we partake of the Divine mercy, and that it is through Him alone we have access again unto the throne of grace. This is indeed an incomprehensible mystery to the human understanding, but O! my dear —, I have seen how in this as upon other occasions when my mind has been divinely opened, the design of the great Head of the Church has been to instruct me and to make me sensible of my own nothingness and entire dependence upon Him. I have been made to see in my experience that the time has indeed come when judgment must begin at the house of God; and I humbly trust that a desire has prevailed in my heart patiently to endure the turnings and overturnings of his holy hand, that so I may be counted worthy of occupying a place in that spiritual building which is to show forth the praises of Him who hath called us out of darkness into his marvellous light. And oh! that the precious testimony, 'Though He was rich, yet for our sakes He became poor, that we through his poverty might be made rich,' may be often brought into remembrance and sealed with sweetness upon the mind. * * *

I could enlarge much in relation to these things. Indeed, who has had such abundant cause for grateful acknowledgment to the Source of all our sure mercies and living consolations, for the long forbearance and tender compassion wherewith, as a tender Father, the Lord of mercies hath dealt with my soul? but as the experienced apostle testifies in relation to himself, so I feel a concern 'to leave the things which are behind, and to press forward to the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.' * * *

My dear friend will rejoice with me if I say, that through infinite mercy it has been my lot to know a little of quiet settlement upon some occasions of late; but as dear G. Jones recommended to me this day week, that in seasons of deep affliction and destitution I should remember seasons of consolation and light, and that when I felt somewhat lifted up, to remember these dark and desolate feelings, that so preservation might be experienced from too much depression or too great exaltation; therefore I have desired that I might be preserved in my proper allotment, and be brought into a sense of my own nothingness in the sight of Him who is glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders. Farewell: the assurance of the most tender and affectionate regard towards thee may be always thine from thy faithful friend,

As before stated, on the 13th of 5th mo. 1828, William Scattergood was married to Elizabeth, daughter of John and Ann Comfort, of Solebury, Bucks Co., Pennsylvania.

To E. C. Scattergood.

"6th mo. 21st, 1829.

My precious and beloved wife.—(From a letter to his wife of the above date, the following is extracted):—As I feel lonely, solitary and sad, this afternoon, I have taken the pen to communicate a little with thee, in the hope that when made sensible of the desolations which surround my poor soul, thou art ready to drop the tear of sympathy and to partake with thy poor and afflicted companion the sorrows of this mournful pilgrimage.

How often are my tears shed in secret over past and present failings! and how does my soul long for the bread which nourishes up unto eternal life! How I crave a little true faith in the Divine Redeemer, whereby I might be shielded and supported against the darts of the cruel enemy! I am often led to wonder, and to enquire within myself, whether this dispensation, so grievous and afflicting, is for edification or destruction? Whether I am utterly cast off as an unprofitable and withered branch, or whether the Lord, whose heart-tendering visitations were extended in the days of my youth, still designs, through these hidings of his face and deep and manifold tribulations, to prepare a vessel for His use?

I believe that if we were more fervent in spirit, earnestly contending for the prize and for the victory, we should more often experience the presence of Him who is the chiefest of ten thousand. Thy truly loving husband,
WM. SCATTERGOOD."

Under date of 8th mo. 20th, 1829, W. S. makes the following memorandum:—"I often feel fearful in looking back that I have not been so attentive to the day of small things as I ought to have been; and when I reflect upon my present condition, I am ready to conclude that I am an utter castaway; and that I shall never experience a coming up in my proper allotment either in the church or in filling up my station as a private individual; but, on the contrary, as is feared, always remain a halting, hesitating one. O Lord my Redeemer, whom I have desired to serve, and who art the helper of thy believing children, excite in me, I pray thee, a lively thirst for the waters of life; and O! suffer me not to be numbered among the unbelievers. Thou knowest all my secret backslidings. Thou knowest my heart as it really is. Make known, O Lord, thy power in me, and show me clearly my duty to thee, that I may not be as the heath of the desert not knowing when good cometh."

"Ninth mo. 27th.—I am inclined to think that if I would sometimes bring my scattered thoughts, poor as they are, together in this way, that perhaps it would tend to profit, and might possibly have a good effect in stimulating in future to more diligence to make my calling and election sure."

(To be continued.)

Teaching of the Holy Spirit.—How lamentably has the teaching of the Holy Spirit been neglected by professing Christians, notwithstanding the promise respecting this Spirit as the Comforter, that He should take of the things of Christ and show them unto his disciples. From this neglect arose the apostacy of the Christian Church in early days, both in faith and practice; and from the same source arises in the present day, the unscriptural provision of most churches in regard to ministry and various other subjects, by which people are drawn to lean unduly upon man, instead of being instructed to seek to know the Lord to be their teacher, and to trust in Him alone. The professors of Christianity are consequently very generally kept in great weakness, and in great shallowness of Christian experience.—Jas. Backhouse.

For "The Friend."

Gather the Fragments.

In one of the letters of Abraham Shackleton to his son, he gives him a caution, "never to be drawn forth into many unnecessary words." And in a letter to Samuel Neale, this sentence occurs: "I have been greatly pleased formerly, when favored with thy company, to observe the watchful care that clothed thee, even in the times of enlargement and liberty of spirit, lest any word or unguarded expression should inadvertently pass, to wound or administer offence in any wise, to the least babe in Christ."

We sometimes go into company where these cautions might be very useful—where multitudes of words are uttered on subjects of but trifling importance, and where no thoughts or information of value is received.

Quite in contrast with such occasions, was a visit described to me in 1854, by Benjamin Gardiner, a worthy Friend of the Island of Nantucket. His father, Prince Gardiner, who had died a number of years before, was subject to attacks, in which, while not actually sick, he was rather despondent and disinclined to converse. As he was sitting by his fireside one winter's evening, in such a mood, his neighbor Hezekiah Barnard came in to spend the evening. Prince quietly pointed to a chair on the opposite side of the fire, which Hezekiah as quietly occupied. They sat thus in silence for a considerable time; and then Prince went to the cellar, drew a mug of cider and placed it on the hearth before the fire. Another silent sitting followed, and Prince in the same manner brought in some pie or bread and cheese, and, setting it down, pointed his friend Hezekiah to it and to the mug of cider. They both ate and drank—and when the time had arrived for going home, Hezekiah shook hands with Prince and departed. The evening was passed without a word being uttered, and yet it was a satisfactory opportunity. In speaking of it afterwards, Hezekiah said he had a good comfortable visit, was kindly received and treated to cider and refreshments, and neither of them said a word to the disadvantage of any body else.

Under the date of 5th mo. 1847, I find a memorandum in my note-book of an incident related a short time before by the Warden of the Penitentiary at Philadelphia, to a ministering Friend who paid a religious visit to the inmates of the institution.

One of the prisoners had been brought up to the profession of thieving, and for some crime had been sentenced to be transported for life, I believe to a penal settlement in Australia. After a time he managed to make his escape in a boat, and was picked up by a French whaling vessel: but continuing in his evil course, he finally found himself in the prison at Philadelphia. Here he refused to engage in any work. The officer in charge reasoned with him in a kind way—and the sympathy and kindness with which he was treated had such an effect upon him, that he immediately conformed to the rules of the prison, and labored in the work assigned him. He afterwards remarked to the warden that those were the first kind words that had been spoken to him for many years. He had continued to be a satisfactory prisoner, and manifested a tenderness of spirit. Like begets its like: rough, brutal treatment hardens and degrades; but gentleness, combined with firmness, acts on the better principles of our nature.

In The Arm-Chair, it is related of Samuel Emlen, a minister of Philadelphia, who died in 1799, that "he felt concerned often to look up the sick, weak and halt of the flock; and for this purpose, in the latter part of his life he kept a one-horse chair, in which he rode about doing good; in allusion to which practice, he sometimes said, he 'earned his bread by jobbing.'"

"Ah, these were luscious morsels, ate with joy,
A heavenly relish free from all alloy;
Some of that bread of which the righteous eat,
That others know not of,—sustaining meat."

Perhaps the most diligent of laborers in this "jobbing" line, whom we have known in latter years, was the late Thomas Kite, who deceased in 1845. Of him, the same poet says:—

"Where the lone widow wept her early love,—
Where the 'reft husband for submission strove,—
Where the sad mother wailed her darling dead,—
Where the fond father's heart in sorrow bled,
Thy feet were turned the blessed balm to bear,
Woe to assuage, or in the woe to share."

In a memorandum made in 1847, there is mention of meeting with Benjamin Hoyle, of Ohio, who said that when in Philadelphia some time before, he and Jacob Green, of Ireland, went to call on Thomas and Elizabeth Robson. Soon after, Thomas Kite came in, called them aside and wished them to sit with him. They did so, and he took them to four places, at all of which they had favorable religious opportunities.

I remember a morning's walk in the country, with this devoted laborer in the Lord's vineyard. We made six calls, including that at the house of the friend where we dined. At two of these, we were drawn into silence and T. Kite's mouth was opened in Gospel service. At a third, the sitting was in the chamber of a sick woman where I was not present. At the other three places, religious advice was administered in a conversational way.

There are, I doubt not, many yet living who remember with interest the faithful labors of this diligent servant. J. W.

Punctuality.—In the early part of the career of John Brown, of Sheffield, he happened to be in Edinburgh when the Edinburgh, Perth and Dundee Railroad was about to be opened and chanced to call on Grainger, the engineer of the line. Everything was in readiness except a few sets of springs, which the contractor was unable to supply; and as it seemed impossible to get the articles required in so short a time, it looked as though "the ship was going to be spoiled for the want of a penny-worth of tar." Grainger mentioned the matter to his visitor and in sheer desperation asked him if he could supply the spring by the following Fifth-day. This was on the Seventh-day, and J. Brown replied, that considering the imperfect carrying communication, he feared the time was too short. "Well," rejoined Grainger, "we must have them."

John Brown considered a moment, and then said, "You shall have them." He started forthwith to Berwick, took the train and coach for Newcastle, and thence to Sheffield which he reached 11 p. m. on First-day. Here he went straight to his foreman, and told him to have the men there the first thing in the morning, and gave positive orders that the springs were to be ready by Second-day night.

the goods were packed at the appointed time, and the maker hurried off with them to Manchester. Here he had arranged to have a wagon ready to convey the springs to the station from which the mail for the North started. He was in time for the train, but when he presented his consignment a new difficulty met him in the refusal of the officials to load such goods in the mail. J. Brown went straightway to the manager, told him his case, and got a horse-box put on to convey the springs. After a devious journey, and notwithstanding many threatening contempts and anxious moments, the traveller reached Glasgow, via Ardrossan, at 5 o'clock. Fourth-day afternoon, to the amazement and gratification of Grainger, who not only compensated the enterprising manufacturer for his outlay and pains, but also introduced his feat to the notice of most of the railway directors present at the opening ceremony; and the gallant effort threw into John Brown's works for a considerable time the bulk of the Scotch trade in railway material.

Letters of Richard Hall.

The publication in the last number of "The Friend" of a notice of the late Richard Hall, of Cumberland, England, led the writer to examine some of the letters received from him in former years. The following extracts from them contain sufficient, it is believed, of general interest to justify their insertion here.

"11th mo. 28th, 1872. I observed in the Philadelphia 'Friend' a short time ago a proposition to establish a boarding house in the city for the use of Friends from a distance resorting thither. No doubt this might prove a comfortable convenience to such, where perhaps more of a home feeling might be experienced than at an ordinary boarding house, particularly if a library could be attached. I have, however, been thinking there is great danger if such an establishment could, by degrees or at once, become what is called here an 'institute,' where young people resort for the purpose of discussion, tutoring and producing written essays on religious as well as secular subjects. I believe the tendency of these among Friends has been exceedingly prejudicial to the best interests of individuals and the Society generally.

Several experienced Friends were apprehensive when the one at Manchester was established a good many years ago, it might, becoming a debating club, where subjects of a religious character might be freely commented on and discussed, lead away the minds of some from the simplicity of Truth. I have often thought their apprehensions have been more than realized; for, I believe, if one thing more than another has been the means of betraying into rationalism it has been the lectures and discussions in the institute there. And, to what an extent this has gone and the results attending it, no doubt, thou art aware. I had the opportunity of observing the effect of this system on one interesting and intelligent young man, and I could see the influence it gradually gained over him, till, by degrees, he became an entire skeptic."

"The diffusion of intellectual knowledge in the things pertaining to salvation seems to be an absorbing pursuit of a large portion of the active members of our Society, coupled with a popular philanthropic movement evinced in missions at home and abroad."

"The minds of many seem so entirely absorbed in prosecuting self-imposed labors of this description, and so thoroughly pleased with their own work, that they have very little scruple in violating the known testimonies of truth in prosecuting it; and very little attachment is manifested to the principles and practices which our predecessors were led to adopt in obedience to the discoveries of the Spirit of Truth and in accordance with the testimony of Holy Scripture.

So rampant was the spirit of innovation, that the practice of reading the scriptures in meetings for worship as well as congregational singing were openly defended by Friends of prominent standing. This degeneracy has not sprung up all at once, but has been developed gradually, yet it seems now to be approaching a climax, when those who sincerely love the Truth must experience very deep and painful suffering; and what may be the result we cannot foresee. We seem so fast losing our distinctive character and are relapsing into the mixture from which our faithful predecessors were mercifully gathered, that in all human probability, we shall soon amalgamate with the world and its spirit.

That the pure Truth will ultimately triumph we cannot doubt, but there is little prospect that our present organized body will be the chosen people to show forth the praise of the living God; seeing that we are denying Him to be our King and Ruler, and are seeking to be governed like the people round about us."

"8th mo. 17th, 1873. The consciousness of my own weakness and the very small progress I have made in the Christian course, as well as my natural tendency to dwell on the gloomy side of our position and prospects, has discouraged me from taking up the pen—lest I might weaken thy hands in the faithful discharge of thy duty in the support of the Truth.

I often greatly covet, that, not being gifted for active service in the Church myself, I might, at least, be thought worthy to strengthen the hands of such as are so gifted—if not by visible and outward efforts, yet by the availing, sympathetic breathing of spirit to our gracious Heavenly Father that He would be pleased to strengthen and qualify his servants, powerfully to advocate his holy cause, and maintain that standard of truth and righteousness which was raised by our worthy predecessors."

"The general tendency now seems to be in exactly the opposite direction to what George Fox esteemed it his privilege to advocate, viz: to turn people's attention and dependence from the teaching of men, and to seek after and obey Christ the living Teacher—by his Light in their hearts. We seem to vie with other professing bodies in literal religious teaching, and are making provision to extend this to the inhabitants of far distant and heathen countries. And there is a gradual development of a disposition on the part of members of the select body (ministers and elders) to assume an activity and responsibility regarding the particular meetings they belong to, which savors much of clerical distinction and oversight, and as it increases, will naturally lessen the feeling of individual responsibility on the part of those who may be compared to the laity."

"That you, too, are tried, and I have no doubt, deeply tried, with the same degeneracy which prevails to such a large extent here, there is no doubt; but it is evident there is yet a considerable body of united and sincere hearted Friends among you who yet prefer Jerusalem above their chiefest joy, and are conscientiously concerned to uphold the Truth in its fulness, according to that standard renewedly raised up by our worthy predecessors. I feel to unite with these in tender and loving sympathy, although but a weak one and a learner in the school of Christ, scarcely worthy to suffer for the noble and excellent cause. The way, at times, feels strait and very difficult in these perplexing times; and our strength seems to consist in standing still, until the Lord is pleased to work for us. May the true patience be abode in and allowed to have its perfect work, then will the true fellowship be strengthened with our Holy Head and with one another."

"6th mo. 14th, 1875. Not feeling clear or easy to decline an appointment to attend our last Yearly Meeting, I gave up to be there. It is three years since I was last present.

In its conducting and conclusions there was a large amount of unanimity, and certainly much moderation and mutual deference in the discussions which arose—but, as for the consistent maintenance and support of our principles, or commending them to our members generally, there was such an entire absence as felt to me very remarkable, and which I briefly ventured to express. Though this is the case, the efforts put forth to evangelize and to establish religious teaching and instruction through the medium of Bible classes, missions, First-day schools, &c., was never so rife; and the desire to have these works, even more than they have been, recognized by the Yearly Meeting, was very strong."

"By the large body of the meeting this 'Christian work' as it is called, or by others 'the Lord's work,' is the all-absorbing theme, and is extolled and commended along with those engaged in it, to the exclusion of what should have been the legitimate exercise and business of the Yearly Meeting, at the same time exonerating, in a great measure, the active operators from all allegiance to what has always been considered the way of Truth as professed by Friends. It is easy to see the encouragement given to vocal expression in religious engagements is gradually and surely introducing serious innovations into our meetings for worship, besides engendering a lifeless and unbaptized ministry.

With these preponderating and prominent views prevailing, it cannot be expected that our true condition, as a Church, can be realized—for all is congratulation and self-complacency, and thanks are repeatedly offered up for our hopeful and favored condition. It is freely admitted that we are passing through a state of transition, but this is understood as a redemption from a state of deadness, inactivity and formalism, to invigorating life—and we are called to rejoice in the evidence of zeal in the service of the Head of the Church, principally by our younger members.

There are, however, a few, here and there, often secluded and hidden ones, who are brought under sufferings for the cause of Christ; and though it may be said with truth that his true Church is driven into the wilderness, yet there is a reverent trust, that He will not suffer his blessed cause to fall utterly, but that, in his own time, He will arise in his power to exalt his name and cause, whether it may be among us as an organized body or not."

May it not be said of this beloved Friend—
"He, being dead, yet speaketh?"

For "The Friend."

Let Your Light Shine.

In proportion as the influence of any becomes operative over their fellow men, so far do they become increasingly and relatively accountable for the talent or talents committed by Him who has said: "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." We all exert an inappreciable, yet powerful influence in little things (so called) and in greater things over those around us. This power, operating on the mind of others for good or evil—who are oftentimes wide awake to inconsistencies—may be fully known, if ever, only by its effects; but, nevertheless, it greatly tends to leaven with the leaven of righteousness unto righteousness, or that of iniquity unto iniquity, all who come within the sphere of its attracting or repelling power. While how fearfully, at the same time, it rolls up the measure of our responsibility to Him by whom actions are weighed, and who hath enjoined, Let your light shine.

In this view, the increase of means whereby we can gratify the desires of the natural heart and mind, may become a snare to us by tempting to the indulgence of vanity and excess in the adornment of our persons, in the superfluities of our tables, in the sumptuousness of our houses, and in the costliness and elegance of our furniture. But no amount of means can justify a disregard of Christian simplicity; allow of unsafe examples for others to follow; or warrant the stumbling of a weak brother who cannot reconcile sumptuousness with being a follower of Christ, nor with a due regard of liberality towards the poor.

It is a great thing to be good and faithful stewards of all which a beneficent Father in heaven has so richly given us to enjoy, and for the promotion of his honor. As this honor is filially and with due deference sought, it will make us watchful and careful in the earnest desire to appropriate these temporal accommodations and blessings unto the purposes for which they were intended by the great Donor. Thus should we "occupy" with the all committed, as a sacred trust, until the Lord come, being examples to all of Christian moderation, simplicity and liberality.

The following testimony concerning Rebecca Reynolds, is well worthy of our consideration and emulation also, viz.: "She was a woman of sincere and unaffected piety: and, though living in affluence, she was steadily concerned that her life might be one of simplicity and self-denial; and that these Christian graces might increase and prevail amongst her fellow professors and in the world at large. These qualities, combined with her charity and benevolence, united to a good understanding, rendered her a valuable companion and friend."

The more we are brought under the humbling, baptizing power of Truth, which induces love to God and love to man, the more we shall desire that our ever short and very uncertain journey through this probationary scene, may be so in the preserving fear of the Lord, as to enable us to serve our generation both by godly example and by loving precept, by life and conversation, according to his blessed will, which is our sanctification. This can no otherwise be done, than by setting the light of our influence, be the circumference thereof larger or smaller, upon the candlestick, that so through and over all, praise and glory may redound to our Father who is in heaven. Thus being engaged to follow the Captain of salvation in "low self-denial and watchful restraint," He will cause us increasingly to become as "living epistles" known and read of all men; and our path to be like that of the just, which "shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

ANSWERED.

I thought to find some healing clime
For her I loved; she found that shore,
That city whose inhabitants
Are sick and sorrowful no more.

I asked for human love for her;
The loving knew how best to still
The infinite yearning of a heart,
Which but infinity could fill.

Such sweet communion had been ours,
I prayed that it might never end;
My prayer is more than answered; now
I have an angel for my friend.

I wished for perfect peace to soothe
The troubled anguish of her breast;
And numbered with the loved and called,
She entered on untroubled rest.

Life was so fair a thing to her,
I wept and pleaded for its stay;
My wish was granted me, for lo!
She hath eternal life to-day.

THE LIGHT-HOUSE.

High o'er the black-backed Skerries, and far
To the westward hills and the eastward sea,
I shift my light like a twinkling star,
With ever a star's sweet constancy.
They wait for me when the night comes down,
And the slow sun falls in his death divine,
Then braving the black night's gathering frown,
With ruby and diamond blaze—I shine!

There is war at my feet where the black rocks break
The thunderous snows of the rising sea;
There is peace above when the stars are awake,
Keeping their night-long watch with me.
I care not a jot for the roar of the surge,
The wrath is the sea's—the victory mine!
As over its breadth to the furthest verge,
Unwavering and untired—I shine!

First on my brow comes the pearly light,
Dimming my lamp in the new-born day,
One long, last look to left and right,
And I rest from my toil—for the broad sea-way
Grows bright with the smile and blush of the sky,
All incandescent and opaline.
I rest—but the loveliest day will die—
Again in its last wan shadows—I shine!

When the night is black, and the wind is loud,
And danger is hidden, and peril abroad,
The seaman leaps on the swaying shroud;
His eye is on me, and his hope in God!
Alone, in the darkness, my blood-red eye
Meets his, and he hauls his groping line.
"A point to nor'ard!" I hear him cry,
He goes with a blessing, and still—I shine!

While standing alone in the summer sun
Sometimes I have visions and dreams of my own,
Of long-life voyages just begun,
And rocks unnoticed, and shoals unknown;
And I would that men and women would mark
The duty done by this lamp of mine;
For many a life is lost in the dark,
And few on earth are the lights that shine!

THE STREAMLET.

I saw a little streamlet flow
Along a peaceful vale;
A thread of silver, soft and slow,
It wandered down the dale.
Just to do good it seemed to move,
Directed by the hand of Love.

The valley smiled in living green;
A tree which near it gave
From noontide heat a friendly screen,
Drank from its limpid wave.
The swallow brushed it with her wing,
And followed its meandering.

But not alone to plant and bird,
That little stream was known;
Its gentle murmur far was heard;
A friend's familiar tone!
It glided by the cotter's door,
It blessed the labors of the poor.

And would that I could thus be found,
While travelling life's brief way,
A humble friend to all around,
Where'er my footsteps stray:
Like that pure stream, with tranquil breast,
Like it, still blessing, and still blest.

On the Desert.

CONVENT OF ST. CATHERINE.

"It gives one an idea of the age of the Convent, to remember that it is older than Mahomet: it was founded by the Emperor Justinian in the year 555, so that it has been standing more than thirteen centuries! The early monks felt the need of making friends with the new power which had just risen in Arabia, and was attacking and destroying on every side, and so sought and received from Mahomet a pledge of his protection. He could not write, but dipping his broad hand in ink (it might have been in blood, for the color is red), gave the imprint of his open palm. That was a signature which could not be mistaken. A copy of this bloody hand is hung up in the room in which I am now writing; the original is said to be in Constantinople, though I can hear of no one who has seen it; but tradition supports the fact of its existence; and to this pledge of the Prophet the monks have often appealed, and it is due to it that the Convent has not been long since destroyed."

"The Convent has always been a post of danger, as it was on the border line between two religions—Islam and Christianity—or rather, in the territory of the enemy, where it stood as a solitary citadel of the faith. It has often had to stand a siege, when nothing but its walls and towers kept it from destruction. But if those were days of peril without, they were days of prosperity within. Looking around the interior of the Convent, I observed that it was surrounded with a corridor on each story, upon which the cells of the monks opened, and in those days there were hundreds within its walls."

"There are now twenty-four members, who form a community entirely among themselves being quite apart from the rest of the world. Some of them have been here thirty or forty years, perhaps not once in all that time leaving these mountains. Indeed, I was told that several of them had not been outside the Convent in twenty years. All the affairs of the household are managed by themselves. Some of the menial offices are performed by Arab servants, but every species of handicraft is wrought by the monks. Dr. Post, who had the case for his plants broken, found here a very good tinsmith. Any one whose garments are torn, or whose shoes are worn out scrambling over the rocks, may find a cobbler and a cobbler to patch them up again. "But all this is apart from, and subordinate to, their own great vocation, which is prayer. They tinker a little and cobble a little, but they pray a great deal. Their eyes are spent in prayer. Seven hours out of the twenty-four are given to devotion. Several times in the day we hear a stroke, as with a hammer, on a nakus [a bent iron bar] a sound which, like the voice of the muezzin from the minaret, calls the faithful to prayer. The reception room is near the chapel, so that the voices of the monks come to us distinctly through the open windows; and we should be dull indeed if we could sit unmoved at the chanting of the songs of the ages, and of prayers which in different tongues are repeated in all the communions of Christendom. Nor are these hours of devotion confined to the day-time; fully one-half are taken from the night. At three o'clock in the morning the bell of the church wakes every sleeper in the Convent."

"If the question be whether this round of religious exercises has any very important influence in making men spiritually better, a candid observer must shake his head. At least one who listens in a musing mood to these midnight devotions, would think that out of such vigils and prayers must spring a consummate flower of piety; that these men, who are so holy that they cannot live with their fellows, but dwell apart, must be better than others; that all their conversation must be of heaven, and their lives be spent in deeds of charity.

But let us see. I observed the next morning that there was a strange silence in the Convent. Having taken the night to pray, they took the day to sleep. These hours of prayer were not then so much added to the usual times for devotion, but only turned into day that day might be turned to night. Was there in this any spiritual gain?

"As to the pretensions of superior sanctity, any such impression is quickly dispelled. It is enough to look in the faces of these men to see that they are, with scarce an exception, of a low stamp. They are very ignorant."

"But a man may be very ignorant, and even superstitious, and yet from daily communion with spiritual things, may grow into a higher life, which shall show itself in his very countenance. Not a trace of this does one see here. There is no such process of gradual elevation. There is neither natural refinement nor that spirituality which comes from converse with sacred things. Let a monk remain here forty years, and he that as vulgar is vulgar still, and he that was filthy is filthy still.

"Nor is their life one of self-denial. Of course they submit to the prescribed fasts of the Church. It is now Lent, when the fasts, as well as the vigils, are kept rigorously. They will not touch a particle of animal food, but they will drink to excess. Almost the only industry which is pursued here, is making a kind of a brandy out of the dates of the palm tree; and this not being prohibited, they do freely. We often see them the worse for liquor. Several of them who have been out the mountains with us as guides, before the day was over have been in a state of intoxication. It takes away from the merit of fasts when it leads to this. If they took a little more of simple, nourishing food, they would not drink so much brandy. Of course I am not particularly edified when I see these same old codgers standing in their places in the church, intoning their prayers!

"But the gravest charge which I have to bring against the monks, is their utter indifference to the poor Bedaween by whom they are surrounded."

"The moral of all this is that a life of entire separation from the world, and seclusion in a Convent, is not the way to serve God, or do good to men. A life more vacant of all high purpose, or of practical usefulness, I cannot conceive of; and when I went into the charnel-house, where are piled up the bones of whole generations, with a ghastly array of skulls, I felt that I saw before me the mouldering relics of so many wasted lives."

"If I had any secret fondness for the monastic life, a few days in a monastery would be quite sufficient to disenchant me. I feel no temptation to turn monk; the Convent cell would be a prison cell. Indeed a sentence to such a life would be like a sentence to death. The very thought makes me shudder, as if I were descending into a tomb, on which a heavy lid of blackest marble were shutting down upon me. It seems as if one could be driven to this life only by the direst necessity, or by superstitious fear."

Southern Presbyterians.—About the commencement of the Southern Rebellion the Presbyterians of the South withdrew from connexion with the General Assembly and organized as a separate body. The unpleasant feelings caused by this action have since in large measure died away—though the charges of being "schismatics," "heretics," &c., have not been altogether forgotten.

From time to time efforts have been made to heal the breach, but not with entire success. At the General Assembly (South) held at Atlanta, Georgia, in the spring of 1882, the subject was again considered, and the following minute adopted: "While receding from no principle, we do hereby declare our regret for and withdrawal of all expressions of our Assembly which can be regarded as reflecting upon, or offensive to, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America."

This was sent by telegraph to the Northern Assembly then in session at Springfield, which sent a reply couched in the same language; and delegates were appointed by each of the Assemblies to attend at the next annual convention of the other.

An explanatory resolution was added by the Northern Assembly—"That in the action now being taken, we disclaim any reference to the action of preceding Assemblies concerning loyalty and rebellion, but we refer only to those concerning seism, heresy and blasphemy." This resolution has been somewhat of an apple of discord, and some uneasiness was felt as to the reception of the Northern delegates and the effects of their visit to their Southern brethren. This reception has now taken place and was in a high degree cordial. The Moderator in his words of welcome said that as he stood there and witnessed the spectacle of brethren long alienated and separated from each other, again meeting in fraternal bonds of union, he felt almost ready to say, with good old Simeon, "Now, Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation."

It is not expected that this movement will lead to an organic union between the two bodies, which is not deemed necessary nor desirable by either branch.

A proposition was made to permit persons to be ordained as ministers in the Presbyterian Church, who have not had a classical education; but this was rejected.

Upon the question of marriage with a deceased wife's sister, the Assembly decided, by a large vote, that it was not unscriptural, as the cases forbidden in the law of Moses do not include that degree of relationship.

Sensational Literature.—The papers have told us of frequent arrests of young boys on their way West, bold and bloody deeds in their fancy, and a walking arsenal without, the end of their journey being the extermination of Indians, robbing of trains, and a freebooting life in general. Without an exception, their inspiration for such a life was the cheap, trashy boys' weekly papers, the life of the James brothers, or such vile stuff. These cases are arousing some attention from the teachers and guardians of children. At Cleveland the managers of the public library have banished the novels of Evans, Southworth and Holmes; and it will be a reason of rejoicing when similar institutions throughout the country follow this lead, and clean their shelves of all such sensational stuff, which is ruin to mind and soul of every young person who becomes absorbed in them.—Cynosure.

First-day Trains.—The President of the Louisville, New Albany and Chicago Railway, Bennett H. Young, has issued an order, that so far as possible, no trains shall be run or work done on the First-day of the week. He regards the running of all but mail trains as unnecessary, and has ordered that if any employé has conscientious scruples against working on that day, he is to be relieved absolutely. The Christian Advocate remarks: "Aside from the advantages of such an order to the interests of the Christian religion and of public morals, it has proved extremely grateful to one of the most industrious and over-worked classes of the community—the railroad employés—who greatly need the weekly rest thus secured to them. Not the least gratifying feature of the case is the statement of the gentleman who issued the order—'I did it simply because it is right.'"

Reformed Episcopalians.—The 9th General Council of this body has recently been held in Baltimore.

Bishop Nicholson, the former President, was nominated for re-election, but declined on the ground that he thought it best there should be rotation in office.

The Reports showed an increase in the membership.

Intelligence of the Crows.—As I was walking among the crumbling arches of Caracalla's baths in Rome, in 1882, when near the walls, a stone nearly as large as my fist fell at my feet. Fearing a recurrence of what I supposed was an accident of perishing masonry, our party went farther toward the centre of the area. A second and a third fell near us; and, looking up, I saw some crows circling above our heads, one of which dropped a fourth from his claws. It seems we had been strolling too near their nests; and they took this method to drive us away—a very effectual one, as a stone of that size, falling from the height of sixty feet, was an exceedingly dangerous missile, and perhaps only prevented from being fatal by the failure of the bird to make allowance for the impetus given by its own motion. The aim was accurate, and the discharge right overhead; but, as both we and the bird were moving, it fortunately missed its mark.—Samuel Kneeland in Science.

Ropy Milk.—The ropiness in milk, which is sometimes observed, is caused by the action of a microscopic organism upon the milk sugar. The same organism acts similarly on cane and grape sugar, converting them into a substance resembling vegetable mucilage in its properties.

Large American Pearls.—Some remarkably large pearls have been obtained during the last fishing season at La Paz in the Gulf of California. One of these—the largest on record from this region—weighing 75 carats, sold for $14,000, and is considered to be worth much more. Another very perfect one of 47 carats, is valued at $5000 and a third at $3000.

Fresh-water Mollusks.—The lumbermen on the Chaudière eat these mollusks and obtain them in an ingenious manner. Birch bush-wood is attached to the raft so as to drag gently over the bottom when in the shallows. The open bivalves feel the twigs passing over, close the valves on them and hold fast. At intervals the brush is lifted, and the adhering “clams” are picked off.

Fertilization of Red Clover.—Prof. Beal, of Michigan, has been experimenting for six years on the fruitfulness of red clover, Trifolium pratense, when visited by humble-bees, and when protected from their visits by gauze or netting. In some years there were scarcely any seeds perfected in those plants from which the bees were excluded; and the average for the six years was only one in four compared with the plants to which the bees had access—thus showing the importance of this insect agency in the distribution of the pollen and the fertilization of the plant.

Pre-historic Remains in North Carolina.—In an ancient grave in North Carolina were found ten skeletons, the principal one with the face downward. Under his head was a large engraved shell; around his neck, the remains of a necklace of large-sized beads; at each ear, pieces of copper; around each wrist, bracelets composed of copper and shell-beads; on his breast a piece of copper; at his right hand, two implements of hammered iron; under his left hand, an engraved shell filled with beads of various kinds. The other nine skeletons were arranged around this one, extending in all directions. Scattered over the area were found a number of stone axes, polished celts, discoidal and rubbing stones, a number of steatite pipes highly polished, with bowl and stem of one piece; also copper arrow-heads, plates of mica, graphite, &c.

These articles have all been received by the Bureau of Ethnology. The same parties have since opened another mound, in which were found 55 skeletons, four or five engraved shells, copper beads, a piece of hammered iron, pots, cups, one tomahawk, a number of stone implements, about a dozen pipes, mica, galena, &c.—Science.

Force of Wind.—A vivid impression of the sudden fury of the Southern cyclone is conveyed by this brief statement of B. F. Jones, of Beauregard, Miss., who, the moment he saw the danger coming, called his wife and little boy into the yard and made them lie flat on the ground and grasp some small shrubs which stood within reach: “I put one arm about my wife, while with the other I clasped a small tree, and made my son lie close up to me, and then I said to them, ‘Hold on, hold on, for God’s sake! It is for life!’ and then the wind came. There was a whirl and a roar. I was shaken, and heard the crash of my falling house. An instant and it was over. I still held my wife in my arms, but she was insensible, and my boy was still nestling close up to me, but bruised and bleeding.” All three escaped without serious injury, thanks to his presence of mind and the prompt obedience of his wife and child.—Chr. Adv.

Old Coins.—Near Rochester, in England, on the estate of the Earl of Darnley, an important discovery has been made of Roman coins. Some workmen were digging up the roots of a tree a short distance from Cobham Hall, when they came upon a large earthenware jar, in which were these coins, which are of bronze, and number between 800 and 900. The most of them bear the date of the fourth century or about 100 years before the Romans left Britain, and are chiefly of the reign of Constantine, Constans, and Constantius. Many of them bear the labarum, the first emblems of Christianity adopted by the Emperors. The spot where the coins turned up is near the old Roman Watling-street, which ran through Cobham wood toward London and the interior of the island.

Pompier Life-Savers.—St. Louis, Chicago and New York have adopted the German system of “pompiers” companies for fire service. The pompier is a fireman specially drilled in the use of simple appliances for saving life, such as scaling ladders, ropes, &c. Each man is equipped with a waist belt and spring clasp-hook, a long rope (light but strong), a hatchet and a helmet, and each company of half a dozen or more men has several light ladders, made for scaling purposes. Each ladder is a single hickory pole, with rounds sticking out a few inches on either side. On the top is a long iron hook for fastening the ladder to the window sill. It is better that there should be one man to each ladder, and one ladder to each story of the house to be scaled; but, if necessary, two men, or even one man, with a single ladder, can quickly ascend to the top of the highest building. The method is very simple, and does not require much skill. The ladder is driven through the glass of the window in the second story, and the first pompiers ascends. If he is alone, he must straddle the window sill, and raising the ladder above him drive its hook through the window above and again ascend, but if he has a comrade he hooks himself to the first ladder and then has both hands free with which to put his comrade’s ladder to the third story, and so on. If necessary to avoid flames the pompiers can swing himself over obliquely from window to window. When he reaches the roof he has the means of either helping people to escape or of assisting to raise fixed ladders or hoists to his position on the roof. The chief advantage of the new system seems to be the speed with which the firemen are enabled to reach otherwise inaccessible places from the outside of a burning building. It does not displace any existing apparatus used for saving life or extinguishing fires, but is a very useful addition to the tools of a fire department.—Public Ledger.

THE FRIEND.

SIXTH MONTH 23, 1883.

In an editorial article in the Christian Worker, of 5th mo. 10th, headed, “Some principles that will guide us;” sanctification is spoken of as a work subsequent to justification from past sins. And in its issue for 5th mo. 24th, in a criticism on an article written by William Nicholson, of Kansas, it is stated that the work of God in saving a soul is “always instantaneous,” although man may for a long time resist the convictions of the Holy Spirit and thus delay his reception of the offers of mercy.

Neither of these positions, we believe, is in accordance with the teaching of the early members of the Society of Friends, to which body, we suppose, the editor of the Christian Worker professes to belong; nor do we believe they are calculated to edify, or to promote the cause of religion.

“Without holiness no man shall see the Lord.” The object of our Saviour’s coming on earth was that man might be redeemed from all iniquity, and be saved from sin and its consequences; and this blessed effect is accomplished in those only who are washed, sanctified and justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God. Strongly did Geo. Fox feel this, that he used the striking language,—“So far as a man is sanctified, so far is he justified, and no farther. Very similar to this, are the words of Isaiah Penington: “There is no man justified by the Lord till he be changed, translated into Him in whom God justifieth, out of the place of condemnation into the place of justification. For till men are changed by the Spirit and power of the Lord, they are but darkness and in the darkness, where no justification is. It is the believing, the obedient, the child of Light, that are justified by the Lord.”—Works, 4th ed., vol. 3, p. 215.

In another place, the same deeply experienced writer says: “Justification and sanctification go hand in hand together. There is none justified, but he that is in measure sanctified; and there is none sanctified, but he that is in some measure justified.”—Id., vol. 3, p. 332. In reference to this subject, Job Crook has some weighty remarks to the same effect.

The editor of the Christian Worker speaks of repentance and faith as preceding a sense of forgiveness of sins. But this repentance and this faith, if of a godly sort, include a sight of our sinful condition through the shining into our hearts of the Light of Christ—a submission of the heart to the work of Grace thus begun, a sorrow for sins past, a turning away from them, and a looking unto the Lord for mercy and help. All these are a part of that work of sanctification which is carried in man; which may be summed up in the word "regeneration," by which a person redeemed from the kingdom of the Evil One becomes one of the subjects of the Son of God.

The testimony of Scripture is clear, that the love of God reaches to man, even in his fallen and sinful condition: for "God so loved the world, that He gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him, should not perish, but have everlasting life." And the apostle commends the greatness of the Divine love, by the statement, "while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." The Divine displeasure ever rests on a state of disobedience and revolt; and the Divine favor is never extended to a state of obedience to his commands, and of unity with his Spirit. The sinning and sufferings of our Saviour, and his ever-continuing work in the hearts of his children, are designed to bring man out of the former condition, and to place him in the latter; and whether he is eventually saved or not depends on whether or not this work has been effected in him.

It may be thought by some, that in the former view of the way of salvation, the blessed effects of faith, so highly extolled in the Scriptures, are too much left out of sight. But this is not so. Faith may be defined to be a confidence in the truth of the impressions made on the mind by the Holy Spirit. It is a divine gift, for the conviction felt of the importance and truth of those impressions comes from God, and is not an exercise of any natural power of our own. Those who are willing to receive it with humble submission, and faithfully to follow the path thus pointed out, are those who "walk in the Light." But those who reject the offered gift, and are unwilling to submit themselves to its leading, are those who love darkness rather than light, because they are not willing to forsake their beloved sins. The proof of faith, is the walking in obedience to it; and without a continual daily exercise of it, it is impossible to do the Divine will. These views are well expressed in the following passage from Isaac Newton's works—4th ed., vol. 3, p. 333:

"Faith and obedience are of the same nature, and always go together. So that wherever there is faith, there is obedience likewise; and wherever there is obedience, there is faith. Obedience flows from faith and cannot be without it; for the very nature and virtue of faith is in it. And faith is obedience. For this is the command of God, that the soul believe on Him (and in his appearances) whom He hath sent to save; and this believing, is obedience unto Him that commands it. And this faith, and this obedience, is holy and just in God's sight; and through it (but not without it) the soul is both justified and sanctified."

Since sanctification and justification are inseparably connected, and the work of the Spirit in the cleansing of the heart is often continued before the effect is fully produced, we see no benefit to be derived from teaching the doctrine of instantaneous salvation.

In the life of Richard Claridge, there is a letter written in 1708, which gives his own experience,—which may suitably conclude these remarks;

"The Truth as it is in Jesus, or Christ, who is the Truth itself, is only savingly and effectually known by his internal illumination, and those blessed operations and effects which He produces in the soul. All other knowledge of Him is but notional, this alone is real because experimental.

"Before my conviction of truth, and experience in my measure of the work of it in my heart, I was a great stranger to Christ, in his inward and spiritual appearance.* I knew Him before as to his outward appearance, for I believed the whole history of his birth, life, and sufferings, death, resurrection, ascension, intercession and coming to judge the quick and the dead; as I do now; but I did not know Him then as to his inward appearance, as it hath been since manifested to me.

"For till I knew Him come like a refiner's fire, and like fuller's soap, and sit as a refiner and purifier of silver in my soul, and to purify and purge me as gold and silver; the dross and tin which were in me obstructed that saving and spiritual knowledge of Him, which through the riches of his grace, I have in measure attained to. For they veiled and darkened my understanding, and, till they were removed, they intercepted the spiritual sight of Him.

"Now to remove this darkness there was first light; not natural but divine; and that showed me my sin; the guilt, filth, and penalty due to it—eternal death; and directed me to Christ, the alone Saviour, for salvation from sin, and for deliverance from the penalty due thereunto—eternal death. And as I was enabled by the Grace of God, for without that I could do nothing of myself, to believe in Christ and repent of my sin, which in low and silent waiting, was mercifully bestowed upon me; so I came by the powerful and effectual working of the same Grace, to pass through the ministration of condemnation, and to witness gradually and measurably the ministration of life and peace. I say, gradually; for so it was with me. The work was not instantaneous, but by degrees. Not but that the Almighty could have done it in a moment: but I speak of the experience I have had of his gracious dealings with me, who bore the indignation of the Lord for many months, because I had sinned against Him. Many a night I watered my couch with my tears. It was a time of great distress, anguish and perplexity of soul, and I had utterly fainted in my afflictions, had not the Lord, by his secret power, sustained me. In the midst of this distress of soul, I had now and then a word of comfort given me from the Lord, whereby my faith was strengthened, my hope encouraged, and my love to God excited and revived. For, though the terrors of the Lord were upon me, yet I was made sensible of his love in this terrible dispensation, and that He cast me into the furnace in order to purify and refine me. And as this purging work went forward, so I became in love with it, and earnestly cried unto the Lord that He would take away all iniquity, and cleanse me from all filthiness of flesh and spirit; that He would not suffer one Canaanite to dwell in the land, but put all to the sword that was for the slaughter, that He would thoroughly purge his floor, make my inside perfectly clean, and fit me for communion with Himself."

We have received the Report of The Chil-

* Yet before that time, he had been many years a minister in the Established Church of England.

dren's Country Week Association, detailing the operations for 1882, and suggesting to the benevolent the need of assistance to enable the poor children of our city to enjoy the change of spending a part of the hot season in the country.

The whole number of persons assisted in this way during the last year, was over 14,000: of whom 1802 persons were sent to the country for an average visit of nine days each, and the others on excursions. The expenses incurred were a little less than $6500.

Much care and personal supervision is exercised by the directors of this association over the children sent to country homes, to see that they are clean and neat and provided with sufficient clothing.

The Managers express a desire for more invitations for the children under their care from those living in the country.

All subscriptions, donations and communications should be sent to "The Children's Country Week Association," No. 1112 Girard St., Philada.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—General Crook has returned after an absence of six weeks among the Mexican Cordilleras, where he captured between three and four hundred hostile Indians, including women and children. These Indians will be held as prisoners of war until the Interior Department is prepared to take charge of them. "Two considerations will have weight in determining where to put them. First, the importance of locating them at such a distance from the Mexican border that they will be unable to repeat their periodical raids; and second, to avoid bringing them in contact with other tribes who are now well disposed and peaceable, but upon whom they might exert an evil influence." Secretary Teller has written a letter to Secretary Lincoln suggesting that the captured Indians "should be held as prisoners and punished for their crimes," and that their children should be taken from them and sent to school.

The Secretary of the Interior has paid to Chief Bushyhead, of the Cherokees, the $300,000 appropriated by Congress for lands ceded by the Cherokee Nation to the United States. The money will be distributed among the Cherokees only, in accordance with the decision of the Cherokee Council. Chief Moses, with two other Chiefs and an interpreter, is on the way to Washington to confer with the Secretary of the Interior regarding his reservation in Washington Territory, half of which was recently thrown open to settlement.

The Indian Bureau has received from the War Department copies of the despatches from Colonel Ruger and Lieutenant Colonel Ilges, respecting war parties of Canadian Crees reported to be fighting out with the intention of crossing into the United States, and making war on the Gros Ventres and Assiniboines. Colonel Ilges says the situation is serious, and he suggests that measures be at once taken to prevent bloodshed and loss of property.

The corporators of the Lincoln Institution in Philadelphia, have made the necessary amendments to their charter for converting the institution into a training school for Indian girls. The girls will be brought from the West and trained and educated as at the Carlisle school.

The plan for the consolidation of the Internal Revenue Collection Districts in accordance with the act passed at the last session of Congress, has been virtually agreed upon by the President and Secretary of the Treasury. In all except two of the States, the reorganization of the service has been blocked out, and the matter will probably be finally settled soon. Ohio is understood to be one of the States whose service is still under consideration.

The State Department has been advised by our Minister at Tokio, of the delivery to the Japanese Government of the Treasury draft for $785,000, the amount of the Simonoseki indemnity fund returned to Japan in pursuance of the act of Congress of 22d of 2d mo. last. In accepting the sum the Japanese Foreign Minister expressed "the appreciation of his Government at the equity and justice constantly manifested by the United States toward Japan," and he "alluded with much satisfaction to the present happy relations existing between the people of both countries."

The Secretary of the Treasury has issued a circular to customs officers containing regulations for the treatment and quarantining of imported cattle. The circular provides that "All cattle arriving in the United States from Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia or New Zealand, shall be subject to a quarantine of ninety days, counting from the date of shipment. It shall be the duty of the veterinary inspector at each port to see that the cattle imported shall be securely guarded against the risk of transmitting or receiving contagion until they shall have entered the quarantine grounds, and all imported cattle shall be under his control from the time of landing until they reach the quarantine grounds. He shall also be superintendent of the quarantine, and shall have charge of the grounds, buildings, yards, and all property thereto belonging." Specific instructions are given in regard to the care of the animals, and disinfection of the stations.

The Star Route trial ended on the 14th instant with a verdict of "not guilty" in all the cases, and the jury and the defendants were discharged.

The first train on the Northern Pacific Railroad to Helena, Montana, reached there on the 12th inst. The track is being laid at the rate of three miles per day, with about 140 miles to be laid to the Oregon connection.

A car has arrived at New Orleans with 1,600,000 young shad, sent by Professor Baird for distribution in Louisiana waters: 1,000,000 of them were soon afterwards distributed in Pass Manchae, Bayou Lafourche and Bayou Vermillion.

On the afternoon of the 14th, sixteen car loads of bituminous coal from the Southwestern Virginia Improvement Company's mines arrived at Petersburg, Virginia, consigned to the agent of the Allen Line steamers at Norfolk. It is the first shipment of coal from these mines.

The "High License bill" has passed the Senate of Illinois by a vote of 30 to 20, and been signed by the Governor.

The San Francisco Journal of Commerce says that two months ago the harvest seemed dead, but now the wheat yield is enormous compared with all previous experience. It says: "It must be remembered that only a few years have elapsed since thirty million bushels would have seemed a mighty yield, now we confidently look forward to more than double that figure. Year after year more of our fertile acres have been subjected to the yoke of the plow, until this year we have as much under wheat as has Great Britain and Ireland with thirty-two fold our population. This is something to be proud of. Our wheat will sell for a hundred million dollars this year; our barley for fifteen million dollars; our hops for a hundred and fifty thousand; our wine for four millions; our wool clip for nine millions; our fruit crop will pour into the lap of the grower five millions; our dairy produce will bring nine millions; minor cereals five or six million dollars—a grand total of nearly one hundred and fifty millions of dollars from a portion of our farm produce alone. With a hundred and fifty millions to spend, or about a thousand dollars for every man, woman and child of our farming population, our trade in the year, so auspiciously begun, will be in a measure marvellous."

The President of the Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce estimates the wheat crop of Minnesota at 40,000,000 bushels, and that of Dakota at 20,000,000.

A violent storm and whirlwind visited Muncy, Pa., last First-day evening, destroying the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad station and half a mile of track, and killing a boy. For an hour rain fell in torrents, accompanied by hailstones as large as hickory nuts. Bridges over small streams were washed away, barns were unroofed, a number of other buildings were damaged, fruit trees were levelled and a quantity of grain was destroyed. The storm passed into Northumberland county, doing great damage there.

One of the severest storms ever known in Pittsburg, visited that city on Second-day evening. Hailstones fell as large as hen's eggs, smashing glass throughout the city. In the surrounding country trees were uprooted and cattle killed.

News has been received at Cairo of a terrible storm in Williamson county, Illinois, in which 20 lives were lost. Lightning as well as wind caused destruction, a whole family in one place being struck by an electric bolt, and one of them killed. A tornado passed over Chillicothe, Missouri, and its vicinity, on the 12th, unroofing and wrecking buildings. The house of Dennis Wolfe, five miles south of Chillicothe, was demolished, "the family carried through the air about five hundred feet." Wolfe killed, and his wife seriously injured. At Sumner City, 18 miles southwest, eleven buildings were destroyed. Thousands of trees in the path of the tornado were uprooted.

In the General Synod of the Reformed Dutch Church of America, at Albany, on the 12th instant, resolutions were adopted denouncing the Masonic and other oath-bound secret orders, and cautioning all churches of the Synod to "discourage their members from joining secret societies."

The deaths in this city last week numbered 391, which was 53 more than during the previous week, and 58 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing, 181 were males, and 210 females: 52 died of consumption; 24 of diphtheria; 24 of marasmus; 23 of meningitis; 21 of convulsions; 22 of scarlet fever; 12 of old age; 12 of casualties, and 9 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 103 $\frac{1}{2}$; 3 $\frac{1}{2}$'s, 103 $\frac{1}{2}$; 4 $\frac{1}{2}$'s, 113; 4's, registered, 119; coupon, 120; currency 6's, 128 a 132.

Cotton continues dull, but prices were unchanged. Sales of middlings are reported at 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 7 $\frac{3}{4}$ cts. for export, and 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 8 $\frac{3}{4}$ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in moderate request and firm. Sales of 2000 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at \$5.25 a \$6.50; Pennsylvania family at \$5 a \$5.12 $\frac{1}{2}$; western do. at \$5.75 a \$6.25, and patents at \$6.50 a \$7.50. Rye flour is quiet but steady at \$3.70 a \$3.75 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was unsettled and prices were a fraction lower. Sales of 4000 bushels red, in car lots, at $1.12 a $1.24. Rye is nominal. Corn is fairly active and easier. Sales of 8000 bushels in car lots, at 56 a 66 cts. Oats are quiet and weaker. Sales of 9500 bushels, in car lots, at 47 a 54 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 6th mo. 16th, 1883.—Loads of hay, 413; loads of straw, 52. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 80 to 90 cts. per 100 pounds; mixed, 70 to 80 cts.; straw, 55 a 65 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in fair demand last week, but prices were without material change: 3500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. per lb., as to condition.

Sheep were active and prices were a fraction higher: 10,000 head arrived and sold at 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 3 $\frac{3}{4}$ cts., and lambs at 6 a 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. per lb., as to quality.

Hogs were a fraction lower: 3300 head arrived and sold at 9 a 10 cts. per lb., as to condition.

FOREIGN.—A terrible calamity occurred in the town of Sunderland, in the county of Durham, on the evening of the 16th. From the details thus far received it appears that an entertainment had been given in Victoria Hall by a conjuror, which was attended almost altogether by children, several thousand being in attendance. The accident occurred at the close of the performance. The body of the hall had been entirely cleared of its occupants, when some 1200 of the little ones came rushing down stairs from the gallery. Some of the children who escaped say that a report spread through the gallery at the close of the performance that the child first out of the hall would get a prize, and there was consequently an eager rush for the doors. At the top of the first flight of stairs there was a door which opened only 20 inches, and thus only one child was permitted to pass through at a time. At this point, while the mass of children were pushing forward, some of them fell and were unable to rise, owing to the others crowding on. The result was that a great number were pushed down, trampled on, and about 200 suffocated or otherwise fatally injured.

In the House of Commons on the evening of the 12th, Gladstone accepted a resolution proposed by Lord Clarendon and supported by the Conservatives and the Parnellites, in favor of an early revision of the purchase clauses of the Land Act for the purpose of giving fuller effect to the intentions of Parliament.

Truth asserts that Queen Victoria has quite recovered from the injury to her knee sustained some time ago by falling down the steps at Windsor Palace. The depression of her spirits is, however, said by Truth to cause some anxiety, owing to its influence on her general health.

On the 14th instant the dynamite conspirators, Dr. Gallagher, Wilson, Whitehead and Curtin, were found guilty of treason-felony, and sentenced to penal servitude for life. Ausburgh and Bernard Gallagher were acquitted.

The Times, in an editorial, says the sentences are severe, but, considering the heinousness of the offence, the convicted men have not received more than their deserts. All the London journals express approval of the sentences. The Daily News says the convicted men deliberately declared war against society, and they have no right to complain of the consequences. The Dublin Freeman's Journal also expresses its approbation of the sentences.

President Grévy is opposed to taking extreme measures against Annam, as he does not wish to alienate sympathy of England and America. Prime Minister Ferry, on the contrary, is in favor of an energetic course.

Admiral Pierre, commander of the French fleet in Madagascar waters, in his report of the bombardment of Majunga, in 5th mo., 16, says he demanded the surrender of the place, but received an evasive reply. The vessels then opened fire on the town, the three for which, mounting thirty guns, replied. They were quickly silenced, however. The Hanoi quarter of town was destroyed, but the French factory and most of the American houses escaped injury. The garrison composed of two thousand men, retreated. The French sustained no loss of men. They occupied the town and are collecting the customs.

A land-slip has occurred in Kuezurunare, in the duchy of Bukowina, Austria, by which 112 houses were destroyed.

The Mexican Congress adjourned on Second-day. The most important acts passed by it was the authorization to the President to settle the national debt, amendment to the Constitution submitted to the State giving the control of mining and commercial law to the Federal Congress, and several railroad grants, most important of which gives a charter, with a convention to the State of Michoacan over the route which the Mexican National Railroad forfeited charter after spending large sums in construction.

Advices from Ecuador to the 19th ultimo, state that severe earthquakes had shaken Quito and LaTacu. In the latter place several houses were overthrown, the rest "threatened to fall at any moment." The volcano of Cotopaxi was in active eruption, and a repetition of the catastrophe of 1877 was feared.

The basis of peace between Peru and Chili, signed by Novoa and Lavalle, on behalf of General Iglesias stipulates for the cession of all the territory south of the river Camarones to Chili; the occupation by Chili of Tacna and Arica for ten years, after which a plebiscite is to decide to whom they shall belong, and country getting them is to pay an indemnity of $1,000,000 to the other.

Lima, 6th mo. 15, via Galveston.—The following particulars relative to the terms of peace have been published in the papers here and were taken from letters stolen on the 24th ult. from a special courier route to General Iglesias:

"Chili will not forfeit the decrees about guano and saltpetre issued 2nd mo. 9 and 3rd mo. 20, 1882, the net profits of 1,000,000 tons, deducting all expenses, be equally divided between the Chilean and Peruvian bondholders. These profits only come out of islands now worked, as future mines found in annexed territories belong exclusively to Chili, who can dispose of such newly discovered mines at will. Chili does not hold herself responsible for any indebtedness of Peru. Chili holds the sovereignty of the Lobos Islands not sufficient guano is extracted to fulfil the sale of 1,000,000 tons. When the treaty is ratified Chili turns over Peru 50 per cent of the net proceeds from the Lobos Islands. Lastly, the commercial relations and indemnities to Chilean citizens will be discussed afterwards."

Letters and Memoranda of William Scattergood.

To M. T.

"Philada., 1st mo. 4th, 1830.

My dear — : My mind has been so much with thee and your family for the last few weeks, that I have thought much of endeavoring to pay you a visit. But as it seems doubtful whether I shall be able to accomplish this, and feeling my mind a little quieted this evening, and somewhat sensible of a degree of true sympathy springing up, I thought perhaps I should not do amiss in conveying thee by way of letter the feelings that have occupied the mind. I am aware that feeling is do stripped, as it appears to me, of almost all sense of good, and reduced to the lowest condition to which perhaps a soul that feels itself hungering for the bread of immortal life can possibly be reduced to, it would be presumption to offer much by way of consolation to others, yet as I trust (however the manifestation of it of latter time may have been withheld) that there is still alive between us and towards one another, the sensible evidence of continued affection and regard, and of the friendship of our earlier years based, I have always trusted it was, on the immutable foundation, still continues, I feel a liberty to offer to thee in thy present affliction, the language of sincere sympathy, and to assure thee of my brotherly remembrance, the belief that however the blow may have been long ward off, the reality is not the less painful for being long delayed. * * * Well, my dear cousin, there is a never failing helper; and in the afflictions which are permitted to befall us in our solitary travel, as it may appear many times, this seems our only refuge; and if we can but hold fast a little faith and confidence in the eternal Arm, humbly seeking for a qualification to pray before Him, and for ability to 'behave ourselves wisely in a perfect way,' we shall be strengthened from season to season to show by our example that our Lord is indeed God.

I feel an affectionate solicitude, accompanied with a conviction that it will be the case, that my beloved — will not be in any wise moved from the faith of the Gospel, but that his language will be: 'As for me, I will serve the Lord'—Him who died for us, and is risen again for our justification. Surely marvellous and wonderful are his works! and hast thou not had special cause, my dear M., to magnify his name in a late, less bitter bereavement may I not say, when thy dear brother was made to feel the power of that redemption which came by Jesus Christ our Lord? I have wished to convey to thee before, the feeling which accompanied my mind at the time we followed him to the silent grave. When I think I was made sensible, that the end of all things to him was peace. * * *

Well, my dear cousin, I do not seem to have much more at present to communicate, beyond the hope that thou mayest be strengthened to seek for true support, and that thou mayest be enabled to draw nearer and nearer to the Fountain of everlasting life. Farewell affectionately. My love is to all your family without exception; which thou mayest mention if worth accepting; and to thyself, I think I may say very largely. From thy truly affectionate friend and cousin,

WILLIAM SCATTERGOOD."

From Sarah Hillman to W. S.

No date; but probably about this time.

"My dear friend, why wilt thou flee? is not spiritual death painfully felt in many places, where the enemy has not spread the net, which causes to fall into unbelief. Ah me! thinks, 'woe is me,' may be very properly the language of our spirits, 'because I dwell in Mesech, and sojourn in the tents of Kedar.' May our attention be directed unto Him who died for us, who has, in some measure, brought us unto himself, and made us willing to enter into covenant with Him; and oh, let us steadily follow his leadings, even though we may be brought into paths we have not seen. He leadeth the blind; and He will make darkness light before his own, and crooked things straight.

I am sometimes ready to fear (while I thus speak) for myself, lest I shall never be able to overcome the enemies of my own house, so as to come up in the line which has been marked in my view as the only way for me into the kingdom of rest and peace. Pray for thy feeble friend, that nothing may operate to hinder her from being given up in body, soul, and spirit to the guidance and leadings of the blessed Head of the Church. Farewell in near affection, S. H."

From E. Allinson* to W. S.

"Burlington, 7th mo. 4th, 1830.

clay, into the hands of the Heavenly Potter; that so thou mayest be formed into such a vessel as may be consistent with his holy will. Thus wilt thou be enabled to honor Him in thy generation, and to attain his blessing both in spiritual and temporal things. That thou and thy beloved companion, who I believe is not a stranger to mental exercise and concern for the prosperity of the cause of Truth, may be coming up in your proper allotments, is the fervent desire of thy affectionate cousin,

E. ALLINSON."

The following is extracted from a letter written by Ann Jones to Hannah Paul,* 10th mo. 4th, 1831.—"Does William Scattergood appear (in the ministry) in your meetings? I often think of him, and greatly desire for his own and the Church's sake, that he may be faithful unto death, even the death of the cross. And that by dwelling with the life that lives through death, he may be made more than conqueror through Him who loved him; and who, through death, hath conquered him who had the power of death. Our united love to Ann Scattergood and her children; especially William and Elizabeth."

From the Memoranda.—"1833. Alas, to whom now shall I look? I have lost all faith, all hope, all that can give me any claim to eternal life. What shall I say? O that it were with me as in days that are past, as in the months when God preserved me! O Lord! hast thou utterly cast me off forever? I acknowledge my backsliding; I acknowledge my utter worthlessness and vileness in thy sight. I have returned as the dog to his vomit, and as the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire. But thou, O most holy and powerful Redeemer, art still able to raise from the dead those who believe in thee. Be graciously pleased to touch my heart with a little of the quickening virtue of thine own Spirit; and in thy mercy, which is infinite, cast me not off utterly. O! remember that I am dust, and restrain my mind from wandering from thee. Thou seest the secret defection of my heart; thou knowest how I have departed, and the secret causes which have led into my present condition of barrenness, desolation, and death. O! be graciously pleased to renew me again; create a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within me. I have seen thee, that thou art a holy and just God who alloweth not iniquity; but wilt be justified when thou speakest, and clear when thou judgest. Blot out, O Lord! if it is not yet too late, my transgressions which are as mountains before me; which prevent my having access to thee, and disqualify for service in thy church and among thy people. O! I am defiled, and cast forth as an unprofitable brand; but thou art still able to graft me in again through humility and obedience to thee, and through thy mercy and grace. O Lord, my Saviour! graciously condescend to extend once more the sweet visitations of thy love, that I may be enabled yet to triumph over death, hell, and the grave. I am persuaded that without thee I have neither power nor ability to raise one sigh or prayer which shall reach thy Divine ear. O! bow down thine ear unto me; 'wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin.'

* Hannah Paul, an elder in the Northern District Monthly Meeting, Philadelphia, deceased 3d mo. 24th, 1854, in the 79th year of her age.

"1834.—What shall be said of my present condition? I feel desirous to walk in conformity to what I know to be right; but alas, 'without faith it is impossible to please God.' This is obvious; for how can we be sincerely desirous of serving Him, if we do not livingly believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him? It is easy to say, we believe. I can say I think with truth, that I believe that He is; but is it alone available to salvation? O Lord! I see myself poor and naked and miserable, and often look toward thy holy habitation with desires for help; but alas, utterly unable as I am to do any thing of myself or to ask any thing, my soul falls back again, without rising in living aspirations to thy holy footstool.

Oh! how shall I look Thee, my gracious Redeemer, in the face, in the day of awful account? My stewardship unfulfilled, my accounts not ready? Where shall I look for help if thou forsakest? May I ask again for the light of thy countenance to enlighten my dark and hard heart! I feel my want; I feel that I have been negligent and idle; and that the beggary to which I am now brought is through idleness and fear. Be pleased to restore unto me the tenderness and visitations of thy love as in earlier years; that, if not too late, I may again know the strengthening virtue of thy arm, which is able to save to the uttermost all them that call upon thee."

"12th mo. 24th.—'Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him.'"

For "The Friend."

The Quest for Entertainments and Sports.

The following letter, addressed by the author of "The Dairyman's Daughter" to his children, gives apt expression to those considerations of tender solicitude which should animate all, in the parental relation, who believe that Christ's followers are enjoined to be a peculiar people.—to be "peculiar" in a conscientious separation from the deadening spirit of the world.

"Many temptations will occur to induce you to yield and conform to habits and principles, the very reverse of those which you hear me supporting both in the pulpit and parlor. Be not ashamed of firmly, though modestly, in such cases, resisting them. State what mine and your principles are, and heed not the momentary unpleasantness of appearing singular, when conscience and duty require it. You may easily say, 'my father does not approve of such and such things, neither can I.'

"All description of public amusements, novels, popular amorous poems, plays, songs, vanities and finery, and all the sad tribe of poisonous and dangerous pursuits, should be regulated by this principle; and O, that your simplicity and love to Christ, may never give way to one sad influence of false sentiment, even among those whom, on other accounts, we may esteem and regard. The half religious are often more dangerous than those who are less so; because we are more on our guard in the latter case than the former. The great number of instances in which I have seen the young people of religious families deeply injured in their spirits and habits, by much visiting with persons of different views and customs from those of their own household, has made me, I confess, from pure motives of conscience and prudence, very averse to much of that sort of visiting in my own children's case, which I know to have been productive of bad consequences in others. And the difficulty of drawing the line has always appeared very great with my numerous friends and acquaintance. Still, I wish to make you happy in every reasonable way; and I am glad when I can give you the advantage of new scenes and company, when it is of the right kind."

The enunciation of correct Christian sentiments such as these of Leigh Richmond, has ever caused their promulgators to be contemned as over-scrupulous and illiberal by those parents to whom the way of the cross is an offence. Yet the sincere-hearted may here say with the Psalmist, as provoking to steadfastness of purpose, "The proud have had me greatly in derision; yet have I not declined from thy law," and, further, as expressive of thankfulness that their lot has been cast with the seekers of God, may they quote the language of the same excellent psalm which so extols the Lord's statutes and testimonies, "I am a companion of all them that fear thee, and of them that keep thy precepts."

Of more recent date than the foregoing parental letter, but as speaking the same language, and inciting to the same thing, is the subjoined expression on worldly conformity by a thoughtful writer, Dr. James W. Alexander:

"The door at which those influences enter which countervail parental instruction and example, I am persuaded, is yielding to the ways of good society. By dress, books, and amusements, an atmosphere is formed which is not that of Christianity. More than ever do I feel that our families must stand in a kind but determined opposition to the fashions of the world. And I have found nothing yet which requires more courage and independence than to rise a little, but decidedly, above the par of the religious world around us."

It need scarcely be said that, along with the desire to escape the Divine condemnation and the self-reproach which laxity of parental control, like that of Eli, may bring with it, there is need of much care lest we drift into the accompanying peril of a scolding habit. There is, perhaps, no agency better calculated to temper this over-severity or mere censoriousness which an unwatchful state or a forgetfulness of "the hole of the pit whence [we] are digged," may induce, than may be found in a frequent application of those evidences of disingenuousness, disobedience, or ingratitude which we see in our children, to our own states as careless, disobedient, or otherwise sinful sons and daughters of a very compassionate Father in heaven. And when we reflect that, in alliance with this loving and forgiving spirit of the Lord, we owe so much to his gentle and continually-repeated admonitions as the inspeaking Director of our paths, we should thence be led to an apprehension of our duty not to be negligent—whether in helpful counsel, in commendation or rebuke (but never in sarcasm)—toward the offspring with whom Providence may have entrusted us.

The several seasons of the year offer, to youth, different temptations to be encountered. With those whose parents have abundant means, and who are not debarred from spending their summers where they may cline—as at the fashionable watering-place there are associations, frequently far from best, and not helpful to the children of Friends in the hotel's dancing hall, music parlor, ca table and ten-pin alley, and, generally, in companionship of those who may have little relish for that simplicity of address and attire which we have been taught to esteem. may hence, with profit, observe the rule Leigh Richmond's—to seek the happiness the children in every reasonable way, affording them the advantage of new scenes, with the qualification that the company, the associations shall be "of the right kind."

By instilling a fondness for natural history pursuits, and similar beneficial employments the young may often be assisted to estimate merely frivolous and time-wasting occupations at their true value. When being shown not long ago, by a Friend of means, a very expensive collection of appliances for natural history study intended for his children, I reflected that, morally speaking, the investment represented probably some of the best-paying stock that he possessed; while, addition to that, the actual money cost had been but a tithe of the outlay, which, with different and gayer tastes to indulge, a "gracious piano" would have entailed.

In alluding, in conclusion, to the subject Athletic Sports, I am aware that I go upon ground where I am likely to be, by many, unwelcome. As there is an undoubted propriety in the student devoting a certain portion of his time to the healthful development of the body, I have naught to object to such employment, within reasonable limits, whether it be in the way of running, leaping, ball-playing, rowing, or similar bodily exercises. It is simply to that abuse of skilled athletic practice, which has led to those competitive inter-collegiate and other matches—now to come an acknowledged evil—that exception is taken. Previous to the late war, trials of skill in boat-rowing and ball-playing were, for the most part, confined to impromptu contests between companies of students in the same institution. But the ambition now, we well know, is to participate in formally arranged public matches between picked students of different colleges, with professional players occasionally brought in. The details of these matches being reported in all the daily papers, the participants in them feel that they are men indeed. As proofs of their manliness, betting on races, a liking for sporting papers, smoking, liquor drinking, and other vices or indulgences gain headway, whether party or class feeling grows more intense.

It may not always be that the studies the lads are markedly neglected by reason of this excessive participation in sports. Son of them will naturally be ambitious to excel in their studies as well as in their public gymnastics, and will graduate well-up in the classes. A greater number, however, will be willing to sacrifice excellence in their professional pursuits to a determination to enjoy themselves; whilst all will suffer in their ious life. As has been shown by dear experience in very many of the 360 colleges of the land (and increasingly so of latter years) the students will be more ready of provocation, less tractable, less willing to come under discipline even where it is judicious and wholesome. Necessarily, the Bible and other religious books will be neglected, and the companionship of those who would be morally helpful will be unsought. Under such a preparation for the active duties of life, the spirit of speculation and worldliness which has so often entered into the life of many churches, will yet, when these students become business men, be their vitality more and more. Great praise for gratitude is it that the students within our borders have been largely preserved from these sporting customs, and from the outlawry and virtual infidelity, which, as many college presidents can tell us, have followed in their train. J. W. L.

For "The Friend."

Religious Views and Tenets.

That life which is the spiritual light of every man, is the only true light. And it is the light that enlighteneth not only the converted ones, but every man that comes into the world; it is by this light shining and operating upon the darkness of our sinful hearts, that we are converted and turned from darkness to light, and from the power that Satan has over us to the converting power of God. But the darkness of itself does not comprehend the light. For David says, "In thy light shall we see light;" and life and immortality are fully brought to light through the inshining of that gospel light which Paul says has appeared to all; and which teaches the ways of salvation to all who will be taught by it. So while we have the light, let us believe in the light that we may become the children of light, and be saved from the wrath to come. Christ himself says, "Ye believe in me, believe also in me." Yes, believe in Him and all his fulness. For it is written: "Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh his arm his arm; and whose heart departeth from the Lord."

If Christ is indeed our Lord, as many of the professors of religion in their mouth-worship him to be; why are they not more willing that the preparation of the heart and the answer of the tongue should be of Him? If God is a spirit, why should not the worshipping of Him be in spirit and in truth, without the embellishment or ostentations show, or musical display of poor finite man? Without the heavenly spirit we have not the heavenly life or light; and without this, how can we reach or speak of heavenly things to the profit of the hearers? We must first receive the Spirit before we can hand it out to others. If we have it not ourselves, how can we be ministers of the gospel? We may be ministers of the letter by the spirit of man that is in us; but we cannot be ministers of the Spirit until we receive it from Him who is a Spirit, and who must be worshipped in spirit and in truth—that is, without mockery or hypocrisy. We must receive before we can give: because we cannot give that which we have not. But there is a spirit in man; and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding; and how can we understand the deep things of God but by the inspiration from Him? Christ says, without me ye can do nothing—nothing that will advance his cause, without his assisting and enlightening grace. So there is a spiritual ministry, coming from the Spirit of the Lord, which tends to lead the hearers from earth to heaven; and there is an intellectual ministry, proceeding from the spirit of man, which, with all its eloquence, tends to lead the hearers no higher than earth. The one is from the earth, and is earthly, the other is from heaven, and is heavenly in its nature. The one kills, while the other makes alive.

We read that the sons of Aaron through negligence or inwatchfulness had suffered the fire that had been divinely kindled upon the altar to go out; but they continued to show their activity in offerings to the Lord. Although He had said, "I will be sanctified in them that come nigh to me; and before all the people I will be glorified;" yet they "offered strange fire before the Lord, which He commanded them not;" and so they suffered the penalty of death. This was under the outward law, and for outward transgressions. But now, under the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, is not spiritual death the penalty for spiritual disobedience? Spiritual death to those who offer a strange fire on the altar of the heart, which the Lord has not kindled nor commanded. How can He be sanctified in us unless his pure Spirit prevails in the soul, quickening it by his Divine energy, and causing the heavenly fire to burn on the altar of the heart?

"O for a closer walk with God!
A calm and heavenly frame,
A light to shine upon the road
That leads us to the Lamb."

The heavenly-minded man longs for the light of the Spirit of life to shine upon the road that leads from earth to heaven; and he often finds it to be a marvellous light. Though clouds of darkness may at times be permitted to intervene to try his faith, yet it is an everlasting and unchangeable light, causing the darkness in due time to give place to the arising of the Sun of Righteousness with that healing and restoring virtue which spreads over and heals all who patiently wait the brightness of his coming. But the man of the world, who believes not in the light of spiritual life, is striving to content himself with a worldly light—the light of reason—the light of a cultivated intellect—a light comparable to the changeable moon that rules in the darkness of this changeable world, but shines no higher; neither has it the crown of twelve stars upon it; but is kept under foot by the true church, which is clothed with the unchangeable Sun of righteousness.

As the outward visible world could not subsist without the outward visible sun to warm and enlighten it; so the spiritual or invisible world cannot subsist without the Sun of Righteousness shines upon it to warm and enlighten it, and to make it fruitful in the heavenly kingdom.

If under the old dispensation, the ministers of the outward sanctuary had to be cleansed from the filthiness of the flesh before they could minister of holy things; how much more now under the ministry of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle which the Lord has pitched, and not man, should the ministers be purged from the filthiness of the spirit, by the washing of regeneration, before ministering of the law of the Spirit of life? The old ministry was under that law which made nothing perfect; and which was only figurative of the new, which is established upon better promises. But now Christ is head over all things unto his church; and has become the minister of ministers; and is willing and able to furnish all, who in faith humbly rely on Him, with that ability which God alone through Him can give. He is able to bless and hand forth the bread and water of life to all the hungering and thirsting ones, who patiently wait in the silence of all flesh for that refreshment which comes alone through Him. But we have to hunger and thirst after righteousness before we can relish heavenly food; and we must have the carnal mind, which is enmity with God, silenced in us before we can hear the still small voice; and we must have the spiritual eye opened before we can see heavenly things. One of the many wonderful things our Saviour did while outwardly among men, was to open the eyes of the blind. And Paul's mission, when he was sent by Him among the Gentiles, was to open the eyes of the spiritually blind, and to turn them from darkness to light, &c. And so it is with all true ministers who are sent out by Him. And they are to do it in the ability that God giveth, that He alone may be glorified and not man.

A curious Marriage Certificate, which has been preserved in John Woolman's handwriting.

Whereas, William Boin, a negro man now employed in the affairs of Moses Haines, of Springfield, who by an agreement with the said Moses Haines, set forth in writing and signed, expects to enjoy the full benefit of his labors on the first day of the Fourth month, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and sixty-five: And Dido, a negro woman, of late servant to Joseph Burr, who now enjoys the whole benefit of her labor, having for some time manifested an inclination to join in marriage with each other, and on enquiry no difficulty appearing in respects to marriage engagements with any others.

They, the said William Boin and Dido, on the third of the Fifth month, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and sixty-three, at a little meeting held in a dwelling house, on that occasion did publicly inform us, the witnesses to this instrument, that they took each other as husband and wife, and mutually proposed to use their best endeavors, through Divine assistance, to be faithful and true to each other until death should separate them. And in confirmation thereof have hereunto their hands,

WILLIAM BOIN,

The Opening of the Congo.

The question whether the great Congo river is to be dominated by French or Portuguese influence or is to be free to the world involves political and business interests of great importance; but with these interests are bound up very closely the higher interests of civilization and Christianity. The grandest civilization attainable is Christian civilization, and Christianity prepares the way more thoroughly for the commerce and other elements of civilization, as even a distinguished French atheist has recently admitted, than any other agency. Africa has been regarded, until the present generation, as an inaccessible continent. Along its wonderful extent of coast-line, trading stations, towns, even colonies might be formed to gather up important articles of trade from the interior; but no thought, until in recent years, of even communication with the vast unreachd interior was entertained. And yet the great unexplored regions lying immediately to the west of the great lakes can be reached by one of the most wonderful water-courses in the world. When Stanley descended the great Congo, which he rechristened the Livingstone, a few years ago, it was considered the greatest feat ever accomplished by an African traveller. Now, after some months' work and a considerable outlay, a pathway extending nearly fifteen hundred miles across the continent is open to travel and trade. Four steamers, under the auspices of the African International Association of Belgium, ply on the river. Three occupy the navigable waters between the cataracts around which Stanley has built good roads, below Stanley Pool, which is about 350 miles from the coast; and one is for the navigation of the stream above the Pool, a magnificent stretch of 1,000 miles being open to it. From Stanley Pool to the coast many trading and missionary stations have been established, and colonies are growing up around them; and the journey to the Pool, which the English Baptist missionaries made a year or two ago with the greatest danger and difficulty, will soon become as common as the trip up the Nile to the Second Cataract.

Stanley's mission is an international one. He is opening the way to the interior, not for Belgium, whose sovereign has generously assisted the enterprise from his own private purse to the extent of $100,000; not for Germany, not for England, but for the world. It is a noble, a humane, a generous undertaking, designed to develop trade, introduce civilization, advance science, let Christianity into the heart of savage heathendom, and relieve human oppression and degradation. The flags which Stanley has raised over his stations are non-national. On the other hand de Brazza, as the envoy of France, is on the Congo to make French territory. He has raised the French tricolor at Stanley Pool, and in many other places, and claimed for the Republic a vast amount of territory. A conflict with Stanley seems more than probable; but we hope, for the sake of Africa, and humanity and civilization, and Christian missions, that the tricolor will not triumph.

The great struggle, however, will be for the mouth of the river. Whoever controls the outlet controls, as a matter of course, the whole stream. Portugal lays claim to it, and asks England's support, on the ground of occupation of the whole territory in the seventeenth century. Portugal still holds the Congo and Angola districts to the south of the river, and would be glad to annex Loango to the North. France proposes to seize all the territory it can lay hands on south of the equator, and French gun-boats and Portuguese have aroused the natives to a high pitch of excitement. England at first seemed inclined to listen to Portugal, on the ground that a more stable government was needed along the coast than the native chiefs could provide; but public sentiment in England sets strongly against this policy, and the Government must heed it. Portugal's colonial policy is selfish, if not rapacious. So little of beneficence has there been in its rule in Congo and Angola that improvement cannot be found anywhere. Even the Catholic religion has well-nigh died out. France's designs are quite as ungenerous. At home the Republic is tolerant of all religions; in its colonies it is generally rigidly intolerant. If it obtains control of the Congo the great Protestant missionary enterprises will probably be suppressed, or be greatly hindered.

Because, therefore, of the grand possibilities which the Congo opens to Christianity, civilization, and commerce; because it is the key to the great interior regions and population of the continent, we do not want to see it under the control of France or Portugal. Its importance to Europe is such as would justify its being internationalized, as the Danube is, in Europe. Let no national flag predominate on it. Let it be free as the ocean is, and let no flag be excluded except the slaver's flag.—Chr. Adv.

Character as a Commentator.—Whether we use the old Version, or the Bible Union, or the Canterbury Revision, or the Greek Testament, it is well to bear in mind that we read and interpret the [Bible] very largely in the light of our own character. He who is most spiritual, finds the New Testament spiritual. He who is material, finds it material. Thus the words of our Lord: "One thing is needful," a German scholar has interpreted as meaning: "one dish is sufficient for supper." A man of Christian experience sees in the words something far different. One man sees in the conversion of Paul nothing but a change of intellectual conviction from Judaism to a logical belief in the divine mission of Christ. Another man realizes that the change was something vastly beyond a mere intellectual transition.

It is true of all moral and spiritual, æsthetic and affectional truth, that we know only what we have experienced. He who has never held in his arms a child of his own, does not know, cannot know, what it is to love his child, or what it is to lose his child. Napoleon might receive the intellectual proposition that it is wrong to be ambitious and selfish; but he could not know the excellence of unselfish devotion to the good of humanity. "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them; because they are spiritually discerned." Our knowledge of the Bible is no broader, no deeper than our experience of the Bible. What to one is the most exalted spirituality and wisdom, to another is merely the expression of an unreasonable enthusiasm.—Nat. Baptist.

CHRISTOPHER HEALY'S FATHER'S TESTIMONY AGAINST BEARING ARMS AND WAR.

Christopher Healy said that his grandfather died when quite young, and that his father was placed as an apprentice with a worthy friend to learn the trade of a shoemaker. I have no doubt that it was from some of the Seed of life, which was then sown in his heart, that he was led in mature age to join in membership with the Society of Friends. He was a sedate and quiet man, and I think I may say, that he was of a temperate peaceable spirit; and perhaps his worst failing as a father, was, that he let his child do pretty much as they pleased, and let them go to meeting where they pleased. It is true, there was no great choice of meetings to which we could go, in my young years, as there were few except Presbyterians and Baptists in the neighborhood. During the earlier part of the war of the revolution, he suffered much account of his refusal to bear arms; and it is a little remarkable that he was strengthened to bear a consistent and faithful testimony against war—though too weak to live up to the doctrines of the gospel in other respects. The colonel of the local militia and all his subordinates were very much prejudiced against him; and it seemed to be the pretty unanimous judgment of the neighborhood, that he ought to be hanged if he would not fight. To such an extent was this prejudice carried, that they would employ him, so that it was likely to go hard with his family. On a particular occasion there came an order from the governor's council, to organize a party to guard the neighboring coast against the English. The colonel called upon my father, and told him that he should go with his party, dead or alive. My father knew very well from the officer's determination of character that he would go hard with him, if he could not obtain protection from some higher power. Upon solidly weighing the subject, he found it most easy to seek that relief from the Governor of Connecticut which he had sought in vain from lower officers of government. As soon as night set in he started for Lebanon, where the governor, Jonathan Trumbull, lived; arrived pretty early in the morning, and found the council assembled, but the governor was not then with them. My father was but poorly dressed, for he was a poor man, and dress as became one—and his clothes were not then in their best order—for both he and his garments were travel-worn and travel-soiled. His long walk of thirty miles of a dark night. When he entered the council chamber, he saw so many men in big wigs, and covered with powder, he felt considerably tried, but thought it would never do to give out then. So he told them he wished to speak with the governor. The councillors looked at the poor rustic before them with considerable haughtiness for some time; at last, one of them asked him what the nature of his business with the governor was. My father said, I have applied to all the subordinate officers of government in my neighborhood for protection, and have been refused, and I have now come to see if the Lord will not dispose the heart of the governor to grant me succor in my extremity, for unless I receive it, I am likely to lose my life, and leave my family without any protection or means of support.

The speaker requested him to explain himself more fully, saying that whatever the nature of his distress might be, the consideration of it would necessarily claim the attention of the council, and it might expedite the business if he would give them a history of his case while they were waiting for the governor, assuring him that he would lose nothing by letting them hear it at once. Being thus induced and encouraged to proceed, he told them, although he was not a member of the Religious Society of Friends, yet that he had been convinced that war was inconsistent with the religion of Christ, and that in consequence of this belief, he had found himself restrained from bearing arms, and that he had been subjected to much persecution and misery on account of his conscientious scruples in relation to this subject. He told them that his sufferings had been much increased since the order came down to guard the coast; mentioning, that the colonel had threatened him the day before that he should go with them, dead or alive, and added, that he knew the man well enough to be assured that he could fulfil his threat, if the governor did not grant him his protection. He finished his little narrative by detailing the sad condition in which his wife and children were already reduced by the prejudices of their warlike neighbors, and depicted the still more deplorable circumstances under which they would suffer if he was taken from them, without assuring the council that whether life or death were to be his portion, he could not consent to wrong his conscience by bearing arms. The simple earnestness of his appeal had a very reaching effect upon my father's hearers, and when the governor came in, he who had before spoken, introduced my father to the officer, giving him also a short account of the nature of his business, but leaving it to my father to give it more in detail. The governor listened very attentively to his narrative, and asked him many questions about his religious principles, views of government, family, &c., and then requested him to go over to a tavern, which stood on the other side of the street, and get refreshment, and wait till they had finished some important business, which must first be attended to. He declined going to the tavern, but said he would wait outside until they were ready for him. The governor asked him, if he had any scruple about going to a tavern? and when informed that he had not, he further queried if he declined going? So father frankly told him it was because he had no money to pay for refreshments. Upon which the governor nodded to one of the council, who went over to the tavern with him, and directed him to be furnished with whatever he stood in need of.

In about two hours my father was sent for, and the governor handed him a letter, saying, get this to the colonel before he goes to bed to-night, as it is very important for you that he gets it early. Father said, I cannot walk thirty miles between now and bed time, but I will engage, if my health permits, to let it to him before he is up in the morning. My father thanked him for his kindness, and then bid them farewell. They all took hands with him at parting, wishing him a safe journey, and a joyful return to his family.

At sunrise the next morning my father had the colonel called from his bed to receive the governor's letter, and though at first he seemed displeased, and asked him how he dare go to Lebanon without his permission? yet when he had read the letter, his countenance relaxed, and he said pleasantly, the governor shall be obeyed, and I will take care that you shall not be molested any more on account of your conscientious scruples. And he laughingly added, I hope, Mr. Healy, you have no scruple against making shoes for your fighting neighbors. To which father replied, I am willing to work for any body and every body, according to my ability. Well then, said the colonel, come and make my family some shoes, and I will take care that no one shall molest either you or your family. And Christopher added, he was as good as his word, and we can plainly see the Lord's hand in it, who made way for him to escape, because he was faithful in that which was required of him then, as he was afterwards faithful to further manifestations of duty.

Zuni Indians' Land.—In 1877, President Hayes issued an executive order, setting apart and confirming to the Zuni Pueblo Indians of New Mexico the lands which they have owned, occupied and cultivated from the time of the Spanish invasion of Mexico, 350 years ago, and they claim many centuries before, and to which they hold a legal title from the Mexican Government. A surveyor was sent to run a line around the Zuni reservation, and make a map of it for the U. S. Land Office solely for the protection of the Indians. Either purposely or through a mistake, the surveyor's map leaves all the best portions of the lands of the Zunis, including their principal farms, and the springs from whence they get their supply of water for their cattle, and to irrigate their fields, outside the reservation. This fact seems not to have been discovered until last summer. It also appears that Senator Logan, of Illinois, first discovered it. This honorable Senator did not go to the President and ask him to issue an executive order, supplementing that of President Hayes, and correcting the blunders of the surveyor. But instead he hurried off to New Mexico, visited the Zuni village, spied out the land, and through his son-in-law, Paymaster Tucker, of the army, entered this land under the desert land act and the homestead law. This statement is made on the authority of the Chicago Inter-Ocean, a Republican journal of influence. The Inter-Ocean says, that a few weeks ago, one Collins, formerly a soldier under General Logan, and now associated with him, recently came to Fort Wingate, and announced that he had come on to take charge of the rancho which General Logan had located in the Nutias Valley, with instructions to build a house and corral, and that in a few weeks he should drive in a large head of cattle and take possession. The officers at Fort Wingate were astonished, as was also Indian Agent Thomas, and the Zunis were almost paralyzed at the threatened robbery, which if consummated would utterly ruin them. The officers of the Fort, Agent Thomas and Professor Cushing, of the Smithsonian Institution, who resides with the Zunis, engaged in studying their manners and customs, wrote to Secretary Teller on the subject, and the Secretary inquired into the matter at once, and prepared an executive order, which corrects the mistake, and laid it before the President who approved it and ordered it issued.—The Council Fire.

Incidents and Reflections.

SOFTENING EFFECTS OF DIVINE LOVE.

The sweetness of Divine love, and the softening effects of the gracious visitations of the Lord, have been felt by many; and their influence on the recipient has often been very perceptible to others.

John Churchman relates, that when travelling in Massachusetts, he had a meeting at Ipswich, in the house of Benjamin Hoeg, "none professing with us," he says, "living in that town but himself and family; though a friendly man, as I came late to the town the evening before, invited me to lodge at his house, which I accepted, and being weary, slept well. In the morning I heard a noise of high words in the street, and getting up I opened the door of the parlor where I lodged, and through a passage into the kitchen, saw a woman whom I took to be the mistress of the house, and went toward her; but with a look of exceeding displeasure she immediately shut the door. I turned into my room again; and after a while my landlord came to me, and told me he had been with the Burgess, who had given leave that a meeting might be held in the town-hall; but the priest and his two sons had since been with the Burgess and forbade him, and that rather than displease them, he had withdrawn the leave. The priest asserted that the Quakers were heretics, and had gone about the town to forewarn his hearers against going to the meeting, which was the meaning of the noise I had heard in the street. I felt very easy, and desired he would not trouble himself any further than to inform them, that the meeting would be held at the house of Benjamin Hoeg; for I did believe the railing of the priest would raise the curiosity of the people to come, and so it proved. I asked him to show me the way to the house, that I might assist in making provision for seats if occasion required. He said I must take breakfast with him, which was soon brought in by the woman who had shut the door as before mentioned. I asked him if she was his wife; he told me she was, on which I arose from my seat and offered her my hand, asking her how she did, but she in displeasure refused, and saying not a word, directly left the room. After breakfast we went to the house where the meeting was to be held, and there soon came a great number of the people, and the priest also very near the door, where he stood cautioning his hearers; but several came by an alley to the back door, and others seemed little to regard him. After a time he went away, and through the goodness of the Lord we had a solid profitable meeting. I believe many were there whose hearts were reached and tendered by the love and power of the Gospel of Christ, and among them I saw my scornful landlady; a woman whom she valued having persuaded her to come with her. Before the meeting ended, I perceived her countenance was changed and her stont heart tendered, and after it she came to me with her husband, and kindly invited me to dine with them. I owned their love, and desired them to mind the truth by which they had been reached. So, in humble thankfulness of heart to the great Author of all mercies, I left them."

One of the most marvellous instances of the transforming power of Divine Grace is that related by John B. Gough, of a woman whom he encountered in Edinburgh, Scotland, where he had gone to labor in the interests of temperance. He attended a meeting in the wickedest part of that city. He had never before witnessed such degradation, misery and filth, as were visible among the outcasts there assembled. Among the audience was one of the most desperate characters known to the city authorities. She had served fifty-four terms in prison. Not one of the police force would attempt to arrest her without help, and when she was excited by rum or passion, the thieves and outlaws among whom she lived would flee from her.

Some one on the platform pointed her out to J. B. Gough, and was telling him her character, when she noticed that they were looking at her. She immediately arose, went on to the platform, and in a defiant manner asked Gough whether he would give the temperance pledge to such an one as she. His companion greatly feared a scene of fighting and confusion, and whispered to Gough not to notice her—that she would never keep a pledge to abstain from liquor. She demanded in a threatening way, Is he ready to give me the pledge? He replied, yes; but there is a man here that says you will not keep it. Terribly excited at this, she screamed at the top of her voice, and demanded to know who and where he was that had so said. Her excitement was calmed by Gough who again said he would give her the pledge, and that he would take her word to keep it as quick as he would the word of any woman in Edinburgh. Touched by his confidence, she stood quiet and thoughtful for a minute, and yielding to the visitation of Divine love to her soul, afresh extended at that critical moment, she promised to give up her drinking habits.

Four years after, J. B. Gough held another meeting in Edinburgh. Two women sat in front of the platform, listening attentively. The tears and emotion of one of them touched his heart deeply. When the meeting closed, one of the women came up to the platform and asked him if he knew the woman that sat sobbing in front of him. He said no. "Well," she said, "that is my mother. And oh, how proud I am of her. But the fire and rum is all taken out of her now, wherein the neighbors were all afraid of her when she drank. Now, when they have trouble or sickness, the worst of them will say, bring me the good angel, for she has got the comfort that serves all." There she sat clothed, and in her right mind. She that was as ferocious as a tiger sits with streams of joyful tears, rubbing her cheeks, so subdued and humbled that she shrinks from making herself known even to the man that dare trust her word when no living creature would believe her. Gough asked her how she got along. "Oh, sir, the struggle was hard, hard, hard, very hard. Often I have dreamed that I had gone back to drink, and that I was fighting with the neighbors with a worse nature than ever before. The dreams have been so real to me that I have often awakened out of sleep and rolled out of bed unto my knees, crying at the top of my voice for God to save me, and I would never drink or fight again.

The voice of my daughter has often called me to consciousness, in times of such despair. She would cry, 'Mother, mother—you are safe; it is only a dream you had.' As I passed from that anguish, at the thought of falling, I had some idea of the misery of a lost soul. And when I threw myself on the floor of my little quiet, clean room, with my saved daughter by my side, Oh how the joy of a heaven on earth flooded through my soul. Praise God, I am not only saved, from drink, but saved from sinning against such a merciful and loving God as I have found in Jesus."

J. B. Gough made inquiry from others how she got along and spent her time. He found that she hired a little shop and sold eatables, such as the poor around her used, at a lower price than they could buy at other places. Her daughter and she made common sacks. They lived on thirty cents a day, and were able to help scores of poor families. As soon as the drink got out of her own system, she began to labor with others like herself. Her first effort was with a woman that was counted the next hardest case in Edinburgh. She never left her until she was reclaimed. When she went after such ones, she was never known to fail. She believed when she felt for them, God felt for them, and had laid the burden on her for them. There was no sacrifice too great for her to make, in view of rescuing another immortal soul. She generally brought them to her house, and kept them there, until she broke up their hardened hearts with her love. She would watch every move that they would make. She would wait on them, wash their feet, comb their hair, pat their cheeks, and kiss them as but few mothers can. She knew her work, and had the assurance that she was successfully wooing them for Christ. She was never idle in her new Master's work. Many were lifted up from the lowest depths of sin through her instrumentality.

She lived to the honor of her Redeemer, Jesus Christ, over twenty-seven years. She died in great joy, praising God for his power to save to the uttermost all that come to Him through Jesus Christ, the only mediator between God and man.

The mayor of Edinburgh, with the city officers, and ministers of the gospel, and Christians of every denomination, together with thousands of the citizens, mourned with a heartfelt grief as her remains were lowered into the grave.

Hat-Honor.—A testimony which gave the early Friends much trouble and, indirectly at least, sent many of them to prison, was their refusal to take off their hat in deference to the presence of others, or to the place where they then were. Doubtless it has often suggested itself to you, as it often has to me, that as the hat was made to protect the head from the heat or the cold, it was very unnecessary for them to seem to court punishment by wearing it in the house. William Penn says "religion makes no man discourteous, uncivil or unkind."

The early Friends, however, were among the first to proclaim the equality of men, and they regarded the bowing of the body and the taking off the hat to their fellows as inconsistent with this great principle. But during all rightly authorized prayer in their religious meetings, in which each member is regarded as participating, they devoutly took off the hat, and remained uncovered. They could not in conscience, they thought, pay the same mark of respect to man that they did to God. For the wearing of the hat had an especial significance in those days. The historian Bancroft, whose associations certainly were not such as to prepossess him in favor of any of the peculiar practices of early Friends, thus writes on this subject "The Quaker bows to God and not to fellow-man. The fendal nobility [in the 17th Century] still nourished its pride. The Quakers knew that the hat was the symbol of enfranchisement [full citizenship], and worn by the Norman nobility in the presence of the king as a proclamation that they were peers of the realm, equal with their sovereign. When Cromwell assumed the power of prince he covered his head, all the others remaining uncovered."

"After more than a century and a quarter when in the first great scene of the French revolution, at the opening of the States General, the clergy and the nobility, according to established privilege, had, like the king, put on their square caps and plumed bonnets the representatives of the commons, imitating the Quaker precedent, covered their heads also with their hats, that had neither plume nor ribands; thus explaining to the Bourbons the meaning of the Quaker symbol."—Dr. J. Leveick's Early Friends and their Service in America.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Masking of Crabs.—Certain species of sea coast crabs are covered during much of their lives with a superficial growth of sea-weed, sponges and other forms of life, such as are found on the surrounding stones, &c. It has been supposed that these parasitical growths found their way to the shell of the crab by accident. DuRoi de Trieste finds that the presence is due solely to the intelligent action of the crab, who intentionally places them in position with its feet, for the purpose of concealing itself from the gaze of its enemies. The selection for the covering, moreover, consists of such forms as most strictly partake in the coloring with the colors of the surrounding objects, and consequently of such as will be least likely to attract attention. The species of crab thus disguising themselves are provided on the back with a peculiar growth of hooked bristles, which tends to secure the objects placed there, and to retain them until they shall have become firmly united or rooted to the mass.

Report of Sanitary Commissioner of Bombay.—The report for 1881 shows the number of deaths from snake-bite in Bombay to be 12, which is about 100 more than the average of the preceding five years. The greatest mortality is in the warmer months of the year when the snakes are probably the most active and aggressive. The deaths from fever in 1881 were 272,403—probably much of the mortality being due to miasmatic causes. The efforts of the sanitary authorities in India will probably lead to beneficial results on the public health.—Nature.

A Forest of Stone.—A petrified forest near Corizzo, on the Little Colorado River, has been recently visited by scientific explorers and a graphic description of its appearance given in the Albuquerque (N. M.) Journal. The road at a distance of ten miles from Corizzo enters an immense basin, the slope being nearly a semicircle, and this inclosed by high banks of shale and white fine clay. Half an hour's good driving from this point es one to the heart of the forest. The rified stumps, limbs, and, in fact, whole es lie about on all sides, the action of the ters for hundreds of years has gradually shed away the high hills roundabout, and trees that once covered the high table ds now lie in the valley beneath. Immense nks, some of which measure over five feet diameter, are broken and scattered over a face of 300 acres. Limbs and twigs cover sand in every direction, and the visitor is zled as to where he shall begin to gather beautiful specimens that lie within easy ch. There are numerous blocks or trunks his petrified wood which have the appear- e of having been just cut down by the dman's axe, and the chips are thrown and on the ground so that one instinctively es them up as he would in the log camps Michigan and Pennsylvania. Many of the ll particles, and even the whole heart, of e trees have now become thoroughly crys- zed, and the beautiful colored cubes sparkle he sunshine like so many diamonds. Every or of the rainbow is duplicated in these stals. The grain of the wood is plainly wn in nearly every specimen.—Chr. Adv.

Insects as Food for Man.—Max Buchner's ontribution to the Ethnography of the ntus," contains the following interesting es, which show that insects are by no ns despised as food by this tribe of negroes, ch inhabit a large portion of South-eastern eia. "Toward the end of the rainy season, April, when the white ants are swarming, conical buildings of the insects are covered h a dense matting of banana leaves, while, hin this cover, vessels are placed with nel-shaped entrances. In these vessels a number of white ants, males and females, caught and roasted on the spot. They considered a great delicacy, even M. chner finding them palatable. A large, subterranean cricket, as well as a large eopterous larvæ, living in hollow trees, are ally sought for and roasted over fire. But especially a large caterpillar called 'ugomn,' which is harvested by the natives like a d crop. It is about five centimeters long, ck, with yellow rings, occurs on the savan-, and 'belongs perhaps, to the butterfly nis.' Whenever it appears in large num- s the negroes march out in full force from ir villages, camping out for weeks in the derness to gather and cure the crop. After intestines have been pressed out, the erpillars are dried before the fire, and rolled in packages of fresh leaves."

An Earthquake-Shock.—During my stay at rinkan in the Island of Celebes, in 1859, curiosity was satisfied by experiencing a tly sharp earthquake-shock. One even-, as I was sitting reading, the house began king with a very gentle, but rapidly in- asing motion. I sat still enjoying the el sensation for some seconds; but in less n half a minute it became strong enough shake me in my chair, and to make the se visibly rock about, and to creak and ek as if it would fall to pieces. Then be- a ery throughout the village of "Tana rang! tanagoyang!" (Earthquake! earth- akel) Everybody rushed out of their houses women screamed and children cried—and I ight it prudent to get out too. On get- g up I found my head giddy and my steps eadly, and could hardly walk without ing. The shock continued about a minute, during which time I felt as if I had been turned round and round, and was almost sea-sick. Going into the house again, I found a lamp and a bottle of arrack upset. The tumbler which formed the lamp had been thrown out of the saucer in which it had stood. The shock appeared to be nearly vertical, rapid, vibratory, and jerking. It was sufficient, I have no doubt, to have thrown down brick chimneys and walls and church towers; but as the houses here are all low, and strongly framed of timber, it is impossible for them to be much injured, except by a shock that would utterly destroy a European city. The people told me it was ten years since they had had a stronger shock than this, at which time many houses had been thrown down and some people killed.

At intervals of ten minutes to half an hour, slight shocks and tremors were felt, some- times strong enough to send us all out again. There was a strange mixture of the terrible and ludicrous in our situation. We might at any moment have a much stronger shock, which would bring down the house over us, or—what I feared more—cause a landslip and send us down into the deep ravine on the very edge of which the village is built; yet I could not help laughing each time we ran out at a slight shock, and then in a few moments ran in again. The sublime and the ridenous were here but a step apart. On the one hand, the most terrible and destruc- tive of natural phenomena was in action around us—the rocks, the mountains, the solid earth were trembling and convulsed, and we were utterly impotent to guard against the danger that might at any moment over- whelm us. On the other hand was the spec- tacle of a number of men, women and children running in and out of their houses, on what each time proved a very unnecessary alarm, as each shock ceased just as it became strong enough to frighten us. It seemed really very much like "playing at earthquakes," and made many of the people join me in a hearty laugh, even while reminding each other that it might really be no laughing matter.

At length the evening got very cold, and I became very sleepy, and determined to turn in, leaving orders to my boys, who slept nearer the door, to wake me in case the house was in danger of falling. But I miscalculated my apathy, for I could not sleep much. The shocks continued at intervals of half an hour or an hour all night, just strong enough to wake me thoroughly each time and keep me on the alert ready to jump up in case of dan- ger. I was therefore very glad when morn- ing came. Most of the inhabitants had not been to bed at all, and some had staid out-of- doors all night. For the next two days and nights shocks still continued at short inter- vals; and several times a day for a week, showing that there was some very extensive disturbance beneath our portion of the earth's crust. How vast the forces at work really are can only be properly appreciated when, after feeling their effects, we look abroad over the wide expanse of hill and valley, plain and mountain, and thus realize in a slight de- gree the immense mass of matter heaved and shaken.

The sensation produced by an earthquake is never to be forgotten. We feel ourselves in the grasp of a power to which the wildest fury of the winds and waves is as nothing; yet the effect is more a thrill of awe than the terror which the more boisterous war of the elements produces. There is a mystery and an uncertainty as to the amount of danger we incur, which gives greater play to the imagination, and to the influences of hope and fear. These remarks apply only to a moderate earthquake. A severe one is the most destruc- tive and most horrible catastrophe to which human beings can be exposed.—Wallace's Malay Archipelago.

1787. When I take my seat in the upper gallery in our meeting-house, and cast my eyes over the meeting beholding the poor lads toward the far side of the house, and remem- ber how it was with me of their age and cir- cumstance, my heart is often filled with ten- derness and melted with contrition. Under these feelings fervent cries ascend in my heart to the Lord Almighty, that He may be gra- ciously pleased to extend the visitations of his love unto the souls of the poor youth, as He did to mine, and that He may bring them by his out-stretched arm to know Him to be their Saviour.—*H. THE FRIEND.

SIXTH MONTH 30, 1883.

There is often a feeling of weariness, in sitting through a silent meeting, in those who are not under religious concern either for themselves or others. There are times, when a solemn covering spreads over an assembly almost from their entering the place of gather- ing, in which the soul is nourished; but there are other seasons when a painful strug- gle has to be maintained against intruding thoughts of a worldly nature, drowsiness or restlessness; and the seeking after spiritual food seems for a long time almost like the labor of the apostles who toiled all night and caught nothing. It is not therefore surpris- ing that some, who feel no especial anxiety about their spiritual condition, are induced to leave these meetings, where there is so little of an outward nature to amuse the mind, and frequent assemblages where they may be relieved of the labor of seeking spiritual food for themselves, and where they hope to be fed by the efforts of another.

We do not doubt that there are true Chris- tians in all the different denominations; but those who are such have been made so by the very same process by which any of our own people are brought into the Heavenly fold. Christ is the author of salvation; and He it is whose baptism of Spirit and of fire must cleanse the heart, and perform that thorough work which is spoken of in Scrip- ture as being born again of the incorruptible Seed and Word of God. We must all pass through this experience, whether we be Jew or Gentile, bond or free, must learn to hun- ger and thirst after righteousness, and to seek with earnestness after the kingdom of Heaven and the righteousness thereof. Those who have been brought into this condition will be willing to wrestle for a blessing, and will wel- come the hour for religious meetings, where they may wait upon the Lord and seek after a feeling of his presence.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Captain Crawford, with four companies of cavalry and 250 Indian captives, arrived at the San Carlos Agency, in Arizona, on the 23d instant. Chiefs Loco, Nana and Bonito talked freely with the reservation Indians with whom they were acquainted. Nana said he "was too old for further operations," and he was glad he "had arrived at a safe place." The telegram reporting the arrival of the Indians at San Carlos adds: "Rumors had reached the Indians that in case of capture they would be put in irons and killed, hence, they say, their delay in coming in. While the Indians generally do not distrust General Crook, these rumors have had effect on his plans. There are people willing to see the hostiles on the war path as then more military would be brought into the territory, making business better. As an evidence of what General Crook has to contend with, it may be stated that six miles from Wilcox several persons approached the hostiles with the intention of selling ammunition to them."

General Crook has been ordered to Washington for consultation in regard to the final disposition to be made of the captured Apaches. A telegram from Agent Wilcox, dated the 24th, has been received by the Interior Department, announcing that "the renegade Indians were forced on the reservation" the day before. Secretary Lincoln's attention having been called to the matter, he said that "the agent must be in error, as he had given positive orders to General Crook to keep the renegades apart from the other Indians." He added, that he "would reiterate the orders to General Crook."

Chief Moses and two subordinate chiefs have arrived in Washington, to confer with the Secretary of the Interior in reference to a proposed relinquishment of part of their reservation in Washington Territory.

The steamer Nevada, which sailed from Queenstown for New York on the 21st, had on board 671 Mormons, 171 of whom are British and 500 Scandinavians.

Disastrous breaks have occurred in the levees near St. Louis. On the night of the 22d, the Fish Lake levee, which protected fifteen square miles of rich farming land, on the Illinois side of the river, below East Carondelet, gave way and 10,000 acres of land were overflowed. The damage to crops and other property is estimated at $100,000. The Madison Dyke, between St. Louis and Alton, also on the Illinois side, broke in two places the next morning, and it was expected that all the bottom land north of East St. Louis, covering 50 to 60 square miles, would be inundated.

Following a terrific thunder storm, a tornado struck a tract of country near Omaha, Nebraska, on the morning of the 23d, causing a loss of property estimated at $10,000. The people along the path of the tornado, seeing its approach, saved their lives by taking refuge in their cellars, where "a number of families saw their houses turned about over their heads."

A heavy rain storm visited the neighborhood of Bedford, Pa., on the 26th inst. Bridges, fences and a part of the tracks of the Bedford Division of the Pennsylvania Railroad were washed away. The low-lying part of the town was inundated, the water rushing into the houses and rising to a height of several feet. Great damage was done to crops in the western part of the county.

The mortality among cows in the neighborhood of Joliet, Illinois, is increasing, and many people are afraid to use milk. It is supposed the cows are sickened by eating a small bug which appears on the grass, and is said to be very poisonous.

It is reported that "a destructive bug" is destroying the fruit in Berks county, Penna. "Wherever it stings the fruit falls unripe, and branches of trees die when penetrated by the bug. Farmers are applying various remedies without success."

The Kaaterskill Railroad was opened on the 25th inst. for business. With its connections it forms an all rail route from Rondout to the top of the Catskill mountains.

Construction trains on the Northern Pacific Railroad reached Missoula on Seventh-day the 23d of last month. A gap of 120 miles remains to be closed between Missoula and Helena, and work is progressing from both ends.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 307, which was 84 less than during the previous week, and 2 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number 156 were males, and 151 females: 36 died of consumption; 21 of cholera infantum; 14 of diphtheria; 12 of old age; 13 of scarlet fever, and 8 of marasmus.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 104½; 3½'s, 104½; 4½'s, 113; 4's, registered, 119½; coupon, 120½; currency 6's, 128 a 132.

Cotton.—There was no essential change to notice in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 11 cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans. Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ a 7¾ cts. for export, and 8½ a 8¾ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour continues dull, but prices were unchanged. Sales of 1900 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.25 a $6.25; Pennsylvania family at $5 a $5 12½; western do. at $5.75 a $6.25, and patents at $6.50 a $7.25. Rye flour is dull at $3.70 a $3.75 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was unsettled and ¼ a 1c. per bushel lower. Sales of 3600 bushels red, in ear lots, at $1.09 a $1.22. Rye is nominal at 65 cts. for Pennsylvania. Corn is quiet and futures are easier. Ear lots are fairly held. Sales of 10,000 bushels in ear lots, at 56 a 66 cts. Oats are dull and lower. Sales of 9000 bushels, in ear lots, at 45 a 47 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 6th mo. 23d, 1883.—Loads of hay, 279; loads of straw, 46. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 80 to 90 cts. per 100 pounds; mixed, 70 to 80 cts.; straw, 55 a 65 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in fair demand and prices were firmer: 3000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5½ a 6½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

Sheep were in fair demand and firmly held: 10,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3½ a 6 cts. per lb., and lambs at 4 a 9½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

Hogs were a fraction lower: 4000 head arrived and sold at 8½ a 9½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

FOREIGN.—The British passenger vessels Hurunui and Waitara, belonging to the New Zealand Shipping Company, came into collision off Portland on the night of the 22d inst., and the Waitara sunk in two minutes. Twenty-five persons were drowned. The Hurunui immediately launched her boats, which rescued sixteen persons struggling in the waves. Among these was a lady, a saloon passenger, to whom a sailor, who was saved, had given up his life-belt. Two other saloon passengers were also saved. All the second-class and steerage passengers were lost. The captain of the Waitara was dragged aboard the Hurunui with the aid of ropes. The two vessels left London together. The Hurunui struck the Waitara, end on, just in front of the saloon, on the starboard side. The survivors state that no crash was heard, but that the side of the Waitara gave way like cardboard. They say that more of the passengers might have been saved had a bark and a steamer, which were seen near by, heeded the Waitara's signals of distress. The Waitara was an iron ship, of 833 tons. She was built in 1863. The Hurunui is also an iron ship.

This week's Truth prints the following statement in regard to the condition of the Queen: "The Queen has for two months been in a state of mild melancholia, which, in the course of time, if not relieved, would probably become very difficult to treat. Her condition has naturally caused great anxiety because of the tendencies of her family. Her majesty and Princess Beatrice, will, in the autumn, go to the vicinity of Florence, Italy, where they will remain two months."

John William Colenso, Bishop of Natal, South Africa, died at Durban on the 20th of 6th month.

Intelligence of a dreadful calamity at a place of amusement in the town of Dervio, on the shore of Lake Como, has been received in London. While a performance was in progress at a puppet theatre, at that place, the structure took fire and was entirely destroyed. Forty-seven persons lost their lives, and twelve others were injured.

A fire broke out in the Woodstores in Lyons, on the morning of the 19th instant, and, despite strenuous efforts to extinguish or prevent the spread of the flames, now covers two acres. Forty railway cars have been burned. Train service between Lyons and Geneva was interfered with.

With reference to Admiral Pierre's despatch announcing the capture of Tamatave, the Malagassy Envoys state that the demands of the French were preposterous. They knew that the ultimatum would be rejected. The Queen of Madagascar gave stringent orders not to return the French fire. She recalled most of her troops to the capital, and only 200 remained at Tamatave to maintain order. Tamatave is defended by merely one mud fort, mounting four old muzzle loading guns. The Queen is now shut off from foreign Powers. It will take the French at least five months to march to the capital, and there is sufficient food in the capital for a siege of several months. The Hovas have there over 6000 disciplined troops, most of whom are armed with Remington rifles. The nation will fight to the bitter end, meanwhile it is hoped that the Powers will intervene.

The envoys regard the bombardment of Tamatave as a wanton and cruel act. They fear that many of the foreign residents of Tamatave were killed. The ambassadors, having failed to obtain any terms from French Government, have again implored the assistance of Lord Granville. He, however, declines to mediate, and advises Madagascar to concede the demands of France.

The arrest of the Polish author Krazewsky and other persons, charged with giving information to Russian revolutionists regarding the movements of Russian troops, will lead to their trial on charges of high treason. Important evidence has been obtained against the A Polish journalist, named Adler, has handed to the German Ambassador at Vienna important papers bearing on their case, which have been forwarded to Prince Bismarck.

The floods now prevailing in Silesia were attended by waterspouts. A large part of the town of Hirschberg is submerged, and houses in the adjacent villages are flooded. A railway near Salzbrunn was washed away. A number of cattle perished. Despatches received from Breslau state that the rise of the river Neisse at the town of that name has been most alarming, the water having reached a higher mark than has attained since 1829. The Evangelical school and church building, two barracks and part of the post-office are submerged. Disastrous floods are also reported in Bohemia and Moravia. The Danube is expected to overflow its banks shortly, as the river Inn and its mountain streams are rising rapidly. The quay at Linz is already flooded.

Of 42 deaths which occurred in Damietta on the 2d inst., 28 were known to be from cholera, and the rest was suspected were from the same malady.

It is thought from the reports made by whalers, who have arrived recently in London from Iceland, that will not impede the progress of the steamer Sophia having on board Professor Nordenskjöld and his Arctic expedition.

The difficulty between China and France has been adjusted. Li Hung Chang is expected to return to Peking immediately.

Payta, 6th mo. 19th.—The Chilean Commandant day gave orders that if the Peruvian authorities acknowledge General Iglesias as President, Chili is prepared to withdraw her troops immediately. The Diario Oficial to-day prints an editorial from the Valparaiso Mercurio of 6th mo. 4th, on the President's Message, arguing that he always desired peace, but had had one to treat with. Now he hopes it may be consummated with General Iglesias.

Great distress is reported among the fishing population along the coast of Labrador, owing to the detention of their supplies by the ice jam along the shore. It is feared that several deaths from starvation have occurred. Great distress for want of provisions is also reported in the neighborhood of Natashquan, in the Saguenay district of Quebec.

Letters and Memoranda of William Scattergood.

Letter from Ann Jones.

"Stockport, England, 12th mo. 31st, 1834.

My dear friend, William Scattergood, * * * was very pleasant to my dear G. J. and I myself to receive a written testimonial from you, of thy continued remembrance of us. Although thy plaintive language of almost ceaseless lamentation over thyself, might induce an entire stranger to conclude there was need little or no hope for thee, yet this is the case with me. 'Thou tells me, thou art in secret sheds tears of sorrow over thy present condition, but they are not the tears of true repentance. I would ask, who is it that whispers this to thee? Is it not the old serpent of the brethren? who would if he could stir thee up to impatience, and lead thee to conclude, that it is in vain to seek and try to serve God. Ah! believe him not, for he is liar from the beginning; endeavor in patience to possess thy soul, and righteously to 'perme, 'all the days of my appointed time I wait till my change come.' For, assuredly, He who appointeth the bounds of our habitation, also setteth bounds and limits to the power of the enemy; as well as appointeth the seasons of summer and winter, and time and harvest, both in the outward and spiritual creation. Then 'fear not, worm, nor be utterly cast down. Though tarry, wait for Him; for his reward is with Him, and his work before Him. He has not said to the wrestling seed of Jacob, 'I will seek ye in vain.' Oh! how many gracious and precious promises are there to the waiting, seeking, wrestling soul! Remember the patriarch already alluded to, who wrestled through the night season with the angel of the Lord, and nobly determined, 'I will not let thee go, except thou bless me.' This was a promise to him of great strait and difficulty and yet: but the Lord blessed him. Suffer not the enemy to suggest to thee, that thou art not of the Lord's chosen as Jacob was. I believe that He who visited and preserved him in and through many tribulations, has also in mercy visited and called thee to his service; and that as thou endeavors to bear the chastening of his hand in patient dependence upon his mercy, determining 'Though thou slay me, yet will I trust in thee;' and, 'If I perish it shall be at thy footstool,' that in his own good time, which must be waited for, He will hear from heaven his holy habitation, and send thee help from his sanctuary and make thy way prosperous; yea, He will enlighten thy darkness, and cause thee to go on thy way rejoicing.

Hast thou not this evidence of life remaining, that thou lovest the brethren? that thou also lovest the Holy Head and High Priest of our profession? Then remember his gracious promise: 'Ask, and ye shall receive; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.'

* * * We are much obliged for thy kind remembrance of us in the book way. The Testament I prize much; though we have a variety, we had not one of that kind before. We wish thee to accept a copy of the 2d edition of John Barclay's life of Alexander Jaffray. It contains an interesting history of the rise of Friends in Scotland; and some of us old-fashioned Quakers are glad of it. In this day when so many are deserting the standard of primitive Christianity, and are going back to the weak and beggarly elements, it is some consolation to see a lineal descendant of the able Apologist come forward and openly espouse the cause of Truth, for which his worthy predecessors suffered much. John Barclay is the fifth in descent from the Apologist. He is a plain man; of much primitive simplicity in appearance and manners; and a preacher of the same gospel with R. B. Though born a member of the Society, he was by education as remote from true Quakerism as his noted ancestor Robert Barclay.

Our united dear love awaits the acceptance of thyself and thy dear E. I am in near sympathy, and with desires that thou mayest put on strength in the name of the Lord, and rise above every unprofitable discouragement the enemy would cast in thy way.

Thy affectionate friend in gospel fellowship,
ANN JONES."

"2nd mo. 22d, 1835.—Have felt to-day in meeting as I often feel of latter times, very little capacity even to look towards 'the quiet habitation.' * * * I would fain enter the house of prayer, but alas, my unstable hard heart! Am I to experience a miracle to save me out of my present condition? Oh for the spirit of availing prayer! whereby I might enter into the presence of the Most High through Him who bore our sins and carried our sorrows, and who ever liveth to make intercession for us. My tears are at times poured out in secret, upon reviewing my present state. But alas! the cross, the weeping cross is in the way. Oh for a little of that holy magnanimity, which would enable me to put the month in the dust before Him in whom we live and move and have our being, if so be there may be hope."

To E. C. S.

"Millville, 8th mo. 30th, 1835.

[Written while at M. on business, before going there to reside.]

* * * I can truly say that my feelings have been stirred up at times in looking at my present prospects, and at the change which has taken place in my situation within a short time past. Sincere desires prevail in moments of retirement, that we may be preserved on the right hand and on the left. We are embarked in a business, which I perceive will involve us in many temptations, such as we have not been accustomed to encounter. Fears often prevail that we, or rather I, may become a castaway amid the shoals and quicksands, which are continually to be found in our passage through this busy world. We have need of prayer; not only for preservation, but I, for restoration: for truly my tears are often shed in secret, when I look upon myself. Here there is ample room for reflection; and I am perhaps better qualified, than when mingling in the midst of society and of my friends, to look into the doings of my own heart. Farewell; affectionately thy

W. S."

To the same.

"Millville, 7th mo. 6th, 1836.

My dear E. * * * I truly feel the want of congenial society, and of thy company with our little flock. I sometimes feel almost discouraged in being engaged in such a business requiring so much absence from the endearments of home.

* * * I have been to Greenwich to-day to meeting. It is a long road; the distance being 17 miles. I find it requires some resolution to accomplish it, especially when business is pressing.*

We have succeeded in accomplishing most of the matters we had in hand, and I think I shall feel hereafter as though I could manage a glass factory: but should much prefer it being within easier reach of dear home. Perhaps we may have things different sometime. Meanwhile I hope thou wilt be sustained by Best Help a little longer.

Bless me thy affectionate W. S."

* William Scattergood was remarkably regular and punctual in the attendance of all the meetings at Greenwich while within its limits though so far away, except the first one after going to Millville. The writer well remembers hearing him say, that upon said occasion, he thought he had so much business in hand he could not go: whereupon he was tempted to stay from meeting to attend to it. But, he added, he never had so much trouble to keep himself employed as during that day. This conflict and uneasiness of mind from the apprehension that he was not in his right place, so decided the point of not letting temporal business interfere with religious obligations, that he never afterwards neglected, on account of any business engagement, this Christian and "reasonable service."

He has now gone where sacrifices and crosses for the Truth can no more help nor hinder. But his commendable diligence and faithfulness herein, may prompt all to similar dedication in this very important religious duty; whereby the Scripture concerning one of old will be verified: "He being dead, yet speaketh."

Memorandum, "6th mo. 1837.—I am still through mercy spared with life and health, and many earthly blessings. But alas! my leanness, my leanness! O how unwatchful! how careless! My soul at times looks toward the quiet habitation; but faith is wanting to lay hold on that, which entereth within the veil."

During the year 1837, he removed with his family to Millville.

For "The Friend."

Let Brotherly Love Continue.

The subjoined epistles, being interchanges of thought and feeling and Christian regard, between the co-ordinate Yearly Meetings of London and Philadelphia—the first in 1808, the other in 1825—are herewith offered for insertion in "The Friend."

When will the harmony again prevail, which existed at the time these communications were written? It is truly to be desired that the period may again come when these two Bodies shall alike "Stand in the ways and see, and ask for the old paths, and walk therein;" shall again see eye to eye; again seek to strengthen each others' hands in the Truth and in the Lord; and again "in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, and in purity," harmoniously labor for Truth's honor.

To the Yearly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

Dear Friends,—Your very encouraging and intelligent epistle of last year has been read in this our large Yearly Meeting, in which we trust we have been enabled to come to divers satisfactory results in cases of importance which have come before us. We fully unite with you in desire that the several talents and gifts, with which the Author of creation and of grace, has indued his rational workmanship of the present and rising generation, may be improved to his praise, so will it also be to the further building of us up, a people, who, both by word, and by the still more expressive language of conduct, will be advocates of his righteous cause, and we shall clearly show forth to beholders, that the happiness of man is inseparable from the holy will of the Lord—that his suffering, life and ignominious death for our sakes, is a proof of it; and that obedience to his commands are his appointed means of our becoming partakers of his transcendent love.

We can also rejoice with you in observing the probability of a succession of laborers in the Yearly Meeting. Many of us have lived to see most of those who were active when we set out in life, removed from this state of being. We trust that they are removed from the trials of time to the security, peace and joy, of an everlasting union with that God whom it had been their chief object, whilst here, to serve in the Gospel of his Son; yet we dare not say they are wanted, or that their places are not supplied.

The aspect of things may be somewhat different from that of former times. We are bereft of many who once labored in word and doctrine with great acceptance. Of public general admonition, therefore, there is less; but we are much mistaken if, low as things are in many places, there be not more of labor extended from brother to brother; and more close inspection exercised, not only by this, but by Quarterly Meetings. In many instances indeed we have chiefly, as it were, to arrest and confine an ebbing stream, which, unless the spring break out afresh, must ultimately fail; for in various places the number of faithful Friends is much reduced. In others we are comforted with hoping that it has already afresh bubbled up, and that the Lord will not be left without witnesses to the truth of those testimonies which, we humbly trust, He has called us to bear. But, notwithstanding the calamities which overspread the civilized world, this is still comparatively, a day of ease to many; and this Society you know as well as we do, has long found that to be at ease lulls the mind asleep, and diverts it from the duties of the Christian warfare. Nevertheless we believe there are those among us who see the necessity of being unincumbered with the cares of this life, and prepared for any storm which infinite Wisdom may yet permit to overtake this long favored and too ungrateful kingdom.

Your concern for the few under our name in Germany, is peculiarly acceptable, both because we know their distresses have been great, and because we are much cut off from the channel by which relief can be extended; nevertheless our Meeting for Sufferings did find means, near a year ago, to send them the supply of an hundred pounds.

We find our said Meeting for Sufferings has lately largely written to yours, and their letter has been communicated to us. We approve of its contents, and join you in considering it a source of mutual strength when meetings are enabled to convey to each other their reciprocal feelings of brotherly love. At the same time it renders it the less needful for us now to enlarge. Yet we may just mention two of the concerns of this present meeting: One has been to recommend to Monthly Meetings a visit by appointment to heads of families, to excite them to more diligence as to the religious care of their children, specified in our (4th) Query on that subject. The other is attending to the settlement of a school for several Quarterly Meetings in the West of England, which we hope will be a benefit to Friends in that part and a relief to Ackworth.

We salute you, dear friends, as brethren united in the same cause, and endeavoring to serve the same Lord; and we desire that your hands may be strong in Him, and that his all-sufficient blessing may rest on your endeavors.

Signed in and on behalf of the Yearly Meeting held in London, by adjournments from the 18th to the 27th of the 5th mo. 1808.

JOHN WILKINSON,

Clerk to the meeting this year.

From our Yearly Meeting held in Philadelphia by adjournments from the 18th of the 4th month to the 22nd of the same, inclusive, 1825. To the Yearly Meeting of our friends and brethren in London.

Dear Friends,—That our correspondence has frequently had an animating effect we have thankfully to acknowledge; and when the anointing oil is felt to descend from our holy Head upon the members of the body in their diversified allotments, producing that travail of spirit by which the prosperity of Zion and the enlargement of her borders are promoted, its effect is strengthening and cementing. Under a lively sense of this gracious vouchsafement afresh extended to us, we now cordially salute you.

In this our large solemn gathering we have the acceptable company of brethren from the Yearly Meetings on this continent but one, and an evident increase of weight in our deliberations has from time to time been experienced—inducing a hope and belief that many are concerned to dig deeper and deeper in order to an establishment upon the true foundation, where in quietude and stillness of mind, the voice of Truth is heard, and of several duties are discerned.

This necessary preparation for services the Church we desire the rightly concerned may everywhere be encouraged diligently to press after, as that on which our individual advancement in righteousness, and the success of our endeavors to promote a belief in the power of Christ depend. Thus, too, you may know the name of the Lord to be our hiding-place in the time of trouble, and be instrumental in directing the seeking minds of others to it. But dear friends, let us bear in mind that, for want of this experience much loss has been sustained in our religious Society, both in a general and particular relation; too many, even of those who have apprehended themselves qualified to be active in religious concerns, having by a zeal without knowledge rather contributed to bring the Gospel of light and life, by which we profess to be governed, into question with others and for want of its support been themselves betrayed first into an indifference, and then an open violation of its precious testimonies to the injury of the cause they have espoused and an exposure of their own weakness and unsoundness. But while we reflect on these dangers, we are not unmindful that we are all exposed to them, and desire to unite with the sincere hearts in prayer to Him who still graciously sustains the character of the Healer of breaches and Restorer of paths to dwell in that He may be pleased, by his effectual baptism, to winnow away our chaff, and purge away our dross, our tin and reprobate silver, that our judges and counsellors may be as in the beginning, and the great end for which this our favored Society was raised up, may be answered, in its becoming a city of righteousness, a faithful city, to the praise of its ever adorable Founder!

Your general epistle of last year, with that particularly addressed to us, have been read in this meeting to our satisfaction and encouragement, evidencing that our continued endeavor for the promotion of the great cause of universal righteousness and peace are still owned by the Master of our assemblies.

The abolition of slavery, the civilization of the Indian natives, and the guarded education of our youth, with other subjects pointed out in the queries, continue to engage our solid, and we hope our increasing attention, persuaded as we are that these concerns originated in Best Wisdom, and that the labors of those who have (through many difficulties and discouragements) been exercised in them, have been blessed.

In considering the circumstance of our fellow-members in Upper Canada, some difficulties appear to attend them; these are referred to the care of our Meeting for Sufferings, which will probably represent them to yours if there should be occasion for your assistance. With desires for our mutual preservation in the unity of the Spirit, which is the bond of peace, and that the grace of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ may be multiplied increased in the churches every where, again salute you in the fellowship of the spel, and remain your friends and brethren.

Gather the Fragments.

When William Kennard, of Ohio, was lying the bed of death, after his labors in the spel of the Redeemer were nearly finished, thus addressed a beloved friend who had come to visit him: "I have been desirous to see thee once more, having felt the fresh workings of Gospel love toward thee.

"I am very sensible of the preciousness of thy gift, that, in the pourings forth of the Holy Spirit thou hast received. I know thou hast thy trials. Cross-occurrences are to be met with; but hold fast that thou hast received, that no man take thy crown; keep a single eye to the blessed Master in this day of great out-pouring of words without life, in which many have foolishly run into; hold fast that thou hast even unto the end, it shall be thy crown of rejoicing. Be faithful unto death, and thou shalt have a crown of life." After a time of much solemnity, he said that when he was a young man, before he was first married, he was in the practice of walking out daily into the woods to pray and give thanks. At one time, in returning, as he had got over the fence into the road, he was suddenly taken, as in a vision, into exceeding brightness, and enjoyed such a precious, overwhelming sense of Heavenly goodness as the tongue of mortals could not describe. In this condition he remained for some time, but at length he was sensible of an internal struggle, and found himself as he was before the vision. He remarked that he had never mentioned this occurrence before, but that it came from the Lord.

Not long before his death, Lloyd Milfin, of Germantown, near Philadelphia, referred to somewhat similar experience, of which he said he had never before spoken. In early life, he had been favored with a remarkable presentation or sight of the Saviour, which was very precious to him at the time, precious to refer to through life, and precious in his old age. He spoke of it as a sacred thing to him.

The visitations of the Lord's Holy Spirit—the overshadowings of his Divine power—ought to be sacred to all of us, and to be prized to whatever degree they are ministered to us for our comfort or help.

Shortly before the death of Ellen Cozens, of Philadelphia, a friend called in to see her, whom she had told of a heavenly opening or sight which she had had, in which it appeared to her that she had crossed the river of death, and proceeded up to a bright mansion. The door opened on her approach, and as she entered she found it all light and glorious within.

The last time William Scattergood spoke of public ministry, he used the text, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man, the things which the Lord hath prepared for them that love Him." Whilst speaking, his countenance changed, and it soon became evident that the time of his departure was at hand. He died, it is believed, on the following day. Those who are sensible that their earthly existence is drawing near to its close, in looking over their past lives, often regard its incidents with feelings very different from those with which they were animated at the time.

A valued friend many years ago related to me an occurrence in his own early experience, which illustrates this, and also shows how great is the responsibility which rests upon all for the influence they exert over others.

When a boy he was placed in the employment of a mercantile firm, one of whose partners was a Presbyterian. My friend had been brought up to the regular attendance of meetings on week-days as well as First-days, and conscientiously believed it his duty to be faithful in this matter. But he soon found that his new master was unwilling to spare him from his store duties for that purpose, telling him he might go to meetings on First-days and in the evenings, but that business hours belonged to his employer, and must not be diverted from attention to his interests. The boy was thus brought under deep trial and conflict to know his real duty in the position in which he was placed, and earnestly prayed to his Heavenly Father for light and strength.

On the morning of week-day meeting, he was told to unpack an invoice of goods recently received from China, evidently with the intention on the part of his employer, that there should be no opportunity for going to the place of worship; and soon after received a sample card of a case of Chinese buttons which was in the invoice, and a list of persons in the city who dealt in such goods; and was sent out to endeavor to effect a sale.

Pleased with the commission with which he was entrusted, our young friend went from one store to another, but met with no success—none were in want of the article, and he was told that a new style of buttons had been lately introduced which had largely superseded the Chinese article. Somewhat discouraged by these continued rebuffs, he found himself at the end of his list of names, at the store of a merchant, as I think, in Second street, near Vine, and close to the meeting of Friends, then held in New Street (or Key's Alley) below Second street. This last merchant was, like the others, unwilling to purchase, but gave permission to the boy to leave his card on the store counter, while he went to the meeting to wait upon the Lord, and receive from Him comfort and help in his troubles.

While he was thus communing with his Creator, a person entered the store of the merchant, picked up the sample-card of buttons, was pleased with some of the patterns, and asked the storekeeper if he had those buttons in stock. The storekeeper replied that he could furnish him with any of those represented on the card; and accepted an order for some of them which was given him by his customer.

On the return of the boy from meeting, to claim his card, the merchant told him that he had changed his mind, and would take part of the case offered him. He was told that the case was not to be divided; so, as he had already sold a part, he agreed to purchase the whole, and our friend returned to his own establishment, much gratified with the events of the morning.

On entering the store, he said to his employer, that he had sold the case of buttons. He was pleased to hear it, and remarked, "That was much better than going to meeting." "I did go to meeting," was the reply, "and if I had not gone, I would not have sold the buttons." From that time forward, the subject of meeting was never mentioned, nor was any allusion made to what had occurred, but it was well understood that no opposition should be made to the performance of his religious duty in this respect.

Years rolled on, and the time came in which his former master felt that he was drawing near to the dark valley of the shadow of death. He lingered for some months in declining health; and during this time, his former boy, now his faithful friend, was often with him, nursing and caring for him. At this period, for the first time, he referred to their former conflict, saying, in substance, to my friend—"I cannot tell you how thankful I feel that you were faithful to your convictions, and did what you believed to be right. If you had given up your meetings in deference to my wishes, and violated your conscience, it might have been the beginning of a downward course for you; and now, with the prospect of death before me, I might feel that your blood was required at my hands."

Stanch Principles.

The late Bishop E. S. Janes was distinguished for that immovable firmness with which he adhered to his convictions. This eminent quality was most clearly shown in reference to total abstinence, and the liquor traffic in all its forms. His convictions were so deep and well-settled, that it was not possible for him to conceal them whenever the occasion justified. While residing at his summer home, Bernardsville, N. J., a few years ago, he had occasion to purchase of a neighbor a farm wagon for immediate use. The bargain had been satisfactorily made, but when the bishop was about to leave the neighbor asked the privilege of retaining the wagon a few days, incidentally remarking that he wished to transport a few barrels before finally disposing of it. The bishop, with his usually quick discernment, suspected what might be the object, and promptly said, "What barrels?" "I have a few barrels of apple whisky yet to remove," he responded. "Has that wagon ever carted barrels of whisky?" inquired the good bishop. "O, yes," was the reply. "Well, then, I don't want it; I have no use for it," was the immediate response. "That is only a mere matter of opinion," said the neighbor; not measuring the profound convictions that moved the bishop, though holding him in common with the entire community in great esteem. "No, no, my friend," responded Bishop Janes; that is not mere opinion; that is conviction, sir, that is conviction."

It is needless to say that not only was the intended purchase not made, but that this act produced an impression in that community for good, an impression abiding to this day in many minds. This manly avowal of his convictions on temperance was in accordance with his entire policy in practical life. During a certain autumn, when his orchards were loaded with fruit, it was suggested that it would be well to manufacture vinegar for sale, and that this could easily be done at the cider-mill in that vicinity. "Never! never!" he promptly replied. "Some one might be injured by seeing our apples carted to a whisky-mill; we must avoid in all things the very appearance of evil." Visiting Europe on several different occasions, his hosts became so fully conversant with his temperance principles that, in many instances, and out of deference to his convictions, wine was banished from the table, a token of respect that must have borne fruit—in some quarters, as we have reason to know, and is yet bearing fruit in favor of total abstinence. On all questions this noble man was wont to say, "It may sometimes be up-hill business to be honest and true, but it pays, pays well always, and it always comes out right in the end."—Christian Advocate.

The Outer Hebrides.—One mile from Mingalay lies South Bernera, the southernmost of the isles, a bold mass of gneiss, about a mile in length and a half a mile in width, sloping gradually downward toward the east, but presenting to the western waves a precipitous front of about seven hundred feet in height, crowned with a magnificent lighthouse of granite and iron, such as may defy the wildest storm and warn all mariners to keep as far as possible from this deadly coast. It is said that this light can be discerned at a distance of upward of thirty miles, but practically the height of the crag on which it has been placed is found to be a disadvantage, as its light is often shrouded in mist, while all is clear below.

Lonely, indeed, is the lot of the men in charge of this beacon light, left to their own resources on this uttermost isle, their only communication with the outer world being when, twice a year, the lighthouse stores are brought by a steamer, which can only lie to for a few hours, for there is no manner of anchorage, and the only possible landing-place is a shelving ledge of rock, on which he who would go ashore must spring at the moment when his boat rises on the crest of a wave, and then make the best of his way to the summit by scrambling up a slippery shelving rock.

Once a year, too, a priest from Barra comes here to visit his little flock, numbering about two score—a fine, hardy, self-reliant race. Their isle supplies pasture for cows and goats, so they have the blessing of good milk; otherwise the sea-birds who congregate on the cliffs—puffins and auks, guillemots and kittiwakes—supply their larder with fresh meat in summer and salt meat for winter use; also with oil for their lamps and feathers for bedding. When fishing is possible, the boats go off to wrest a harvest from the sea—cuddies, haddock, herring, flounders, lythe and sythe, rock-codlings, and skate. Eels they will not touch, but dog-fish are welcome, and are salted and dried for winter store.

In the spring time thousands of eggs are taken by bold cragsmen, who venture and sometimes sacrifice their lives in this quest.—All the Year Round.

'Tis sin that Christ is come to save man from, and death and wrath as the wages of it; but those that are not saved, that is, delivered, by the power of Christ in their souls, from the power that sin has had over them, can never be saved from the death and wrath that are the assured wages of the sin they live in.—Wm. Penn.

The man who strives to put something into the world that shall make it better, not simply seeking to get the most possible out of it, never has his head bothered over the question whether life is worth living. It is the greedy life, and not the generous one, that has doubt as to the worth of existence.

LINES.

Selected.

Saviour, beneath thy yoke,
My wayward heart doth pine,
All unaccustomed to the stroke
Of love divine:
Thy chastisements, my God, are hard to bear;
Thy cross is heavy for frail flesh to wear.

Perishing child of clay!
Thy sighing I have heard:
Long have I marked thy evil way,
How thou hast err'd:
Yet fear not: by my own most holy name,
I will shed healing thro' thy sin-sick frame.

Praise to thee, Gracious Lord!
I fain would be at rest,
Oh now fulfil thy faithful word,
And make me blest!
My soul would lay her heavy burden down
And take with joyfulness the promised crown.

Stay, thou short-sighted child,
There is much first to do,
Thy heart so long by sin defiled,
I must renew.
Thy will must here be taught to bend to mine,
Or the sweet peace of heaven can ne'er be thine.

Yea, Lord, but thou canst soon
Perfect thy work in me,
Till like the pure, calm, summer noon,
I shine by thee.
A moment shine, that all thy power may trace,
Then pass in stillness to my heavenly place.

Ah, coward soul, confess
Thou shrinkest from my cure;
Thou tremblest at the sharp distress
Thou must endure,
The foes on every hand for war array'd,
The thorny path in tribulation laid,

The process slow of years,
The discipline of life,—
Of outward woes and silent tears,
Sickness and strife;
The idols taken from thee one by one,
Till thou canst dare to live with me alone.

Some gentle souls there are
Who yield unto my love,
Who ripening fast beneath my care,
I soon remove.
But thou stiff-necked art, and hard to rule,
Thou must stay longer in affliction's school.

My Maker and my King!
Is this thy love to me?
Oh that I had the lightning wing
From earth to flee.
How can I bear the heavy weight of woes
Thine indignation on thy creature throws?

Thou canst not, oh, my child!
So hear my voice again;
I will bear all thy anguish wild,
Thy grief, thy pain.
My arms shall be around thee day by day,
My smile shall cheer thee in thy heaven-ward way.

In sickness, I will be Watching beside thy bed:
In sorrow, thou shall lean on me
Thy aching head,
In every struggle, thou shall conqueror prove,
Nor death itself shall sever from my love.

Oh grace beyond compare,
Oh love most high and pure!
Saviour, begin, no longer spare,
I can endure.
Only vouchsafe thy grace that I may live Unto thy glory, who canst so forgive.

"Each cloud has of silver a lining,
Though we may not see its light;
The sun has not ceased its shining,
Though hidden awhile from our sight.
Our way through the world may be cheerless,
Our feet may be bleeding and torn,
Yet sharp tho' the wild blast, He tempers
The wind to the lamb that is shorn."

FORGIVING JENNY.

Selected.

A little cripple passed along
The quiet village street—
The clothes she wore were patched and old,
Yet very clean and neat.
Though she was sickly and deformed,
Her face was sweet and fair;
And the glossy curls around her brow
Proclaimed a mother's care.

Ere long she passed the village school,
As from the open door
A train of boys came shouting forth,
Glad that their tasks were o'er.
A few, more boisterous than the rest,
Themselves erect and strong,
Began to mock the humpbacked girl
Who slowly walked along.

Once Jenny uttered sharp retorts,
When jests like these she heard:
But now that grace had changed her heart
She answered not a word.
Only the blush that dyed her cheek,
And the tear that down it stole,
Showed that the coarse, unfeeling taunts
Had sunk into her soul.

Arrived at home, poor Jenny sought
Her chamber small and bare—
Methinks those thoughtless lads had wept
If they had seen her there.
Beside her lowly bed she knelt,
And sent this prayer to heaven—
"O Father, help me to forgive
As I have been forgiven!"

Dear children, 'tis from God above
Health, strength and beauty come,
And He in wisdom hath withheld
These precious gifts from some:
Be kind to such, and learn to keep
The golden rule in view,
Nor ever let a cripple hear
A cruel taunt from you.

Incidents and Reflections.

"WATCH."

Every experienced Christian has found necessary to observe the emphatic caution given by our Saviour to his disciples—"Watch and pray lest ye enter into temptation," as many have known what it is to suffer grief and loss and to be involved in serious difficulties from a neglect of this holy watchfulness. We propose, in the present article, to collect a few testimonies on this point.

John Richardson in his journal mentions his return home from a religious visit to America, and says, "And now I was under a thoughtfulness how to walk and demean myself so as that I might be preserved near to God, and in due reverence and true fear before Him; that, inasmuch as I found there was something of 'Holiness unto the Lord' imprinted or engraven upon the fleshly tab of my heart, that now in this time, when was not so particularly and immediately concerned in the like daily travel on Truth's account, I might not lose the savor, relish and sensation of heavenly things. * * * No in this careful and watchful frame of mind, have found preservation from time to time this day, by retaining the salt of the kingdom in the soul of the inward man, which is of preserving quality, with which the vessel and can only be kept fit for the Master's use."

In another place, he pens this caution: "Now my tender and well-beloved Friend watch against and strive to keep out the enemy that he enter not; for what way soever he enters and gets footing, he defiles God's temple; and before thou witnesses the Lord to destroy him and cast him out again, the st have many a sore combat and some warfare (perhaps more than thou art aware of) before thou gainest all the ground thou hast lost, by giving way to the adversary of thy soul; therefore keep upon thy watch-tower, watch unto the end, watch and pray continually, that ye enter not into temptation, said our great Lord unto his followers." This watchful care is as essential for those who minister unto others as it is for their arers; indeed there are peculiar dangers in the path of those who are eminently gifted, and who attract the admiration of others. Henry, in his History of Friends in Ireland, relates the case of Abigail Boles, afterwards Smith, who was convinced about the year 1755, and about eight years afterwards came forth as a minister. He says: "She was an eloquent woman, of a majestic presence, much admired and followed. She travelled on her account both in Ireland and England, and did acceptable service in many places, and several persons were convinced by her ministry. She was greatly applauded by many, and, not being strong enough to bear praise, was transported into pride thereby, lost her self and fellowship with Friends, and from the highest pitch of applause fell into as low a degree of contempt. It is certain, however, that she became sensible of the fall, and suffered many bitter agonies on that account, passing the latter years of her life in retirement, great sorrow and mortification. She has left behind her a pathetic paper of self-condemnation, as a caution to all who think they stand, although in the highest station, to take heed lest they fall."

In a paper which she prepared, she "warned those concerned in the ministry to watch against that Luciferian spirit which would seek and adorn itself with the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, and not to value themselves upon any gift which God bestows on them; because that opens a wide door for temptation."

One of the most successful stratagems of the enemy of all righteousness, is to delude mankind with the idea that if they yield to the temptation which is presented it will matter little, for it is a small thing, a very slight departure from the right way, and that they need go no further than they choose in the path of self-indulgence. But it is by grace only that we are able to stand, and he who leaves his only sure Helper, and follows the enemy, has no power of his own to return to the fold from which he has wandered. It can only be through the fresh extension of that Divine love, whose pleadings he has rejected. It is recorded of a man who was confined in prison under sentence of death for murder, that he was visited there by two young men who manifested an interest in his condition, one of whom asked him how the sad occurrence happened.

"It did not all happen at once, young man," was the slow reply. "Sit down in that chair and I'll tell you about it. It did not all happen at once," he repeated, "it did not all happen in a day or a month or even in a year. It was true that I sent an axe crashing into the brains of a fellow man—that happened in a moment of time, but I was many years in getting to that moment. Once, young man," and here the speaker's voice trembled, "I was as pure as you are—vice had not then left its fearful stain upon my face, and I would not then have harmed the meanest of God's creatures. But the tempter whispered to me, just as he does to all, and I unconsciously yielded. He whispered again and again and I yielded, each time resolving in my heart never to yield again. But I trusted in my own strength, and so when temptation came again I was like a reed shaken in the wind. Little by little I gave up the contested ground to my enemy, and little by little I drifted away from right and truth—away from honor and manhood—away from God and heaven. The tempter whispered in louder tones, until he shrieked in awful tones, 'Murder that man,' and I did the awful deed. Young man, in God's name, don't yield to the first temptation. If an evil thought comes to you, crush it as you would a viper—turn away the very first suggestion of the tempter and then you are safe."

The rough-looking prisoner was trembling like a leaf when he ceased speaking, and the two young men were almost as deeply agitated. It was a lesson that they never forgot.

A boy from the country obtained a position in a banking-house in a city. Before leaving him in the counting room his father took him aside, and gave him this advice: "My son, be obedient, obliging, civil and respectful; be attentive to business, be honest, be trustworthy. Above all, remember the motto, 'Thou, God, seest me.'"

He promised he would, and kept his pledge for a time. He followed as closely as possible his father's advice, and gained the esteem of his equals and the confidence of his superiors. He rose step by step till he occupied one of the most responsible positions in the place.

But he was not to live always a stranger to temptation. At any moment he might have laid his hand on hundreds or thousands of dollars, and walked away with the money. At first he reproached himself for permitting the thought of such covetousness to enter his mind; but the temptation grew stronger, and he grew weaker. The plans by which the wicked act could be carried out opened before him. Everything arranged itself with the nicest harmony and precision. The evening was set, the money was where he could lay his hand on it in a moment. Through all the preceding day he was fearfully tried. At last the fearful moment came. All the others had left. He remained, under the pretence of finishing some business. He walked to the vault, and swung open the heavy door. As he reached out his hand to grasp the money, it fell from his fingers as if it had been a bar of red hot iron. He trembled as if in convulsions, for then the burning thought flashed across his excited mind, "Thou, God, seest me." He felt the eye of God gazing upon him, and, with a reproving glance, warning him of his guilt. He fell upon the floor and groaned aloud. The money he had dropped seemed to answer, "Thou, God, seest him." He cried out aloud, "O God of my mother, save me from this crime!"

And God did save him. In uttering the prayer he had passed the crisis. He replaced the package of money, closed the vault, and repairing at once to the house of the president of the bank, related to him all that had transpired, and begged to be dismissed from his position. The president was a good and wise man, and promised that he would keep the matter secret, assured him that his confidence in him was not destroyed, and that he would keep him in his place. But he advised him to retire for a month from the bank to recover his shattered energies, and to reflect upon the past and prepare himself for the future.

At the end of that time he came back, with a deep sense of his own weakness, but with a firm reliance on the grace of God as his only true safeguard, and with a more abiding sense than ever of the great truth, "Thou, God, seest me."

It is many years since this occurred. It is a lesson from the life of an experienced banker; but, with some modifications, it is a history of the temptations that beset scores of boys and young men in city life. May the result be also the history of every one that is tempted to do what is not right in the sight of God!

In one of the Methodist Journals I find a narrative written by R. H. Howard, which illustrates the danger there is of going backward in religious condition, if the holy watch against evil is not maintained. The person of whom he speaks was the son of a wealthy and influential physician in Connecticut. When about 22 years of age he united himself with the Methodist Episcopal Church and became a zealous worker in that denomination. But a fondness for the wine-cup led him astray, as it has many others. Through neglect of the warnings of Divine Grace in his own heart, which would have preserved him from this snare, he became finally so enslaved by his passion for strong drink that he lost property and friends, and, sinking from one degradation to another, at length father and brothers cast him off, and finally his wife felt compelled to abandon him and seek a refuge in her own father's home.

Rendered reckless and desperate by the depths to which this habit had brought him, he enlisted in the United States army, then engaged in subduing the Indian tribes of Florida and the Western frontier. For eight years thereafter he continued to lead that half-civilized life that soldiers then led amid the Florida swamps and the Western prairies. Meantime, surrounded by the hardships and privations of such a life, he learned to prize the home he had so recklessly broken up, and to curse the habit which had caused all his bitter woe.

With the breaking, however, of the chain that bound him, strange, to say, came no revival of his olden love to God. On the contrary, he seemed, rather, only to harden his heart and to sear his conscience by adopting every infidel doctrine he had ever known. The consequence was, that when his term of service was completed, and he had returned to home and friends, and had become a temperate man, and so a kind husband and father, and a respected citizen once more, he had also become a confirmed infidel—a bitter contemner and opposer of every thing connected with God and religion. The very talent which had once made him an effective worker in a good cause now made him no less successful in a bad one, and he who had once written of a Saviour's love, now not only utterly denied his divinity, but gave himself, with pestilent activity, to the destruction of the faith of others in that Saviour's lordship and Godhead.

Some twelve years after his return his wife died. It was a terrible blow to him, for notwithstanding his previous faults, they were devotedly attached to each other. This affliction tion, however, severe as it was, did not yet seem in any degree to soften his heart. Instead, indeed, he seemed only the more rapidly to rebel against the hand that had chastened him.

Two years later consumption laid its remorseless hand upon him. Slowly he failed, until at length he knew he must die. At first he gave no sign of relenting. About two weeks, however, before his death, his stubborn heart, his pride of intellect that had so long upheld him, utterly gave way, and, like a poor, broken-hearted child, he came back to the foot of the cross, supplicating with a truly despairing earnestness and energy for the peace and pardon he had once enjoyed. He was one of the saddest, the most wretched, heart-broken of human beings. "I have sinned against such light!" he would say; "I have crucified the Saviour afresh—counted the blood of the covenant wherewith I was sanctified an unholy thing; there remains for me, therefore, no more atonement for sin."

He conversed freely about his former Christian experience, always closing with remarks like these: "I am worse than Judas. I sold my Master for nothing. Like Peter, I denied him, but, unlike Peter, I did it without provocation. Like Saul of Tarsus, I persecuted Him, but, unlike Saul, I did it," he said bitterly, "with a full knowledge that he was the Messiah."

In this despairing frame of mind he remained until his death, earnestly entreating every one around him to pray for him, and with the publican's prayer ever upon his lips.

The last words he ever uttered were, "Lord Jesus, have mercy!"

Whatever hopes we may entertain, that this prayer was heard and answered, yet the narrative is one that strongly enforces the need of obeying the command of our Saviour—"Watch and pray lest ye enter into temptation;" and of following the example of the Apostle Paul, who said, "I keep my body under and bring it into subjection, lest by any means, after I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway."

The New Heart.—There is in every righteous man a new vital principle. The spirit of grace is the spirit of wisdom, and teaches us by secret inspirations, by proper arguments, by actual persuasions, by personal applications, by effects and energies; and as the soul of man is the cause of all his vital operations, so is the Spirit of God the life of that life, and cause of all actions and productions spiritual; and the consequence of this is what St. John tells us of, viz: Ye have received the unction from above, and that anointing teacheth you all things that pertain to life and godliness; all that by which a man is made truly wise and happy.

Unless the soul have a new life put into it, unless there be a vital principle within; unless the Spirit of life be the informer of the spirit of man, the word of Scripture will be as dead in operation, as the body in its powers and possibilities. Unless there be in our hearts a secret conviction by the Spirit of God, the gospel itself is a dead letter.—Christian Philosophy by Vicessimus Knox.

Grace teaches us, in the midst of life's greatest comforts, to be willing to die, and in the midst of its greatest crosses to be willing to live.

The Scourge of War.

In W. S. Lovell's Personal Narrative of Events from 1799 to 1815, may be found some slight glimpses of the evils of war. The author entered the navy when scarcely ten years of age, and during his whole life was trained to look upon military pursuits as an honorable occupation; yet, when speaking of the conflicts between the French and English in Spain and Portugal, during the time of Napoleon Bonaparte, he says: "God forbid, old England ever should be the scene of warfare. Contending armies are one of the greatest scourges with which Divine Providence can afflict a nation. Even your allies cannot avoid bringing with them desolation for a time, by destroying crops of all kinds, to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. In short, ruin and devastation follow in the train of an army, whether friend or foe."

"Being near the town of Usagree, in Estremadura, with a brigade of dragoons, I remember seeing whole fields of wheat, &c., cut down and given as green food to the horses of our army. The French being expected almost immediately to occupy the position we were then in, the commanding officer very properly thought it better to secure the grain for ourselves than leave it to fall into the hands of the enemy. A poor old Spaniard came up to the gallant colonel, the late Sir Felton Harvey, and, shaking his grey locks, implored him to spare his only field, which was to preserve himself and family from starving, and which he beheld our troops cutting to feed their horses. The reply was, that we were his friends; that we were obliged to take the corn, since our horses must not starve; that, if they did not eat it, those of the French, his mortal enemies, would. The colonel concluded by giving the poor man an order on the commissary to pay him in dollars equal to what had been taken away."

"The constant state of alarm and anxiety that the whole of Spain and Portugal suffered, while the contending armies were hovering about, was extreme."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Microscopic Organisms as Destroyers of Building Materials.—In examining some mould that had vegetated on a brick partition in a damp department, Parize noticed some small blisters or bubbles on the plastering. On puncturing one of these there came out a very fine red dust that had resulted from the powdering of the bricks. An examination of this showed the presence of an immense number of living organisms, belonging to the algae, which were moving with extreme rapidity. Having cleaned the surface of the bricks with a stiff brush and drilled a hole about an inch into one of them, the dust from the bottom of this was found to contain the same organisms though not in such great numbers. This shows that the germs or spores of these minute forms of life may exist and be preserved almost indefinitely in surroundings where we would scarcely think of looking for them.

Hence is explained the utility of the disinfecting processes that are employed in apartments, hospitals or stables where cases of contagious disease have occurred; and the importance of scraping the walls to remove the layer of material in which parasitic germs may have been able to establish themselves.—La Nature.

Iron and Steel.—The annual production of pig iron is now 20,000,000 tons and of steel 5,000,000. Owing to the improvements in its manufacture the cost of steel has greatly diminished, which is undoubtedly one of the causes which has led to the wonderful increase in its use.

Spontaneous Combustion.—The Mutual Fire Ins. Co. of New York calls the attention of its customers to the increase of fires arising from spontaneous combustion. The most common cause of this is oily waste—whether in cotton waste, animal fibre as silk and wool or vegetable fibre as raw cotton, jute or celsior. All such greasy material should be kept carefully cleaned up and not be allowed to remain about a building.

Gas from Iron Cement.—In building a railway bridge over the Forth, a number of cylinders were sunk into the bed of the river. They were built of iron rings six feet in diameter and several feet high, and made of total height of 60 feet. The space round the sections was filled from the inside by a mixture of iron turnings, sal ammoniac and sulphur. When wet this oxidizes and swells up so as to fill the spaces into which it was thrust. One day when there was a perfectly still atmosphere, the man at work inside the cylinder was observed to become overpowered by some "mysterious influence," and a companion descended by a windlass to his assistance. The first man was hauled up into the air and recovered, but the second succumbed to the same influence and fell into the water at the bottom and was drowned. The effect was traced to the absorption of oxygen from the air in the cylinder by the iron and sulphur of the mixture, until it would no longer support life. The state of the atmosphere prevented the free circulation of the outer air.—Scientific American.

Bee-hunting in Timor.—The bees-wax is an important and reliable product, formed by the wild bees, which build huge honey-combs suspended in the open air from the underside of the lofty branches of the highest trees. These are of a semi circular form, and often three or four feet in diameter. I once saw the natives taking a bees' nest, and a very interesting sight it was. In the valley where I used to collect insects I one day saw three or four Timorese men and boys under a high tree; and looking up, saw on a very lofty horizontal branch three large bees' combs. The tree was straight and smooth-barked and without a branch, till at 70 or 80 feet from the ground it gave out the limb which the bees had chosen for their home. As the men were evidently looking after the bees I waited to watch their operations. One of them first produced a long piece of wood apparently the stem of a small tree or creeper which he had brought with him, and began splitting it through in several directions which showed that it was very tough and stringy. He then wrapped it in palm leaves which were secured by twisting a slender creeper round them. The wood-torch thus made was fastened to one end of a strong creeper or bush rope 8 or 10 yards long, which one of his companions had cut, and lighted at the bottom, emitting a steady stream of smoke. Cloths were wrapped round his head, neck body, leaving his face, arms and legs completely bare.

The bee-hunter now took hold of the bush just above the torch and passed the other round the trunk of the tree, holding one in each hand. Jerking it up the tree a little above his head, he set his feet against the trunk, and leaning back, began walking it. It was wonderful to see the skill with which he took advantage of the slightest irregularities of the bark or obliquity of the trunk to aid his ascent, jerking the stiff creeper a few feet higher when he had found a firm hold with his bare feet. It almost made me giddy to look at him as he rapidly got up—30, 40, 50 feet above the ground, and I kept wondering how he could possibly mount the next few feet of straight smooth trunk. Still, however, he kept on with as much coolness and apparent certainty as if he were going up a ladder, till he got within 10 or 15 feet of the bees. Then he stopped a moment, and took care to swing the torch (which hung just above his feet) a little toward these dangerous insects, so as to send up the stream of smoke between him and them. Still going on, in a minute more he brought himself under the comb, and, in a manner quite unintelligible to me, seeing that both hands were occupied in supporting himself by the creeper, managed to get upon it.

By this time the bees began to be alarmed, and formed a dense buzzing swarm just over his head, but he brought the torch up close to them, and coolly brushed away those that settled on his arms or legs. Then stretching himself along the limb, he crept towards the nearest comb and swung the torch just under it. The moment the smoke touched it, its color changed in a most curious manner from black to white, the myriads of bees that had covered it flying off and forming a dense cloud above and around. The man then lay at full length along the limb, and brushed off the remaining bees with his hand, and then drawing his knife off the comb at one slice close to the tree, attaching a thin cord to it, let it down to his companions below. He was all this time enveloped in a crowd of angry bees, and how he bore their stings so coolly and went on with his work at that giddy height so deliberately, was more than I could understand. The bees were evidently not stupefied by the smoke or driven away far by it, and it was possible that the small stream from the torch could protect his whole body when at work. There were three other combs on the same tree, and all were successively taken, and furnished the whole party with a luscious store of honey and young bees, as well as a valuable lot of wax.

After two of the combs had been let down, the bees became rather numerous below, flying about wildly and stinging viciously. Several got about me, and I was soon stung, and I ran away, beating them off with my hands and capturing them for specimens. Several of them followed me for at least half a mile, getting into my hair and persecuting me most pertinaciously, so that I was more annoyed than ever at the immunity of the bees. I am inclined to think that slow deliberate motion, and no attempt at speed, are perhaps the best safeguards. A settling on a passive native probably becomes as it would on a tree or other inanimate substance, which it does not attempt to sting. Still they must often suffer, but they are used to the pain, and learn to bear it passively, as without doing so no man could be a bee-hunter.—Wallace's Malay Archipelago.

God feeds the wild flowers on the lonely mountain side without the help of man, and they are as fresh and lovely as those that are daily watched over in our gardens. So God can feed his own planted ones without the help of man, by the sweetly falling dew of his Spirit.

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 7, 1883.

We have received some extracts from a book entitled, the "Inner Life of the Religious Societies of the Commonwealth," written by the late Robert Barclay, of England—a descendant of the Apologist, but holding very different views from his honored ancestor. These extracts are designed to show that the views of George Fox and our Early Friends on Hireling Ministry were not so fully opposed to the system as those which have prevailed in our Society since his day.

Most of the extracts sent to us, with some others on this subject from the same work, are quoted and commented on by the late Dr. Charles Evans, in his able and fair review of the "Inner Life," entitled "An Examen," &c.

In this review, C. E. shows on what slender foundations the author rests his assumptions; the remarkable facility with which he takes for granted, as undoubted facts, the suggestions of his own imagination; and, that the narrative contained in his book, as relates to Friends, is "formulated to suit pre-conceived opinions."

The extracts referred to commence with the statement, that "it is a great mistake . . . to suppose that Fox in protesting against a 'hireling ministry,' protested against all payments to the ministers of the Gospel. What he opposed was a ministry which was the creature of the civil power, and hired by it." The assumption here—that it was only a ministry which was "hired by the civil power," to which Friends objected, is one of those imaginary suggestions taken for a fact, of which the book contains many specimens. The views of the Society of Friends on this subject are shown in the following passages:

"They who have received this holy and unspotted gift [of the ministry], as they have freely received it, so are they freely to give it, without hire or bargaining; far less to use it as a trade to get money by; yet if God hath called any one from their employments or trades, by which they acquire their livelihood, it may be lawful for such, according to the liberty which they feel given to them in the Lord, to receive such temporals (to wit, what may be needful for them for meat and clothing), as are given them freely and cordially by those to whom they have communicated spirituals."—Barclay's Apology, Prop. X.

"The ministers we plead for, are such as having freely received, freely give . . . whose hands supply their own necessities, working honestly for bread for themselves and families. And if at any time they be called of God, so as the work of the Lord hinder them from the use of their trades, take what is freely given them by such to whom they have communicated spirituals; and having food and raiment are therewith content."

"[The ministers who are called and sent of God] when they stay in a place, being immediately furnished by God, and not needing to borrow and steal what they preach, from books, and take up their time that way, fall a working at their lawful employments and labor with their hands, as Paul did when he gathered the Church at Corinth."—Id.

In 1695, George Whitehead and some other Friends had an interview with King William III., in which the king inquired of them, "What places we belonged to, or to what congregations we did minister?" To which they replied, "They were not pastors or ministers over any particular congregations, but visited Friends' meetings in divers places as the Lord inclined us. For we do not make a gain of our ministry; we do not take stipends or hire of our ministry, but preach the Gospel freely, according to Christ's command to his ministers; freely ye have received, freely give."—Friends' Library, vol. 8, p. 431.

In the same year, a law, which imposed a fine on every minister who had not taken orders according to the Church of England, being about to be renewed, Friends called on some of the members of Parliament, and, as G. Whitehead states, "Acquainted them how undeservedly many of our Friends had suffered as preachers, by a maladministration of the said Poll-act, when they have no profit, gain or contribution on that account."—Id. p. 442.

The case of John Banks, who was an eminent minister in the early days of our Society, may be taken as an example of the practice of his brethren in the work of the Gospel. He says: "In my native county in Cumberland, and also in many places elsewhere, it is well known to Friends, with what diligence I labored among them in the work of the Gospel, early and late, far and near, through much hardship to my body, in heat and cold; and yet, through the strength and ability given me of God, I was preserved in and through all, having faith therein. And with all diligence, when I was at home, I labored with my hands, with honest endeavors and lawful employments, for the maintenance of my family."—Friends' Library, vol. 2, p. 16.

In conclusion, we are fully prepared to unite in the judgment arrived at by Charles Evans, after a discussion of this question:—"From all this it may be safely asserted, that the testimony which the early Friends bore, openly and unremittingly, against a hireling ministry, was not restricted, as represented in the 'Inner Life' to those who took the compensation provided by the State." The disposition which has been manifested of late years to set aside our ancient testimony on this point, we regard as one of the accompaniments of that unsettlement which has been introduced into the Society of Friends, and which is leading some into the doctrines and practices out of which our early Friends were led by the power and Spirit of God, and which all sound Friends since their day have been concerned to bear their testimony against.

We believe it is not out of place to express in "The Friend," the satisfaction we feel at the progress thus far made in Civil Service

Reform, both by the General Government and in some of the States. So great are the demoralizing effects of the system which considers the officers under governments as the rewards of partizan politics, and which enforces a change of subordinate officers with every change of the party in power; that any blow to this system must be regarded as a step in the direction of public morality as well as economy.

What has been already done in this direction is but the beginning of a reform, which we hope will continue and extend.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—General Crook arrived in Denver on the 1st instant, on his way to Washington. He firmly believes the troubles with the Apache Indians is settled.

The effect of the executive order consolidating various internal revenue districts, is to reduce the number of such districts 46, or from 126 to 80. It will probably take until the 1st of 8th month to carry the order into final effect. The saving effected by the consolidation is estimated at $200,000 a year.

Sixteen hundred and thirty-nine new post-offices were established in the United States during the fiscal year just closed.

The steamship Nevada arrived at New York last week with 680 Mormon converts, from Sweden, Denmark, Wales, England and Norway.

Professor Brooks, of the Red House Observatory, at Phelps, New York, reports a telescopic observation on First-day morning, of an enormous group of spots now central upon the sun's disc. The diameter of the group is 50,000 miles, and the spots are visible to the naked eye. They exhibit violent cyclonic action, electrical storms and aurora accompanying this solar outbreak. A brilliant aurora was witnessed at Phelps all Seventh-day night.

On the 28th ultimo, the Supreme Court of Ohio gave out its decision in support of the Scott liquor tax law. The Court holds the law to be "valid and constitutional, except the second section, wherein it is held not to apply to leases executed prior to the passage of the act, as no contracts made can be violated." The point is made that "declaring one section partially null and void does not destroy the validity of the law as a whole, and its legality is not thereby affected."

The total assessed valuation of real and personal estate in the city of New York for 1883, is $1,276,677,164, an increase of $43,200,765 on the valuation for 1882.

The total debt of the city of Boston is reported at $41,281,000, an increase of $1,118,000 since last year.

Dangerous counterfeits of dimes and five-cent nickels have appeared in New Orleans. The dimes, which are of brass plated with nickel, are well calculated to deceive.

The trade dollar, which is not a legal tender, is being refused as a circulating medium at face value, and is rapidly disappearing.

Florida has 630 factories, employing 2749 hands and about $1,680,000 in capital.

A special meeting of the New York State Board of Health was held on the 29th ult. in Albany, at which Erastus Brooks called attention to an alarming increase of pleuro-pneumonia among milch cows on Staten Island. A resolution was adopted calling the attention of the National Commission on Cattle Diseases to the increase of pleuro-pneumonia in New York State, "with a view to investigation of its origin and growth, and to securing its eradication, if possible, and the punishment of those responsible for its introduction."

The Delaware river was higher at Trenton on the 29th ult., than it has been for many years. The streams which empty into the Upper Delaware are swollen to a height unknown for twenty-four years.

The recent rain storm flooded collieries and damaged towns throughout the Schuylkill coal regions. In some places whole fields had grain washed out of them by the roots.

It is reported from various sections of Berks county that, in addition to the Hessian fly, a small green worm has appeared, "which eats off the grain at the head, the latter then dropping to the ground and rotting." Old farmers say the same worm devastated the wheat twenty-five years ago.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 430, which was 123 more than during the previous week, and 58 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing, 228 were males, and 202 females: 52 died of consumption; 28 of convulsions; 25 of marasmus; 21 of scarlet fever; 16 of old age; 17 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels, and 11 of pneumonia.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 104½; 3½'s, 103½; 4½'s, 113; 4's, registered, 119½; coupon, 120½; currency 6's, 127 a 131.

Cotton.—There was no essential change to notice in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 11 cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ a 7¾ cts. for export, and 8½ a 8¾ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour.—The demand for flour continues limited, both for export and home use, but prices were unchanged: 2100 barrels sold, including Minnesota extras, clear, at $5.37½ a $5.50; small lots do. straight, at $5.75 a $6.25; Pennsylvania extra family at $4.90; do. do., choice, at $5; Ohio do. do., at $5.50 a $6; do. do. do., new process, at $6.25; Southern Illinois do. do., at $5.75 a $6; Wisconsin winter family at $5.25; Ohio patent, at $6.50 a $6.75; Minnesota do., at $7 a $7.25, and 1000 barrels City Mills on secret terms: Western and Pennsylvania super at $3.50 a $3.75; do. do. extras, at $4 a $4.25; Pennsylvania extra family, at $4.87½ a $5; Ohio do. do. $5.25 a $6; Indiana do. do., at $5.25 a $6; St. Louis and Southern Illinois do. do., at $5.37½ a $6.50; Minnesota, bakers' clear, at $5.25 a $5.50; do. do. straight, at $5.75 a $6.25; patents, winter wheat, at $6.50 a $7; do. spring, at $7 a $7.25. Rye flour sells at $3.62½ a $3.75 per barrel. Feed.—Winter bran sells at $15 a $15.50, and spring at $14 a $14.50 per ton.

Grain.—Wheat was rather firmer: Sales of 3200 bushels red and amber, at $1.07 a $1.19; 2800 bushels do. track, at $1.14; 2400 bushels No. 2 red, in elevator, at $1.13½; 2000 bushels rejected at $1.07 a $1.10. Rye, 65 a 67 cts. Corn was unsettled. Sales of 9000 bushels sail, at 55 a 63 cts., as to condition. Oats were also unsettled. About 8500 bushels sold in lots 42 a 44 cts. for white, and 39 a 41 cts. per bushel for rejected and mixed.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 6th mo. 30th, 1883.—Loads of hay, 177; loads of straw, 23. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 95 cts. to $1.05 per 100 pounds; mixed, 85 to 95 cts.; straw, 65 a 75 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in fair demand and prices were a fraction higher: 3000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4½ a 7 cts. per lb., as to quality.

Sheep were dull and lower: 12,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3½ a 5½ cts. and lambs at 4 a 9 cts. per lb., as to condition.

Hogs were dull and rather lower: 3700 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 8½ a 9½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—The Old Testament company of revisers have now finished the last revision of the Old Testament, and are making up the appendix, which contains the unadjusted differences between the American and English revisers. The committee will meet again in 7th mo. for several days, and resume work in 9th mo. next. It is expected that the revision will be completed before the end of this year, and published by the University presses of Oxford and Cambridge before next spring.

The House of Lords on the 28th ult. rejected the bill permitting marriage with a deceased wife's sister on its third reading by a vote of 145 nays to 140 yeas. Lord Derby, the Colonial Secretary, said that the Government was not prepared to annex New Guinea, owing to the enormous extent of the territory, the unknown character of the interior of that country, and the certainty that the natives would object to annexation.

Gladstone made a similar statement in the House of Commons. He said: A despatch will shortly be forwarded to Queensland stating the view of Her Majesty's Government on this question. The annexation of New Guinea is clearly and legally null and is not warranted by policy. We are not prepared to confirm the action of the Queensland Government. We think the particular colony of Queensland is not well suited for the function which it has undertaken to perform. The home Government alone will assume the responsibility if such a step would be necessary. There is no reason to believe that other powers wish to annex New Guinea. The despatch will refer to our intention to strengthen the hand of the High Commissioner in regard to police of the neighboring seas.

Earl Spencer, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, speaking at Limerick, said he saw signs of a better future for Ireland. He advocated technical training, leading to an improved style of farming, before the people entered upon the task of reclaiming waste lands. He maintained that the Land act worked well, and asked classes to co-operate for the material advancement of Ireland.

The chairman of the Loughrea Union has declared that he never knew the out-door relief list to be so high as it is now, and that it has become necessary to increase the relieving staff.

At a recent meeting of British ship-owners, opinion was received from eminent English counsel who were decidedly against Count de Lessep's monopoly of the work of constructing canals across the Isthmus of Suez. A committee of the ship-owners will forthwith demand power to construct a second canal.

The cholera continues to prevail in Damietta, Egypt more than five hundred deaths having occurred in five days. It has been decided in Cyprus to allow no refugees from Egypt to land on the island, because of the lack of quarantine stations there. The Spanish authorities have imposed ten days' quarantine upon all vessels arriving at Spanish ports which have left Egypt since 6th mo. 22d, and a fortnight's quarantine upon vessels with sickness on board. The Italian Government has ordered that all vessels arriving at Italian ports from Egypt be quarantined ten days. The French Government has issued a similar order.

The spectrum line of helium, an element heretofore recognized only in the sun's spectrum, has been found by Dr. Palmieri in an examination of lava from Vesuvius.

At St. Petersburg the Government announces that the negotiations between Russia and the Vatican have been concluded. The hierarchy will be allowed freedom of matters of faith, but interference in questions in regard to the temporal power is forbidden. The Government retains the right of inspecting seminaries. The Czar recognizes the right of the Government to exercise control over the education of Catholic children in the Russian language, literature and history. Appointments of teachers are to be first submitted for the approval of the Government. In regard to instruction in the canonical branches, the rights of the bishops remain untouched. The power is restored to the bishops removing clergymen. The Government intend to renege the exceptional measures against the Catholics issued in 1864.

The damage by the great fire which broke out on the Island of Gutujewsky is now estimated at 10,000,000 roubles.

The tribes in revolt near Bagdad have had a battle with the Turkish troops. Two hundred and fifty men were killed. It is not yet known which side was victorious.

Fears are entertained at Sourabaya and Remban Java, of a rice famine. Disease has destroyed 200,000 acres of the crop.

Through the exertions of the Geographical Society of Quebec a survey is about to be made of the country lying between Lake St. John and Hudson Bay. The Dominion and Quebec Government will bear a large proportion of the cost.

Lima, 6th mo. 28th.—The Tribune, a new Iglesias organ, says that a meeting at La Union, in the department of Huanuco, on 6th mo. 14th, resolved to adhere to the conditions of peace, and to recognize Iglesias as President. The same paper prints a certificate from Juan T. Demarini, dated Talma, 6th month 22nd, that similar resolutions were passed there on 6th month 1st and at Palpa, in the province of Ica, on the 19th.

Letters and Memoranda of William Scattergood.

"Are ye able to drink of the cup that I drink of, and to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?" was the query of our dear Master to two of his first disciples. Thus showing that it was, in measure, to be a tried and humiliating experience of every one who, like them, enlisted under his banner, recognized Him as their Captain unto becoming his disciples, through filial adoption, and the fellowship of his suffering. To such as these, chastenings, trials, conflicts, with baptisms as into the depths of Jordan, become as part of the way to prepare for usefulness in the Church of Christ, as well as that

"Ordained to guide the ransomed spirit home,
From toilsome life to never ending rest."

We have witnessed in the case of the tribulated author of these Letters and Memoranda, at though almost ready at times to cast away the shield of faith, and to "be swallowed with overmuch sorrow," he was nevertheless in mercy supported through deep and arduous conflicts; and that over all the assaults of the enemy, the desire was kept alive to devote himself, body, soul and spirit, to the work and service of Him who had visited him in his tender years; who had preserved him from many temptations; and who had again and again returned to bless, as promised, His name recorded in the heart of every one of His loving children. To be made willing to accept the Saviour in his meek and lowly appearance, to walk by faith, to let patience perfect its perfect work under the Lord's chastening, and to profit duly by the things which we have suffered, are perhaps as hard Christian lessons as any that we are called to, or permitted to learn in the training, transformation-school of Christ.

W. S., as set forth in the following memorandum, was now to enter upon the great work of the ministry. For which service, we can doubt, the foregoing recorded exercises were, in part, the preparatory discipline. As under the Law, they were to be "clean to bear the vessels of the Lord;" so under the new covenant dispensation the soul must come "as a weaned child," and the lips be washed with the live coal from off the holy altar, before power from on high, or the anointing oil, would by the Omniscient, be poured forth unto the praise, in this line of service, of his ever-excellent and adorable name.

"9th mo. 23d, 1838.—Last Fourth-day, in our little meeting at Greenwich, I opened my mouth in a few words, commencing with: 'Who will show us any good?' And oh! the feeling experienced since then till to-day. It truly seemed as if my soul had found rest, and my foot once more a firm place to stand upon. To day in meeting an impression of duty to bend the knee in public prayer was reasoned away, and emptiness is my portion this evening. It seems now as if the path was plainly pointed out in which I ought to walk, if I expected peace with God.*

Truly the fleece is turned enough in the experience of these days, to give courage to my fearful soul, which has held back, dreading the cross; and saying, I am unfit for this great work. Truly, indeed, I am unfit. But the Lord can qualify the meanest for his service; and if He see proper to strengthen me for this work, I have great occasion to bow in submission, and say: 'Thy will be done.' O! may my trembling knees be confirmed, and may I be enabled to put forward the work of the day which has been too fearfully neglected of late years."

"10th mo. 15th, 1838.—My mind, through mercy, is preserved in calmness. The effort to accomplish what appeared my duty, seems afresh to have opened the door of mercy. I am favored with renewed and I trust living desires, to draw near to God; to plead for mercy; for a capacity to walk conformably to his gracious requirements. Oh! that I may improve the favor, and be found diligent in watchfulness unto prayer. True, I am weak; I find myself, through long-continued neglect of duty, weak and prone to earthly sensual thoughts; my heart full of other things—hard, unthankful and irresolute. Nevertheless, in the humbling sense of my many infirmities to be made to feel that help is laid upon one that is mighty, is calculated to animate in prayer, that the Great Master will hear and answer out of his holy habitation.

* From a letter by one since deceased, dated 9th mo. 19th, 1838, we extract the following: "W. Scattergood has appeared both in testimony and supplication in our meeting within a couple of weeks. Thou perhaps knows that he appeared in the same way when a very young man and before his marriage; but a few times only. I believe some of his friends have looked toward him as a laborer in that line ever since. I was not alone in thinking it savored of the right thing—seeming to bring a solemnity over us, not immediately dissipated. I am sure he had my sympathy; and I don't know but my heart almost rejoiced that he could be made willing to be put forth on the Lord's errands. It was not unlooked for by some of our members. They dined with us on First-day. I was struck with a more than usual soberness of countenance and deportment, but did not know what was passing within. I hope he may be preserved faithful; and if called to labor in word and doctrine, do it in humility and sincerity."—From "Selections of Letters and Memoranda of Mary M. Sheppard," p. 110.

May I be strengthened to faithfulness in the appointed path, and to a consistent walk among men. May my conversation be seasoned with salt; and may I be engaged day by day to seek a closer acquaintance with Him, who is the strength of our life, and without whose gracious assistance, we can do nothing acceptable in his eye sight."

From Sarah Hillman to W. S.

Dear William,—Thy last letter was truly grateful, as it contained intelligence new to me and desirable. * * * And now, my dear friend, if thou lettest faithfulness to the Lord be the girdle of thy loins, He will assuredly give thee thy wages, as He has in mercy done; and all that He spake to thee of in early days, will He accomplish as thou keepest hold on thy part of the covenant. Oh! that thou mayest follow unreservedly and faithfully the leadings of his Holy Spirit, counting nothing too near or too dear to part with for his blessed name's sake: and when He leadeth again into Jordan, yea, the very depths of Jordan, be willing to abide there until He speaks the word, 'Come up hither.' Ah! then thou wilt bring up thy stones of memorial, living stones to the honor and praise of Him who hath called thee out of darkness, and whose love hath been ever toward thee; yea, I have invariably believed, that in the very darkest times thou hast experienced since I knew thee, thou hast been in his love.

Things here are truly discouraging as relates to the Church, looking with man's unassisted sight: nevertheless, the eye of faith from Pisgah's mount, beholds, at seasons, the good land and better times ahead. Then let us struggle on, my dear friend, and cast our care for time and for eternity, on Christ Jesus; He, who has in mercy never to be forgotten, visited us in infant years, and kept us in an humbling sense of our inability to save ourselves, and whose gracious promise even in our darkest moments has been realized, 'Lo, I am with you always,' or we had long are this fallen a prey to the enemy. Ah! and He will be with his own, as I believe, to the very end of the world. 'The mountains may depart, and hills be removed, but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord, that hath mercy on thee.' Pray for us in this great city, this tumultuous city; that our faith fail not. Great are our conflicts; wrestling not against flesh and blood only, but against spiritual wickedness in high places. Our meetings very large (a great assemblage of gay people,) and often interrupted (I speak in fear) by offerings whereupon the impresses of the hand of the High Priest—the great Apostle of our profession—is not seen, or any of the living virtue—the smell of the ointment made after his art—discernable. May we learn to be content. When the Seed suffers, we must suffer. My heart is full; but it is near meeting time, and must affectionately commend us to the keeping of Israel's Shepherd, and say farewell.

Thine in sincerity, S. HILLMAN."

"1st mo. 13th, 1839.—I find that conflict is still to be my portion; and that the struggle with the enemy is still to be maintained. The condition of my mind in meeting is often trying beyond expression. So little capacity to draw near to the Fountain! Such a preponderance of earthly sensual cares and wandering thoughts? How is this to be avoided! How shall I overcome in this matter! O Lord! look down in pity upon me; and so clothe with the covering of thy Spirit that I may know an arising with thee unto eternal life. In my daily converse among men, may I experience a more watchful frame of spirit, that my words may be few and savory, ministering grace to the hearers.* Oh! that I may experience a fervent concern, morning by morning, to walk in thy fear; that so I may know thy favor and presence extended for my consolation and strength in the needful time. My mouth of late has not been opened in meeting; but I have had to mourn when there, under a sense of my utter unfitness for so weighty a work, and to desire preservation from the hands of my cruel enemy."

"1st mo. 20th.—Went to meeting to-day under a feeling of earnest desire that I might profit by it, and know a little of the lifting up of the Lord's countenance. Through mercy, I was in some measure favored to struggle for the blessing; but do not find the light and joy which I so much desire to feel. May I deeply ponder and enquire the reason. Is it because I desire the reward without the labor? and do I wish to enjoy rest and satisfaction short of a complete victory over sin and the corruptions of my hard heart? It is my fervent prayer at times, that the Lord would purge me with hyssop, that I may be clean; and wash me that I might be whiter than snow. That He would 'restore unto me the joy of his salvation; and uphold me by his free spirit.'"

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend."

In a recent examination of the old records of Concord Quarterly Meeting, the following was found on a loose sheet:

Some of the last words of counsel and exhortation spoken by Walter Fausit to his wife, children and friends, about twelve hours before his departure out of this life.

"I desire to have my love remembered to all friends, and especially to Samuel Bownas, if you live to see him again, and more I would name particularly, but for reason of weakness of body I cannot. He then desired his wife might be called, and when she came his first words to her were, I am laboring for my long home, and then how brave it is to be before the Lord with a clear conscience; what a happy state is such; what a joy is there for them. And on the other hand the woe and misery that attends for the disobedient. Speaking again to his wife, said, If thou keep to God and his truth, He will be a husband to thee and a father to my children, and the poorer and lower thou seems to be in thine own eyes, the nearer the Lord will be unto thee and work for thy deliverance beyond thy expectation. And then speaking to his children, said: I desire you may keep to the Truth and then the Lord will do wonderfully for you; and speaking particularly to his son John, said, My soul hath often travailed in secret to God for thy preservation, and if thou wilt but leave off thine own willing and be more faithful to God than thou hast been, He will make of thee a noble plant, but if thou refuse to be obedient to God's teachings, and do thy own will and not his, then thou wilt become a vagabond; and then he uttered some words in prayer to God, which were in this wise:

* A testimony left us from another hand is: "His serious and weighty deportment, and a kind attention to the numerous persons employed in the establishment under his care, with his diligence in attending, mostly accompanied by his family, all his religious meetings—a distance of twice 17½ miles—caused him to be much esteemed by those with whom he became acquainted. So that, it is believed, his influence and example had a restraining and salutary effect upon those with whom he had intercourse."

'O Lord! keep thy people in unity one with another, and affect their hearts more and more with thee, and prosper thy truth in their assemblies, that thou may have the praise of thine own works,' and many such like words he uttered in prayer and exhortation, which are not remembered. And when he delivered these things his spirit was much raised and the power of the Lord was eminently with him and flowed through him to the tendering of the hearts of those that were present in an extraordinary manner; and so he continued patient in mind, perfect in speech, and quick of apprehension to the last moment—it being the 29th day of 1st mo. 1704."

From Dr. Smith's History of Delaware Co. we learn, that as early as 1684, Walter Fausit (as it was then spelled) settled on the northeast side of Ridley Creek, in the township of Ridley. "He was a man of great industry and energy of character, for while he attended strictly to his religious duties as a preacher and member of the Society of Friends, he was equally diligent in the service of the community as a good citizen. In 1695 he was appointed one of the Peace Makers for Chester county, then an office of considerable responsibility, and also served one year as a member of the Assembly.

For many years Chester Monthly Meeting was held at his house. His wife Grace having died in 1686, he was married to Rebecca Frame, of Darby, in 1694. He died 1704, leaving two sons—John, who married Grace Crook, and Nathan by his first wife—and three daughters, Rebecca, Mary and Sarah, by his second wife, to survive him."

W. F. was one of the signers of the testimony against Geo. Keith. In 1698 he paid a religious visit to England.

Of W. F.'s son John, who was addressed so earnestly by his father on his death-bed, we find by minute of Chester Monthly Meeting of 4th mo. 1708, that "Chester Meeting laid before this meeting the great grief and trouble occasioned by J. H. and John Fausit's missteps in their conversations and the labor of love to reclaim them." At a meeting in the 6th mo., J. F. appeared and gave in a paper of condemnation to the satisfaction of the meeting. There does not appear to be any further mention of his name in the minutes of Chester Monthly Meeting. W. P. T.

Whatever our trials are, the strength of the conflict lies between faith and unbelief.

Gather the Fragments.

12th mo. 31st, 1869.—An acquaintance related to me a remark made by his grandfather, John Tatum, probably many years before. When an old man he was in the course of some religious service, and dined, as I understood, at the house of the parents of an informant. On parting, the family said he supposed he would soon be with them again as the time for the convening of the Meeting for Sufferings was approaching. John spoke doubtfully, and thought his time of service was nearly over. As they seemed surprised he explained, that when at a meeting not long before, he had expressed a concern which did not seem to meet with much acceptance among his friends, and he found his mind little disturbed by the circumstance; and concluded that if such an occurrence could produce such an effect upon him, it was evidence of the weakness of advancing years and a warning not to be disregarded.

3d mo. 27th, 1870.—An anecdote was related of Abraham Griffith, a minister of Rollinson Meeting, which contained some instruction. When looking towards marrying, he felt some difficulty in deciding, to which of two women his addresses should be paid. One was rich and the other poor. He thought the poor woman was the one whom he ought to marry, but being tempted by the wealth of the other, passed by the lane leading to her house, concluding that if the rich one refused him, he would try the other. His suit was accepted and he married the rich woman who proved a thorn in his side. In riding up hill on horseback behind him, she would hold on by the hair of his head. He bore his domestic trials patiently, regarding them as of his own procuring, since he had married the wife of his own choosing, and not the one whom his Heavenly Father had pointed out.

11th mo. 1870.—A friend related an incident which had been mentioned by our late friend Thomas Evans, as an encouragement to those having charge of children to be faithful in the discharge of their duty in watching over and instructing them. Sometimes such labors are like bread cast on the water and "found after many days."

One of the scholars at Westtown School years ago, was a bad boy. After leaving school he was sent to sea, but was so troublesome on ship-board, that he was landed on a desolate island, and there left. Here he had an opportunity to reflect on his course of life and on the good instructions he had received, and the efforts of his friends for his welfare. He was led to repent of his sins. After time he was taken from the island by another vessel, and came home a changed man.

The person who gave me the narrative said that his father was acquainted with the person referred to.

The following anecdote of Christopher Healy was narrated by Nathaniel N. Stokes.

He was at a meeting in Richmond, Indiana, at a time when Henry Clay, John J. Crittenden, and Governor Moorhead of Kentucky, three noted politicians and statesmen, were in the city. They wished to attend a Friend meeting, and accordingly were present.

In the course of the meeting a concern spread over the mind of Christopher, and he arose with the words, "This world is not our home," and proceeded to address the audience at some length. Henry Clay and J. J. Crittenden nden sat in a very solid manner, but Moorhead appeared to be more unconcerned.

When the meeting closed, Clay arose, shook hands with Christopher, and expressed his satisfaction with the sermon, saying he should never forget the sentence—"This world is not our home."

Moorhead said there was not a man in all Kentucky that could cause such a solemnity at a meeting, as "that little white-haired man."

N. N. Stokes also spoke of a visit which Richard Jordan paid to Westfield Meeting, about the year 1825. It was a rainy morning, and Nathaniel had felt somewhat tempted to remain at home; but shaking off the suggestion, he put on his great coat and went through the woods. On entering the house he found no one there but Richard, who had come early, and he was greatly rejoiced that he had persevered.

After the meeting gathered, Richard arose and spoke on the divinity of our Saviour. Some of those present had imbibed Unitarian sentiments, and afterwards left the Society at the separation which followed. As Richard went on with his discourse, he was very close, and spoke of some there who were counting the blood of the covenant an unholy thing. Towards the close he addressed in very comforting language those who retained their truth and integrity, quoting the language of the prophet, "They that feared the Lord shall not be ashamed; and the Lord shall be remembered and heard of, and a book of remembrance was written before Him for them that feared the Lord and thought on his name. And they shall be mine, saith the Lord, that day when I make up my jewels, and will spare them as a man spareth his only son that serveth him."

The remembrance of this favored opportunity was evidently fresh on the mind of my friend, and he appeared to have a comforting hope, that at the end of his days, he would realize the fulfilment of the gracious promise.

A True Story of Florence Nightingale.

When the celebrated philanthropist, Florence Nightingale, was a little girl and living in Derbyshire, England, everybody was struck with her thoughtfulness for people and animals. She even made friends with the shy partridges. When persons were ill she would sit up nurse them, saving nice things from her own meals for them.

There lived near the village an old shepherd named Roger, who had a favorite sheep-dog called Cap. This dog was the old man's only companion, and helped in looking after the flock by day and kept him company at night. Cap was a very sensible dog, and kept the sheep in such good order that he saved his master a deal of trouble.

One day Florence was riding out with a friend, and saw the shepherd giving the sheep their night feed; but Cap was not there, and the sheep knew it, for they were scampering out in all directions. Florence and her friend stopped to ask Roger why he was so sad, and what had become of his dog.

"O," he replied, "Cap will never be of any more use to me; I'll have to hang him, poor fellow, as soon as I go home to-night."

"Hang him!" said Florence. "O Roger! how wicked of you. What has poor old Cap done?"

"He has done nothing," replied Roger, "but he will never be of any more use to me, and I cannot afford to keep him. One of the mischievous schoolboys threw a stone at him yesterday and broke one of his legs." And the old shepherd wiped away the tears which filled his eyes. "Poor Cap!" he said, "he was as knowing as a human being."

"But are you sure his leg is broken?" asked Florence.

"O! yes, miss, it is broken, sure enough; he has not put his foot to the ground since."

Then Florence and her friend rode on.

"We will go and see poor Cap," said the gentleman. "I don't believe the leg is really broken. It would take a big stone and a hard blow to break the leg of a great dog like Cap."

"O, if we could but cure him, how glad Roger would be!" exclaimed Florence.

When they got in the cottage the poor dog lay there on the bare brick floor, his hair disheveled and his eyes sparkling with anger at the intruders. But when the little girl called him "poor Cap" he grew pacified, and began to wag his short tail; then he crept from under the table and lay down at her feet. She took hold of one of his paws, patted his rough head, and talked to him while the gentleman examined the injured leg. It was badly swollen, and hurt him very much to have it examined; but the dog knew it was meant kindly, and, though he moaned and winced with pain, he licked the hands that were hurting him.

"It's only a bad bruise; no bones are broken," said the gentleman; "rest is all Cap needs; he will soon be well again."

"I am so glad!" exclaimed Florence. "But can we do nothing for him? He seems in such pain."

"Plenty of hot water to foment the part would both ease and help to cure him."

"Well, then," said the little girl, "I will foment poor Cap's leg."

Florence lighted the fire, tore up an old flannel petticoat into strips, which she wrung out in hot water and laid on the poor dog's bruise. It was not long before he began to feel the benefit of the application, and to show his gratitude in looks and wagging his tail. On their way home they met the old shepherd coming slowly along with a piece of rope in his hands.

"O Roger!" cried Florence, "you are not to hang poor old Cap. We have found that his leg is not broken after all."

"No, he will serve you yet," said the gentleman.

"Well, I am most glad to hear it," said the old man, "and many thanks to you for going to see him."

The next morning Florence was up early to bathe Cap. On visiting the dog she found the swelling much gone down. She bathed it again, and Cap was as grateful as before.

Two or three days later, when Florence and her friend were riding together, they came up to Roger and his sheep. Cap was there, too, watching the sheep. When he heard the voice of the little girl his tail wagged and his eyes sparkled.

"Do look at the dog, miss," said the shepherd, "he's so pleased to hear your voice. But for you I would have hanged the best dog I ever had in my life."—Youth's Temperance Banner.

Incidents and Reflections.

YOUTHFUL CHRISTIANS.

There are few things that bring more true pleasure to the heart of the sincere Christian, than to see those young in years bending their necks to the yoke of Christ; and becoming followers of the Saviour. He can rejoice over such, because he knows they have entered on the only path in life which leads to pure and unmixed felicity. It is sweet indeed to trace the dealings of the Lord with those who yield their hearts to Him in early life. Such are often made a blessing to others in a far higher degree than they themselves can know.

There are many witnesses to the truth, that the Grace of God which bringeth salvation, which is the Spirit of Christ our Redeemer shining in the heart, visits the minds of young children, causing them to fear their Creator, and pointing out what they must do and leave undone.

John Churchman thus relates his experience: "I early felt reproof for bad words and actions, yet knew not whence it came, until about the age of eight years, as I sat in a small meeting, the Lord by his heavenly love and goodness, overcame and tendered my heart, and by his glorious light discovered to me the knowledge of Himself. I saw myself and what I had been doing, and what it was which had reproved me for evil; and was made in the secret of my heart to confess that childhood and youth, and the foolish actions and words to which they are prone, are truly vanity. Yet, blessed forever be the name of the Lord! in his infinite mercy and goodness, He clearly informed me, that if I would mind the discoveries of his pure light for the future, what I had done in the time of my ignorance, He would wink at and forgive; and the stream of love which filled my heart with solid joy at that time, and lasted for many days, is beyond all expression."

Job Scott says: "I can well remember the serious impressions and contemplations which, at that early period of life, [ten years of age] and for some years before my mother's decease, attended my mind, as I sat in meeting with her and on my way home. I even had longing desires to become truly religious, and to serve and fear God, as Abraham, Isaac and Jacob did, and others that I read or heard of."

I am fully persuaded of the great advantage, and spiritual usefulness to children and others, resulting from frequent silent waiting on the Lord. I have seen lively and convincing evidence of it, even in children very young in years; and fully believe the impressions of Divine goodness have been such to their minds at some such seasons, even when there has not been a word uttered vocally, as have lastingly remained and powerfully tended to beget the true fear and love of God in their young and tender hearts. And oh! that parents were more generally concerned to do all they could towards leading their tender offspring into an early acquaintance with, and relish of Divine things; best learned, and most livingly and experimentally sealed upon the soul, in a state of silent introversion, and feeling after God.

Almost as early as I can remember anything, I can well remember the Lord's secret workings in my heart, by his grace or Holy Spirit; very sensibly bringing me under condemnation for my evil thoughts and actions, rudeness and bad words; (though not frequent in the use of them); disobedience to parents; inwardly wishing, in moments of anger, some evil to such as offended me; and such like childish and corrupt dispositions and practices; which over and beyond all outward instruction I was made sensible were evil, and sprang from a real root of evil in me."

Anna Shipton relates that when travelling in Italy, she stopped at a large hotel. She says: "Great was my astonishment in the evening, when I descended to the table d'hôte, to find a small table spread for me alone in a large and magnificent saloon, lighted by one solitary lamp and warmed by the faint flame of a wood-fire recently ignited.

The rain poured in torrents; the wind howled through the long corridors, and echoed through the solitary saloon, with its fresco paintings and gorgeous decorations.

At the close of my dinner, a lady in deep mourning, enveloped in a mantle and shawl, entered the room. Supposing from her appearance that she had just arrived in that tempestuous weather, I hastened to offer her the seat I had occupied, and stirred the pine wood into a cheerful blaze.

As the pale face of the stranger became lighted up by the kindling flame, I was struck by the deep dejection of her countenance, that told of some recent sorrow.

She was lately a widow, and now mourning an only child, a fair, promising daughter of seventeen, in the dawn of life's morning given to God. She had returned for the last time from the seminary where her education was completed, and the still youthful mother welcomed her companionship, to be no more interrupted; both had awaited this day with impatience.

On the first evening of her return, with her arm clasped around the waist of her mother, and her blooming face pillowed on her breast, the young daughter told forth her happiness. And then there was a long pause, as if some perplexing thought had entered her mind and shadowed the face that seemed to have known no cloud of care; and then she said slowly,

'Mother! - Are we Christians?'

'Yes,' replied the widow, a little startled at the earnest tone of the question, 'Christians! Yes, I hope so.'

'Then,' continued the daughter, 'we do not live like Christians. We are just like other people. We take the same amusements, do the same things. If we are Christians, should we not live for Christ?'

These words from the lips of her child, who had never known the trials and sorrows of her own life, awakened in the mother new views of a future, which she had imagined was to be one of social enjoyment and cultivated talents. Mother and daughter took counsel together how Christians could serve Christ, and both personally desired to know how this new life could be lived.

They had not long to wait to know the way of God more perfectly. Fever broke out in the neighborhood, and the widow's only child was one of the first to sicken and fade.

It was the messenger of the Lord to prepare the way before Him. Six long, anxious weeks of hope and fear passed by for the mother, marked by an amount of heaven-taught wisdom in the child that I never before traced in one of her years,—so much of the trial and temptation more common to riper age was comprised in her experience. The Lord was moulding and maturing the young spirit for its eternal home.

'I only wish to live to serve Christ!' was the expression on her lips, whenever a dawn of hope brightened the heart of those who watched beside her. And the Lord heard it.

A lady left her own family of five children to help the mother to nurse her only child; and when remonstrated with on the danger and cruelty of incurring the risk of infection to her children, she meekly replied that she had obeyed the Lord in coming, and she trusted her children to his care, who bade her leave all to Him. Her family and herself were preserved from the fever. The words and example of this young disciple, 'whom Jesus loved,' were made instrumental in the religious awakening of the eldest son of her nurse and of several other persons.

A physician of great eminence, who was also a friend of her family, was called in to see her. She inquired of him if he thought she would recover. He replied that most assuredly she would. On which she reproved him with a sternness which startled him, telling him that he knew the falsehood that he had spoken; and with a power and clearness that came from the Holy Spirit's teaching alone, she set before him the Saviour whom he rejected, and the wisdom and power of God which he despised.

During these six weeks this girl of seventeen, with so little [outward] instruction in the things of God, but with a heart that longed to serve Him, lay down upon a bed of fever and suffering to accomplish the desire of her heart in ways she knew not; and died to live with and serve Christ forever, where neither tears nor death can come."

BLUE FLOWERS.

Selected.

You ask which flowers I love the best,
When spring calls forth her pretty train,
And each in pretty garments dressed,
She sends them forth o'er hill and plain?

Give me blue flowers
To grace my bowers,
"The perfect color"—heaven's own blue,
Meek violet,
In emerald set,
And glistening with the fragrant dew;
Or by the brook,
With downcast look,
The nodding harebell's fairy form
I love to see,
Where lowly she
Doth bend her head to meet the storm.

Blue flowers! Oh, give me fair blue flowers,
So pleadingly their azure eyes
Uplook to mine at morning hours,
Taking their color from the skies;
Of heaven they learn,
To heaven they turn
Their opening bells at break of day;
And heaven doth shed
On each fair head
A blessing on them where they lay—
A blessing meet,
For flowers so sweet,
A portion of her glory bright,
Our prayer should be,
Oh, thus may we
Be "clothed upon" with robes of light.

Let others boast of mansions bright,
Of power, or wealth, or fame;
Or seek ambition's giddy height,
To win an honored name;
Let all who choose take foreign tours,
And all who wish to roam;
But leave to me the sacred walls,
And sheltering roof of home.

CHRIST'S WAY OF BLESSING.

Selected

Oh! not in strange portentous way
Christ's miracles were wrought of old,
The common thing, the common clay
He touched and tintured, and straightway
It grew to glory manifold.

The barley loaves were daily bread,
Kneaded and mixed with usual skill;
No care was given, no spell was said,
But when the Lord had blessed, they fed
The multitude upon the hill.

The hemp was sown 'neath common sun,
Watered by common dews and rain,
Of which the fishers' nets were spun;
Nothing was prophesied or done
To mark it from the other grain.

Coarse, brawny hands let down the net
When the Lord spake and ordered so;
They hauled the meshes, heavy-wet,
Just as in other days, and set
Their backs to labor, bending low;

But quivering, leaping from the lake,
The marvellous, shining burdens rise,
Until the laden meshes break,
And all amazed, no man spake,
But gazed with wonder in his eyes.

So still, dear Lord, in every place
Thou standest by the toiling folk
With love and pity in thy face,
And givest of thy help and grace
To those who meekly bear the yoke.

Not by strange sudden change and spell,
Baffling and darkening nature's face;
Thou tak'st the things we know so well
And buildst there thy miracle—
The heavenly on the common-place.

The lives which seem so poor, so low,
The hearts which are so cramped and dull,
The baffled hopes, the impulse slow,
Thou takest, touchest all, and lo!
They blossom to the beautiful.

We need not wait for thunder-peal
Resounding from a mount of fire,
While round our daily paths we feel
Thy sweet love and thy power to heal
Working in us thy full desire.

LITTLE PATTERING FEET.

The dear little feet, oh! how busy,
From morning till night to and fro,
All over the house they are running,
Nor stopping to rest as they go.
Sometimes 'tis an errand for mamma,
Sometimes it is papa to meet;
Oh! who does not love it, the music
Of these little pattering feet.

To mothers o'er-burdened with labor,
And weary with watching and care,
It sometimes may seem that their music
Is more than a mother can bear.
But when the day's labors are over,
Then her's is a pleasure most sweet,
As she holds them and prays God to bless them,
These dear, little pattering feet.

But there are some homes oh, so lonely!
Which have been so happy before;
And there are some hearts which in anguish,
Refuse to be comforted more.
They listen in vain for the music,
So welcome to them and so sweet,
In their homes they shall never more hear it,
For gone are the pattering feet.

For Jesus who loves little children,
Has called to that "beautiful shore,"
Many dear ones, and safe in his presence
Their little feet weary no more.

To pass through life without sorrow would naturally speaking be good; but patiently to bear sorrow, and profit by it, is still better; the former is a temporary good, the latter eternal.

The Dress Parade at West Point.

BY JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

It was with a feeling akin to pain, that I read in a letter from West Point recently printed in the Episcopal Recorder, this expression concerning the dress parade at that place, that "there is no more beautiful sight in art or nature" than the display referred to. As our journal has not unfrequently dwelt in terms of dispraise and horror upon engagements in, and preparations for war, I trust that nothing may go out from it calculated to diminish the force of its hitherto expressed testimony against the barbarous practice. I believe it will not be out of place here to consist, in two extracts from the life of the late shop Cummins, the merely mental enthusiasm which such a spectacle as a dress parade excites, with that settled horror which grows from acquaintance with war, and an apprehension of its baneful accompaniments and consequences may engender.

When George D. Cummins was a young man, under thirty years of age, (it being the year 1851,) he was requested to deliver the annual address before the Cadets' Bible Society at the Virginia Military Institute, at Lexington. In a letter written from the spot, he writes:

"(Bishop Meade's) home is near the Institute, and by the lawn where the cadets parade drill. This is very interesting. Both evenings I have been here they have had a drill of flying artillery, and the rapid firing of a cannon is very beautiful. This evening they are to have a battalion drill of the whole corps, and it is said to be a very fine sight. My address is to be delivered at eight o'clock to-night in the Episcopal Church."

In 1864, however, the civil war was nearing its close, but its pernicious results upon society becoming each year more and more apparent to the observant mind, he speaks in a strain which makes it evident that the sad lessons of the time were not lost upon himself; they were rather applied to his spiritual refinement.

"As my life advances," he says, "I feel more profoundly than ever, the utter worthlessness and hollowness of a life of worldliness, and the unspeakable blessedness of a life whose contents are all in Christ—a life of separateness from the world, of an earnest following of Jesus, and of daily growing more like Him. I think the sad discipline of events around us in the past three years has contributed to increase this feeling in me. The prevalence of war and all its horrors—the change in our country to one who has seen it so different—the new aspects of society—the repulsiveness of many social features of our day, all help to open my longing for something better, purer, holier than earth."

When I was last upon the parade-ground at West Point, two or three summers ago, my little boy of nine years, who was with me, was naturally disposed to linger that he might witness the brilliant evolutions of the cadets. I briefly told him why I thought we had better pass on. So, when the youngest son of the excellent Leigh Richmond, inspired by the glitter and show of a military parade, manifested his preference for a soldier's life, the father expressed his dissent in the strongest terms. "Anything but this," said he, "anything but this—the very mention of a military drill fills me with horror; I cannot bear to think of a child of mine engaging in scenes of bloodshed and destruction. No consideration on earth could extort my consent." And to his eldest daughter he wrote: "There is a subject which often hangs heavy on my spirits,—I mean my poor dear T——'s inclination for a military life. Hating war as I do from my very heart, convinced as I am of the inconsistency of it with real Christianity, and looking on the profession of arms as irreconcilable with the principles of the Gospel, I should mourn greatly if one of my boys chose so cruel, and generally speaking, so profligate a line of life. I could never consent to it, on conscientious grounds, and therefore wish this bias for the profession of arms to be discouraged. I dislike and oppose it with my whole heart."

Whilst I do not forget my own feelings of delight and exhilaration, as a lad, in witnessing with all its 'pomp and circumstance' the soldiers' march, yet I do confess that the Spirit of my God has brought me to a better mind upon the subject, and that now to behold a parade of the military—especially when participated in by the orphan-pupils of a Girard College or Soldiers' Home—will bring moistened eyes, and quivering lips, and an averted face.

I do not deny that Christian men may have been soldiers, but can there be any question that the profession of arms is an occupation which the followers of Him who defended not Himself with the legions which He could have called, and who said that "my kingdom is not of this world, else would my servants fight," are enjoined to come out of. The primitive Christians of the first three centuries saw it so, and one of those best known to us (Tertullian), writing upon the unlawfulness of the military pursuit, pointedly says that "when a man has become a believer, and faith has been sealed, there must either be an immediate abandonment of it, which has been the course with many, or all sorts of quibbling will have to be resorted to in order to avoid offending God."

Strong language indeed was that used by "Fighting Joe Hooker" to Dr. Prime, when the latter spoke of the reconcilability in some cases, of war and Christianity. The General said, with emphasis: "The truth is, a man cannot be good and be a fighting man. He must have the devil in him. To kill one another, men must have their blood up, and then they are just like devils." And herein the hero of Lookout Mountain and Missionary Ridge but echoed the sentiment of the first Napoleon, that "war is the business of barbarians," and of the Duke of Wellington, that "men who have nice notions of religion have no business to be soldiers." Ought we not therefore to unite with the conclusion of the editor of the Boston Christian, who, after referring to the vehement expression of Sir Charles Napier, in the midst of his triumphs in India—"Accursed war! May I never see another shot fired!"—aptly says: "What have Christians to do with such cruelties and crimes against humanity and against the God of peace?"

In conclusion, I have remembered those last plaintive words of the lamented Hedley Vicars, when, fatally wounded beneath the tower of the Malakoff, and carried away from the field of blood, he faintly exclaimed—"Cover my face! Cover my face!" We know not the revelation of those last awful moments in the young soldier's ebbing life, but we may well believe that the penitent thought came powerfully to mind: Had he, and these comrades of his, and those, his enemies, observed the command of the Lord Jesus Christ, to love one another? And had not this same Lord instructed his disciples how they, and all others after them who called Him Master, should effectually conquer their enemies? Coming like a flood to the remembrance of the dying soldier, whilst the roar of cannon and the rattle of musketry mingle with the curses of the combatants, and the moans of the wounded and dying, how appropriate then this last request to his carriers—"Cover my face! Cover my face!"—Episcopal Recorder.

Look to Your Influence.—At the close of a recent General Assembly the mother of a grown-up family, whose home had been opened for the entertainment of guests during the Assembly, exclaimed sorrowfully: "I have had such a bitter disappointment. I voluntarily deprived myself of the privilege of attending most of the meetings in order that I might have four ministers of the gospel at my table these two weeks, hoping that my oldest son, who has grown skeptical these later years, might be brought under their godly influence; that their words, their example and their prayers might convince his heart, when arguments had failed to convince his head. But instead of any such result, he has been driven farther away from the truth than ever before, such was the faculty of these ministers for turning all proceedings of the Assembly into ridicule, such their uncharitable remarks and criticisms, such their levity and silly nonsense. My children were simply disgusted, and my poor Charlie said to me this morning, when the door had closed upon the last of our ministerial guests: 'Mother, I have been taught in the Scriptures from my youth up, as you have good reason to know, and I am well informed as to what a professing Christian should be. I have listened to the conversation of these Reverends and D. D.'s three hours each day for two weeks, and I am more than ever confirmed in my unbelief. I have no desire to have any part or lot with such professors, much less to be one of such ministers of the gospel. Skeptic as I am, I would not speak of my mother's church, nor make light of sacred things, as I have heard these men do.'"

Hannah More once said of Wilberforce: "It is impossible to spend an hour in the society of that man and not be the better for it." Let us make sure that the homes we enter shall be the better for our having been in them; that some at least of the children in these homes may look back in after years from honored positions in the Church, and find the date of the turning point in their history coincident with the time of our temporary abode beneath their parent's roof.—Selected.

Were the Ancient Hebrews Left-handed?—Dr. Erlenmeyer has just given an interesting and learned lecture to prove that the ancient Hebrews were a left-handed people. Most of the Aryan people, as we know, write from the left to the right of a sheet of paper, and their books are so printed as to be read in this direction. Most of the Semitic people, on the contrary, write from the right to the left of the paper. Hitherto this very emphatic difference has been simply represented to be a mere characteristic of habit, kept up by the reverence for tradition which is so deeply rooted in the Semitic mind. It has never occurred to any one, so far as we know, that the direction taken by the hand of a Semitic scribe in writing was due to a physiological cause, namely, to the fact that his left hand was his better hand, and was much more ready and "dexterous" than the hand which we Aryans call the dexter.

Dr. Erlenmeyer insists that the writers of the Old Testament, and probably the early Talmudists after them, naturally wrote with their left hands, and would have found it difficult, if not impossible, to write with the other hand. Hence it was only natural that manuscript should travel along a line which started from the right and ended on the left. Dr. Erlenmeyer says that this hypothesis is not a mere happy thought of his own, but that he has found striking confirmation of the theory in the Talmud. For instance, he cites a passage which insists that certain special prayers and inscriptions are always to be written with the right hand, and not with the left. The execution of this exceptional prescription was a work of time, patience, and difficulty, and it is implied that the process of writing with the right hand was a departure from the ordinary, easy and natural way of writing. The learned doctor also cites passages from the Hebrew of the Old Testament in which a particular stress seems to him to be laid upon the "left-handedness" of the old Hebrews. Jacob and Job, he says, preferred to give the pre-eminent benediction with the left hand instead of the right. Jacob, "knowingly and deliberately," laid his left hand upon the head of his eldest grand-child. —London Echo.

If we neglect a proper care of our bodies, disorders will hurt them; if we omit to seek for spiritual nourishment, our souls will be in danger of perishing; and if we exercise not our reason, to cultivate and improve our natural understandings, to form us and our manners so as to be pleasing and profitable members of society, our spirits may in our progress through life, contract dispositions which, in course of time, may be inveterate and hard to be removed; dispositions which will much disqualify us for fulfilling our several departments in life with propriety, and with ease and satisfaction to ourselves and others. —Richard Shackleton.

Every believer, while on earth, in his several calling, is an ambassador for Christ, though not called to the ministry. He has something of his Master's character and interest to maintain. He derives his supplies, his supports, his instructions, from above: and his great charge and care should be to be faithful to his commission, and every other care he may confidently cast upon the Lord to whom he belongs. In this sense we are to take the state upon ourselves, to remember our dignity, and not to stoop to a conformity to the poor world among whom we live; we are neither to imitate their customs, nor regard their maxims, nor speak their language, nor desire their honors or their favors, nor fear their frowns; for the Lord whom we serve has engaged to maintain and protect us, and has given us his instructions, to which it is both our duty and our honor to conform.

An East Wind in the East.—H. H. Jessup, writes from Beirut to the Christian Weekly as follows:

"Have you ever thought what is meant in the Bible by an 'east wind?' Had you been here last week, you would have learned all about it by bitter experience. No wonder that Jonah's head was scorched by it. In the Arabic version we read (Jonah iv. 8:) 'And it happened at the rising of the sun that God prepared a hot east wind and the sun smote on Jonah's head, and he wilted and he asked death for himself and he said, My death is better than my life.'

"An east wind began to rage here on Wednesday, August 22nd. A deadening and oppressive heat settled over the land. The next two days it grew more intense. The air was dry and hot as the breath of a furnace. The birds sat motionless in the thick trees. The green leaves of the fig trees grew crisp and dropped to the ground. Book-covers curled up as though they were being held by a coal grate. Doors, bureaus, and tables cracked with a loud noise, and warped with heat. Even the wooden ceilings cracked as if the boards were in agony. Men and beasts panted as if gasping for breath and parched for want of water. Our children awoke almost every hour of the night, calling for cold water.

"I have rarely enjoyed anything more than I did the sight of a great flock of sparrows, driven by thirst to our yard, where there is a long trough of water. They plunged in, drank and drank again, flew around and fairly exulted with delight at finding in this arid mountain and on such a day an abundance of water. A huge centipede plunged into our washbowl to slake his thirst, and although obliged to dispatch him for fear of his injuring some one of the family, I could not help allowing him to live long enough to enjoy the luxury of a draught of cool water. Writing was almost impossible, as the ink dried on the pen between the inkstand and the paper.

"I had to ride four miles on horseback during the heat. Returning after sunset, I met — Bliss just coming up from Beirut. His first question was, 'Is anybody left alive on the mountain?' The heat in Beirut exceeded anything in the memory of the oldest inhabitant. No wonder Jonah wilted. Thousands of Syrians 'wilted' on Friday, and I doubt not many said in thought if not in words; 'My death is better than my life' if this east wind continues."

Animal Remains in the Coal Measures.—An examination of some of the stumps of trees found in the coal measures of Nova Scotia has shown a number of species of fossil frogs, snails and insects entombed in them.

Nitrate of Silver is sometimes used as a remedy in epilepsy, and when used for a considerable time the skin becomes of a peculiar bluish color. This color has sometimes become permanent.

Manufacture of Canes.—Many are of imported wood, some from the tropics, China and the East Indies. The Whongee canes from China are the stems of a species of gigantic grass closely allied to the bamboo. The orange and lemon are highly prized and are imported chiefly from the West Indies. Myrtle sticks are imported from Algeria. The Rajah stick is the stem of a Borneo palm, and takes its name from the fact that the Rajah will not let any go out of the country without paying a heavy duty. The palm canes are more or less angular and are the leaf-stalks of the date palm. The Malacca canes are the stems of a slender climbing palm.

Many imported sticks have to go through a process of straightening by mechanical means. They are buried in hot sand till they become pliable; then the workman bends them in the direction opposite to its natural bend and so straightens it. To make the crook curl for the handles, one end of the cane is firmly placed in a vise, and a stream of fire from a gas pipe is poured on the part to be bent. When sufficient heat has been applied the cane is pulled slowly and gradually round till the hook is formed. An additional application of heat then serves to bake and permanently fix the curl. —Scientific American.

Defective Vision Among Weavers.—It is the business of a weaver to keep his eye upon the work. The shuttle does not require his attention, still the eye, when on the cloth, cannot help following it. The sley moves at right angles, and the eye naturally takes in this motion also. These two motions struggle with each other in their effect upon the eye and produce an unnatural strain which weakens. Let anyone not accustomed to this try to follow the objects near the roadside which he passes in a railway train. He will find it most fatiguing to the eye. The average speed of a railway train is about 20 miles an hour, and a shuttle in a calico loom runs at the rate of 10 miles an hour—but then the objects passed in a railway train are larger and at a greater distance.

It is the suddenness of the motion which tires the nerves, and this is of course increased with the greater velocity of the loom. A hand loom weaver with 60 picks in a minute has not nearly the strain on his eyes which a power loom weaver has with 200 picks in a minute. —The Textile Manufacturer.

Corrosion of Iron.—Iron set in sulphur is frequently corroded owing to the presence of commercial sulphur of small portions of sulphuric acids produced during sublimation of the sulphur. In the joint presence of moisture and acids corrosion takes place. The carbonic acid gas of the air acts upon it, and as this and the moisture are always present in the air, iron so exposed is always affected more or less by rusting. Wet coal ashes corrode iron very rapidly.

A manufacturer of fine cutlery found at one time a large portion of his goods being returned to him as in damaged condition. Instead of the bright, clean surfaces for which such articles are noted, he found rusty, deeply oxidized blades. After much anxiety and watching to determine the cause, whether it was damp paper, the ill-will of some of his agents, or other cause, it was located upon the man who sorted and wrapped the knives in packages. Everything he touched was found to rust, from the peculiar acid character of his skin exhalations.

Similarly, it is well known that some persons cannot carry pocket-knives or bright iron articles, as keys, &c., about their persons without their becoming very rusty.

The rusting of iron proceeds with great rapidity after it has once commenced, because the rust of iron is a ready absorber of moisture and gases, and it thus constantly conveys elements of destruction into the yet un-aged metal. It is to this fact that the difference in the rusting of used and unused rails, machinery and tools is due.

Sympathy in a Dog.—The following touch-narrative is from the pen of a lady.

Some years ago we possessed a large watchdog, a mastiff, who, when he became old, was waded the free range of the garden. We had a little skye terrier, whom he took to his especial charge, walking with her, apparently showing her the various walks, over beds, &c. She had, unfortunately, one at vault, i. e., chasing the cat, who was a pet. On one occasion she was taken to the act, and her master was administering little castigation; whereupon the mastiff crept up quietly to his master, and took his arm in his mouth, not offering to bite, asking him to withhold the coming stroke.
 The successor to this dog was a still more remarkable animal, belonging to the St. Bernard breed. She was with us during a season of bitter bereavement. Her own altered looks, quiet and sad demeanor, told how truly she shared in the prevailing sorrow. For many weeks she never entered the house (except the kitchen), but would often look fully up to the windows. At length, when she did venture into the dining-room, she rarely walked direct to the well-known chair, finding it vacant, with saddened look crept away and left the room.

Time rolled on, her visits to the house were renewed, and then it was that her sympathetic qualities were so touchingly discovered. She seemed to realize the change that had passed over us. She noticed our indications of sorrow when we thought that we were sleeping, and, leaving the spot where we were lying, she would offer us her paw with an expression of countenance which told itself felt.

On more than one occasion she rose spontaneously from the warm rug, and, with a look which conveyed as impressively as words could do the sympathy which she felt, she pressed her beautiful flaxen breast on the lap of the lonely one, clasped her in her arms, and licked the tear-bedewed cheeks."

I knew a case where a dog belonged to a large family, and, as will be the case in families, one of the children occasionally got into disgrace, and was punished. Whenever this happened, "Flo" was sure to find out the offending child, and, by licking its face and giving many caresses, would show her sympathy.—J. G. Wood.

The Spices We Buy.—Those spices like nut-mugs, cloves, stick cinnamon, mace and allspice, which we buy by weight, and in the manner in which they are gathered, are not entirely capable of adulteration. But there is a certain deception to be guarded against.
 Inferior or cheaper quality of the same,
 or of a similar kind of spice, may be mixed with or substituted for better or more costly ones, without any corresponding diminution of price. For instance, wild nutmegs are sold with cultivated ones, bearing about the same relations to the best qualities that the wild apple does to a fine Baldwin. It is the same with mace and cloves, while cassia is substituted for cinnamon, so that it is almost impossible to find stick cinnamon that is not mixed with cassia. To learn to know genuine spices with certainty is our only safeguard. Then, if we choose to buy cassia, we shall do it with our eyes open, and without paying the price of the delicate and costly cinnamon. The weight of good nutmegs should be nearly seven to the ounce, grocers' weight. Very fine ones weigh eighty and one hundred to the pound, or five or six to the ounce. If pricked with a pin, the oil exudes visibly, and the pin also penetrates readily. Wild nutmegs are small and pointed.

 They are inferior in the amount of oil and in the general fragrance.

The best cinnamon comes from Ceylon. It is the bark of a tree of the laurel family, which gives us, even in this temperate climate,
 such plants as our sassafras and our spice-bush. The trees are topped like osier willows, and the cinnamon used is the bark from the young shoots, which form the bush at the top of the tree. It is cut twice a year. A tract not more than a quarter of a mile square forms the great cinnamon orchard of Ceylon.
 No other countries produce so fine a quality, or so great a quantity, as the fertile and silicious tracts of Ceylon, and the neighboring islands. The character of true cinnamon is the splintery, fibrous quality of it. It tears, rather than breaks, and is in small, thin rolls.
 The taste is sweet and spicy, and it retains its flavor long in the month. Cassia or Chinese cinnamon is used to mix with it, being cheap and abundant. It is coarser and in thicker rolls. It breaks readily, but does not tear, and if chewed is granular and mucilaginous.
 It lacks the delicate, sweet taste and smell of cinnamon, having a peculiar woody, strong flavor of its own.

In ground spices, as a rule, we find much reason for dissatisfaction. Their only merit now is convenience, not quality. Nutmegs, mace and cloves are so oily that to grind them easily, some absorbent like sawdust or starch is added, and this becomes a part of the ground spice as the first step, whatever may be added later. There is, however, but little demand for ground nutmeg, American housekeepers having the good sense to prefer the whole nuts.

Twelve specimens of cinnamon were examined. Only three of these contained any cinnamon at all. Even these were mixed with cassia and sawdust. The other nine were cassia and sawdust, mahogany sawdust being distinctly identified in some of them.
 Three specimens of cassia were examined.
 Two contained a very little cassia and a great deal of sawdust, but the third was nothing but sawdust, there being no trace of any spice in it.

It was quite a pleasure after this to take up ginger and find it so comparatively good.
 Of the twenty-eight specimens only seven (or twenty-five per cent.) were adulterated.
 Three of these were adulterated with starch and turmeric, one with starch and mustard husks, one with turmeric, and two with starch only. The remaining twenty-one varied in color from a tawny white to brown, but were all fragrant and good, and some excellent.
 None were at all yellow, except the four to which turmeric had been added. The difference in color is owing simply to the preparation. The fleshy roots are scraped of the bark, as in whole white ginger root or the preserved ginger. Then the ground ginger is quite light in color. If the bark is left on, the ginger is brown when ground. In whole ginger there is often a coating upon the roots.
 This is only lime, into which they have been dipped to protect them from insects. Nut-mugs are imported packed in lime for the same reason.—N. E. Farmer.

True contentment is absolutely essential to happiness. There is a plant called selfishness, and if you will pull it up by its roots, you will find that it grows in the soil of misery. Were self completely renounced, and Christ fully received as all in all, sorrow would be so sweetly accepted by us that the sting of it would be taken away. We must be satisfied with what God appoints, or else we shall be constantly the prey of discomfort, and the victims of disappointment. O Christian men and women, will ye not seek to be content with such things as ye have?—

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 14, 1883.

A letter from a distant correspondent asks whether a member of the Society of Friends can in harmony with his profession sue at law for damages for injury to his character through false charges. There is nothing in the letter to indicate whether this is simply an abstract question, on which our correspondent is desirous of having his opinions settled by comparison with the sentiments of others; or whether it has reference to any case which has arisen,—and it is satisfactory to us that the question is so stated—for it is difficult for any of us, however well-intentioned, to arrive at correct conclusions where our sympathies or interests are involved.

The general principle adopted by the Society of Friends in all cases where one person feels himself wronged by another in any way, is that laid down by our Saviour for the guidance of his followers: "If thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone; if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother. But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that, in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established," &c. It is one of the duties of the overseers, who are under appointment in every Monthly Meeting, to attend to such cases, and to heal the breaches that might otherwise widen, and might disturb the peace of individuals and of meetings. If the offender is convinced of his error, and willing to make suitable acknowledgment for the injury committed; then he should be forgiven for what he has done, in accordance with the commands of our Saviour. The exacting of a pecuniary fine does not seem consistent with that free and full forgiveness which every one of us needs at the hands of our Heavenly Father for our violations of his laws—nor is it favored by such texts as the following:
 "If ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again."

As long ago as 1710, a provision was introduced into the Discipline, prohibiting Friends from entering suits at law against their fellow-members, except in cases where it might seem necessary to the overseers or other solid and judicious friends of the meeting to which the latter belonged. This rule was founded on the principle, that it was one of the duties of the Church to settle disputes among its members, and the duty of members to submit to its decisions, without the exposure and scandal resulting from the publicity of legal proceedings.

Where the offending party is not a member of our Society, and therefore not subject to its discipline, the Friend who is wronged has the right to claim the protection of the courts of law; and, in cases of slander, to demand a legal investigation which may establish his innocence of the charges circulated against him. But this right is one that ought to be cautiously exercised. If the recourse to legal action is stimulated by a feeling of resentment for real or fancied wrong, the effect is almost certain to be injurious to the person who indulges this feeling—for it is inconsistent with the Spirit of the Redeemer, which breathes good-will to all, even to those who have injured us, and inspired the commands, "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 7th instant a conference was held between the Secretaries of War and of the Interior, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and General Crook. It was decided that "the Apache Indians recently captured by General Crook, and all such as may be hereafter captured or may surrender themselves to him, shall be kept under the control of the War Department at such points on the San Carlos Reservation as may be determined by the War Department (but not at the agency without the consent of the Indian Agent), to be fed and cared for by the War Department until further orders. For the greater security of the people of Arizona and to ensure peace, the War Department shall be entrusted with the entire police control of all the Indians on the San Carlos Reservation, and charged with the duty of keeping the peace on the reservation and preventing the Indians from leaving it except with the consent of General Crook or the officers who may be authorized to act under him."

Chief Moses and Sar-Sop-kin, of the Columbia Reservation, and Tomaskat Lot, of the Colville Reservation, have had a conference with Secretary Teller and Indian Commissioner Price. Tomaskat requested that there be constructed upon the Colville Reservation a saw and grist mill, a boarding school to be established at Buonaparte Creek, to accommodate 100 pupils, and a physician to reside with them.

Sar-Sop-kin asked to be allowed to remain on the Columbia Reservation, where he now lives, and to be protected in his rights as a settler, or to remove to the Colville Reservation if he so desires. In case he so removes and relinquishes all his claims on the Columbia Reservation, to have a hundred head of cattle for himself and his people. The Secretary agreed to comply with these requests provided Congress shall make sufficient appropriations. The Secretary also agreed to ask Congress to make appropriations to enable him to purchase for Chief Moses a sufficient number of cows to furnish each of his band with two cows: to build a dwelling-house for Chief Moses at a cost of not less than $1000; to erect a building and maintain a school therein; to construct the saw and grist mill asked for as soon as it shall be required for use, and to furnish each head of a family or male adult person with one wagon, one double set of harness, one grain cradle, one plow, one harrow, one scythe, six hoes, and such other agricultural implements as may be necessary. All this on condition that Chief Moses shall remove to the Colville reservation, and relinquish all claim upon the Government for any land situate elsewhere.

The Secretary further agreed that, if Moses and his people shall keep this agreement faithfully, he is to be paid in cash, in addition to all the above, $600 per annum during his life. This agreement is, of course, conditional upon Congress making the necessary appropriations, and Chief Moses will not be required to move to the Colville Reservation until the appropriations have been made. The Indians expressed themselves entirely satisfied with the result of their conference.

A telegram from the City of Mexico says the treaty between the United States and Mexico, providing that no troops of either country shall cross into the other in pursuit of Indians has been "prorogued" for one year.

The New York Commercial and Financial Chronicle says that this year's cotton crop will be the greatest ever yet produced in the South. It is estimated at 7,100,000 bales, which is more than 1,600,000 bales larger than the crop of last year, and half a million larger than that of 1880-81, the largest hitherto recorded. The present crop, while 30 per cent. larger than that of the preceding season, is produced from an acreage 1.55 per cent. less, the plant of 1882-83 having been 16,590,000 acres and that of 1881-82, 16,851,000. This great difference in yield is attributed to the fact that the season of 1881-82 was exceptionally disastrous to cotton culture, while that of 1882-83 was unusually favorable. The Chronicle's estimate of the acreage of the crop just planted—that is, the crop of 1883-84—is 17,449,000 acres, which is the largest yet reported.

The Supreme Court of Missouri has decided that the High License law passed by the last Legislature of that State is constitutional, and applies to St. Louis as well as other parts of the State.

Great forest fires are reported south of Kalama, Oregon; the losses already are estimated at $200,000. At Oak Point, six miles of railroad and two locomotives have been destroyed.

The Illinois State Entomologist reports that vast numbers of the Hessian fly are now in a dormant condition so low down in the stalk that they are left behind in the stubble when the wheat is cut. This is true of the entire winter wheat region of Illinois. He advises that the stubble be burned at the earliest date possible, or else the infested fields be ploughed deeply and rolled.

The receipts of mackerel at Gloucester, Massachusetts, this season, are 50 per cent. less than last season. The receipts of codfish during the last six months exceeded by over 1,000,000 pounds those of the corresponding season of 1882, while the receipts of halibut have been 1,500,000 pounds below the average.

As was to be expected, the mortality in New York last week shows a very heavy increase, the total deaths being 1051, against 716 the week previous, and of the former 672 were children under five years of age. This is a sad record, but in view of the severe and prolonged heat it can hardly excite surprise.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 504, which was 74 more than during the previous week, and 215 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number, 257 were males; 245 females, and 234 under two years of age: 101 died of cholera infantum; 39 of consumption; 27 of marasmus; 19 of old age; 17 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 14 of scarlet fever, and 10 of diphtheria.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 103½; 3½'s, 103½; 4½'s, 113; 4's, 119½; currency 6's, 128 a 132.

Cotton.—There was very little movement, but prices remain about the same as last quoted. Sales of midlings are reported at 10½ a 11 cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ a 7¾ cts. for export, and 8½ a 8¾ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour.—The demand continues limited, but prices were unchanged. Sales of 1800 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5 a $6.12½; Pennsylvania family at $4.87½ a $5; western do. at $5.62 a $6.20, and patents at $6.25 a $7.25. Rye flour is dull at $3.50 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is 1c. higher. Sales of 3700 bushels red in car lots at $1.07 a $1.17. Rye is nominal. Corn.—Car lots are in fair demand and steady. Futures are higher. Sales of 8500 bushels in lots at 50 a 62 cts. Oats are higher. Sales of 9000 bushels in lots at 40 a 45 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 7th mo. 7th, 1883. — Loads of hay, 144; loads of straw, 21. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1 a $1.10 per 100 pounds; mixed, 90 cts. a $1 per 100 pounds; straw, 70 a 80 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were dull and prices were a fraction lower: 4700 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4½ a 6½ cts. per lb., the latter rate for a few extra.

Sheep were dull and lower: 16,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3½ a 5½ cts. and lambs at 4 a 9 cts. per lb., as to condition.

Hogs were dull and unsettled: 3700 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 8½ a 9½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—The steamship Daphne was launched at Glasgow, on the 3d instant. During this operation she fell over on her side, precipitating a number of people in the water. It is estimated that 150 persons were drowned. The Daphne turned upside down before sinking. Many persons on board swam ashore, and the great mortality is attributed to the large number workmen and others who were in the hold.

The returns issued by the Board of Trade show that during the 6th month British imports increased, compared with that month in last year, by £5,200,000, that the exports decreased during the same period £83,000.

The Post says, De Lesseps has made a satisfactory arrangement with the British Government in the matter of the Suez Canal.

Judge O'Brien, in addressing the Grand Jury Limerick, declared that the diminution in the number of outrages since the last Assizes amounted to a social revolution.

The decision of the Home Government to repudiate the proposed annexation of New Guinea to Queensland has caused discontent at the latter place. Premier McIlwraith has stated in the Legislative Assembly that Queensland will do her utmost to effect the wishes of the colonies. In the Legislative Assembly at Melbourne the Premier of Victoria declined to accept the decision as final.

It is stated that a treaty has been concluded between Persia and Russia, settling the frontier as far as Afghanistan, and providing that if England protests against it Persia shall refer her to Russia.

Heavy floods have prevailed in Surat, India, causing great damage to property and some loss of life. The waters are now subsiding. Traffic on the railways interrupted. Five hundred houses have fallen at Surat. Many villages have been destroyed by the floods, and thousands of people are homeless.

More than one thousand deaths from cholera are reported for the week ending on First-day last in Egypt. About three-fifths of the number occurred in Damietta. The sanitary cordon around this city stretches in a circle fifteen miles in circumference. The Lazaretto Beyrout is crowded with fugitives from Egypt. The officers of the institution refuse to admit any more prisoners. It is reported in Cairo, that a yacht is being prepared and will be held in readiness to take the Khedive to Naples in the event of the spread of cholera making his departure necessary.

On the 9th instant it was stated that provisions laid out at Damietta, and the people were starving. A number of European residents made an attempt to break the cordon around the town, and several were wounded.

According to advices from Behera, Egypt, the cholera plague has ended with the death of all the cattle in the district. The cotton worm is now doing great damage there.

Advices from Venezuela state that locusts are making havoc in many parts of the country. They have reached Puerto Cabello, Valencia and inland districts on the same longitude. In one night all the vegetation in the neighborhood of Moron was destroyed. It is feared they will soon reach the fertile valleys of Caracas.

The volcano on the Island of Ometepe, in Nicaragua, which has been smoking for some time now reported in active eruption. The inhabitants are leaving the island.

Cajame, Chief of the Yoqui Indians, in Mexico, was assassinated on Fourth-day, last week. It is believed that his death "throws all the rich lands and mines of the Yoqui River district) open to the white men."

To M. Comfort.*

"Millville, 1st mo. 24th, 1839.

Dear brother M.—In allusion to E. Robson and her husband, I can now say, that so far I have seen of her movements, they appear to be under right influence; and I trust her spiritual labors may be beneficial to the church. Her deportment is solid and serious, being very careful of her words that they may be pure and savory. She is also watchful over her own spirit, in becoming humility and fear. I have been glad to feel with and for her; and to experience unity with her, I trust, in that which is unchangeable; and have been, I hope, benefitted by her services among us. Alluding to a visit of — in this country (at that time) he says: I fear that in many places great inroads will be made, especially on the minds of the young and unstable, whereby the simplicity of our Christian profession will come to be despised, and a disposition creep in to set up the devices of men instead of the Spirit of truth, as the standard of substance of true and vital religion.

I have felt of late a very fervent desire that as well as all others who have been favored to see this snare of the enemy set for our Society, may experience a renewed engagement of mind, not only to maintain the Truth in purity, but more and more to fulfil in our individual capacity all those duties which are laid for at our hands; and that we may go forth by our humble watchful walking, that we are not only engaged for the support of the principles of truth, as a Society, but that we are intent upon having the Lord's standard exalted in our own hearts, subduing every unsanctified propensity, and leading us forward, under the cross, to victory over sin, and to the attainment of 'the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.'

Affectionately thy brother, W. S."

Moses Comfort, an esteemed member and elder of the Monthly Meeting, Bucks Co., Penna., deceased 1st of 3d month, 1870, in the 74th year of his age. Elizabeth Robson, a minister, with her husband Thomas Robson, an elder, as companion, arrived in this country on her second visit of gospel love, about the of the Twelfth month, 1838; remaining near 3½ yrs. She died the 11th of 12th mo. 1843, aged 73. obituary notice and testimony concerning her, see "The Friend," vol. xvii. pp. 144 and 152.

To M. M. Sheppard.*

"Millville, 3d mo. 7th, 1839.

My dear friend,—My mind has been so much affected since parting with thyself and brother to-day, with feelings of sweetness, and with something of that which unites in the one bond that, though a little out of the usual way, I have felt a strong inclination to communicate of what I have felt, if so be it may tend to our mutual encouragement in that which is good, and to the strengthening the bonds of Christian fellowship. 'If we walk in the light as God is in the light, we have fellowship one with another,' is the precious testimony of one of the apostles, and well comports with the declaration of our Saviour:—'By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another.' I can truly say, I feel a fervent and affectionate desire that this kind of feeling may more and more prevail among the members of our religious Society: that we may be truly united together in the bond of peace; and that making the profession we do, we may know our fellowship to be with the Father and with his Son, Jesus Christ. Are we not as a people, making a profession of love and unity, and yet in great measure, destitute of that which enables to salute one another as fellow travellers and pilgrims in that heavenly highway, which the vulture's eye hath not seen, nor the lion's whelp gone up thereon? Are we not dwelling too much as in the outward court, unwilling to be stripped of that in which we glory, and to come to the footstool of Him who is able to invest us with robes of righteousness, and in the abasement of self, to appear as a crown of glory and as a diadem of beauty unto us? Is it not because of this that our religious meetings, instead of being times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord, are often found to be seasons of sorrow and mourning to the right minded, and greatly barren of that kind of feeling which is as incense before the throne?

O! it is a precious thing to feel a little evidence in ourselves of being united to Him, the Holy Head, and to partake of the living virtue which flows from Him into every member of his body, let that member be ever so small or insignificant in its own estimation. Such an evidence (and the true Christian is satisfied with nothing short of it) is at times furnished; and when thus favored, we can adopt the language of the Psalmist: 'He hath

* Mary M. Sheppard was a member of, and subsequently to this period was acknowledged as a minister by Greenwich Monthly Meeting, New Jersey. She died there 8th mo. 14th, 1849, in the fortieth year of her age.

Several of her letters were addressed to her friend, William Scattergood; and this epistolary intercourse was, no doubt, mutually helpful at a period when both were passing through preparatory exercises and baptisms to fit them for the great work of the ministry; upon which service, as we have learned, he entered in Ninth mo. 1838—having spoken a few times about ten years before—and she in Fifth mo. of 1840.

set my feet upon a rock and established my goings; and hath put a new song into my mouth, even praises to my God.' May we, my dear friend, be engaged more and more to become acquainted with God; to experience a being united to the root; to be engrafted into Christ the true Vine; and to know all our fresh springs to be in Him, who is the unfailing Fountain of all excellency. May we be brought into a willingness to go down into suffering and baptism for the Body's sake which is the Church; for it is truly given unto us not only to believe in Christ Jesus, but to suffer for his sake. And as we are thus engaged according to our measure, I believe we shall know a growth and an advancement in that which is substantial, and which fadeth not away.

I think I can say, I feel more than I can express, of an affectionate desire that those who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, may be drawn nearer and nearer to each other in Him; and that there may be an engagement of mind to follow after peace, and those things whereby one may edify another. I believe much may be gained by a rightly timed intercourse with one another in a religious, social way; and that the interchange of mutual exercises tends to strengthen in the most holy faith. This, I trust, has been the motive which has prompted the present effort; and, should it be found to correspond with thy own feelings, thou wilt perhaps excuse the freedom which has prompted me thus to communicate mine.

I am thy affectionate friend,

W. SCATTERGOOD."

To the same.

"Millville, 4th mo. 1st, 1839.

The anxiety I feel to be preserved to do [nothing] against the Truth, [nor] to follow impulses which may not arise from the right source, has prevented me from taking the pen before this time to answer thy touching lines handed me on Fourth-day last. As I read them on my way home, a crowd of recollections came before me, and scenes gone by of which no mortal knew. * * * The time for apology either for this mode of communication or the freedom of its character seems past by; and I may acknowledge it a relief to the mind thus to impart my thoughts to thee, feeling assured as I do, that the exercise into which thy mind has been introduced and has long been laboring under, arises from similar causes with those feelings which for many years kept my poor soul as in the dust of death. There was one part of thy letter which most sensibly touched me—thy allusion to the days of early visitation. * * *

O, my dear friend, ought not the remembrance of those precious, early visitations, in which the kindness of our Heavenly Father was mercifully extended to us, to fill our hearts with thanksgiving, and induce us to trust in Him through every vicissitude? How can we doubt the infiniteness of that compassion, which reached forth to us when we were enemies and strangers to the cross of Christ, and brought us into a nearness to himself and his people! Does not the recollection of these things bring something like an assurance, that with the same merciful Shepherd and Friend, there is still forgiveness that He may be feared? that He still continues to look upon us, poor frail creatures, with tender compassion, and will heal all our backslidings, and love us freely, if we are only humble and faithful unto Him, and willing to receive the bounty from his hand?

Thy reflections upon thyself, might induce a stranger to conclude there was little or no hope for thee. But is not the very sense of death an evidence of life? Can that soul be twice dead to religious susceptibility, that is sick of feeding on husks? Does not that very feeling indicate a hunger for substantial food? and dost thou suppose thou couldst lament thy hardness of heart if it was truly hardened? Ah, no: these are the evidences which convince me, and, I trust, may convince thee, that thou art under the care and protection of the Shepherd of the sheep, who is seeking thee and is extending toward thee his tender compassionate regard, by keeping thy soul from settling down in indifference and carelessness. Dost thou not love the Lord Jesus? Dost thou not love his children and people—his dedicated followers? Are they not still in some little degree a savor of life to thee?

I doubt not for thee as well as myself, that the conflicts through which we may have had, or may yet have to pass, as they tend to subdue and humble us in a sense of our weakness, will be made availing ultimately to our benefit, in the exercise of those gifts dispensed by the Head of the Church; and that in recurring to the wormwood and the gall of these days of sorrow and mourning, we shall find abundant occasion to magnify the name of our merciful Caretaker. * * * As patience is abode in, and a willingness felt to embrace the offers of Divine mercy and deliverance, I have a good hope that thou wilt yet see the salvation of God; and although at present it may seem to thee a great way off, yet remember He comes as 'a thief in the night,' therefore, may we be found watching; and let us not be 'fearful of taking our possessions in the promised land.' * * *

My soul is poured out for thee; and, according to my very little capacity, prays that thou mayest be enabled to cast away the sackcloth and ashes—the doubts, discouragements and conflicts of thy present condition—and be prepared to come up on Mount Zion, and again behold Jerusalem a quiet habitation. * * * Stand still in thy watch and patiently bear his hand upon thee; and by and by the door of sweet relief will open, and out of weakness thou wilt be made strong. We can do nothing for ourselves. If we are delivered, it must be by Him who led captivity captive; neither can we by taking thought, add one cubit to our stature. Let this consideration deeply affect us; and may we be unitedly engaged to patiently wait and quietly hope for the salvation of God.

With feelings of true affection, I am thy friend

W. S."

Incidents and Reflections.

REBUKE AND EXHORTATION.

What encouragement for the sincere penitent may be found in the Scripture declaration, "There is forgiveness with the Lord that He may be feared." Those who obey the apostle's exhortation, to bear one another's burdens, have need at times to extend the language of encouragement to a penitent brother, as well as to rebuke offenders.

An illustration of this occurs in the life of "Billy Bray," of Cornwall, England. He says; "At the time I was building Bethel Chapel, I knew a very good man, but who had a very wicked woman for his wife. She persecuted him in various ways; sometimes by throwing water in his face. One day she provoked him so much that he swore. He at once keenly felt that he had grievously sinned. Very earnestly did he ask the Lord to have mercy on him, Satan busily telling him all the while that it was no use to pray, for no one would believe in him again. When I was working about the chapel the Lord spoke to me and said, 'Go up and restore thy brother.' So I threw down the shovel that I was working with, and away I went to his house. When I got there his wife began to curse him, and to tell me what her husband had said. When she had done I asked the husband to walk out with me. I then said, 'Is not the devil telling you that it is no use to pray, and that nobody will believe in you any more?' 'Yes,' he said. Then I told him that the dear Lord had sent me to him, and that He was on his side, and that I was on his side; and while I was talking to him the dear Lord sent another brother to encourage him. And on the following Sunday the darkness was all dispersed, he regained the blessing he had lost, lived and died trusting in the Saviour; while his wife, continuing to harden her heart, and make the path of her husband rough and difficult, was soon removed by death, to answer at the judgment-seat of Christ for all that she had done."

The testimony given to the disciple of the Lord to deliver, is sometimes one of rebuke, which may not be pleasant to those to whom it is addressed, and which the servant would gladly feel excused from uttering. But if it is faithfully proclaimed, the obedience will receive its reward. Anna Shipton mentions that when on shipboard in the Mediterranean, at the dinner-table, her attention was arrested by an Englishman, who, with his bride and some members of her family, was seated on the opposite side. He was drawing amusement for the listeners from the Bible, and she felt constrained to reprove him publicly. She says:

"There was a pause in eating and speaking. Every eye was fixed on me in amazement and scorn, but I heeded it not. He retorted rudely. I only heard the jeer and the laughter which had been called forth by the ridicule he had awakened on the instrument that by the Holy Spirit was given as a revelation of God to make man wise unto salvation; and so I told him.

"Doubtless, some will say, it would have been wiser to have kept silence and prayed for him.

"Nay, it was no time for silence when the Lord had placed me there for testimony.

"When that testimony was given, I had no more strength left; so that when dinner ended I could with difficulty push my chair from the table to a corner near the door, and wait for the cold sea breeze to revive me, and enable me to descend to my cabin. The Lord had guided all.

"The Englishman would have passed through the door-way to the deck, but his hat and cloak had been placed on the console before which my chair was closely drawn. He paused before me, looking still ruffled. He arose from my seat to enable him to reach the door, and expressed my regret that I had been compelled to rebuke him before others; but that it was my Master's truth that he had assailed with ridicule.

"He who aforetime said unto the temple, 'Peace, be still!' ruled the strong man's head. Others gathered round, although I spoke in a low tone. He listened, and unabashed before observers and listeners, he frankly held forth his hand, in which I placed my own, he said, 'I thank you; I respect you for what you have done. I shall never forget this day. What will you say to me when I tell you I am a Christian? At least,' he added, said, 'a professing Christian.'

"My work was done. I retired to my berth, and there I realized what Paul meant when he wrote, 'The Lord stood by me and strengthened me.' That night I had meat eat that the world knows not of."

John Churchman mentions in his Journal that when a young man he was brought under great concern on account of a Friend who gave way to sleeping in meetings for Divine worship. He says: "I knew not what was best to do; and reasoned after this manner: Lord, thou knowest that I am young, and an elderly man; he will not take it well that I should speak to him, and, perhaps, I may yet fall; and, if so, the more I take upon me the greater my fall will be; besides, though I have spoken in meetings for discipline when Truth hath been strong upon me, yet out of meetings, I am not fit to reprove, or speak to particulars. I was cautious, indeed in those days, of talking about religion, or good things, from a fear I should get a halcyon thereof, and so not know the true motive which I thought I had observed to be the failing of some. In this strait it came in my mind to go to the person in the night, the most private time and manner; for if I took him aside before or after a meeting others might wonder for what, and I might betray my weakness and reproach the good cause, and do no good; and if the Friend should be displeased with me, he might publicly show, what otherwise he would conceal after private deliberation. So, in the evening I went, desiring the Lord to go with a guide me, if it was a motion from Him. When I came to the house, I called, and the Friend came out to see who was there, and invited me in. I told him I was in haste to go home but wanted to speak with him if he pleased and so passed quietly toward home, to draw him from the door, and then told him my concern for him in a close, honest, plain manner; and without staying to reason much left him in a tender, loving disposition, as I believe, and returned home with great peace. When thou doest or givest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth is an excellent precept."

Sometimes a very effective rebuke is administered without a word being uttered.

his is interestingly illustrated by an incident related of a journey across Pennsylvania some years ago, before the completion of the railroads.

"At a certain point on the west side of the mountains in Pennsylvania, the passengers on the west left the cars and went the rest of the journey by canal. The cars rolled up the captain of the boat, a tall, rough, sun-browned man stood by his craft, superintending the labors of his men, when a party of about half a dozen gentlemen went up to the captain and addressed him somewhat in this wise:

"Sir, we wish to go on east, but our further progress to-day depends on you. In the cars we have just left a sick man, whose presence is disagreeable. We have been appointed a committee by the passengers to ask that you give this man a passage in your boat. If he goes, we remain; what say you?"

"Gentlemen," replied the captain, "I have heard the passengers through their committee. As the sick man a representative here?"

To this unexpected interrogatory there was no answer; when, without a moment's pause, the captain crossed over to the car, and entering, beheld in one corner a poor, emaciated, worn out creature, whose life was nearly taken up by consumption. The man's head was bowed in his hands, and he was weeping. The captain advanced and spoke to him kindly.

"Oh! sir," said the shivering invalid, looking up, his face now lit with trembling expectations, "Are you the captain? and will you take me? God help me! The passengers look upon me as a breathing pestilence, and are so unkind! You see, sir, I am dying; but oh! if I am spared to reach my mother, I shall die happy. She lives in Burlington, and my journey is more than half performed. I am a poor painter, and the only child of her whose arms I wish to die!"

"You shall go," replied the captain, "if I use every other passenger for the trip."

By this time the whole crowd of passengers were grouped around the boat, with their baggage piled on the path, and awaiting the decision of the captain before engaging their passage.

A moment more and that decision was made known, as they beheld him coming on the cars with the sick man cradled in his arms. Pushing directly through the crowd with his dying burden, he ordered a mattress to be spread in the choicest part of the boat, where he laid the invalid with all the care of a parent. That done, the captain directed the boat to be prepared for starting.

Now a new feeling seemed to possess the astonished passengers—that of shame and contrition at their inhumanity. With one common impulse they walked aboard the boat, and not long after, another committee was sent to the captain, entreating his presence among the passengers in the cabin.

He went, and from their midst there arose a white-haired man, who with teardrops starting in his eyes told that rough, sun-browned man that he had taught them a lesson, that they felt humbled before him, and they asked his forgiveness. The fountain of true sympathy was broken up, and its waters gushed up. A purse was made up for the sick man, and all vied in their attention to one whose only desire to live was that he might be in the arms of his mother."

Gather the Fragments.

Among the incidents connected with the efforts of our Society to dissuade its members from selling or using ardent spirits for drinking purposes, is one related by Eli Thomas, an elder of Goshen Monthly Meeting, which shows the care that is needed in our business enterprises, that we do not become connected with any transactions which may prove a stumbling block to others, or weaken our testimony on behalf of the Truth.

Many years ago, the farmers in that section of the country were much in the habit of raising barley, which was sold to brewers for the manufacture of beer. The farmers thought that much the larger part of the ultimate profit went into the pockets of the brewers, and that the share which they received for the cultivation of the grain was disproportionately small; and some of the more adventurous among them determined to start a brewery in Philadelphia, which should consume the barley they raised. The project met with favor, and so many of the Friends residing in that neighborhood took shares in the enterprise, that it was popularly known as "Friends' brewery." Eli Thomas steadily declined all solicitations to join the company.

It so turned out that on one occasion, the manager of the works thought proper to convert a quantity of the barley into whiskey, instead of beer, perhaps from the state of the market, or from some accident that occurred in the preliminary stages of the manufacture.

These preliminary statements are needed to show the point of the incident told by Eli Thomas.

Goshen Monthly Meeting in laboring with its members as to the use of spirituous liquors, appointed him and another friend, who was a stockholder in the brewery, on a committee for that purpose. They called on one who was in the way of using them, and stated to him the object of their visit, and the concern felt by the Monthly Meeting for its members. He replied, that it was true he had so indulged in former times, but now he had come to a resolution to reform, and hereafter would confine himself to the use of whiskey which came from Friends' Brewery.

Eli may have felt sympathy for his fellow committee man, at whom the retort was aimed; but he was rejoiced that his own hands were clear, and renewedly confirmed in the wisdom of avoiding entangling alliances.

The cultivation of barley in Chester Co., Pa., has been almost entirely given up for many years.

When a similar committee was laboring in the limits of Salem Monthly Meeting, N. J., they found one of their members, J. —, a storekeeper, who sold much spirits to the workmen at the furnaces, &c., and who regarded the action of the meeting as an unwarrantable interference with his private business; and accordingly was prepared to resent their labors, and to express his own views with decision and harshness.

There was an old man who had received the name of "Captain," who was nearly always lounging about, whom J. often employed to attend to his store when he was called away; and who, he had no doubt, would be there to relieve him when the Committee came.

For "The Friend."

Joseph Whitall, who was then attending meetings in the neighborhood, joined the committee, consisting of William F. Miller and others, in their visit. When they arrived at the house, word was sent to the store for J., but the "Captain" could not be found, and he was compelled to lock the door and leave it shut up. He had scarcely reached his dwelling, before a number of workmen from a neighboring furnace arrived with their jugs to have them replenished; and he hastened back to the store. As jug by jug was filled, the men began to treat each other; and considerable delay was occasioned, so that Wm. F. Miller came to see what was the matter. He found J. surrounded by his whiskey-customers, while he was in the act of drawing for those not yet supplied. J. said afterwards, that at the moment he wished the floor would open and let him go through out of sight, especially as some of the men, exhilarated by their potations, backed W. F. Miller into a corner in their fruitless efforts to make him drink with them; and another called out to know whether he had any more of that excellent gin he used to keep!

At length all were served, the store-door locked, and J. returned to the house, thoroughly mortified at the exposure of his business. The committee gently opened to him their object in calling, stating in conclusion that he was the only member of the Monthly Meeting who sold liquor. To this he promptly replied, "This exception shall no longer exist, for I will sell no more." The events of the day had disarmed him of his weapons.

When David Ferris entered upon store-keeping as a business, he found it was the practice to sell rum. He says: "I was told that if I did not conform to it, I need not expect to do any business of importance. So without waiting for [Divine] direction, I fell into the practice; and followed it for several years; until it became a subject of uneasiness to me. I found many used that article to the injury, both of body and mind. Some spent their estates to procure it; and thus brought themselves and their families into want and distress; which gave me trouble of mind. But, being unwilling to lose the profits of this branch of business, I adopted an expedient to soothe my pain; which was, to refuse selling it to such as I thought would make an evil use of it. But this did not answer my expectations; for they would send for it by those who were not suspected. At length I was made willing to relinquish the profits on this article; and trust to Providence for the result. I ceased to sell it; which afforded me peace, and made no great diminution of my business." J. W.

Morality in Business.

The recent departure from earth of a Christian friend, distinguished for integrity no less than for his great business capacity, has led us to reflect upon the grounds of that personal influence which he held over a wide circle of acquaintance, and which seemed to strengthen to the very end of life.

We are convinced, after careful consideration, that his influence over others was largely due to one chapter in his business career.

Through an unexpected combination of circumstances, at a certain period—circumstances entirely beyond his control—he was obliged to throw himself upon the generous confidence of his business creditors. Many discomforts consequent upon this disaster were to him painfully trying. Chief among these was the thought that his misfortunes had brought sorrow to families sorely in need. Hasty criticism, all the more keen because unjust, also formed a part of this severe ordeal. The days were dark, the future gave promise of little that was assuring.

But now, with a profound trust in God, and with a manly self-reliance, he summoned every energy to the task of recovery. The ordering of his household, the frank avowal of his purpose, his diligent application to business, all evinced the sincerity of his heart. "Not one dollar shall be lost by me," was the motto of his life. Beholding that manly aim, friends gathered about him. Unjust opprobrium was silenced. The purpose within was daily strengthened. Opportunities to acquire riches came unexpectedly. Hope covered the sky with a bright bow of promise. At last the hour toward which he had looked with fond anticipation came. He met every obligation, and went forth in conscious integrity to meet the responsibilities of life.

It should not be said that final success in meeting all just demands upon him was the deepest ground of that wide influence which marked his subsequent history. No, indeed. It was his high moral purpose; it was subjecting himself to personal inconvenience to accomplish that purpose; it was the daily exhibition of a royal manhood, vigorously battling for reinstatement; it was a tender interest in all those who temporarily suffered on his account—these were the secret reasons for that personal influence that any one might well covet for a proper use. Many a man has struggled to overcome failure and has never reached the final goal in this life. But though this be denied, the elements of manhood displayed in the mighty effort won for him the fruits of a virtual conquest. His patience, perseverance, and honest aim commanded the sympathy and inspired the confidence of his fellow-men.

Integrity in business, therefore, was the ground of that wide respect with which the name of our Christian friend will long be spoken. Such integrity has its root in the genuine religious life. That life was not demonstrative, but it was true. It was a life of trust in God, and of humble reliance upon Jesus Christ, his Son. Such a life produces such integrity; such integrity is the very best demonstration of our divine religion before the eyes of men, and will have its final commendation from the lips of the Judge of all at the great day.—Christian Advocate.

The Way to the Kingdom.—In the house of a settler [in Van Dieman's Land] at whose house we lodged upon the way, we had much interesting conversation on the importance of minding eternal things, and on the manner in which the kingdom of Heaven is brought near to us by the inshining of the Light of Christ, the witness of the Holy Spirit against sin, which, being attended to, enables mankind truly to receive Christ, and gives them power to become the sons of God by adoption; so that they "are no longer strangers and foreigners," in regard to the kingdom of Heaven, but "fellow-citizens with the saints and of the household of God," to whom "they have access by one Spirit, and are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone."—James Backhouse.

THE LEADETH ME.

Selected.

In pastures green? Not always; sometimes He Who knoweth best, in kindness leadeth me
In weary ways, where heavy shadows be.

Out of the sunshine, warm, and soft, and bright,
Out of the sunshine into darkest night,
I oft would faint with sorrow and affright—

Only for this—I know He holds my hand,
Whether it be in green or desert land
I trust, although I may not understand.

And by still waters? No, not always so;
Oftimes the heavy tempests round me blow,
And o'er my soul the waves and billows go.

But when the storms beat loudest, and I cry Aloud for help, the Master standeth by,
And whispers to my soul, "Lo, it is I."

Above the tempest wild I hear Him say,
"Beyond this darkness lies the perfect day,
In every path of thine I lead the way."

So, whether on the hill-tops high and fair
I dwell, or in the sunless valleys where
The shadows lie—what matter? He is there.

And more than this; where'er the pathway lead
He gives to me no helpless, broken reed,
But his own hand, sufficient for my need.

So where He leads me I can safely go;
And in the blest hereafter I shall know
Why in his wisdom He hath led me so.

WHERE WE WERE BORN.

You'd know the place where we were born
Not by the old well standing by;
Nor yet by fields of waving corn

Which you might see in passing by;
Yet you would guess it night or morn,
The dear old place where we were born!

You'd know it—for in all your ways,
On country road or village street,
Through lengths and lengths of summer days,
You never saw a place so sweet
As ours in May dews, morn or night,
When apple-trees are blossomed white.

For round and round on every side
These trees in friendly grouping grow;
You could not find or far or wide
A place so circled round, I know,
Toward rising sun and closing day,
They stand in watchman-like array.

The ancient orchard on the slope
Is first to catch the warm spring sun,
Its trees are aged beyond hope
And yet they blossom every one,
And such odd apples ne'er were seen,
As fall upon its shady green.

And all along the dear old lane,
They arch their branches over head,
And in a breeze or shower of rain,
They scatter petals white and red.
We held our little aprons high
To catch the sweetness fluttering by.

And when the autumn tints were gay
Upon the landscape every where,
In reckless heaps the apples lay;
We heard them dropping here and there,
And laughed and gaily tossed them high
Beneath the blue, benignant sky.

And when we'd grown beyond the child,
The aspirations that we knew,
Our vivid fancies running wild,
Our learning of the false and true,
Seemed somehow in the light and gloom
To hold a breath of apple bloom.

And now, when May comes yearly round,
And decks the apple-trees again
With blossoms sweetest to be found,
Sometimes, my tears drop down like rain,
So vividly does memory tell
About the home I love so well.

ONLY WAIT.

When the spirit, worn and weary,
'Neath its daily load of care,
Finds the pathway long and dreary,
And the burden hard to bear,
Tired with hoping, faint with fearing,
Sighs to reach the golden gate,
Then in accents soft and cheering,
Patience whispers, "Only wait;"
For a brighter day is dawning,
Joy awaits us in the morning—
In the beauty of the morning—
"Only wait."

O sad hearts, whose soundless sorrow
Dares not let a murmur fall,
Only wait and trust the morrow—
God's great love is over all.
Only wait, O wounded spirit,
By the cross of life weighed down;
Thou shalt surely earth inherit—
Bear the cross and win the crown.
For a brighter day is dawning,
Joy awaits us in the morning—
In the beauty of the morning—
"Only wait."

Margaret Trembath.

The early years of Margaret Trembath were spent at Mousehole, where she was born in the Fourth month, 1800. Her parents were Wesleyans, who educated their children carefully, but it may be said that M. T.'s education was chiefly in the school of Christ.

Mousehole is a scattered village, built on the rocky western shore of Mount's Bay, and derives its name from a peculiar cave in the adjoining rocks. The view from Mousehole across the Bay towards St. Michael's Mount which is about four miles distant, and becomes an island twice every twenty-four hours, one of the most attractive of the many beautiful views in Cornwall. The eastern boundary of that view is The Lizard, a point of special interest to all navigators leaving or approaching the English Channel.

The dwellers on the shores of Mount's Bay are a hardy, active, and independent, yet gentle class, accustomed to associate with various grades, whether their own busy neighbors, or the talented and inquiring tourist, who seeks refreshment and information among the natural objects of interest in this south-west peninsula of England.

The little village of Mousehole is very quiet except during the departure and arrival of its many fishing boats, when every one seems interested in the stir, especially if success has attended the fishermen. Occasionally storm and sad disasters occur, that cast a deep gloom over nearly every house.

The following record of M. T.'s early life given nearly in her own words, is taken from a memorandum penned by herself when about forty years of age:

"In a retrospect of my past life, truly the language of my heart is, where or how shall my wondering soul begin to record, in any degree, the long forbearance and tender mercies of the Almighty with me? Praises forever be ascribed unto Him, who in his unbounded love was graciously pleased to visit and instruct my infant mind, and caused me to hear distinctly his heavenly whisper in my heart in these words: 'The Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, that did seek God.' I was returning from school with other children, and, as nearly as I can recollect, was about six years old. This Divine, unsought-for visitation so affected me, that I seemed like one amazed at being so denly stopped in the midst of my mirth, I looked around me to see if there was any person who could have thus whispered in my ear. After a short pause, I was directed to look upward, and was led to believe from that moment that there surely was a God above the skies that knew all things, yea, the most hidden secrets of the heart. This convincing I, as I have ever regarded it, seemed the beginning of days with me, and a measure of holy heavenly fear was from this period implanted in my heart.

Thus did He, who in the days of his flesh, I, 'Suffer little children to come unto me, I forbid them not,' kindly condescend through his holy awakening to show me that there was an heir of bliss or pain, a sinner born to die.

I was fully convinced that I was a naughty child, and a desire to lead a better life was gotten in me. I wept day and night on account of my sins, although I was greatly preserved from many evils, as compared with other children. Never, as I recollect, but once was I severely corrected by my dear Father for telling an untruth.

But the Universal Parent of all good was pleased to lend an attentive ear to my cry, and I renewed desire to offer unto this Holy Father my heart for his instruction was raised in me. I forsook my playful companions for awhile, and sought out places of retirement from the world. I have often with much assurance remembered that a flower, however, 'faintly,' when offered in the bud, is no mean sacrifice. Many, very many precious seasons were afforded me. When quite a child I loved reading such little books as might be profitable to my well-inclined mind, but as yet I had no form of prayer. Simple were my expressions (if any), but oftener did I groan to my Father who knew my heart, the unuttered prayer. Thus was a merciful Father pleased to supply me richly with his love. As I advanced in years many were my inward detestations and backslidings from the living Father, and the enemy of all good suggested that it was time enough to be serious; that I might enjoy myself as others of my age, and be quite good enough. But the compassionate Saviour, knowing my weakness and inability to fall, was pleased to alarm me much with the fear of death, and the awful consequences of being taken in an unprepared state; I was afresh concerned to seek the Father of Him whom I felt I had offended. In my distress I cried unto the Lord that He would be pleased to pardon my many offences; truly I longed for his favor more than for anything earthly. In mercy did He incline his ear to the feeble petition of his unworthy child, and caused me measurably to repose in Him who said, 'I love them that love me,' and they that seek me early shall find me. This was very encouraging, and for a while I was greatly comforted.

Between ten and thirteen years of age I became fond of playing at cards. I often felt convicted for so doing, yet I was pleased to divert myself that this indulgence was more harmless than many other plays practised by children. At length this game introduced me to persons much older, and of more corrupt habits; again did my Heavenly Father visit and rescue me from this snare of the enemy. O wondrous condescension to one so guilty! O wondrous sight of my great Creator! While deterring my wandering from the only true source of bliss, his word in me was, that if I would follow Him, He would lead and guide me all my journey through life. My heart responded, 'Draw me, and I will run after Thee; unite my heart to love and fear Thee all my days.'

About this time, Twelfth month, 1812, there was a great revival in our village (Mousehole) and neighborhood, and the number of old and young added to the very small Methodist Society was very considerable.

Amongst the first was my eldest sister, then about seventeen years of age. She had been previously visited, and, as I afterwards understood, powerfully reached, whilst reading in one of the Gospels. I silently admired the change in my beloved sister, and was anxious to become acquainted with some good people, and with some sincerity I sought counsel of my Divine Leader, for He alone is to be feared and sought unto, and surely blessed are those whom He teacheth out of his pure law. I was not hasty in joining this religious body, for as yet I knew them by name only. After some deliberation, being satisfied that my doing so might be a preservation from evil, in the Third month of 1813, about my thirteenth year, at the close of a large meeting, with much fear and trembling I offered myself to the notice of the society. The preacher spoke kindly, and signified his approbation at my request. I returned home deeply affected, and the idea of making an open profession of what I hoped would be a serious advantage to my long-exercised mind, seemed a weighty matter. But the unchangeable Jehovah, who alone is worthy of all praise and adoration, ceased not to encourage me to take heed unto that Light, and unto that Grace, which from a child had appeared unto me, with the promise that if faithfully followed it would guide me safely through all the changing scenes of life.

I greatly desired that, as to the outward, I might be preserved blameless, that the good might not be evil spoken of through an inexperienced child. I became increasingly fond of retirement, and fearful of mixing with young people, lest I might lose in any degree the sense of things divine, which had from season to season been graciously afforded me.

In addition to my father's business, he kept a small farm, where I was favored with many opportunities of being alone, and knew of a truth times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord, something of 'the soul's calm sunshine, and heartfelt joy.' I spent many happy hours in the fields, often rising before the sun, that I might enjoy the stillness of the morning, and hear the birds sweetly tune their great Creator's praise.

For "The Friend."

Religious Views and Tenets.

The Christian's path is not a gloomy one, though sorrows often intervene. But obedience to known duty leads to happiness, both here and hereafter; for godliness has the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come. And while it restrains lightness and vanity, yet through all the varied scenes of good and ill that cross our pathway through this vale of tears, a cheering hope is granted that the arm of Divine Power will preserve us, and eventually carry us through, and land us safe beyond the boundary lines of sin and sorrow. We may, like Paul, "suffer trouble, as an evil-doer, even unto bonds," (spiritually), but he says, "the word of God is not bound; therefore I endure all things for the elect's sake, that they may also obtain the salvation that is in Christ Jesus with eternal glory."

The prophet, in his aspirations to God says, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee; because he trusteth in Thee." So "trust in the Lord and do good, and thou shalt dwell in the land; and verily thou shalt be fed." Yes, thou shalt dwell in the heavenly land, of which Canaan was only a figure; where thy place of defence shall be the munitions of rocks; bread shall be given thee; thy water shall be sure, because it shall be ever with thee as a well of living water, springing up unto everlasting life.

The natural man needs the outward bread and the elementary water, that he may be strong and able for outward things while in this probationary world. And the spiritual man, as he passes through it, wants also heavenly food, to nourish the "inner man," that he may grow strong in the Lord, and be thus enabled to work for his heavenly Master in whatever way He may employ him. And while the outward man retains his bodily health, and receives his natural food, if it is of a wholesome kind, he is by it enabled to go on with the duties of life. So, if the heavenly man retains his spiritual health, and is supplied with wholesome spiritual food, he is, by it, enabled to journey on in the heavenly race, doing his Heavenly Master's work. But it is only as we receive the heavenly food—the bread of life—day by day, that we grow in grace and in the saving knowledge of our Lord. And if we become indifferent, and cease to rely on the true Vine for our support, we become weak, and are easily led astray by the errors of the wicked, and so fall from our own steadfastness. Nothing but the fruit of the Tree of Life (which tree is figurative of Christ Himself), can fully satisfy the cravings of an immortal soul. Nothing but drinking of that pure river of water of life, which flows from the living fountain of God, and the Lamb, can quench the thirst of the heavenly man who is longing for the waters of salvation. And this bread and water of life is freely offered to all mankind, of every nation, kindred, tongue and people, without money and without price. Though we have to give in exchange for it all that pertains to the fallen nature of the sinful man. We have to sacrifice upon the cross all that self-will and fleshly nature which obstructs our journeying forward in the heavenly race. It must all be nailed to the cross, and crucified by the assisting grace of Him who suffered and died for us, that we might live to Him. He gave Himself for us that He might redeem us from all iniquity. And unless we are redeemed from all iniquity, and set free from the law and bondage of sin and death, the full object of this gift of God, through Christ, to a fallen world, is not accomplished in us. He is not our Saviour until He has taken away the sin of the world out of our hearts, and redeemed us from all iniquity. But He stands, as it were, at the door of every heart, and knocks for entrance. And we have to give attention so as to hear the still small voice, and then to open the door of the heart and let Him in. And as He is permitted to enter, and to dwell there, as a refiner with fire, He will purify us unto Himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. When we have received this, we have received the new birth—been born again, not of corruptible seed, like the natural man, but we are new creatures. All the old things pertaining to the fallen nature are passed away, and all things become new, and all of God, who hath reconciled us to Himself by Jesus Christ. And “like as He was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we should walk in newness of life.”

But how are we to walk in newness of life, only as we are spiritually renewed by Him who is the life and the light of men? “The true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world.” And if we walk in this true light we have fellowship one with another, and we witness the blood of Jesus Christ to cleanse us from all sin. But if we have not the spirit of Christ we are none of his. And if we are Christ’s, we have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts. Now these are sound doctrinal views. But Paul told Timothy, that the time would come when they will not endure sound doctrine. I have sorrowfully witnessed of late the fulfilment of this in the head department of my meeting. In relation to the late Philadelphia Address, that body condemned it as pernicious, unsound and unscriptural, and decided against its distribution. So the time has come that they will not endure sound and scriptural doctrine. But having itching ears, they prefer to turn away their ears from the truth and listen to those who teach for doctrine the commandments of impulsive and degenerate men. And many are following their pernicious ways, by reason of whom the way of truth is evil spoken of; who, through covetousness and feigned words of men’s wisdom, are making merchandize of the deluded people, and professing to turn them from darkness to light, before they have been turned themselves; or who, after they have known the truth, have forsaken it, and ran greedily after the error of Baalam for reward, and perished in the gainsaying of Core (or Korah). But I am persuaded better things of a mourning remnant, who weep when they remember our Zion in its primitive purity. Although their harps may be hung for a season as on the willows, in the midst of the troubled waters of confusion, yet thus saith the Lord: “Fear thou not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God; I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness.” “When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee; when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burnt, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee,” &c. For “The Friend.”

Meeting lately with a copy of “A Visit to the Celestial City,” the following selection struck me as being much in harmony with such an allegory, or such a railroad, jocund, pleasure trip: “There was much pleasant conversation about the news of the day, topics of business, politics, or the lighter amusements; while religion, though indubitably the main thing at heart, was thrown tastefully on the back-ground. Even an infidel would have heard little or nothing to shock his sensibility.”

Natural History, Science, &c.

Changes in Dimensions by Change of Temperature.—It has been found that in mercurial thermometers, after being heated to 212°, the freezing point is frequently changed about half a degree, owing probably to change in the size of the bulb. In some recent experiments noted in the American Journal of Science, bars of zinc, steel and glass were alternately packed in melting ice, and exposed to the heat of boiling water, and the changes in length carefully noted by a micrometer. The result was that zinc was less reliable than the other substances experimented with; and that bars of steel, copper or brass are not likely to vary in length appreciably at any temperature within the range to which our standards are ordinarily subjected.

The New York Agricultural Experiment Station.—Both field experiments and sprouting trials showed a decided superiority in seeds of corn taken from the tips of the ears over that taken from the butts or the middle.

The terminal eyes of the potato were found to germinate more promptly and vigorously than those at the base. The best crops were obtained by cutting the potatoes to single eyes, and so cutting them that each eye retained a portion of the tuber running as far as possible to the central axis.—Science.

African Exploration.—The explorations and settlements on the Congo of H. M. Stanley, under the auspices of the Belgian International Association, and those of S. de Brazza, who is sustained by the French Government, have led to some interference and dispute. An appropriation of 1,275,000 francs was made to de Brazza by the French Government. He plans to enter the interior of Africa from a point on the coast north of the Congo, and hopes to find a valley which will allow of an easy railroad route to the inner stations on the river. The expedition is to be of a peaceful character, and 65,000 francs are to be devoted to buying gifts for the African chiefs who are to be conciliated. In the mean time Stanley has gone up the Congo with 230 men and 3000 tons of merchandize. The claim of de Brazza for French possessions on the Congo, has brought out from the Geographical Society of Lisbon an assertion of prior right on the part of Portugal.

Snails for Food in Spain.—The Spaniards eat not only the large vine-snail which is made use of in South France and Germany, but all kinds which are large enough to be worth the trouble of collection, except a few which are deemed tough and unwholesome. The mountain snail is considered the most delicate of all. Snails are sold in the markets of Valencia at about 40 cents a hundred. They are cooked in a broth with onions, stewed, or steamed with rice. They are so much esteemed in Spain as to be imported for home uses, and exported for the benefit of Spanish colonists in other parts of the Mediterranean.

Numbering the Hours.—The Cleveland, Akron and Columbus Railway, in Ohio, has adopted the plan of numbering the hours on its time-tables from 1 to 24, the latter being midnight. This avoids the confusion which so often exists as to the A. M. and P. M. hours.

Tuckahoe.—This word in the low-lying districts of the Southern States, was applied to various roots and subterranean fungi, which are supposed to have been used by the aborigenes as articles of food. The fungus which it is now principally applied resembles a large yam, with a rough, blackish exterior and a white, cream-colored interior, very soft when first found, and becoming hard as ivory-like when thoroughly dry. It has little or no value as food.—Science.

Power of a Steamship.—The Oregon, of the Guion line, is designed to be the most powerful and the fastest of the transatlantic passenger steamers. Her engines are of 13,000 horse power. The boilers consume about 3 tons of coal per day, evaporate 2700 tons of water, and require 6000 tons of air to support the combustion. It is expected that the Atlantic will be crossed in six days in good weather.

Artificial Fuel.—A manufactory has been established which utilizes coal-dust by mixing it with pitch and coal-tar. It is passed between moulding rolls which deliver it in egg-shaped masses. It is said to be a valuable fuel, and doubtless is so, if the cost of manufactory can be kept within proper limits.

Talking to Dogs, &c.—J. G. Wood, in his work entitled “Man and Beast,” gives the following illustrations of the power of talking to lower animals to understand the meaning of what is said in their hearing.

“Ben,” a very fine collie, belongs to an acquaintance of mine, a farmer. One day, Ben’s master was preparing to go to a village at some miles distance, his wife asked whether he meant to take Ben with him. He answered that he should not do so, and told her to lock up the dog until he came back. Being hearing this, slipped out of the house unperceived; and when his master reached the village, he found Ben waiting for him.”

“A Scotch gentleman has kindly forwarded to me the accompanying story:

“A son-in-law of mine, an extensive sheep-farmer in Berwickshire, had a collie dog named ‘Sweep,’ one of the very best of his kind. When, on account of old age, he became unsuited for his ordinary work, he was used for taking out and bringing in the cattle from the park. He generally lay before the kitchen fire, and when milking time came, all that was required was to say, ‘Sweep, go for the cows,’ where he would at once get up and go for them, bringing them up without any assistance whatever.”

“Not many years ago there lived in Edinburgh a drunken, shiftless mole-catcher, the name of Hastie. Like most of his trade he was very fond of dogs, especially terriers, and he had one which he loved above all others.

“She often used to act the part popularly attributed to the jackal, and provide her master with food. When, as often happened, Hastie was in straits for food, and had no money, he would go past a butcher’s shop, point to a piece of meat, and say quietly, ‘Susie, I want that.’ He then went on his way, and in a few minutes the meat was sent to be in his possession.

“Time wore on, and, as every thing mortal must have an end, poor Susie became sick unto death. The last I heard of the poor waif was, that he was seen with the dying object of his affection in his arms, hugging her and pressing her to his heart. The man was weeping like a child, and dreading the swiftly coming moment when he and his beloved Susie were to be parted.”

“I give the following story in the words of the gentleman who kindly sent it to me.

My grandfather, in Lanarkshire, possessed a watch-dog of the name of "Help," who was usually kept chained up. For some time repeated losses had taken place among the sheep, none of which were found torn and mangled, but only partially, if at all, devoured. Every effort to trace the secret enemy proved in vain. At last, while walking one day on the banks of a little river which flowed at the foot of a pasture hill, his attention was attracted by seeing his dog, whom he supposed to be safely chained near the house, running up the hill.

As the dog drew near, it was seen that its mouth and fangs were covered with blood. My grandfather concealed himself so that he might watch unobserved what would follow. The dog walked into the river, dipped his head in the water, and shook his head backwards and forwards, until he thought that all traces of his guilt were removed. He then came out at the side next the house, towards which he proceeded, his master following at a little distance. The dog went to his kennel, and, with the help of his paws, put on his collar, which was lying with the chain on the ground.

My grandfather walked up to him and said, "Help, my poor fellow, there is no help for you." He then went away, and gave the necessary orders for the dog's execution. But when the servant came to lead him to his gallows, the collar was once more empty, and "Help" was never more heard of in the county."

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 21, 1883.

LONDON YEARLY MEETING.

The Yearly Meeting of the "Meeting of Ministry and Oversight" commenced 5th month. During its sitting several Friends told of their labors in the past year. A fear was expressed least so many members engaging in Mission work should have a tendency to lower the standard of true Gospel ministry held by Friends.

A caution was also held out as to the effect of placing the young members in educational establishments under the control of other religious denominations, the danger being great of loosening their attachment to the principles of the Society of Friends.

The Yearly Meeting at large met 5th month. The reading the Epistles from abroad was the first business, and the subject of lowering them gave rise to some discussion; the members wishing to send a general letter to all bodies in America calling themselves Friends, as many of these meetings, in correspondence with London Yearly Meeting, were composed of solid Friends.

On reading the Queries much attention was given to the benefits to be derived from careful attendance of midweek meetings; and the members were pressed to be more helpful in this particular.

A report from one Quarterly Meeting that it had introduced reading the Bible into its meetings for worship brought a concern in the minds of some Friends lest formality would thus take the place of true religious sentiment in those gatherings.

The situation of those under our name on the Continent was brought before the meeting, and some interesting remarks were made about the burdens brought on them by the military training required of the young men, and much sympathy was expressed for them.

In considering the proceedings of the Meeting for Sufferings much interest was elicited in regard to the opium trade to China, and the exportation of rum to Madagascar, and Friends were called on to keep their interest alive in furtherance of efforts which might be made to relieve those countries from the baneful effects of these pernicious articles of trade.

The sittings of the Yearly Meeting from Second-day to Fifth-day—three full days—were taken up in considering a revision of the Book of Discipline, brought in by a large committee, appointed last year through the different Quarterly Meetings.

In discussing the revised discipline much diversity of opinion prevailed, and a decided feeling like laying aside the older rules as too strict for the advance of the age, was evinced.

The attendance of other places of worship than our own was advocated by some, and finally the wording of the discipline was altered so as to only place censure on "frequently attending other places of worship."

The proposition to allow of the intermarriage of first cousins came before the meeting, and after much discussion it was decided to so change the rule on the subject as to allow of these marriages, but to pointedly discourage them.

The paragraphs against using the heathen names for the days and months, and against teaching music, were omitted from the new rules of discipline.

The Home Mission Committee's Report led to a discussion as to the manner in which the services of the Missions were conducted. Reading the Scriptures and singing were stated to be, at times, part of the mode adopted. To a close question by one Friend as to how the funds were supplied to these "laborers," it was answered that the mode of paying their expenses varied: one case was named where the salary was a fixed one. There appeared much uneasiness in the minds of some with this new phase of Yearly Meeting work. After much opposition the clerk decided that it was the judgment of the meeting that the committee should be reappointed.

It was stated that the Mission work, as carried on at Norwich, "did not strengthen the Society, but evidently led away from it. None of the converts attended meeting, and a large portion of the Friends there had their attention so engaged by it, that they appeared to have lost their interest in the Society." Similar statements as to the character of the "Mission meetings" in other places were made; and the wide difference between them and the regular meetings of Friends was openly declared. One speaker, who stated that he was a worker in the Missions, said—"Their work was conducted more after the manner of the Church [of England] or of Wesleyans in their missions and Sunday Schools. In this important question, all should be straightforward, and acknowledge that the style of work was pretty much that of the Wesleyans or Congregationalists. The Society set up, that it did not believe in paid ministry, but he came there to say that as far as the Mission meetings were concerned, they were determined to have a paid ministry."

Epistles to the Yearly Meetings in Dublin,

New York, Baltimore, North Carolina, Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, Canada, Kansas, and the Western Yearly Meeting, were read and passed. The draft of an epistle to Friends in Australia and the Southern Hemisphere was read, and after some discussion was signed.

In reading the proceedings of the Yearly Meeting, and of the Mission Association and other organized bodies connected with it, it has been evident that the prevailing tendency in London Yearly Meeting is to lower its standard of doctrine and discipline so as to conform to the altered practice of many of its members. This is a source of sorrow to those who believe in and love the original principles of our Society; for it opens the way for further departures, and gradually leads to that alienation in feeling, and the disruptions which naturally follow from it, of which we have had such bitter experience on this side of the Atlantic. Those members of London Yearly Meeting whose eyes have been opened to see these dangers, and who have been made willing to bear that testimony for the Truth which the Lord has required of them, are entitled to the unity and sympathy of their brethren in other places. May their hands be strengthened, and they enabled to abide faithful to the end, so as finally to adopt the language of the apostle—"I have fought a good fight, I have kept the faith, henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness."

Dublin Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders met 5th mo. 1st and the General Meeting on the 2nd. Epistles were received from New York, New England, Baltimore, Indiana, Ohio, North Carolina, Western, Canada, Kansas and Iowa.

The Missionary exertions of the Western American Friends elicited considerable commendation from some of the members.

Much time was given to the unsettled state of Ireland and the effect these troubles were having on Friends. The judicial trials for taking human lives placed some Friends in a trying position, because of their conscientious objections to serving on juries in such cases; they feeling that their true position in this matter was not appreciated by the public.

The subject of Home Mission work called out a lively discussion and much diversity of sentiment. Some thought much good had resulted from these meetings; others regarded them in a very different light.

The use and sale of intoxicating liquor engaged the weighty attention of the meeting, and Friends were encouraged to be more on their guard as to the influence their habits might have. The length the American Yearly Meetings had gone in their care over their members in respect to temperance was favorably alluded to.

A letter from Friends in Madagascar, and two from Monthly Meetings in India and Brumana, were read.

During the recesses of the Yearly Meeting, meetings of Friends' Peace Society, Friends' Foreign Mission Association and Friends' Temperance Association were held.

The Yearly Meeting closed on Fourth-day, 5th mo. 9th.

Owing to an absence from home for several weeks—some of the letters and communications received from our correspondents have not received as prompt attention as the writers might reasonably expect. We make this explanation, so that none may feel that they have been improperly neglected.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The steamship Niagara, of the New York and Cuba Mail Steamship Company, which sailed from New York for Havana on the 7th instant, was destroyed by fire on the 12th, off the coast of Florida. Her passengers and crew were saved. The Niagara was an iron vessel of 2265 tons, built by John Roach, in 1877, at a cost of $350,000. She carried a general cargo, mostly provisions.

The first permanent iron bridge on the Rio Grande, uniting the United States and Mexico, was finished by the National Mexican Railway Company, at Eagle Pass, on Fifth-day last week.

Reports from a great number of points in the West and Northwest, state that a general change for the better in all the crop prospects has taken place during the past two weeks, owing to the cessation of rains and the advent of hot weather. The spring wheat and oat crops are unusually promising, and are both now nearly assured. It is believed that the corn crop is rapidly coming up to its condition in 1882.

A telegram from Little Rock says: "Advices from the cattle centres indicate that the drive this year will reach 600,000 head against 350,000 last year."

The Secretary of State, of Michigan, has issued his crop report for that State for 7th month. He estimates the probable yield of wheat this year at 24,194,000 bushels. Other crops, compared with 1882, show percentages as follows: Corn, acreage, 90, condition 72. Oats, condition 97. Barley, condition 94. Wheat was slightly injured by insects. Twenty-six per cent. of the corn planted failed to grow. Apples promise an average of 61, peaches 52.

The Wilmington Evening publishes despatches from all points of the Peninsula, reporting that the peach crop "has felt the effect of the 6th month fall of young fruit with more than usual severity, but as well as can be summarized the reports indicate that there will be from two-thirds to three-fourths of a full crop, and that the fruit will average better in quality than usual." Another estimate makes the crop about 80 per cent. of that of 1882, or about 4,000,000 baskets. Calculating with the old time basket, the predecessor of the present, this would make the crop one of, say 2,500,000 baskets.

The Chicago Railway Age publishes statistics of railway building during the first half of the present year, showing that 2500 miles of main track were constructed, not including switches or sidings, on 114 lines, in 35 States and Territories. During the corresponding period of last year 4990 miles were built.

It is said that to the five groups of sun spots which have exhibited intense action during last week, two more have been added by the sun's rotation. "The sun storm, which is just coming into view, covers a great area, showing very rapid changes. The violent storms that occurred last week are thought to have been a result of this condition of the sun."

The New York Bureau of Vital Statistics reports the number of deaths during last week as 742, of which 660 were of children under 5 years of age. The marriages numbered 254.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 563, which was 59 more than during the previous week, and 142 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number, 285 were males; 278 females, and 302 under five years of age; 142 died of cholera infantum; 57 of consumption; 29 of convulsions; 25 of marasmus; 23 of sunstroke; 14 of typhoid fever, and 13 of diphtheria.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3½'s, 101; 4½'s, 112½; 4's, 119; 3's, 103½; currency 6's, 128 a 132.

Cotton continues dull, but prices were unchanged. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 10¾ cts. per pound for nplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ cts. for export, and 8½ a 8¾ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is inactive and weak. Sales of 1700 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5 a $6; Pennsylvania family at $4.87½ a $5; western do. at $5.40 a $6, and patents at $5.75 a $7.25. Rye flour is dull at $3.50 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is in light request, but firmer. Sales of 4400 bushels of red in car lots at $1.06 a $1.15½. Rye is neglected. Corn is quiet, but stronger. Sales of 8500 bushels in lots at 54 a 62 cts. Oats are quiet, but steady. Sales of 9500 bushels in car lots at 41½ a 47 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 7th mo.

14th, 1883.—Loads of hay, 191; loads of straw, 34. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1 a $1.10 per 100 pounds; mixed, 90 cts. a $1 per 100 pounds; straw, 70 a 80 cts. per 100 pounds. New hay 20 cents below the above prices.

Beef cattle were a fraction higher: 3000 head sold at the different yards at 4¾ a 7 cts. per lb., as to quality.

Sheep were rather firmer: 10,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 2½ a 5½ cts., and lambs at 4 a 8 cts. per lb., as to quality.

Hogs were lower: 4100 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 8 a 8½ cts. per lb.

FOREIGN.—A number of pauper emigrants have been returned to Ireland by order of the American authorities. All accounts agree in describing them as a wretched class of people.

The Joint Committee of the House of Lords and House of Commons, which has had the English Channel tunnel scheme under consideration, has rejected it by a vote of 6 nays to 4 yeas. The majority of the Committee differed so much relative to their reasons for voting against it that they refrained from presenting any collective statement of their views to Parliament.

An agreement has been arrived at between De Lesseps and the English Government, which provides for a new Suez Canal, parallel to the one now in existence; for a reduction of the canal dues and for the appointment of an English Surveyor of Traffic. The new canal is to be completed at the end of the year 1888. England, he said, would lend the Canal Company £8,000,000, at 3½ per cent. interest, the loan to be redeemable in fifty years. The Government would endeavor to obtain a fresh concession of land from Egypt, and an extension of the original concession for ninety-nine years. The London Chamber of Commerce has unanimously decided that the agreement between the British Government and De Lesseps, for the construction of another Suez Canal, is inadequate and unsatisfactory. Meetings of ship owners at Sunderland and West Hartlepool have voted that the arrangement is detrimental to British commercial interests. Numerous other similar bodies throughout the country have passed resolutions of the same character, independently of politics. De Lesseps has informed the Paris correspondent of the Telegraph that in the event of the rejection of his agreement with the British Government regarding a parallel Suez Canal, which he thought improbable, he would appeal to the opinion of the whole world, and would ask for the support of the French Government in resisting English demands.

A report of the British Directors of the Suez Canal Company says that they have power to require a satisfactory width and depth of the new canal. By an arrangement for a reduction of dues British shipping, at the end of seven years, will probably be relieved to the extent of one million pounds. An agreement for the appointment of a British Vice President and an inspector of navigation secures British interest better than anything would short of a complete British management. The choice is to secure this valuable advantage or leave the Company to the full possession of the monopoly.

The revenue of France for the first half of the present year was 23,000,000 francs below the sum estimated in the Budget. It was anticipated that there would be an increase of the estimate. The imports into France during the 6th month increased 64,000,000 francs as compared with those for 6th mo. 1882. The exports for that month decreased 21,000,000 francs as compared with the exports for 6th mo., last year.

The French Government have informed England that they await official advices from Tamatave before replying to Lord Granville's demand for explanations of the occurrences there.

A despatch from Durban, dated 7th mo. 9th, says a great battle has been fought between the forces of Cetewayo and those of Oham. The latter chief was captured.

Over 900 deaths from cholera are reported to have taken place in Egypt during the week ending with First-day the 15th inst. The disease has appeared in Cairo.

Louis Pasteur, the well-known French chemist, has offered to organize a mission with the object of investigating the nature and origin of cholera in Egypt. The Hygiene Commission has approved the scheme, and Pasteur has applied to Lord Granville, the British Foreign Secretary, to furnish him with facilities for carrying out his mission.

The Spanish Cabinet have considered favorably the project of France for the construction of a tunnel under the Strait of Gibraltar.

A despatch from Hong Kong, dated 7th mo. 12th, reports that Tonquin is in a state of anarchy. The French have captured and hanged many marauders, bands of whom hovered about and fired upon the posts. Nevertheless the latter are still fired on nightly. A despatch from Beckenried, Switzerland, says nearly all the cultivated land in that district has been ruined by storms and a landslip.

Affairs in Crete, owing to the resistance of the people to the payment of taxes, are very grave. Committees are being formed throughout the island to resist the measures of the Porte. An outbreak is expected.

Two books formed with sheet-iron leaves, have been sent to the Amsterdam exhibition by an English firm as an illustration of the perfection to which the process of rolling sheets of iron has been brought. The leaves are said to be no thicker than "good-toned paper."

Nearly one-quarter of the town of Rostov, Russia, has been burned despite the exertions of the populace, a brigade and troops. Several persons were injured. Rostov has a population of about 45,000. It is well built, and defended by a strong fortress. It has depots of provisions for the army, and is a principal entrepot for the trade of the country along the river Don. annual fair is very large.

A telegram from the City of Mexico reports that the surveys for Captain Eads' ship railway canal across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec are progressing rapidly. "Eighty kilometres surveyed the greatest gradient is 1:101 kilometres."

The message of the President of Chili on the subject of peace with General Iglesias, has fallen like a thunderbolt in Bolivia. The conduct of the Peruvians is bitterly commented on.

Heavy floods are reported at various points in the Canadian province of Ontario, causing great destruction of property and loss of life. In the city of London bridges and dwellings were carried away, and 17 persons are reported to have been drowned.

* * The prospect of going to Yearly Meeting is attended at times with misgivings of heart, which I believe would keep me at home, were there not inducements to be present there which overbalance these feelings of discouragement, and seem to point out something like duty in submitting to the trial. Our spirits are rightly engaged about the business and proceedings of so important a meeting, I believe we shall be in measure satisfied into suffering for the Body's sake; and this, if rightly abode under, however obscure our position, will yet tend to promote some measure those gracious ends for which the Head of the Church unites his people together in a visible communion. Truly we have abundant occasion in the present time to recur to the principles and practices of our early Friends, and to seek to carry them out in every branch of our conduct. And the more we do so, the more we shall be knit together as the heart of one man; the more we shall shine as individuals in the work of true religion; and the brighter will our light shine before men as a city which cannot be hid.

This morning as I rode to meeting, under the sense of my own weakness and incapacity to do every thing good, I had brought to mind the language which George Fox says was spoken to him under distress and mourning at his own condition, and when he had unavailingly sought many outward teachers, viz: 'Then, O Lord, I heard a voice which said: There is no man, even Christ Jesus, that can speak to thy condition.' This, my dear ———, is the precious and heavenly teaching to which we all need to come; to which if we do come, we know Him to be effectually raised in us, we shall know a being new creatures; old things shall have passed away, and all things shall have become new, and all of God. We will receive capacity to try words as the truth tasteth meat. Our ears will be enabled to discriminate between the voice of the flatterer and that of the true Shepherd. We will not be carried about with every wind of doctrine, but being established upon a rock, shall patiently wait upon the Lord who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not.

So long as we are looking to grow up upon what is furnished by or through instrumental means, we may be very sure of remaining in a halting condition. We must have bread in our own houses and water in our own cisterns. We must learn for ourselves to draw water out of the wells of salvation, instead of depending upon others to do it for us. We may have many good desires, and may oft bemoan ourselves for our backslidings and short-comings; but if we are all the time to be in this condition, where is the growing up to a perfect man in Christ Jesus? When are those blessed attainments to be realized which are set forth in the New Testament as being within the reach of the Christian believer? True it is, our lot whilst here is to be subjected to temptation; to find Satan besetting our path, sometimes it may seem at every step; but shall we be always yielding to his devices? Shall we not rather seek with earnest entreaty for victory? and is not the Captain of our salvation, who was made perfect through suffering, able to make us perfect, to establish, strengthen, settle us? May we seek this blessed experience; then I believe we shall not often speak of our besetments, except to Him who seeth in secret, and who hears the cry of the poor, and the sighing of the needy. We shall indeed find his ear open to our cry, and as a kind and tender parent who pitieth his children, and knoweth that we are dust, He would hear and answer us out of his holy habitation."

"5th mo. 12th, 1839.—Since my mouth was afresh opened in the name of the Lord, I have been occasionally engaged to utter a few words in our meetings in much fear; in which I have felt the reward of peace; and a belief that my movements were not in my own will. To-day, my mind was exercised in silent, fervent prayer, that a qualification might be experienced to yield to the discoveries of duty, which may be merely vouchsafed, however much in the cross to my natural inclination; that I may be engaged under His care, without whom not a sparrow falleth to the ground, faithfully to follow my Heavenly Leader in whatsoever He may call to, whether spiritually or temporally. * * * *

The path of dedication is one to which my natural temper and disposition seem much averse; and I am ready to think it doubtful whether I ever shall attain to that simplicity of resignation, wherein the fervent desire is begotten, to walk in entire conformity to the will of my Divine Master. O! for more complete redemption from the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eye; for more of heavenly-mindedness; for fervent inward prayer; for a willingness to walk, in my little measure, as Christ our holy Pattern walked. May I daily pray for help from the sanctuary; may

I look to the Captain of salvation, and be engaged to press forward."

Sarah Hillman to Wm. Scattergood.

"Philada., 5th mo. 27th, 1839.

Dear William, * * * My mind is deeply oppressed under weights and burdens, known only to our Almighty Helper; 'who weigheth the mountains in scales,' and in his own way and time bringeth from under the mountains, removeth the weeds from about the head, and is afresh felt to be our 'Wisdom, Righteousness, and Sanctification.'

Ah! there are none, I believe, fully made sensible of what the poor messengers, who are sometimes called upon to blow the trumpet in Zion and sound an alarm in the Lord's holy mountain, have to pass through while eating the roll of prophecy; but they who are baptized into the same death. Nevertheless, these have the sure consolation of knowing, that He that is in them is greater than he that is in the world; and that He will keep that which we have, through mercy been enabled to commit unto Him, unto the great day. Then in seasons of great conflict, let us retire into this strong tower, and spread our cause before Him whose we are, who knoweth us altogether, and whom we desire to serve in the Gospel of his dear Son. Surely there is nothing in this world, worthy to be compared with the joys of his salvation; not any thing worthy the energies of an immortal mind, short of the pursuit of those durable riches and righteousness which are at his right hand.

I can truly tell thee, my dear friend, that since I saw thee, very little relief has been afforded my poor mind; from meeting to meeting treading in deep waters without any ability to cast off the burden or any part of it: but retiring last eve under much oppression, I was awakened, after a little sleep, with this gracious promise: 'I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness.' Thinking it might prove a little encouragement to thee also, I freely pen it. Thou knowest that thy correspondent has long known of baptisms, and conflicts, and deaths many; and yet has made slow progress towards the promised land. Nevertheless, to the praise of his grace who has thus far sustained, I can say He has, forever blessed be his Holy Name, always shown himself strong, when my heart has been thoroughly reduced into submission. When his chastening has thus brought into passiveness, how has He burst the bars of iron in sunder! How has He said to the prisoner, 'Go forth!' yea, and even out of darkness has brought into light. Peter's situation when sleeping between two soldiers, bound with two chains, has been much before me. When the angel of the Divine presence appeared, a light shined in the prison, and the command was given: 'Go stand and speak in the temple to the people all the words of this life.' Chains could not bind him then. The prison doors opened of their own accord; and we find that after the angel had conducted him through the gate and one street, he departed. Peter was to feel what he was; he was to go in the strength of Him who had called him, as must we also.

— came yesterday to our meeting, and spake long; then prayed. 'To me, there was the savor of death. * * * The spirit that is gone forth cries words, words; help, help; chiefly to the servants not to the Master. 'It is splendidly delusive,' as S. Fothergill* said; and those who follow it cannot distinguish between that which serveth God and that which serveth Him not.

In love to thy dear E. C. S. and the little ones with thy own self, in which my dear mother and sisters unite, I am thy attached sympathising friend S. HILLMAN."

Society.

Editorial strictures, in a late number of "The Friend," upon modes recommended by the Christian Worker, for renewing the depleting ranks in our Society, calls to mind language used by the editor of a weekly paper published in New York, for whose general sentiments I hold a high regard. After referring to the "discussion" upon this subject, which took place in the Yearly Meeting recently held in Philadelphia (Hicksite), he says:

"Very few of the young people, rich or poor, are following in the ways of their parents. The only way in which these young people can be saved to Quakerism, is for the older ones to relax their old rules as to costume and amusements. These good old people have forbidden so many things that are not sinful, that the younger ones feel cramped, and are asking for more liberty. If they cannot have within the bounds of Quakerism the liberty they want, they will seek it elsewhere, notably in the Protestant Episcopal Church, whither a great many of them are going." The Christian Worker seems to embrace about the same idea.

In the first place, these papers, and "the good old people," may differ in their conviction as to what is sinful. As to "costume," we may esteem it inconsistent with the Christian character to "adorn" the body "with gold, or pearls, or costly array," whereas they may have no testimony to bear against ministers and elders' wives being leaders in the fashions.

We may feel a testimony against all kinds of "amusements" which distract, or divert the mind from a due consideration of our obligations to the "Man of sorrows, who was acquainted with grief;" whilst they may think it right to be "all things unto all men, that by all means they may save some." Has Christ changed, or his Gospel been amended? Many in his day (and in all ages since) wanted more "liberty" than the "strait and narrow way which leadeth unto life" allowed of. Doubtless, had he widened the way, there would not so "many have gone back and walked no more with Him." But with the "broad gate and the wide way," so as to admit the world as it is, and was then, where was the influence for good, or the need of "repentance," so imperatively called for? Where was the need of telling his disciples, they need not marvel if the world should hate them; but to remember, "it hated me before it hated you. If they have heard me, they will also hear you; but if they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you." Nay, my brethren, "having begun in the spirit, are we now to be perfected by the flesh?" Under the restraining and constraining influence of the Cross of Christ, the profane man relinquishes his profanity; the devotee of fashion denies his vain desires; the theatre-goer denounces his dissipating follies, and the immoral man his immoralities. Then, we conclude, "it is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth."

For "The Friend."

Marriage of Roger Haydock and Eleanor Lowe.

The marriage certificate drawn up by John Woolman, and published in No. 47 of "The Friend," has suggested the printing of the expressions used by Roger Haydock and Eleanor Lowe on the occasion of their marriage.

Sewel, the historian, speaks of Roger Haydock as a learned and intelligent man of Lancashire, who about the year 1667 "came to enter into society with those called Quakers, whose doctrines his eldest brother John Haydock had received before him. But it so happened, that Roger coming once to his father's house, was by his mother put on to discourse with his brother John, in hopes that thereby he might have been drawn off from the way of the Quakers. But John gave such weighty reasons for what he asserted to be truth, that he quickly put Roger to silence, which so displeased his mother, who was inclined to the Presbyterian way, that she blamed him for not having held it out longer against his brother; but he told her, 'It is truth, and I dare not say against it.' Being thus convinced, he also became a public professor of the doctrine of the Quakers, and in time a zealous preacher of it too. And he being a man of great parts, well read and full of matter, many times engaged in disputes with the priests, sometimes making use of his pen also to that end; for he was an unwearied laborer, and suffered the spoiling of his goods, and several imprisonments; and though he was attended with bodily weaknesses, yet he did not use to spare himself, but travelled much to visit the churches in England, Scotland, Ireland, Holland, &c. And he continued steadfast to the end of his days."

He died in 1696 at the age of 53.

The Form of Expressions used by Roger Haydock and Eleanor Lowe, his wife, at their marriage.

Roger first said:—Friends, the girdings of the Truth of God having compassed my spirit about, and the power of the Almighty resting upon my soul, it lives with me in the Spirit of his Son to say amongst you, that in his holy dread, pure fear and Divine counsel, God being present, and in the presence of you all, that as God's appointment for me to be a meet-help to me, I take this my beloved friend, Eleanor Lowe, to wife, whereof you are my witnesses: having hope in Christ, and faith in the power of God, that according to the full purpose, and result of my heart and mind, I shall be to her a loving, constant, loyal, and faithful husband whilst we live, and until one of us be dissolved and be with the Lord.

Then Eleanor said:—In the Holy fear, authority, power, presence and dread of the Almighty God, and in the presence of you that are here gathered who are my witnesses this day, I take this my friend, Roger Haydock, to be my husband, and have hope of life, through the assistance of the Grace and Spirit of God, to be to him a faithful, constant, loving and true wife, so long as we both live and until the day of dissolution separates us.

After they had taken each other, Leona Fell said the mighty power of the great Almighty God, hath joined these two together and nothing short of the mighty power of the great and mighty God, could have brought this thing to pass.

The remarkable form of expression used by Roger Haydock—"that as God's appointment for me to be a helpmeet to me, I take this my beloved friend, Eleanor Lowe, to wife," brings very clearly and prominently to view the belief which the Society of Friends have ever maintained, that those who are looking towards marriage, should enter upon such an engagement in the Divine fear, and in the Divine ordering and appointment.

That the married life so reverently entered on, was abundantly blessed, is shown by the wife's testimony concerning him, quoted by Sewel:

"I was made a blessing to him, more comfortable every day than other: he would often express it; and truly so was he to me every day, every way, and in every respect. No tongue nor pen can relate the full of the comfort and joy we had in God and one another."

The Baby's Victory.

I was waiting in a railway station a few weeks ago for my train to come along, and was thinking my occupation a very tedious one, when suddenly I became so interested watching a small conflict going on near me that I forgot the tedium altogether. A pretty fairy-like little girl, of two or three years of age, was playing and dancing back and forth between the door of the waiting-room, outside of which her father walked up and down with an older child, and her young mother, who sat next to me. Every one's eyes were attracted by the laughing, loving, dainty little creature, who would run up every few minutes to kiss her mother, or say something to her in her pretty baby talk, and who seemed happy as a child could be. At last she climbed into her mother's lap, and began to make business of kissing and caressing her.

A lady, sitting directly behind them, could not resist this sight, and began to ask the mother her little one's age, &c. Then she produced out of her bag a little cake and offered it to the child, who instantly took after the manner of children. Her mother told her to thank the lady, but she only gazed steadfastly into the face of her new friend and said nothing. The mother then took hold of the cake, the baby's fingers still grasping and said, "Thank the lady," in a very persuasive voice, over and over again, but to urpose. Still the blue eyes looked obstinately and with silent lips at the giver of the cake. Then the mother said, "If you don't say, 'Thank you,' I shall give the cake back to the lady." Not a word came from the tiny, mute mouth. The lady began to protest that it was no matter; she knew the little one thanked her, &c.; but the mother reiterated her endeavors to coax or threaten the child, to beguile her by intimations that she could say it, that she had lost her tongue, &c., so saying the two little words required.

* Samuel Fothergill, a minister from England, paid a religious visit to this country, arriving in the autumn of 1754; and leaving, as he records, "with peace and holy quiet," in the summer of 1756. He died 6th mo. 15th, 1772, in the 57th year of his age, and the 36th of his ministry.

All this time baby and mother both had their fingers on the cake, and a faint movement was made by the latter occasionally to take it away and return it to the giver. I sat down and watched with real interest to see how the thing would end, for my old eyes cannot behold such a battle without the thought how it will tell on the future of the young creature just entering on life.

I suppose the mother's effort to make the child obey her continued for some ten minutes, during all of which time the little one knelt in her mother's lap, looking over her shoulder at the lady behind, steadily keeping her lips closed, while the whispered entreaties and threats were uttered in her ear. Then, at last, with the declaration that "baby was a naughty little girl," the mother took her fingers away from the cake, and ceased her persuasions; the child ate the cake forthwith, and immediately began to prattle to her mother of other things.

What would I have had that mother do? Take the cake away from the dimpled fingers that held it so tightly, after the child once fully understood that such a result would follow refusal to obey. But the child would not, and that would be a nuisance in such a case! Better a nuisance for a moment than a lesson taught of disobedience and self-will. Next time that the baby is told to do something, which she does not want to do, will she be likely to obey the command? I trow not. Why should she? She has found that by holding out long enough she will get her own way, and that is much pleasanter to her than to take the way of others. She learned a great deal, I think, in the waiting-room that day, although, I dare say, this was not the best lesson of the kind which she had had. This may seem like making much of little, but I may have the critical habit of advancing age in so judging of what I saw. Nevertheless, I wish the mother, and not the baby, had gained the victory that day.—The Presbyterian.

Whilst engaged in feeling for and laboring among suffering humanity, my concern towards the members of our own Society did not abate; but I attended all our meetings in and about London. The more I have mixed with persons of other religious denominations, the stronger has become my attachment to our own Society, and the Christian principles which we maintain. I rejoice greatly indeed in having met with individuals, yea many in several nations where I have travelled, who are very near and dear to me in spirit, and who I believe love the Lord Jesus in sincerity; but I met with no people who, as a religious body, maintain doctrines and testimonies, so scriptural and agreeable to vital Christianity, as does the religious Society of Friends; and my concern and frequent labor for this people are, that they may not only believe in these principles and Divine truths, but also walk uprightly and with faithfulness in accordance therewith.—Stephen Grellet.

I went on for some time pretty comfortably, generally attending my class and other meetings, often wishing my leader, who I believe was a pious woman, would pass me by unnoticed; and after some private conversation on the subject she was not anxious to draw words from me. The objectionable parts for singing, also, were avoided; my respected leader chose such lines as she thought might generally be united with. As I had been fond of singing, and understood a little of music, I was too easily drawn into parties at the invitation of friends to whom I felt strongly attached. Adored for ever be the hand Divine that showed me I must desist from this practice, as it might lead me very far from the true fold of rest and peace. I believe that the charms of music have a tendency to bewitch and steal the heart away from its Creator; and his command to me was to 'come out from them and be separate.' This was a smarting stroke, but there was honey at the end.

In language like this I petitioned the Most High for his great deliverance: 'Oh! Thou who hast taught me from my youth, be pleased in mercy to direct my steppings. Thou knowest my foolishness, and none of my sins are hid from thee. Be pleased also to turn away my eyes from beholding vanity, and quicken thou me in thy way. What am I, oh, thou glorious Being! that thou shouldst so often condescend to rescue me? Oh! may I through every period of my life, pursue thy goodness.'

For nearly three years I rejoiced in the blessing of knowing my transgressions forgiven, and my sins covered. The happiness I enjoyed can but feebly be described. I seemed at times overwhelmed with the power of saving grace, and often was I favored with a measure of the speechless awe that dares not move, and a flow of heavenly love.

About this time, Third month, 1818, it pleased the Giver of all good to remove by death my beloved sister, after a few weeks' illness. Her end was peace, she having witnessed a good confession.

In this year I was appointed to another class. This change was trying to my feelings, for my new leader was a wordy, active man, pleased with a detail of experience. For some time he formed a favorable opinion of me, and thought me a sincere inquirer after truth; but finding I was not so forward as many others, he complained of me, at which I desired an explanation. After I had simply stated to him some of my religious views, he replied, 'You are like the Quakers.' I told him I did not know what sort of a people they were; but I was induced to walk miles that I might have an opportunity of looking into a bookseller's shop or window, in hopes of seeing something to gratify my curiosity respecting this people. I was satisfied, however, at not succeeding. Shortly after this, there was a meeting appointed by some Friends, near my own dwelling, and child-like, loving all the good, I went.

Soon after I entered the house an elderly woman addressed the assembly from the words, 'Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it: except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain.' What this dear Friend and her companion said was like bread cast on the waters, to be found after many days. I thought how I should enjoy such meetings, and how blest were those who were thus privileged. At this time I had not the most distant idea of approaching Friends further than when opportunity offered to be found waiting with them at their Master's table, if but for a single crumb that might fall to my lot. In one of my ever-memorable times of retirement I was shown in an indescribable manner that I must cease to look for instruction from man, and that I was not to lean on earth, for at best it was but a broken reed, and that everything I held dear must be parted with, for the Lord alone would teach me, and if obedient, great would be my peace. In my astonishment I cried, 'What shall I do?' The answer was, 'I will bring the blind by a way that they know not; I will lead them in paths that they have not known; I will make darkness light before them, and crooked things straight; these things will I do unto them and not forsake them.' So wondrously were my views changed that I could not conceal my feelings from my most intimate friend. For awhile he seemed to have sympathy with me in my sharp exercises, but afterwards he thought to turn me quite from my strange notions. Here again I was met in 'love Divine, all love excelling,' with, 'He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me; he that taketh not up his cross and followeth after me, cannot be my disciple.'

As yet I had known but little of the buffetings of the enemy, but now I was taunted with having lost all the good I had ever known, by yielding as I imagined to better counsel than that of my esteemed friends in profession. This involved me in sore trials and great perplexity. I could not attend my class with peace of mind, nor was I free to say much on the subject, for I felt myself a very babe. In my distress I cried—'Oh! Lord, I am oppressed, undertake thou for me.' Shortly after this I had put into my hands the 'Life of Thomas Ellwood,' the perusal of which caused my heart within me to leap for joy, in the belief that there were those whose views and feelings were similar to my own. This for a season proved a stimulus to seek strength from Him who had hitherto been my light and my defence. My soul delighted in the thought of being taught by Israel's Shepherd.

After much inward conflict, early in the year 1824, I discontinued meeting with my endeared mistaken friends, from motives of a purer kind than they were willing to allow. Hearing of a Friends' meeting appointed at a place some miles distant, I attended it to my great satisfaction. The dear Friend rose with—'He giveth power to the faint, and to them that have no might He increaseth strength.' My drooping soul was refreshed, and an idea crossed my mind that some day I should become one of these people.

The latter end of the year, very unexpectedly, I had the offer of living with two Friends at Marazion—Eleanor and Joanna Richards. Thus through a kind Providence I was released from a train of painful circumstances.

I was nearly twelve months in this family before I attended meetings, during which time, through great opposition and incessant reasonings, the enemy of all good seemed to dispute all the ground that I hoped I had gained. Oh! the mountain of opposition that was raised against going to meeting! I well remember the time when I first yielded a little to this long required duty. As I entered the house it seemed given me for my confirmation, 'This is the way, walk ye in it;' and a little after, 'Oh! thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted; behold, I will lay thy stones with fair colors, for the Lord hath called thee as a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit.' Some stranger Friends were now visiting the meeting, and I was invited to attend. After it was over a Friend followed me out, and, putting his hand upon my shoulder, said, 'Young woman, I wish to speak with thee.' I would gladly have been excused; but when I turned towards him, he imparted some weighty counsel, and bade me be faithful.

I had but little alteration to make in my dress, but this was an offensive stumbling for years, until I was quite in despair through my rebellion. My distress was so great that I wished I had never been born! My worthy friends were deeply interested for me, and greatly desired my encouragement; but my soul refused to be comforted.

Again I concluded that the mercy of the Lord was clean gone, and that He would be favorable no more! In the midnight of my grief, the merciful long-suffering Jehovah was pleased to cheer me with the language, 'Pay thy vows unto the Most High, and call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee.' Through best help I was enabled to give up to this requiring as to my dress, and not to fear the reproach of man; I truly felt that I had 'escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowler.'"

(To be concluded.)

12th mo. 23rd, 1807.—"R. S. Harford and his son attended our little meeting [Trosnant]. I thought it an unspeakable privilege, which I would not barter for all the world, to have the opportunity of thus meeting in companies, though small, to retire from all, even lawful concerns, and with the best ability that we have, to wait upon God, the eternal, inexhaustible Source of all good. O! how refreshing, to the drooping mind, to experience from time to time, that the Rock of our salvation remains unshaken, though the floods, the winds and the rain may beat upon the poor tabernacle. I do afresh believe, that if through faithful dedication we grow in spiritual experience, we shall acknowledge that there is no joy like unto the joy of God's salvation."

The outward testimony to the truth of the Gospel, is a very strong one; but yet it is found to be insufficient without the inward testimony. The best understandings have remained unconvinced by the outward testimony; while the meanest have been fully persuaded by the co-operation of the inward; the divine irradiation of the Holy Ghost shining upon the heart, and giving lustre to the letter of revelation.—Christian Philosophy.

Christianity, like the sun, discovers itself by its own lustre. It shines with unborrowed light on the devout heart. It wants little external proof, but carries its own evidence to him that is regenerate and born of the Spirit.—Christian Philosophy.

THE BORDER-LAND.

BY RAY PALMER.

When the soft twilight o'er the empurpled hills
Its mellow radiance spreads,
And brooding silence dyes the rude clamor stills,
And peace her influence sheds—
All nature seems in kindness to smile,
As of its chafing cares it would the heart beguile.

And nightly, e'en from childhood's dreamy days,
My joy has been to stand,
While lingered yet the golden light, and gaze
As on a border-land
All loveliness, dividing day and night,
Whose scenes woke in my soul an ever-new delight.

Nor has it been—this border-land—to me
A dream alone, a name;
But lingering oft entranced its charms to see,
All substance it became;
A type—through which, the while I gazed, unsought,
Truths born of heaven swept through my quickened thought.

E'en thus, where slowly sinks life's setting sun,
And fall the evening shades
That stilly gather, ere his course be done,
And death's hushed night invades;
A border-land there lies whose twilight glows
With hues diviner far than aught that nature knows.

O border-land, dividing life and death,
Of beauty strange and rare!
Whose airs are gentle as the evening's breath;
Whose skies serenely fair;
E'en as 'twixt day and night the twilight lies,
So between earth and heaven thy chastened glories rise.

No sombrous mists enshroud thee, like a pall
In gloom funeral hung;
But evening's draperies, such as round her fall,
Her grateful curtains flung;
Clouds tinged with crimson, amber, purple, gold;
In the still, musing hour, e'en such I thee behold.

And I have loved to greet thee, when the noise—
The soul-disturbing din—
Away hath died, and left me to the joys
That thought and silence win;
When o'er my spirit stole a soothing power
That bade me give to thee the meditative hour.

Ah! lingering thus, what tender memories woke
Of hours too swiftly past!
Of scenes 'mid which life's radiant morning broke
In bliss too sweet to last!
Of those to me most dear at early dawn
Who now in heaven abide, long since from earth withdrawn.

Nor think I sadly now of manhood's years,
Its hopes, its wrestling stern,
Successes glad, or failures wet with tears,
Gone never to return!
Nor that, at length, life's latest hour at hand,
'Tis mine to tread thy path, O pleasant border-land!

What though beyond thee lies the silent night?
'Tis lit with glorious stars!
Its shadows do but veil the eternal light
Whose gateway death unbars,
And to the pure in heart bring peaceful sleep,
From which oft-sorrowing eyes no more shall wake to weep.

Well pleased, I watch thy floating clouds that glow
Suffused with lustrous beams,
Which from the uncreated sun do flow
In unexhausted streams;
Thou art a Beulah, whither angels come
And with the good do walk, anon to lead them home!

The night shall pass, and on these waking eyes,
Enraptured at the sight,
The glad resplendent morning shall arise
In full effulgent light;
The throne, in unveiled splendor, I shall see,
And Him with glory crowned, once crowned with thorns for me!

ANGELS' WINGS.

When the summer days were warm, and sweet
With clover-bloom and ripening wheat,
We used to lie upon the grass,
Within the flickering shadows spread
By leafy branches overhead,
And watch the bright clouds slowly pass.

They were so white against the blue,
With such a glory streaming through
Their silver fleeces, we were sure
They must, at least, be angels' wings;
And the mere fancy of such things
Kept childish speech and conduct pure.

We dared not quarrel, when the skies,
For all we knew, were full of eyes
That watched to see if we were good;
And sometimes, just the sight of one
White cloud illumined by the sun,
Availed to check an angry mood.

Now we are women grown, and men,
That were but careless children then;
Wise in our realistic lore,
The shining mystery we explain—
Only a vapor born of rain!—
And dream of angels' wings no more.

But are we wiser, after all?
Haply the world-worn hearts recall,
With something like a thrill of dread,
What time the Master undefiled
"Set in their midst a little child,"
And what the words were that He said.

It might—we silently infer—
It might perhaps be easier
The kingdom of the Lord to win,
If still in far, blue summer skies
We felt the watching angel eyes
That kept our childish hearts from sin.

Among the good things that take long time to get into print is the revenge of the Bonjean Brothers, in Paris, for their father's murder. President Bonjean was shot, as a hostage, by the Commune. His last message to his three sons was to avenge his death, not by bringing its perpetrators to punishment, but by working for the poor and ignorant of Paris, that such horrors as those of 1870 should be prevented. So far as their efforts could go, he asked them to cut at the root of neglect of the ignorant and poor in Paris that makes "Commune" atrocities. They have all three carried out this request by reclaiming juvenile vagrants and criminals who would be the future mob-makers, thieves and incendiaries of Paris, unless turned to better ways. A prison-home in the Department of the Eure is one of the branches of their work; it is a technical school, and in it are also trained professional overseers of juvenile penitentiaries. The system of this one school is intended to be spread by means of these practised superintendents over many such institutions. To show the devotion of the eldest son to his duty, he for a long time filled the position of magistrate, sparing himself no drudgery and hearing six thousand cases yearly. As "judge of instruction" he attempted, as he said, "to get into the skin of each accused" person brought before him, to judge how much society was to blame for making this particular criminal, and to test what responsiveness yet remained to better opportunities. He claims, in his reformatory, to have turned out excellent young men from boys who had gone astray. How much better is this legacy of a murdered father being fulfilled, against the disorder of Paris, than if his sons had devoted themselves to the "satisfaction" of revenge.

For "The Friend."

low fittingly and encouragingly for every one, has John Barclay conveyed the importance of avoiding "an approach to unwatchfulness" in every thing that would unfit for a sweet retirement of mind in which heavenly communion is experienced, and which is much the element and atmosphere of the true Friend!

"Isle of Wight, 6th mo. 1818.

I have felt so much dissipation of mind since I arrived here, as to unfit me for a calm enjoyment of the beauties of nature, so properly mingled as they are here. The cares revolving upon me, not a little tend to lead away the mind from that 'retired, strict, and cheerful frame,' (as I think W. Penn calls it) which seems to be the safest and most profitable state for me as an individual, and the most conducive to my present growth. I may truly say, that though I desire not to subscribe for any, otherwise than seems to be a special duty; yet, I believe that few, if any, are, to whom an approach to watchfulness or levity is not dangerous—not ensnaring. How often have I been in different degrees unfitted thereby for that sweet retirement of mind, which seems to be, it were, the element and atmosphere of the true Friend."

In 1866, certain railroad companies got charters for railroads, which pass through Indian Territory. These charters, beside granting permission to build said roads, also gave the companies large bodies of public land on the lines of said roads. Congress has power to give the lands of Indian Territory to railroad companies, hence a provision was introduced into the bills chartering the roads, to the effect that the railroad companies should be entitled to ten sections of land on each side of said roads in any State, and twenty sections on each side in any territory of the United States through which the roads could be built. Since that time to the present, a railroad lobby has been kept at Washington, for the purpose of securing the passage of an act to make Indian Territory a territory of the United States. If such a bill should become a law, the Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad would get 3,712,000 acres of land from the Indians without paying a dollar for it to the Indians. The southern branch of the Pacific would get 800,000 acres; the Atlantic and Pacific, 17,920,000 acres; the North Parallel Railroad, 1,244,000 acres. The whole amount thus provisionally granted, amounts up 23,676,000 acres. The Indian Territory contains 45,440,000 acres, hence these provisional grants give the railroad companies considerably more than one-half of the fire country, and the most valuable portion. The 21,770,000 acres left, 15,000,000 is mountain and desert land. The population is 100,000. If the railroads should succeed in obtaining actual possession, there would be but about seventy-five acres per capita of tillable lands left for the Indians. These facts and figures are from public records, and are reliable. These railroad companies are determined to get possession of these immense tracts of land, worth at present more than one hundred millions of dollars, and they are confident of ultimate success.

They concoct the most cunningly-worded Oklahoma bills each session of congress, which are offered, and advocated by members and senators who are in the employ of the companies. But so far they have failed. The Indians and their friends have been able to expose and defeat all such bills. In the meantime, the railroad men have been executing a flank movement under the leadership of one Captain Paine. The plan is to colonize Indian Territory by white men, who will demand admission of the Territory to the Union. This having so far failed, another flank movement has been started. This is conducted by wealthy cattle men, and the plan is to secure leases to large bodies of the lands of the Indian Territory, which they would at once colonize with herders, and cover with cattle. These leases would prove immensely profitable to the cattle men, even though the ultimate object of permanent possession should fail. But it is not likely to fail, if the leasing scheme should succeed on the grand scale proposed. We have opposed this scheme from the start, and shall continue to oppose it.—Council Fire.

And some may say that man must have the superiority over the woman; because God says, that man must rule over his wife, and that man is not of the woman, but woman of the man, &c. Indeed, after man fell, that command was, but before man fell there was no such command, for they were both meet helps, and therefore both to have dominion over all that God had made; and so as man and woman are restored again by Christ up into the image of God, they both have dominion again in righteousness and holiness, and are helpmates as before they fell. So that the man is not without the woman, neither the woman without the man, in the Lord.—George Fox.

The Bank of England.—In the course of five years the paid notes amount to 77,745,000 in number, and they fill 13,400 boxes, which if placed side by side would reach two and one-third miles. If the notes were placed in a pile they would reach to a height of five and two-third miles, or if joined end to end they would form a ribbon 12,445 miles long. Their superficial extent is said to be rather less than that of Hyde Park. They weigh over ninety and two-thirds tons, and their original value was over £1,750,626,600. The greatest of rogues might be inclined to find some comfort in the extent and intricacy of such a store of old paper. Of course, however, they are most systematically arranged, and any note of the seventy-seven millions may be pounced upon with the utmost celerity and precision. At the end of five years these old notes are thrown into a furnace specially constructed for the purpose and burned. It is a curious fact, however, that so firm in texture is the paper of a genuine Bank of England note that burning alone can hardly destroy it. The authorities have in a little glazed frame the remnants of a note which was in the great fire of Chicago. Though completely charred and black, the paper still holds together, and the printing of the note is said to be sufficiently legible to establish its genuineness and to warrant its being cashed.

There are some other notes here which were cashed after having gone down with the Eurydice a few years ago, and reduced to a little better than pulp. Indeed, the scraps and fragments which sometimes come into the bank to be cashed have a really ridiculous appearance. On the occasion of a recent visit, for instance, the officials had under examination a number of fragments of discolored paper, none much bigger than a sixpence; and when put together presenting to the unskilled eye not the slightest resemblance to a note. And yet it was pretty confidently asserted that the paper would be cashed. It is beneath the dignity of the Bank of England to take, or even to appear to take, advantage of accidents to their notes, and if there is any possibility of establishing the identity of any one of them, it is sure to be duly honored.

How much of toil, trouble, sorrow, and disappointment is suggested by a late auction in Washington. It was the sale of rejected models at the United States Patent Office. They numbered 17,000, and have accumulated in eleven years. A dispatch says that they embraced articles of every description, from a coffin to devices for perpetual motion. It also states that "the sale represented the blighted hopes of thousands of ingenious and industrious men, who, after years of trial and study, finally completed their models, only to have them sold for old junk." The whole collection brought only $762. If the lives of the inventors could be traced, many of them could be found in asylums, many have died broken-hearted, others have impoverished themselves and their families.—Chr. Adv.

Early Christian Epitaphs.

BY PROFESSOR PHILIP SCHAFF.

To perpetuate, by means of sepulchral inscriptions, the memory of relatives and friends, and to record the sentiments of love and esteem, of grief and hope, in the face of death and eternity, is a custom common to all civilized ages and nations. These epitaphs are limited by space, and often provoke, rather than satisfy, curiosity; but contain, nevertheless, in poetry or prose, a vast amount of biographical and historical information. Many a graveyard is a broken record of the church to which it belongs.

The catacombs abound in such monumental inscriptions, Greek and Latin, or strangely mixed (Latin words in Greek characters), often rudely written, badly spelled, mutilated, and almost illegible, with and without symbolical figures. The classical languages were then in a process of decay, like classical eloquence and art, and the great majority of Christians were poor and illiterate people. One name only is given in the earlier epitaphs, sometimes the age, and the day of burial, but not the date of birth.

"Homely phrases, but each letter
Full of hope, and yet of heart-break;
Full of all the tender pathos
Of the Here and the Hereafter."

More than fifteen thousand epitaphs have been collected, classified, and explained, by Cavalier De Rossi, from the first six centuries in Rome alone, and their number is constantly increasing. Benedict XIV. founded, in 1750, a Christian museum, and devoted a hall in the Vatican to the collection of ancient sarcophagi. Gregory XVI. and Pious IX. patronized it. In this Lapidarian gallery the costly pagan and the simple Christian inscriptions and sarcophagi confront each other on opposite walls, and present a striking contrast. Another important collection is in the Kircherian Museum in the Roman College, another in the Christian Museum of the University of Berlin.

Hence, while the heathen epitaphs rarely express a belief in immortality, but often describe death as an eternal sleep, the grave as a final home, and are pervaded by a tone of sadness, the Christian epitaphs are hopeful and cheerful. The farewell on earth is followed by a welcome from heaven. The symbol of Christ (Ichthys, the fish) is often placed at the beginning or end to show the ground of his hope. Again and again we find the brief but significant words: "in peace;" "he" or "she sleeps in peace;" "live in God;" or "in Christ;" "live forever." "He rests well." "God quicken thy spirit." "Weep not, my child; death is not eternal." "Alexander is not dead, but lives above the stars, and his body rests in this tomb." "Here Gordian, the courier from Gaul, strangled for the faith, with his whole family, rests in peace. The maid-servant Theophila erected this."

At the same time, stereotyped heathen epitaphs continued to be used (but, of course, not in a polytheistic sense) as "sacred to the funeral gods," or to the departed spirits.

The laudatory epithets of heathen epitaphs are rare, but simple terms of natural affection very frequent, as "My sweetest child;" "Innocent little lamb;" "My dearest husband;" "My dearest wife;" "My innocent dove;" "My well-deserving father," or "mother;" "A and B 'lived together' (for 15, 20, 30, 50 or even 60 years) 'without any complaint or quarrel, without taking or giving offence.'" Such commemoration of conjugal happiness, and commendations of female virtues, as modesty, chastity, prudence, diligence, frequently occur also on pagan monuments, and prove that there were many exceptions to the corruption of Roman society as painted by Juvenal and the satirists.

Some epitaphs contain a request to the dead to pray for the living. From these requests there was but one step to requests for intercession in behalf of the departed when once, chiefly through the influence of Pope Gregory I., purgatory became an article of general belief in the Western Church. But such requests are not found in the first four or five centuries, the overwhelming testimony of the oldest Christian epitaphs is that the pious dead are already in the enjoyment of peace, and this accords with the Saviour's promise to the penitent thief, and with St. Paul's desire to depart and be with Christ, which is far better. Take but this example: "Prima, thou livest in the glory of God, and in the peace of our Lord Jesus Christ."—S. S. Times.

A Work of Faith.—Some people are very anxious to undertake some kind of "faith work," such as they have seen or read of in books. Perhaps they may find faith work all around them.

One of the most intelligent women I have ever known, the Christian mother of a large family of children, used to say that the education of children was eminently a work of faith. She never heard the tramping of her boys' feet as they came home from school, or listened to their noisy shouting in their play, or watched their unconscious slumbers, without an inward earnest prayer to God for wisdom to train them, and for the Holy Spirit to guide them. She mingled praying with counsel and restraint; and the counsel was the wiser, and the restraint the stronger, for this alliance of the human and Divine elements in her instructions and discipline. At length, when her children became men and women, accustomed to the hard strife of the world, her name was the dearest one they could speak; and she who had taught their feet to walk, and their tongues to speak and pray, held their reverence and love, increased a thousand-fold by the remembrance of an early education that had its inspiration in faith in God, and its fruit in the humble lives of upright and faithful men.—Baptist Weekly.

Religious Items, &c.

Military Conscription.—The Vienna correspondent of the Daily Telegraph says that 100,000 Mohammedans have emigrated this year from Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia, to avoid military conscription; and that many more are preparing to follow their example.—Arbitrator.

Prohibition in Kansas.—H. A. Tucker states in the Christian Advocate, that there is one place in Kansas, whose business has been injured, and population diminished by the law prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors, and that is, the State Penitentiary. The number of inmates in that institution decreased over one hundred the past year.

Music among the Presbyterians.—The General Assembly of the United Presbyterians, which met in Pittsburg, Pa., some weeks ago, decided to permit the introduction of organs into their places of worship. About sixty of the members of the Assembly filed a strongly-worded protest against the change.

In the Free Church of Scotland, the signatures of 50,000 members and adherents of the Free Church have been appended to a petition craving the General Assembly to withhold its sanction from the proposal to allow instrumental music in public worship. The petition quotes the "Westminster Confession" to the effect that God "may not be worshipped according to the imaginations and devices of men," that the craving for instrumental music "implies a low and declining state of religious life."

Temperance.—The Siamese government has undertaken to prohibit the importation into Siam, or the manufacture or sale, within the country, of all "spirits which may be deleterious to the public health." The question now to be decided is what kind of spirits is not deleterious to the public health.

Tobacco-using.—Eliphalet Clark left $50,000 to a Methodist Seminary in eastern New England; and inserted the following provision in his will: "If at any time a member of the faculty or one of the teachers connected with the institution shall use tobacco in any form, and shall refuse to abandon the habit, and the case is not attended to by the faculty, then for that year the interest shall be added to the principal."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Intelligence in Fishes.—Dr. C. C. Abbott mentions in Science, that having removed a brood of catfish from their mother, he put them in a glass globe. The parent fish at once recognized that her young were not in the creek, although they were swimming in water. At last it left the creek and made its way as best it could, to the base of the globe containing her young, a distance of about ten feet. The young fish being liberated, they immediately clustered about their parent, and followed her into deep water.

Sunken Timber.—Immense tracts of what are now bog lands in Ireland, were once covered with forests of oak and pine; and, in cutting peat, immense trees are found imbedded in the earth at depths of ten, twenty, a thirty feet; in some cases, whole groves being found as they grew. The timber, when brought to the surface, is perfectly sound and the oak, which is as black as ebony, is used for ornaments and fancy cabinet work. A visitor to the wild moor and mountain region of Donegal, describes the way in which the seekers after these buried forests operate. Men armed with steel rods about thirty feet long traverse the bog, and by running the rods into the ground, are able to ascertain where the trees are to be found.

Fatal Effect of Imagination.—In a case reported in the Med. Press, 4th month 25th, the patient, awakened from sleep by something creeping over his naked limbs, jumped to the conclusion that it was a cobra, went into a state of collapse and died, though it was discovered, even before death, that the supposed cobra was a harmless lizard.

Tobacco-juice Vapor as an Insecticide.—The vapor of tobacco-juice has been tested in France as a means of destroying plant lice and other insects. An extract of the tobacco is made by soaking or boiling, and the liquid thus obtained is evaporated over a fire lamp. It leaves no offensive atmosphere, and is done by the smoke.

White Mountain Avalanches.—The bursting of a heavy rain cloud on the 30th of 6th month, caused a tremendous avalanche on Mount Liberty. Huge trees and great boulders went plunging down the mountain in a frightful manner.

The track of the slide on the side of Mount Liberty is 500 feet wide and a mile in length. There it entered the ravine leading to the flume. The mountain was covered with heavy growth of spruce, all of which was torn up by the roots and hurled down, carrying everything before it. The ravine below for two miles was swept clean, and only here and there a fallen tree remains. The uprooted trees were carried below and broken in pieces or buried from sight.

Where the flume formerly terminated, the avalanche loosened the rocks and cut a channel 25 feet wide, 40 feet deep, and nearly 50 feet long, almost equal to the original length of the flume. The brook which came in at the upper end now flows over the north side of the new part, and makes a fall of 40 feet one of the prettiest in the mountains, for which the name of Avalanche Fall is proposed. The new part of the flume bears a little to the left, so that its entire length is higher when standing below the former location of the boulder. Looking from above the new chasm, and upon the great change which was so quickly wrought, the visitor for the first time will comprehend the mighty power of the avalanche that came thundering down from Mount Liberty, leveling everything in its path. It seems almost beyond belief that so much could pass through the narrow channel without being stopped in its course. The scarred trees above the flume show that the mass of broken rocks and gravel must have been at times from 50 to 60 feet deep.

Two other slides occurred during the storm, one from the southern slope of Mount Liberty and the other from Flume Mountain, still farther south. The latter was the largest, the mountain being denuded of more than 100 acres of timber. Altogether these slides are the largest and most destructive that have occurred in the mountain region of New Hampshire since the great Willy slide of 1826.

Fresh-Water Sponges.—All fresh-water sponges which have been described at the present date, are of a silicious character: that is, their skeleton structure or framework does not consist, as in the familiar marine sponges of commerce, of an elastic network of tough fibres, but of lines of fasciated flint-needles, about the $\frac{1}{100}$ of an inch in length, so arranged as to form a loose intertexture, penetrated by canals, and supporting the sponge-flesh. When crushed, therefore, this texture is permanently destroyed, and will not resume its original shape. The sponge-flesh, so called, is a thin membrane covering the spicules and lining the canals of the living organism; having a peculiar and not unpleasant odor when fresh, but betraying its animal nature by an extremity of foulness when the dead sponge has been kept a few days in water.

Many of the species, native in this country, appear as mere incrustations of varying size and shape, and from less than a line to an inch or more in thickness. Their surface, smooth, or more or less tuberculated, is, in some species, supplemented by a higher growth of branches or finger-like processes, frequently several inches in length. In color they vary from nearly white to the most vivid green, in an almost exact ratio to the degree of light received. The slimy growth of confervæ occasionally seen upon the bottom of pools and streams, or dense masses of water-moss, may momentarily mislead the collector; but a pocket lens will reveal to him at a glance the minute leaves of the moss, or the delicate green threads of the algæ; while the true sponge he will hardly fail to see by its characteristic pores penetrating its surface, and to detect the fine points of numerous projecting spicules.

These sponges are found growing upon any supporting substance except mud, and at every depth beneath the surface of the water; but they affect chiefly the under and upper surface of stones and timbers, the sides of piling, and submerged stumps and branches. The stems and roots of water plants are often matted and matted together by them. As the coating of earthy matter into their pores would suffocate them, we find in standing pools the most flourishing specimens attached to the under side of stones or water-logged timbers, which shield them from the intrusion of the heavier silicious particles; whilst in clear lakes and rapidly flowing streams they plant themselves boldly upon the upper surface of stones in the full sunlight.

A further hint as to the bodies of water which favor their growth, may be found in the fact that three species, one of them the most peculiar of American forms, were found in a stream a child could step over; five were gathered at one time in the submerged cellar of a burnt mill; while the timber-work of the dams upon some of our largest rivers has furnished rich collections; so that there is scarcely a situation where water stands or runs, excepting upon the muddy bottoms of shallow streams or mill-ponds, where sponges may not be hopefully sought for and frequently discovered.—Friends' Intelligencer.

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 28, 1883.

We have received a copy of the printed minutes of the Yearly Meeting held in New York City, commencing 5th mo. 25th.

Among the matters claiming attention were the Reports of several Boards or Committees.

The Bible School and Missionary Board had extended help to a school in Mexico, to the Indians near Shawneetown, and to 29 schools in the South, nearly all of which were in North Carolina. They had also made grants of maps, blackboards, libraries and other appliances to Bible Schools in their own Yearly Meeting; and had employed a person for eight months as a "Bible Reader" among the sick and poor of New York City. The total expenditure had been about $3500, of which the Yearly Meeting had appropriated $750—the balance being derived from voluntary contributions and other sources.

The Report on Statistics gave the whole number of members as 3,672. The usual attendance at the meetings on First-day is stated to be 2,569; and on week-days, 706. There are 11 places where no week-day meeting appears to be held.

The Committee on Evangelistic Work speaking of the need for "pastoral service" in many parts of the Yearly Meeting; says that the continued existence of some of the meetings seems dependent on it, and that they have sought to aid such meetings where way has opened for it. In pursuance of this object they published a notice, "inviting ministers who felt called of the Lord to this service to correspond with us." They state as the result, that "two are already in the field, and others are awaiting instructions from us." The total expense had been about $1400.

It was concluded to meet next year at Glens Falls.

Whatever effect may appear to be produced for a time by this plan of locating ministers among weak meetings, to exercise a "pastoral" care over them, we have no confidence in the ultimate success of such measures in promoting the spread of our principles, or in building up meetings of true "Friends." We believe it is practically impossible for ministers located and paid by a committee, to exercise their gifts simply as servants of the Head of the Church. If (as often happens to the true minister) there should be for a time no call to public service, such an one would feel that he was not earning the compensation allowed him, in thus performing silent worship, where vocal labor was looked for. He would therefore be subjected to a strong temptation to speak unbidden—thus departing from the ground of spiritual worship as held by our Society. So also, that private religious influence which a devoted Christian exercises in the circle in which he moves, would be greatly marred, if not totally destroyed, if his fellow-members had reason to regard his counsels as merely official duties, and not as proceeding from the springing up of Divine life in his own heart.

From a Friend who attended the late Yearly Meeting in Canada, of the Smaller Body, we learn that it met at Pickering on Sixth-day, 6th mo. 22nd. Of the three Quarterly Meetings, but two—West Lake and Pelham—were represented. The disunity caused by the change of discipline and other innovations, though very manifest in Yonge Street, the central Quarterly Meeting, had not caused a formal separation there as it had in the others.

The meeting closed on Third-day, 6th mo. 26th, a public meeting for worship being held in the afternoon, after the business meetings were finished.

Epistles were received from corresponding bodies in Western, Iowa and Kansas Yearly Meetings, and replies sent to them, as was done last year.

Naomi Peacock and Eunice Beesley, from Iowa, were present with certificates as ministers, and were furnished with returning minutes of their acceptable attendance. No other minutes of the kind were issued, as the Yearly Meeting decided a year ago to grant such returning minutes to none but members of meetings with which it was in official correspondence.

Among the strangers in attendance were some members of a Committee appointed by Ohio Yearly Meeting to consider the situation of the scattered remnants of the Society. This committee had been authorized to visit, as way might open, the different bodies of such Friends, in order to ascertain their situation and condition.

There are in this small body of Friends quite a number of young and middle-aged persons who appear at times in these meetings in the line of the ministry. A concern for their preservation and growth in the Truth arose in one of the meetings of the Select body, which led to the appointment of a meeting for members only, on Second-day evening. At this, much weighty and appropriate counsel was communicated.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—It is estimated in Washington that about $300,000,000 of our national debt—or less than 20 per cent.—is held in Europe.

The Japanese Legation at Washington has received a telegram announcing the death at Kioto, on the 21st inst., at Iwa kura, the Second Prime Minister of Japan, and one of the originators of the new policy of that Empire.

The strike of the Brotherhood of Telegraphers throughout the United States and Canada, was begun on the 19th inst. There has been great embarrassment at nearly all points in consequence of the great reduction in the working force of operators, but the places of many of them have been filled in several of the principal cities. Both the companies and the strikers appear to be confident of being ultimately successful. The lock-out of cigar makers in fifteen large shops in New York, employing nearly 10,000 persons, began on the same date.

General E. O. C. Ord, of the United States army, who took passage on the City of Washington at Vera Cruz for New York, and was taken with yellow fever, compelling his removal to the shore while the vessel was at Havana, died from the disease at that place on the 23d instant.

The Chief of the Secret Service Division of the Treasury, under the advice of the law officers of the Government, has issued orders to his agents looking to the suppression of the manufacture of bangles in imitation of gold and silver coins, which is represented to be increasing to a great extent in the West.

The portraits of the new postage stamps that come in use 10th mo. 1st are: 1-cent, Franklin; 2-cent, Jackson; 3-cent, Washington; 5-cent, Garfield; 6-cent, Lincoln; 7-cent, Stanton; 10-cent, Jefferson; 12-cent, Clay; 15-cent, Scott; 30-cent, Hamilton; 90-cent, Perry.

On First-day last a number of Cubans held a meeting in New York, at which addresses were made by General Bonachea and others, urging that every means be taken to assist in freeing Cuba from the Spanish yoke. Spanish promises, it was urged, should be disregarded, because it was claimed they were never fulfilled. One speaker advised the organization of Cuban exiles and the freeing of the colored race held in bondage by the Spaniards. A large contribution was taken up in aid of the cause.

The new high license laws in the West differ widely. In Illinois all licenses hereafter for the sale of spirits and wines, are to be granted upon the payment of $500 a year, and for beer at $150. The Nebraska law puts the fees in cities of a certain grade at $1000, and at $500 for all other places. The law of Iowa permits towns to fix the amount, and there is no uniform rule on the subject. In some places it is as low as $75, and in others as high as $1000, while there has been a large increase in the average amount throughout the State, and a considerable reduction in the number of liquor sellers.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 479, which was 84 less than during the previous week, and 16 less than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number, 250 were males and 229 females; 207 were two years of age or younger; 94 died of cholera infantum; 54 of consumption; 28 of marasmus; 20 of meningitis; 21 of convulsions; 19 of old age; 12 of diphtheria, and 10 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3½'s, 103; 4½'s, 112½; 4's, 119; 3's, 103½; currency 6's, 128 a 132.

Cotton.—There was very little doing, but prices were unchanged. Sales of middlings were reported at 10½ a 10¾ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 6½ a 7 cts. for export, and 7½ a 8 cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in fair request and firm. Sales of 2700 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5 a $6; Pennsylvania family at $4.90 a $5.12½; western do. at $5.50 a $6, and patents at $6 a $7.25. Rye flour is dull at $3.25 a $3.50 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was in better demand and one cent per bushel higher; sale of 4700 bushels red in ear lots, at $1.10 a $1.18. Rye is nominal. Corn is in light request, but a shade firmer. Sales of 10,000 bushels in ear lots at 55 a 66 cts. for rejected and yellow. Oats are dull but steady; sales of 9000 bushels in ear lots at 40 a 45 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 7th mo. 21st, 1883.—Loads of hay, 268; loads of straw, 52. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 95 cts. a $1.05 per 100 lbs.; mixed, 85 a 95 cts. per 100 pounds; straw, 60 a 70 cts. per 100 pounds. New hay 50 a 70 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were a fraction lower this week: 3700 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4½ a 6½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

Sheep.—Good grades were in fair demand and firmly held: 9000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 a 5½ cts., and lambs at 3½ a 8 cts. per pound, as to quality.

Hogs continue dull: 3800 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 8 a 8½ cts. per lb., according to quality.

FOREIGN.—The Times, in its crop report, says the area of wheat planted in the United Kingdom is from 10 to 15 per cent. below that of last year, and the yield will be below the average. Reports from the continent are very similar in their conclusions.

The Executive Council of Queensland has forwarded a memorial to the Earl of Derby, the Secretary of the Colonies, urging the Government to reconsider their decision to forbid the annexation of New Guinea to Queensland, and inviting them to take steps to provide for a federal government for Australia.

A despatch from Earl Derby, the Colonial Secretary to the Government of Queensland, in regard to the proposed annexation of New Guinea, has since been published. Lord Derby states that official inquiry at Paris and Berlin shows that the fears of foreign annexation of New Guinea are groundless, and he emphasized the objections of the Home Government to the annexation of that island by Queensland, whose Parliament, he says, represents the interests of whites, who are suspected of desiring to acquire a supply of colored labor for the sugar industry.

After a meeting of the Managing Committee of the Suez Canal Company on the 20th inst., De Lesseps telegraphed to the Chief Engineer of the Canal in Egypt as follows: "Come to Paris immediately. Bring the plans for the second canal. Funds are assured either by execution of the British agreement or otherwise."

On the 23d inst., W. E. Gladstone announced in the House of Commons that he would not ask Parliament at this session to sanction the agreement in regard to the Suez Canal, made with De Lesseps. Gladstone also said that the consideration of the agreement was dropped owing to the general objection to the scheme, and because more time had been asked for by some of the members. He also expressed his opinion that the canal should ultimately be placed under the control of an international committee. In the House of Lords, Earl Granville, Foreign Secretary, said that the agreement would be referred to a special committee.

Waddington has been appointed Ambassador to England, from France, in place of Tissot, who has resigned on account of ill health, and has presented his credentials.

A report made by De Lesseps at the meeting in Paris on the 17th inst., of the Panama shareholders says, that the co-operation of American contractors had dissipated the prejudices existing in certain centres of the United States against his company constructing the canal. The sentiment of equity prevailing among the Americans caused them to recognize that those who have undertaken the great work of building the canal across the Isthmus of Panama have no object in view but the removal of a material obstacle to beneficial intercourse.

The number of deaths from cholera in Egypt for the week ending on the 22d, varies, but is probably more than 2550. Nearly one-half of these occurred in Cairo. The Standard's correspondent at Cairo says that unless the English authorities promptly take the direction of affairs, the checking of the spread of cholera will be hopeless. Even the simplest sanitary arrangements are neglected. The funeral system is most obnoxious. The corpses, encased in very slight coffins, are carried through the crowded streets on men's shoulders. The clothes of persons dying in the hospital are often stripped off and taken for wearing purposes by relatives. A great quantity of tar is burned in Cairo every night. The number of poor and infirm persons who are being maintained at Damietta at the expense of the State is rapidly increasing. Relief Committees are being formed. Advice from Egypt assert that in addition to an outbreak of cholera at the town of Fareskur, eight miles southwest of Damietta, the leprosy has appeared there, and is spreading rapidly. There are neither doctors nor medicines at Fareskur.

A serious outbreak of cholera is expected at Bombay, as there were thirty-seven sporadic cases of the disease there during last week.

A member of the Commission of Inquiry of St. Petersburg has been sent to Germany, France and England for the purpose of obtaining an exact report concerning the civil rights of the Jews in those countries.

Much attention has of late years been given by physicians in Berlin to the defects of vision among school children. Thousands of them have been examined, and many changes and improvements made in consequence in the arrangements of school-houses, class-rooms, &c. Of late years an aurist has conceived the practical idea of examining the ears of the children, and has arrived at the fact that of 5905 children examined no less than 1392 were affected with diseases of the ear.

The harvest in Prussia promises well, especially in the Northeastern provinces. It will be less in Pomerania and Brandenburg. Wheat in the former is below the average. In Schleswig-Holstein, Westphalia and Rhenish Prussia, drought has done much damage. Fruit, beet-root and potatoes are everywhere good.

The proposed ship canal through the Isthmus of Kraw, in India, has been decided to be impracticable. The Times, of India, says it would cost, it is said, more than the Suez Canal. The rough and hilly nature of the district would make a very circuitous route necessary, some of the cuttings involving very acute angles. According to a Strait's paper, the following is the opinion of an engineer employed by the French exploring party: "It would take the superfluous capital of France for the next hundred years to cut the canal, and when the work was done it would simply be a triumph of engineering, for there would be no profit, in fact there would be additional expense for maintenance." The French expedition also admits that Campon Bay, which would be the eastern outlet of the canal, is half filled with mud and is exposed to the full fury of the northeast monsoon. The locality of the proposed western entrance appears to be equally inaccessible, the sea being thickly studded with shoals and sunken rocks and exposed to the southwest monsoon. All this will be a great disappointment to the French, who hoped that the canal would bring Saigon directly in the track of China-going vessels and enable that place to assume the importance of Singapore, greatly to the advantage of the French Cochinchina settlements.

The Toronto Globe publishes crop reports from all parts of Ontario and Quebec, showing that, with 100 as a basis, the per centages of the average crops are as follows: Fall wheat, 78; spring wheat, 90; barley, 90; oats, 90; peas, 89; rye, 93; hay, 122; potatoes, 80; corn, 74; roots, 93; apples, 64; other fruit, 80.

The Mexican Government has undertaken to rehabilitate the extensive forests of the valley of Mexico. A contract has been let for the planting of 4,000,000 trees in that locality within four years, beginning from next 3rd mo., the contractor receiving $200,000. The principal varieties to be planted are ash, willow, poplar, eucalyptus, truenosajones, mountain eypress, acacias, the contractor being bound to maintain the in good condition for two years after planting. Provision is also made for the study of the science of forestry by agricultural school graduates, the free distribution of fruit trees and other useful plants adapted to the climate, and the translation of works on arboriculture and the German forestry laws.

The Bolivian Government declares it will not make peace without a union with Peru. According to the news published in El Pueblo, General Caceres is at Suano, with 1200 badly armed men. The same authority states that an engagement took place at P. de Agucar, resulting in the loss of Colonel Recabarro and Secado, of General Caceres' forces.

Letters and Memoranda of William Scattergood.

"10th mo. 31st, 1839.—We have returned this day from a visit to our friends in Bucks County; and in a little sense of gratitude and knowledge, that we have been favored to proceed without accident, and with our minds refreshed at times with the belief that Divine mercy has been near. My own mind has been favored to feel strengthened by the company of my beloved friends, and fresh desires are awakened that I may be enabled to walk conformably to that holy Christian profession, which I am making to the world; and, also, that I may be engaged humbly to watch for the openings of the Heavenly Leader, and faithful in the pursuit of that He may be enabled to call for at my hands. May the renewed evidences of Divine favor experienced in the past two or three weeks be remembered with gratitude; and if it be my allotment again to sit as it were at the King's gate in humiliating conflict, may I be helped to hold fast my confidence steadfast unto the end, believing that He is faithful who has promised."

"11th mo. 4th.—After a time of fair weather and some clouds and storms; so after favor comes conflict; that we may be reminded where our dependence is. In a little of this experience have I had to dwell; and sincerely do I desire to be preserved with a single eye to the unflinching Helper; and may I in future be careful to mind my calling and therein abide. A want of faithfulness to a little opening of duty in a family adds to my present feeling of mourning."

"11th mo. 17th. First-day.—How precious is to be enabled at seasons to commemorate the goodness of the Most High! to experience something like the language begotten in our hearts: 'Draw us, we will run after thee. The king hath brought me into his chambers: we will be glad and rejoice in thee.' Was engaged in meeting this morning to revive the gracious promise of our Saviour to his disciples: 'Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.' Fervent desires were felt, that the youth might be engaged to 'ask' in the way of visitation of Him who giveth liberally and upbraideth not."

"11th mo. 30th.—Shame hath in some measure covered me this day, in the sense of how short I am of that attainment which qualifies for the application of the promise left for 'the pure in heart':—'they shall see God.' May I be more and more engaged to pray for it, even that I may have a clean heart and a right spirit created within me."

To M. M. Sheppard.

"Millville, 2d mo. 7th, 1840.

When our hearts are afresh opened towards one another, through the influence of that precious uniting love which flows from the Father and the Son, and in which we feel an engagement to commune with one another either in the line of consolation, instruction, or reproof, I believe it is our duty as it is our privilege, to extend reciprocally a hand of help; thus fulfilling the apostolic injunction, to 'Bear one another's burdens and thus fulfil the law of Christ.' When our hearts are thus touched with heavenly virtue, and an intimation attends to impart our feelings to a fellow pilgrim, if given way to, I believe it has often been attended with happy effects in cheering and enlivening such in their journey heavenward. Shall I tell thee, that such has been the effect of the little note thou hast ventured to send me; and although its contents may seem to thee of little account, the effect upon my feelings has been to cheer and strengthen me in the tribulated path in which all the children of our Heavenly Father must walk if they are finally favored to attain 'that city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker God is.' Oh! it is a precious thing to be brought low; to be made sensible of our own weakness; to be made to see that we are nothing; and to know our sufficiency to be in Him, who bore our griefs and carried our sorrows, and who, as we are attentive to the voice of instruction, sometimes conveyed through deeply trying dispensations, will arise in due season with healing in his wings. He will enable us to say, 'The Lord is my strength and song, and is become my salvation.' He prepares us, through these seasons of suffering, for his service; and I am more and more persuaded they are essential to a preparation for usefulness in his militant church, as well as for the fruition of joy in the church triumphant in heaven.

Dwell not, my dear friend, too much on the sense of thy own weakness; but remember that the Lord our Helper is mighty; and that He is inexpressibly nearer to us in our seasons of conflict and trial than we can have any idea of.

As I rode from meeting last First-day week, my feelings were touched in remembering that passage in which our Saviour speaks of the care that is taken of the fowls of the air: 'Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings? and not one of them is forgotten before God. Ah! if our confidence were, by even so small a grain of living faith, kept in this ever-watchful and almighty Caretaker, then however tossed upon the waves, or however our enemy be suffered to come against us as an overwhelming flood, his eye is none the less over us, his sustaining Arm none the less near; and as we keep our eye single to Him, the victorious Captain of salvation, He will work for us by rebuking the devourer, and will bring up his humble dependent children to stand as upon Mount Zion, and will put a new song into their mouth, even praises to our God.

I cannot well express the feelings of tender sympathy and fellowship which I feel towards thee, and which for some months past I have desired to communicate to thee. I have thought many times we were drinking of one cup; and fervent are my desires that we may be more and more united together in that bond of Christian unity which our blessed Redeemer set forth as the badge and evidence of discipleship with Him. * * *

With sincere and tender desires that we may both be preserved in the best sense, I remain truly thy affectionate friend

W. S."

"2d mo. 10th, 1840.—A beautiful day in the outward; and my soul has been made to experience for some days past, a little of the fresh inshining of the Sun of righteousness, after a season of winter and conflict. Herein there seemed a prostration of hope to a great degree; yet being mercifully favored patiently to wait for the Lord's time, He has been pleased to arise with healing in his wings, and has enabled me again to open my mouth in the assemblies of his people, which for two or three months has been pretty much closed. May I know a renewed engagement to seek a closer acquaintance with Him, the glorious Captain of salvation; and under every conflicting season, bow low in the sense that I need much correction, and thus be permitted to entertain the hope, that these dispensations may be the means of breaking up those corruptions of my fallen nature, which remain to hinder and perplex me in the way everlasting."

"5th mo. 25th, 1840.—My mind this morning has been affected with feelings of awfulness in reflecting upon the work I have undertaken; which seems ready to overwhelm me at times in the sense of my weakness and utter incapacity of myself to do any thing to the honor of the Great Name. May I continue deeply sensible of my entire dependence upon Him, the great Shepherd, who putteth forth and goeth before. Since about the date of the last note, until within a week past, my mouth has been again closed as to any public communication in our own meeting, and but few times elsewhere; in which season my mind has been closely exercised on several accounts. I have been dipped into sympathy with a state similar to that I passed through during a time of backsliding in years past; and my soul has had afresh to participate in feelings which the pen cannot record. Wherein, nevertheless, through the goodness of the Heavenly Shepherd, I have been enabled to experience sustaining help; and I trust a little qualification to minister to that struggling seed, which is pressed down in the hearts of the children of men; and which, as it is suffered to arise will, in its own blessed power, reign over all.*

Many are the causes for trial and even discouragement in the present day among us as a religious Society; and those who can feel, have need deeply to ponder their responsibilities and duty; and according to their respective measures, seek a qualification to fill up that which remains of the afflictions of Christ for his body's sake which is the Church; and be willing to come up in a faithful performance of those things which He calls for at our hands. From the extreme that led many to deny the Divine character and offices of our Holy Redeemer, and carried off many into separation and contention, we have now to contend with the opposite, of endeavoring to persuade that the work of justification is wholly performed by Him in his own body and offering; and that a mere belief in his outward advent, suffices to make us holy in the Divine sight; and also to make us ready to deny that precious doctrine of Holy Scripture respecting the immediate manifestation of Christ in Spirit to his disciples and children in this day. My mind has been often affected in a sense of these defections among us; and under a sense of the weakness prevailing in these as well as in other respects, I was engaged in our Yearly Meeting last month to express myself in these words: 'I feel an earnest desire that we as a religious body, may be more and more engaged to recur to first principles—to the principles of our forefathers—which are those of unchanging truth; and while we are very diligent as we ought to be in the perusal of the Holy Scriptures, let us remember that they recommended the people in their day to a higher and certain standard, even the light, grace, and good Spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ inwardly revealed to the soul. As we are diligently attentive to the voice of this Heavenly guide and teacher, we shall know a qualification wrought in us to draw water for ourselves out of the wells of salvation; and from living experience to speak of the Lord's wonderful works.'

It is very possible for us to read the Holy Scriptures from day to day, and from month to month, and from year to year; and after all we may find by and by that we have not gained one crumb of substantial bread or one

* William Penn, in allusion to the early days in the Society of Friends, conveys: "We were in travail for one another's preservation;" "treating one another as those who believed and felt God present," &c. Were there more of this religious exercise and concern for each other's welfare in the present day,—bearing one another's burdens and so fulfilling the law of Christ—we believe it would be better with us,—with them that sow and them that reap. The weak hands would be strengthened in the ever-blessed Truth, the feeble knees confirmed in that which is everlasting; while at the same time the Scripture would be realized in our experience: "He that watereth, shall be watered himself."

This "travail" for the preservation and help of individuals, as well as for the whole Body, might cause the members more to rejoice in the Lord, and to set up Ebenezers to his praise; whereby also, through the condescension of Him who regardeth the dust of Zion, Sharon might abundantly blossom, Carmel be revived, and the Eternal Name be exalted over all.

drop of living water. May we then be earnestly engaged to seek to have bread in our own houses, and water in our own cisterns: then shall we realize for ourselves the dawning of that glorious gospel day, wherein every man is not to teach his neighbor, or say to his brother "know the Lord, for they shall all know me from the least of them to the greatest of them." Then shall we know a walking in that highway of holiness, of which it is declared, that the wayfaring men though fools shall not err therein."

Celestial Photography.

Within a few years, celestial photography has made such rapid advances that it bids fair shortly to be, not only as a means of record, but also as a means of discovery, one of the prominent astronomical instruments of the immediate future. The science may be said to have originated in 1845, when Fizeau and Foucault took a daguerreotype image of the sun.

The camera is an artificial eye. There is the same lens in front,—the same sensitive plate or membrane on which the image falls. It possesses some advantages and some disadvantages over its prototype. As its use will not disable our natural eyes, the disadvantages may be left out of account. The advantages represent so much power gained to be used in wresting from nature its secrets. They may be considered under four heads:

1. The photographic eye can take a quicker look than the natural one. We do not receive a full impression of any object until we have looked at it for about one-tenth of a second. During this time, the image gets stronger and stronger; but short of this we cannot see to advantage. Now in certain objects, notably the sun, the changes occupy a much less time than this; hence with all the magnifying power of a telescope we can never hope to see distinctly the forms of the elements which make up the photosphere. In times of calm, these elements may be granular and spherical; but when their fluid masses, floating in a more fluid medium, are acted on by any of the countless currents and storms that sweep over the solar surface they readily assume such shapes and changes as the exterior forces impress upon them. At Mendon, in France, a photograph of a portion of the solar surface has been obtained with an exposure of only one hundred-thousandth of a second. This gives the shapes and location of the granules in a way they have never before been seen.

2. Another advantage of the photographic eye is that it can take a very long look. After one-tenth of a second, the impression on our retina becomes no stronger. As the new rays impinge, making new images, the images formed by the former rays fade away. Indeed, the tiring of the eyes is such that they see less well after continued looking at a faint object. Could this one-tenth of a second be lengthened out to a second, we could see ten times as brightly, the glare of the sun would be insupportable, night would be as bright as day, and hosts of faint objects would be brought into view. So it is with the sensitive plate in the camera. An impression formed lasts forever; a new one on top merely strengthens it; and if practical difficulties did not stand in the way there would seem to be no limit to the length of exposure and consequent piling up of the impressions. As it the nebula of Orion and all the features of tail of our latest bright comet have been brought out by exposures lasting between two and three hours.

3. Another gain we make by the use of the photographic plate is that we are able to photograph objects which the human eye is not constructed to see. If a ray from the sun passed through a prism, it is stretched out into a spectrum, the different parts of which differ in the rapidity of their vibrations. The eye can take in vibrations of certain rapidity and not others; it cannot see more than one quarter of the whole. There is a number of rays beyond the violet of the visible spectrum and a very large number outside the red which it never recognizes. The ultra-violet rays are noted for their power of affecting salts of silver and impressing themselves on a sensitive plate. The infra-red rays are principally rays of obscure heat; but they also to some degree can act on a photographic plate and make images of the objects from which they come. Captain Abney, in England, has succeeded in taking a photograph of a teakettle of hot water in a room perfectly dark by means of the obscure heat-rays which radiated from it. When we read this, it does not seem impossible that some day, not only the suns of space, but also their dark worlds will throw their images on our silver film and thus render themselves visible. To supplement the eye, photography then has a especial value, and if we can find some substance still more or differently sensitive than silver salts—which is not improbable,—there does not seem to be any object which throws out rays of any kind which is beyond the reach of our cameras. All our senses are very imperfect. They are constructed so as to be limited in their powers. When the vibrations are of certain quality, they impress the ear and sounds are heard; when they change a little, all is silence. The trouble is in the ear that is not attuned to the new wave-lengths. So with the eye; given a certain rate of motion of the rays which proceed from objects and all the variety of the external world is in the limits of our gaze. Change the rate, and utter darkness follows, notwithstanding the fact that emanations are still entering the pupil; the retina does not respond and no image goes to the brain. The camera gives us, as it were, a new sense. Its retina does respond to these invisible rays. The image is stamped upon it, and it becomes a source of visible rays, and we see the likeness of the dark object, even though we do not see the object itself. It must not be supposed that much has actually been done in the way of photographing dark objects; it is only one of the achievements of the future which seems to be within grasp.

4. But the main use of photography which will suggest itself to everyone is to obtain from the heavenly bodies and their phenomena images that will be lasting. Observers have had to preserve in their memory the appearances and make a description or drawing. Memory is deceptive, and the hand unskilful. But these permanent records can be examined and studied at leisure. There is a certain kind of accuracy about them which cannot be impeached, and comparisons of the different pictures of the same object or group can after the lapse of many years or centuries be readily made. We must remem-er the vast distances that separate the stars from us and from each other, and that they are all in rapid motion and most of them changing their relative positions. It is at least seven thousand times as far to the nearest star as the extremest planet is from the sun. It is more than two hundred thousand times as far as is the great expanse between the earth and the sun. There is no reason to suppose that nebulae are any less distant. Any motions that take place among them will not be detected in a few years. Micrometers and transit circles will do something to locate the larger stars with a sufficient degree of precision to compare, perhaps, with other positions obtained after the lapse of a thousand years. But the great mass of small stars—tens of thousands that are thrown together in clusters,—cannot be thus located without immense labor. But they can, when photography becomes perfect enough, so impress themselves on a plate that a perfect map of them is obtained for the use of all future ages. The nebulae—cloudlike forms which may be drifting about in all possible configurations,—will give us their outline and structure when their light left them, some years before it reached us; and if the astronomers of the next century will compare our work with theirs they may have a fund to draw from which is denied us.

Though the method is in its infancy as a means of research, there is already something going. Daily through many telescopes the maps on the solar surface are imprisoning their images within our reach. The one thousand plates of the late transit of Venus are probably the most valuable outcome of all the expeditions. Harvard Observatory has begun a grand sweep of the heavens, to embrace all the larger stars; Dr. Gould, in South America, has good negatives of some forty or fifty of the most noted clusters to be seen in the Southern sky, and he thinks he can photograph through a telescope, stars that the same telescope will not reveal to the eye directly; M. Jansen has gone to the South Pacific, to observe the solar eclipse, and expects to photograph the whole neighborhood of the sun, to make sure of catching the disputed intra-mercurial planet, should there be such a thing of any considerable size; and, not least wonderful, Dr. Higgins has in full glare of sun-light caught the image of the faint solar corona on his silver plate. Draper, Jansen and Common have photographed the nebula of Orion, and what is still more striking its spectrum, and a number of cameras have been turned successfully on the bright comets of recent times. This record in the dawn of the science promises much for the future.—Isaac Sharpless, in The American.

Margaret Trembath.

"It was not until the year 1835 that it was required of me to make a further change. This was in language, and was sharper than any former exercise. Before this was effected I had much to contend with, and it was given me to understand that if my eye offended, it must be plucked out, and if my hand it must be cut off. Strength was again afforded me to lift my heart unto Him who had deeply wounded, that I might be enabled to endure the sharpness of his two-edged sword, and that He would be pleased in mercy to continne to strive until I yielded him my heart; for I was really afraid at this time that by my disobedience and repeated falls the mercy of my God was clean gone forever. In my anguish a desperate act was looked at; but He that willeth not the death of a sinner was pleased to say—

'Give to the winds thy fears,
Hope and be undismayed;
God hears thy sighs, He counts thy tears,
He shall lift up thy head.'

This was like life from the dead, and I promised, through his assistance, never more to resist his grace. In one of our meetings at this time a messenger from the Most High, agreeably to my secret request, came to proclaim liberty to the captives, and to bind up the broken hearted. This of all meetings was most memorable to me, when I was met in a narrow place, the undivided waters before me, and the host behind! Help came to me in this language, 'The Eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the Everlasting Arms. He shall thrust out the enemy from before thee, and shall say, Destroy them, destroy them.' And on the banks of deliverance I was enabled to say—

'Hence, my doubts!—away, my fears!
Jesus is become my peace.'

Never did the agitated face of the great deep at its worst, succeeded by a perfect calm, more resemble my feelings.

One of the enemy's last darts which I wrote to a Friend on the morning on which I wrote to a Friend on the subject of membership, was that Friends were a declining people, and in a few years would be extinct. This I met by saying that I believed it was the Truth I sought, if so, it would stand firm as a rock; if I felt it should be on this ground. This was in the Eighth month, 1836, and on the same day I was visited by several Friends, some of whom expressed their gratitude unto Him who had thus far helped me; and the following month I was invited to attend their meeting for discipline!

Oh! what a wilderness of snares and temptations have I been brought through! Let none despair of the mercy of God, since I, even I, have been thus favored; truly the Lord has done great things for me whereof I am glad; and if I may by any means stimulate one poor way-worn traveller to come, taste, and see how good the Lord is, unto the Lord on high who is mighty be all the praise."

In the winter of 1840-41 Elizabeth Richardson, of Sunderland, and her daughters Sarah and Elizabeth, were lodging in Penzance, and an intimacy and close friendship with Margaret Trembath commenced, which ended only with life; and that intimacy was marked by some facts of no common character.

In some of their rambles M. T.'s sister Elizabeth joined them, and they distributed tracts among the fishermen of Mousehole with remarkable results, and Elizabeth Richardson, Jr., called Mousehole her 'favorite village.'

One day, when engaged in this work, they handed a tract to Honor Jago, an aged woman. She lived only a few weeks after this interview, chiefly confined to her bed. She kept the tract ('Salvation by Christ') on the bed by her side, and rejoiced in the sense of pardon through the 'Sinner's Friend.'

Another case was that of Martin Wright, who was regarded as a very wicked man, and opposed to religion, although he was the son of a missionary. The narrative is thus given by Elizabeth Richardson in her diary:—

"Twelfth month 29th, 1840.—Sarah, Edward and I took an excursion to Mousehole; the horse was put up, and Sarah and I went to Elizabeth Trembath's, who inquired if we wished to see the village. One circumstance occurred which impressed us considerably. I had a large bundle of tracts, which we either gave to those we met or left at cottages. I handed one to a man, which he received civilly. After we had passed, E. T. remarked, 'I am glad you gave that man a tract, he is such an infidel.' 'Well,' I replied, somewhat surprised, 'the tract I gave him was "The Christian and Infidel in the hour of danger."' E. T. was surprised at his receiving the tract in the way he did, for she said he refused everything of the kind, and was a sad swearer; he had a wife and children, who were very different from him.'

"Second month 12th, 1841.—Elizabeth Trembath called; much interested in hearing something further respecting the tract, which in our last visit to Mousehole was handed—may I not say providentially?—to a man said to be 'a sad infidel, swearer,' &c. A little time ago, E. T. and this man's wife were walking together and talking over the affairs of their Church; she expressed regret at her husband having so long neglected the 'means of grace,' but said she hoped that some time it might be different, for the other day he came into the house with a tract in his hand, which he said a Quaker lady had given to him; he sat down and read it awhile, then slipped it into the Bible, and gave the child orders not to move it from the place in which he had put it. When he came back he finished reading the tract, and read his Bible, and since then he had, so his wife said, continued reading his Bible more or less every day." This man made a happy end, and was as a brand plucked from the burning.

The friendship formed with Sarah and Elizabeth Richardson, Jr., led M. Trembath to dispose of her business at Marazion in 1847, and to take up her residence at Shotley Bridge.

It was in the meeting at Shotley Bridge that M. T. first spoke in the ministry. Her communications as a minister were brief but weighty, and calculated to point the believer to Jesus as the Redeemer, and the Sanctifier. She was recorded as a minister by the Monthly Meeting of West Cornwall in 1878. A testimony respecting her was issued by that Monthly Meeting, from which the following is extracted:—

"M. Trembath was naturally of a strong understanding and possessed much originality of mind, so that the few advantages of education presented by a remote fishing village at the early part of the century, were turned to good account, and her acute observation of character and ready sympathy with the feelings of others, made her company and conversation appreciated by those far beyond her station and opportunities, while her deep religious insight, and the gift of imparting the word in season to individuals, caused her to be especially valued by the spiritually-minded of all denominations; and wherever her lot was cast, the influence of her spirit, continually looking for Heavenly guidance in her daily concerns, as well as in weightier matters, was felt by those around her."

The last few days of her life were passed in much weakness and almost unconsciousness, in consequence of an accident while travelling; but the day preceding her death she responded to a friend who asked her how she did, "Thy rod and thy staff they comfort me."

She died at Mousehole, the 10th of First month, 1882, and was buried at Friends' burial-ground, Marazion, on the 14th.

Sea Side.

For "The Friend."

Sojourning for a short time at one of the many sea-side resorts, now so numerous along the Atlantic coast, for the renewal of health and strength, we have found much to interest, instruct and impress the mind. It is a pleasant occupation, when the state of the atmosphere permits, to sit upon the beach and watch the ever-changing and ceaseless swelling, heaving and curving of wave after wave as they approach and break upon the shore.

"The ocean looketh up to heaven,
And mirrors every star,
Its waves are kneeling on the strand,
As kneels the human knee,
Their white locks bowing to the sand,
The priesthood of the sea."

We note with interest the frequent passing and re-passing of sail and steam vessels, which by the aid of a moderate sized glass can be brought quite near to sight, so as to see men moving about on their decks; and we follow the movements of the numerous little steam-tugs, engaged, it is said, in fishing with nets and boats, the fish being removed from the nets by means of a scoop, attached to an arm projecting from the mast, carried on board the vessel, and there pressed into oil as far as practicable, the residuum being sold for fertilizing purposes; as many as 10 or 12 of these little craft being in sight at a time, particularly of a clear day after a storm.

How long the fish will continue to supply such a wholesale demand made upon it, is a problem which time only can solve. We know that the sea is vast in its proportions beyond the comprehension of finite man to fathom its depths and mysterious contents. The more we look upon it, watch its varied appearances, meditate upon its grandeur, yet see that the mandate uttered in the beginning is still obeyed: "Thus far shalt thou go and no further," &c., we are led to exclaim, with David, "Oh! Lord, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all; the earth is full of thy riches. So is this great and wide sea, wherein are things creeping innumerable, both small and great beasts. These wait all upon thee, that thou mayest give them their meat in due season."

The frequent mention that is made of the sea in the Old as well as the New Testament, the miracles and other striking events that are narrated in the latter as occurring near to and upon it, give it, to the mind of the Christian, an impressive interest. He remembers that it was the Lord who "Gave to the sea his decree, that the waters should not pass his commandment"—"that it was He which alone spreadeth out the heavens and treadeth upon the waves of the sea,"—who "Gathereth the sea together as an heap; He layeth up the depth in storehouses"—that of Him it is declared, "Thou rulest the raging of the sea; when the waves thereof arise, thou stillest them,"—and that He refers to its obedience to his laws as an evidence of his power, "Fear ye not me? saith the Lord; will ye not tremble at my presence, which have placed the sand for the bound of the sea, by a perpetual decree, that it cannot pass it; and though the waves thereof toss themselves, yet can they not prevail; though they roar, yet can they not pass over it."

It is well to remember when at the sea side, as at other places of public resort, that watchfulness over our conduct and conversation is just as essential as when pursuing our daily avocation at home, and will, it is believed, be productive of more solid happiness in the end.

In conclusion, the descriptive lines of Lydia H. Sigourney, on the sea, are suggested:

THE SEA.

Emblem of everlasting power, I come
Into thy presence, as an awe-struck child
Before its teacher. Spread thy boundless page,
And I will ponder o'er its characters,
As erst the pleased disciple sought the lore
Of Socrates or Plato. Yon old rock
Hath heard thy voice for ages, and grown grey
Beneath thy smittings, and thy wrathful tide
Even now is thundering 'neath its caverned base.
Methinks it trembleth at thy stern rebuke—
Is it not so?

Speak gently mighty sea!
I would not know the terrors of thine ire
That vex the gasping mariner; and bid
The wrecking argosy to leave no trace
Or bubble where it perished. Man's weak voice,
Tho' wildly lifted in its proudest strength
With all its compass—all its volumed sound—
Is mockery to thee. Earth speaks of man—
Her levelled mountains and her cultured vales,
Town, tower, and temple, and triumphal arch,
All speak of him and moulder while they speak.
But of whose architecture and design
Tell thine eternal fountains, when they rise
To combat with the cloud, and when they fall!
Of whose strong culture tell thy sunless plants,
And groves and gardens, which no mortal eye
Hath seen, and lived?

What chisel'd art hath wrought
Those coral monuments, and tombs of pearl,
Where sleeps the sea boy 'mid a pomp that earth
Ne'er showed her buried kings?

Whose science stretched
That simplest line to curb thy monstrous tide,
And graving "Hitherto" upon the sand,
Bade thy mad surge respect it?

From whose loom
Came forth thy drapery, that ne'er waxeth old,
Nor blancheth 'neath stern winter's direst frost?

Who hath thy keys, thou deep? Who taketh note
Of all thy wealth? Who numbereth the host
That find their rest with thee? What eye doth scan Thy secret annals, from creation locked,
Close in those dark, unfathomable cells—
Which he who visiteth, hath ne'er returned
Among the living?

Still but one reply?
Do all thine echoing depths and crested waves
Make the same answer? Of that One Dread Name
Which he, who deepest plants within his heart,
Is wisest, tho' the world may call him fool.

Therefore, I come a listener to thy lore
And bow me at thy side, and lave my brow
In thy cool billows, if, perchance, my soul,
That fleeting wanderer on the shore of time,
May, by thy voice instructed, learn of God.

Selected.

WHAT THE TRAVELLER SAID AT SUNSET.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

The shadows grow and deepen round me,
I feel the dew-fall in the air,
The muezzin of the dark'ning thicket
I hear the night-thrush call to prayer.

The evening wind is sad with farewells,
And loving hands unclasp from mine,
Alone I go to meet the darkness
Across an awful boundary-line.

As from the lighted hearths behind me
I pass with slow, reluctant feet,
What waits me in the land of strangeness?
What face shall smile, what voice shall greet?

What space shall awe, what brightness blind me?
What thunder-roll of music stun?
What vast processions sweep before me
Of shapes unknown beneath the sun?

I shrink from unaccustomed glory,
I dread the myriad-voiced strain;
Give me the unforgotten faces,
And let my lost ones speak again.

He will not chide my mortal yearning,
Who is our Brother and our Friend,
In whose full life Divine and human,
The heavenly and the earthly blend.

Mine be the joy of soul-communion,
The sense of spiritual strength renewed,
The reverence for the pure and holy,
The clear delight of doing good.

No fitting ear is mine to listen,
An endless anthem's rise and fall;
No curious eye is mine to measure
The pearl gate and the jasper wall.

For love must needs be more than knowledge;
What matter if I never know
Why Aldebaran's star is ruddy,
Or colder Sirius white as snow!

Forgive my human words. Oh! Father!
I go thy larger truth to prove,
Thy mercy shall transcend my longing;
I seek but love, and thou art Love!

I go to find my lost and mourned for,
Safe in thy sheltering goodness still,
And all that hope and faith foreshadow
Made perfect in thy holy will!

The Education of Character.

A friend has sent us the following thoughtful and suggestive article on "The Education of Character," taken from the Public Ledger, of this city. That a good moral character is more valuable than merely intellectual culture, is so evident a truth, that, probably, few right-minded persons will deny it.

One of the difficulties in the moral training so forcibly advocated in the Ledger's article is, that the only solid and reliable foundation of morality is religion, which cannot be communicated by any human culture. Yet much may be done by conscientious parents and caretakers in keeping the young from evil, in early turning their attention to the voice of the Saviour speaking in their hearts, and in encouraging them to reverence and obey it—as well as in familiarizing them with the precepts and promises contained in the Scriptures.

We hope the article may awaken profitable trains of thought in the minds of many, and lead to an increased estimate of the greater importance of character than culture, and to more watchful care and greater efforts to "train up the children in the way they should go."

"We are all ready to declare, with emphasis, our belief that character is far more necessary to the welfare of the individual and the good of society than any amount of learning or information. Yet this belief must be rather one of the head than of the heart, for unfortunately it does not effectively influence our practice. The mental discipline gained by intellectual studies is eagerly craved by the parent for his child, and by every lover of human nature for her people, and being thus eagerly craved, it is, of course, secured; continual accessions are being made to it in improved methods—teachers and text-books, and the best thought of competent persons is constantly being brought to bear upon it. Now if we really believed in our own hearts what we profess to hold—that important as this may be, the possession of a good character truth, honesty, fidelity and industry, is justly more important, should we not see suits of such a belief exhibited in at least equal efforts to promote it?

It is true every parent hopes that his child will have it, and many a faithful mother inculcates moral principle so earnestly and presents so high an example of it in her own life, that her children grow up well fortified against temptation. This, however, is by no means universal, and to neglect it is not considered near so disgraceful as to neglect having a child taught to read and write. Conscientious teachers, too, strive hard to train the moral faculties of their pupils, but they labor at a disadvantage. Their efforts are necessarily desultory; they have neither time nor experience, nor preparation for the task; provision for it has not been made in the system, and they have to contend with difficulties which discourage and dishearten them.

The truth is that moral training has yet to be organized and systematized before it can be carried on with efficiency on a large scale, and this will not be done until its importance is more fully felt than at present. It is taken for granted, in a loose kind of way, that a good character will come of itself to most people. No one supposes that knowledge comes of itself; that mental power can be gained without trouble; that a trade or profession can be successfully pursued without previous systematic preparation. Yet all or any of these are more possible than that a character, worthy of respect and admiration, should spring up without being built, or without either care or knowledge on the part of the builder of the materials he uses, or the way in which to combine them.

To any one who patiently and thoughtfully considers the relative value to the world, to the nation, to the family, to the individual, of character and of what is popularly called education, it will be a matter of profound astonishment that so much time, thought and resources should be expended on the one and so little on the other. Take the workman who is industrious, sober, honest and truthful, but who has barely learned to read, and place him side by side with another who has enjoyed years of mental training, but who is lazy or intemperate, or unfaithful. No one would hesitate in pronouncing the former a far more valuable member of society, a better husband and father, a better citizen, a better and happier man. So the college-bred man who may have taken honors and begun a brilliant career, but who is a spendthrift or a gambler, or dishonorable in business, or self-indulgent, is vastly inferior, considered in any point of view, to the man who, with but few advantages of culture, has firm principle, provides for his family, and lives honorably before the world.

So in every case where moral character and intellectual acquirements are compared—it must be to the superiority of the former. Whether the parent is providing for the honor and happiness of his child, or the Government planning for the social value of its citizens, the work of character-building must take precedence of mental culture, both in time and importance.

The extreme delicacy and difficulty of this part of education afford one reason, doubtless, why it is so largely put aside. This, however, when admitted, should give an additional incentive for bringing all our powers to bear upon a subject at once so important to human welfare, and so little understood. Character is formed by habits, habits by repeated actions, and actions result from awakened feelings. If we would, then, successfully build up character worthy of esteem, we must present motives to right action, and strengthen the tendencies to such action by securing continuous repetition. Not by perpetually reiterating rules of conduct, insisting on one thing and denouncing another; not mainly by reasoning or explaining, or holding up consequences to view; but by so operating upon the emotions and desires as to strengthen the higher and weaken the lower, and by thus developing the germs of moral principle, which exist in every heart, are good habits formed and good character established.

For "The Friend."

Apt and instructive truly, is the following selection from the "Memoir of Mary Capper," when about 72 years of age: "Shall I be presumptuous if I record, with feelings of great seriousness, that my prevailing exercise in this my latter day, is secret, wrestling prayer, oft on the bended knee, in my quiet, secluded chamber. My spirit craves for more evident marks of godly simplicity among the Quakers, so called. I am one of those who mark the boasted 'March of intellect' with a jealous fear. The refinements of our day seem, in my view, to draw the mind from under the cross of Christ. According to my observation, we are not the plain, unfashionable people that, if faithful, we should be; we are too generally intermingled with the manners and maxims of the times. Everlasting Mercy can yet turn and overturn, and settle a faithful people."

To which, also from the pen of the same, showing her appreciation of fervent, reverential prayer, may be added the subjoined: "If the true light in the soul become darkness, how great is that darkness! Watch and pray that the day-spring from on high may again arise upon us as a religious Society, somewhat scattered and shaken. Oh! had we been a rightly praying people, surely so much declension had not spread among us. May there be, through a rising generation, a revival of true spiritual mindedness. The overshadowing of Mercy is to be experienced everywhere. Oh! how it would flow did every heart watch and pray. I am as weak, of myself, as the least babe; by watching unto prayer is my faith renewed, my hope of entire sanctification and salvation."

Giving his Life for his Friend.

A few years ago a sailing ship left Australia for England. One of the passengers was a gentleman who had recently gone to Australia for his health, but the place had not suited him; his bad health became worse. So he immediately took his passage back, and was now returning. The ship had made more than half her homeward voyage when she was caught in a storm, which lasted day after day and night after night in greatest fury. Winds fell upon her, tore her sails away, and snapped off and blew overboard her masts. Waves leaped upon the deck, tore coverings from over the stairways and ladders leading into the hold and cabins, and poured themselves down in tons of water, until the cook's fires were put out, the berths and cabins were flooded, and all the miserable passengers were driven up to the deck, which, you may imagine, was a scene of danger and confusion.

The ship was now sailless and mastless, and full of water, and rolling helplessly. All hands worked the pumps, but the water gained on them, and the ship sunk deeper and deeper into the sea, and long before the storm had abated it became quite clear that it must be abandoned if a single life was to be saved. So the captain gave orders to launch the boats which had not yet been swept overboard by the sea. These were only two, not half enough for the number of souls on board. The brave sailors obeyed as best they could, and while the boats were being got ready, the captain ordered that lots be cast as to who should go in the boats.

The people gathered under the shelter of some of the ruins of the masts. It was a deeply solemn time. Only one-half at most could be saved, the rest in a few hours, perhaps moments, must be drowned in the swirl of the ship going down; they all stood in the presence of death. Each name was written on a separate slip of paper, then the papers were mixed up in a box; the captain inserted his hand, drew out a name, and read it aloud. It was a dreadful moment to many of them as one by one they heard the names read, yet still theirs had not come, and now the last is being drawn. The captain lifts it to the flickering light of his lantern and reads. The very storm seems silent. The name is read, the suspense is over, and all know their fate. "Range yourselves in line," cried the captain to the fortunate ones, "and move one by one to the boats." And they filed off as ordered, while the doomed ones gathered in lines on either side to watch them go.

The dark day had settled into darker night; the air was black. The vessel rolled terribly, and the little boats, now lowered to the water, leaped and plunged in the blackness below. A lantern swung at the point where the men were to leave the ship to light them down. One by one the procession disappeared over the gunwale, hung on to the ship's side till the boat was thrown near, and then leaped into it.

The young man I have named was one of the procession, for his name had been among the names drawn. At length he was the next man to go. As he waited till the man before him had leaped, suddenly his eyes fell upon a pale, wan face close to him. He remembered it, and its story flashed upon him. He had talked with that young man in sunny days, and learned from him that three years ago, with but a small chance of life, he had left behind him in England his wife, a child, and a child since born, and now full of health, he was on his way home again. Three years had they been parted, and there he stood among the doomed. He thought of the wife's hopes, the children's bright talk about him, and after all he was to be lost! He could not bear it. In an instant, and without a word, he seized the man forced him over the gunwale and stepped aside into the man's place. It was the work of a second; there was no chance to demur. In a few moments more all was over. The ship had gone down, carrying with it a heart lost to itself, even to the value of life, in the thought of the miseries of others.

Some glorious deeds move us to clap our hands and shout. This moves us to tears and silence. It was the act of the utmost tenderness and beauty; and such a heart is like Christ's.

All lovely deeds and lovely hearts are precious in themselves, but most of all are they precious as they help us to understand the solemn, yes, the sad glory of redemption and the simple cause of it, the infinite tenderness of the heart of Christ.—Sunday Magazine.

Annual Meeting of the Society for the Suppression of the Opium Trade.

EXTRACTS FROM ADDRESS BY J. HUDSON TAYLOR.

It is a dangerous thing to a community, as well as to an individual, to continue in the face of heaven to do that which we know to be evil. Allow me to read the emphatic words of Henry Richard before the House of Commons: "I am not ashamed to say that I am one of those who believe that there is a God who ruleth in the kingdoms of men; and it is not safe for a community, any more than for an individual, recklessly and habitually to affront those great principles of truth, and justice, and humanity, on which I believe God governs the world; and we may be quite sure of this—that in spite of our pride of place and power, in spite of our vast possessions and enormous resources, in spite of our boasted forces by land and sea, if we come in conflict with that Great Power, we shall be crushed like the egg-shell against the granite rock." I will not say, if we are friends of China, let us put this evil down. If we are friends of England, let us put it down. As sure as justice does prevail, unless we give up this evil we must suffer for it. I wish I could take you into a company of Chinamen, as I have often been, and see the indignant Chinaman referring to England's opium traffic, and raising his finger in mute appeal to heaven, and uttering the significant words, "There is heaven above." Need I interpret those words? "We are powerless to resist the evil; we are powerless to defend ourselves from the wrong; but there is a Power above beholding the evil and the good, and his vengeance, though tardy, slumbers not." Oh, let us not call this vengeance upon us! Let us rather at once, and at any cost, do the thing that is right, and set China free to deal as she thinks best with this enormous evil.

Not six months ago, a friend of mine was travelling in the province of Nganhwui. He came to a market town which had never before been visited by a foreigner. He was led by his companions into the largest shop in the town, and he saw before him a Chinese inscription in large Chinese characters. He read that inscription. It was as follows: "In obedience to the will (or decree) of the Heavenly Father, I vow henceforth never to touch opium in public or in private." And the date was written against it. My friend said, "What does this mean?" The owner of the shop came forward, and soon gave a reply. He had been a victim to opium smoking for many, many years. Though well-to-do, and consequently able to bear the effect on his constitution and his purse better than most, he found himself in body and in circumstances seriously injured by it, and he tried to diminish the dose and to give it up. He could not do it. He got native medicines and tried to cure himself. He could not do it. He bought the foreign medicines that were advertised in Shanghai. He could not do it. But by-and-by a Chinese soldier, who had heard the Gospel from a missionary farther inland, came to that town, and preached to him of Jesus; and the shopkeeper received the Lord Jesus Christ into his heart. And with a renewed heart there came a renewed power to resist evil—a power to do right. One day the soldier came in to read some portion of the Scriptures with him, and saw him smoking his opium. He said, "Do not you know that you cannot be a Christian and smoke opium?" The shopkeeper had never thought of that. "Is it so?" he said. He was soon convinced that it was a sin, and he was exhorted by his friend to attempt to give it up gradually. "Ah," he said, "I have tried that, and failed." "Yes," said the soldier, "but you had not God on your side then. What you cannot do, God can help you to do. God is able to strengthen you to give up all that is sinful." "Do you really believe that it is really sinful to smoke—say three drachms of opium?" "It is, indeed." "Then it seems to me," said the man, "that if it is sinful to smoke three drachms, God cannot be pleased to see me smoke two drachms and nine-tenths. God cannot be pleased to see me smoking two or three times a day for two or three months, while I am giving it up. If the thing is wrong, it must be stopped at any cost at once." The soldier was terrified. He believed that the man would die. I have seen men die who have given up opium, and who had not smoked as much as that man smoked. The soldier was terrified, and yet he knew not what to say. He could not exhort him to do what he himself had said was wrong, and he said, "Let us pray." The two men knelt down and prayed. And as they prayed for help to the great God to help this man to give up the evil, his faith was strengthened. He rose from his knees. "Not a word," said he; but he took his pen and wrote that paper, and posted it up in his shop there and then, and he never touched opium afterwards. I do not need to tell this Christian audience that God helped that man! When did a man resolve to do right in the strength of God, and God forsake him or put him to shame?—London Friend.

War Expenses.—Out of every twenty shillings of British taxation and local rates, six shillings are devoted to paying the interest of the national debt, incurred for past wars. Five shillings and nine pence are devoted to the existing army and navy. So that about twelve shillings out of every pound are poured forth as a national offering, upon the bloody altar of Mars, even in these Christian days.—Herald of Peace.

Reaction from Militarism.—At the annual meeting of the French Peace Society, the president spoke of the reactionary influence of the militarism of the European governments upon their discontented subjects, oppressed and burdened by taxation for armaments and conscription. This reaction has taken the dangerous forms of Nihilism and anarchy. War, instead of elevating and refining humanity, as Marshal Moltke declared two years ago, has, on the contrary, degraded and brutalized the peoples. It has produced the spirit which uses for its arms the dagger of the assassin, and the dynamite of the conspirator.—Herald of Peace.

New Temperance Movement within the Roman Catholic Church.—The Chicago correspondent of the Presbyterian writes: "The Romanists in this section are evidently waking up to the necessity for a radical temperance reform. That more than three-fourths of our saloon-keepers in Chicago are Roman Catholics, is not a fact which any church can in these days, very well afford to wear as an ornament; and the Roman Catholic Church in this section seems to be waking up to the idea. Fifty-six delegates, representing 18 total abstinence societies, 36 priests, and many influential Catholic gentlemen not heretofore identified with the total abstinence idea, recently assembled in the Cathedral of the Holy Name, and after the celebration of a 'solemn high mass,' listened to a very eloquent and powerful temperance sermon from Father Hodnett. Archbishop Feehan was also present, and concluded the religious services with a pontifical benediction. Then a Diocesan Total Abstinence Society was organized, the adoption of a constitution and the election of officers. The archbishop identified himself with the movement very heartily by signing the constitution and by becoming the spiritual director of the Society. Many prominent and influential Irishmen in Chicago are identified with this new movement, which has connected with it an Employment Bureau whose object is to furnish employment to men of good moral character and temperate habits."

Methodist Itinerancy.—The Methodist press is discussing the question of removing all limit from the itinerancy. Their Discipline at present provides that a preacher shall not remain in the same station more than three years successively, or more than three years in six. If these rules are stricken from their Discipline, many of their ministers would no longer circulate as heretofore, but probably would settle in one place, as in most other Protestant denominations. The question involved in the discussion is a very important one, and the change is not likely to be effected without much opposition, if at all.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Sheet Lightning.—There has been some discussion in successive numbers of Nature, of the source of the sheet lightning so often observed on hot summer nights without any perceptible thunder accompanying. It is stated that the illuminations of an ordinary thunderstorm are visible a distance of forty miles, while the sound of thunder is rarely heard when the flash of lightning is fifteen miles away. This favors the supposition that these silent and beautiful displays are part of the phenomena attending storms too distant for the sound to reach the ear. That this is the case is rendered more probable by the fact that they are often the precursor of a thunderstorm, or the heralds of its approach. A communication from Jno. Tyndall confirms this. He says: "Looking to the south and south-east from the Bel Alp, the play of silent lightning among the clouds and mountains is sometimes very wonderful. It may be seen palpitating for hours, with a barely appreciable interval between the thrills. The Monte Generoso, overlooking the Lake of Lugano, is about fifty miles from the Bel Alp as the crow flies. The two points are connected by telegraph, and frequently when the [silent lightning] as seen from the Bel Alp, was in full y, I have telegraphed to the proprietor of the Monte Generoso hotel, and learnt in every instance that our silent lightning co-existed with a thunderstorm in Upper Italy." It is probable that in some instances these exhibitions are produced by the escape of the electricity of the clouds in flashes too feeble to produce an audible sound.

Bees.—The bees of the Cape of Good Hope are more vicious than those of Europe. A writer in Nature, who has an apiary at that place, thinks they recognize persons more by smell than by sight; and refers to the case of a person who allowed a species of wasp, native to Natal, to build in the door posts of his house. Although he often interfered with the nest, he was only once stung, and that by a young wasp; but no one of the Kafirs, who have a peculiarly disagreeable odor, could venture to approach the door, much less enter. The Cape bees dislike the smell of carrot— a Hottentot child who mischievously threw a piece of carrot and spat it into the entrance of a hive, was so severely stung that his life was only saved by a gardener who heard his screams thrusting him into a trench and quickly covering him with earth.

Incombustible Paper.—G. Meyer, at a recent meeting of the Société d'Encouragement, exhibited a new paste combination designed for the manufacture of incombustible cardboard paper of all sorts and shades. Asbestos is the principal thing employed in its manufacture. He presented specimens of writing, printing, engraving, &c., made with his inks of different colors, and also showed a water-color drawing that had been submitted to the fiery ordeal of the potter's furnace. The printing had preserved all its brilliancy and the paper all its flexibility. A lithograph, seven by sixteen centimeters, was placed between two layers of glass in a state of fusion. After removal the paper was found to have completely resisted the action of the heat, and engraving to have preserved all its sharpness.

Turning the Sahara into a Sea.—The project of turning the Sahara, or a part of it, into a great inland sea connected with the Mediterranean, promises to be both practicable and profitable. Soundings in various parts have shown the existence of nothing but sand to a depth of over 200 feet. With the aid of excavators, representing the work of 10,000 men, the sea might easily be made. Lesseps met with the best reception from the Arab soldiery and population, and made a complete survey of the country between the Red Sea and the Marsh Lakes. He declared that the soil will allow of the excavations necessary to connect the lakes with the Mediterranean; that the works will present no extraordinary difficulty, and that the concessions asked for with regard to the forest and mining lands will make the scheme remunerative and wholly independent of State subvention, or guarantee.

Asteroids.—The number of asteroids discovered has reached 220, but only a few of them possess a diameter of twenty-five geographical miles. In most cases the diameter is to range from five to fifteen miles.

Transport of Live Fish.—The Indian live fish sent to the Fisheries Exhibition in London were transported with the utmost care and economy. Bombay sent ten glass vases filled with aquatic plants, and containing two species of climbing perch. These vases were arranged to swing from a boom on the deck of the vessel, and food for the voyage was provided in the shape of pans of live earth-worms, under the care of the ship's butcher, who was to feed the precious freight. Similar vases were sent from Calcutta, but owing to defective arrangements several of the fish had died by the time they reached Bombay, where accordingly the vases were refilled and replanted.

Amber Deposits of Europe.—In a work that has just been published on the flora of the famous amber deposits of Northern Germany, the great amber-supplying region of the globe, Professor R. Goepfert gives some very interesting data relative to the origin, nature and probable extent of this highly-prized fossil gum. The amber flora represents about twenty species of fungi, twelve lichens, and about an equal number of mosses, and in addition no less than forty-two species of conifers, oaks, birches and willows, besides twenty-seven Monopetale and twelve Polypetale. The amber-bearing formation extends from the confines of the White Sea into Holland. The richest deposits lie along a strip of coast-land stretching from Memel to Dantzic, and appear to attain their greatest development in the province of Samland, where they are known as the "blue earth," and where they occupy a belt or zone depressed from eighty to one hundred feet beneath the surface. This Samland blue earth extends along the coast for a distance of sixty miles, and possesses a breadth of about twelve miles, with an average thickness estimated at about ten feet. Each cubic foot of earth is calculated by Runge to contain no less than one-twelfth of a pound of the resin. The actual yield at the present time is in the neighborhood of two or three hundred thousand pounds per annum (stated to be about five times the quantity annually thrown up by the waves on the shores of the Baltic.)

Wine Vaults.—The wine vaults of London were recently inspected by a correspondent who was given unusual facilities for sight-seeing, and he avers that in a tour of the St. Katherine and London Dock vaults, he saw over five million packages of port and sherry, over one million of claret, and five hundred thousand of spirits. They were in vast tuns, hogsheads, casks and barrels, and the total amount in storage was two hundred and sixty million gallons. There were six and a half gallons for every man, woman and child of the population of Great Britain. Some of it had been in store for years. The owners had forgotten about it, and the old and mouldy casks had rotted away at their chimes and had been several times replaced. One lot of one thousand gallons of sherry had been in the vaults for nearly fifty years. It was brought from the South of Spain by its owner, who had fallen dead in the vaults. The wine along with his other property, had passed into chancery, and the litigation, which has continued for nearly half a century, is as far from being ended, apparently, as when it began. But the wine has been growing old and valuable, and if sold now would probably bring five guineas a gallon. These vaults are simply great cellars under the dock-houses. In area they aggregate some thirty-five acres. They extend under the Thames on one side and well under Tower Hill on the other. They are about sixteen feet from floor to roof, and are by no means regular in form, but reach out in strange passages and alleys in all directions. They are bonded by the Government, and owners can have their property in them as long as they like without paying customs duties.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 4, 1883.

Isaac Penington, in one of his letters, in enforcing the importance of being obedient and subject to the Lord in the least thing that He makes manifest, says to his correspondent: "If the Lord would show thee but this one thing,—that, to use 'thee' and 'thou' to a particular person, is proper language, and Scripture language; and that, to say 'you' is improper, and arose from pride, and nourisheth pride, and so is of the world, and not of the Father; and thou should bow thy spirit to Him in this one thing, thou little thinkest what a work it would make within thee, and how strongly the spirit of darkness would fight against thy subjection thereto."

We believe there is at this day in the minds of many, too much of a disposition to shrink from that full submission of heart to the Divine will, which would lead to an unreserved obedience to all the Lord's requirements—however trivial and unimportant they may seem to our natural wisdom. But it remains to be true, that to enter the Kingdom of Heaven, we must become as little children, humble, obedient, and unquestioning; content to be led and guided by Him who still hides his mysteries from the wise and prudent and reveals them unto babes.

We fear that some of our members, who are attached to our Society, and who rejoice in the prosperity of the Church of Christ, are suffering loss from want of greater faithfulness in what they may consider little things. This want of faithfulness weakens the force of their testimony to the truth, lessens their influence for good in the world, and is a hindrance to their own spiritual progress. To such an one it may be said: "If thou should bow thy spirit to the Lord in these things, thou little thinkest what a work it would make within thee," or how much of increased blessing would follow from bringing all the tithes into the Lord's storehouse.

A correspondent has kindly called our attention to the anecdote of the canal captain and the sick traveller, related in "Incidents and Reflections," on p. 395 of this journal. If the passengers were coming from the West, as therein stated, the place where they were transferred to the canal boat must have been on the east side of the mountains, not west, as stated in the narrative.

We have no means of determining how the mistake occurred, nor is it important for the purpose for which the story is told. The noble conduct of the captain, and the reproof administered to the inconsiderate fellow-passengers of the sick man, are unaffected by the question whether it occurred on the east or the west of the Alleghanies. Yet we love accuracy, and would not willingly have a misstatement on our pages, even on so immaterial a point.

The charge of 10 cents annually for postage, heretofore made to our subscribers, will be discontinued in the future; and the terms for "The Friend" will be $2 per annum, payable in advance. The few subscribers who have already paid the postage on vol. 57, can receive it back by calling at the publication office.

After the present number, our city subscribers will receive their papers through the mail, instead of having them delivered by a carrier.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The 121st call for the redemption of bonds has been issued by the Secretary of the Treasury. It embraces, as anticipated, all the outstanding 3½ per cents not offered for exchange.

The acting Director of the Mint has ordered that no melting charge be imposed on trade dollars deposited at the Mints on account of sales of silver bullion.

The Treasury Department has received from the British authorities a remonstrance against "the return to England of the alleged pauper emigrants who were going to friends in this country who had promised to take care of them, and which emigrants had shown letters to that effect on their arrival in the United States." The matter will be inquired into.

A compromise between the American Rapid Telegraph Co. and its striking employees having been effected, the latter have returned to work. With this exception, the situation of affairs in the telegraphers' strike has not materially changed, both sides seeming to regard the matter as a question of endurance. The strikers express the belief that the sentiment of the business public will force the Western Union Company to yield, while the company reiterates its ability to supply the public wants indefinitely, and declares that the strikers will be forced to come in when their funds are exhausted, if not before.

Montgomery Blair died on the 27th ult., at his residence at Silver Springs, near Washington, in the 71st year of his age.

Another salt vein, said to be the purest crystal yet discovered, has been struck at Genesee, New York, at the depth of 990 feet.

By the railroad collision on the Rome, Watertown and Ogdensburg Railroad, at Carleton Station, on Saturday evening, the 27th ult., 16 persons were killed and 14 injured.

On Second-day morning, the 30th ult., 236 warrants were issued against violators of the new "Sunday" law, which went into effect the day before. Among those reported as having violated the law were keepers of livery stables, breweries, cigar stores, barbers, hackmen, theatres, newspaper men from the proprietors down, street railway and express companies, the Union Depot Company for sending out trains, and various other persons. The Prosecuting Attorney decided to drop cases against liverymen on the ground that their business was "a work of necessity." Test cases are to be advanced on the dockets against the street car companies and the newspapers. The beer saloons in the central portion of the city closed on First-day before noon, but it is estimated that the entire sales of liquor in St. Louis on that day reached $60,000.

Polk, the ex-treasurer of Tennessee, has been convicted of embezzling the money in his hands belonging to the State. At Nashville, on Seventh-day the 28th, Judge Allen overruled the motion for a new trial, and sentenced the prisoner to twenty years' imprisonment at hard labor in the penitentiary, and to pay a fine of $366,000. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court and a bond of $45,000 given.

The army worm is reported to be doing much damage in the neighborhood of Belvidere, New Jersey.

The deaths in Philadelphia for the week ending 7th mo. 28th, numbered 441, of which 235 were of children under five years of age. Of this number, 232 were males, and 209 females: 97 died of cholera infantum; 43 of consumption; 33 of marasmus; 21 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 13 of diphtheria; 12 of typhoid fever; 8 of scarlet fever, and 7 of Bright's disease.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s, 113; 4's, 119½; 3's, 103½; currency 6's, 128 a 132.

Cotton.—Prices remain about the same as last quoted. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 10¾ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ a 7¾ cts. for export, and 8½ a 8¾ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is firm and in fair demand. Sales of 2700 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5 a $6; Pennsylvania family at $5; western do. at $5.50 a $6, and patents at $6.25 a $7.25. Rye flour is firm at $3.50 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is dull and lower. Sale of 3000 bushels red in car lots, at $1.12 a $1.18. Rye is dull at 63 a 65 cts. Corn is quiet and lower for options. Sales of 9000 bushels in lots at 50 a 66 cts. Oats are dull and weak. Sales of 8500 bushels in car lots at 40 a 46 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 7th mo. 28th, 1883.—Loads of hay, 268; loads of straw, 67. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 85 a 95 cts. per 100 lbs.; mixed, 75 a 85 cts. per 100 lbs.; straw, 50 a 60 cts. per 100 pounds. New hay 50 a 70 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in fair demand this week and prices were a fraction higher: 3500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4¼ a 6¼ cts. per lb., the latter rate for a few extra.

Sheep were in better demand and a fraction higher: 11,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 2½ a 5½ cts., and lambs at 3¼ a 8 cts. per pound, as to quality.

Hogs were in demand and a fraction higher: 4200 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 8 a 8½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

FOREIGN.—Chamberlain, President of the Board of Trade, has announced in the House of Commons that the Government had abandoned for this session the English Channel Tunnel bill.

Gladstone has written to De Lesseps, thanking him for so freely and amicably stating that the British Government was not bound to press the provisional canal agreement upon Parliament, and for similarly announcing the independent action which he proposes to take in regard to the construction of another canal. The French press generally consider the withdrawal by the English Government from their agreement with De Lesseps as favorable to the Suez Canal Company.

Intelligence has been received that James Carey, the informer in the Phoenix Park murder cases, was shot dead on the 29th ultimo, on the steamer Melrose while she was between Cape Town and Port Elizabeth. The deed was committed by a fellow passenger named O'Donnell.

A man named Terry left Dover, England, at 9 o'clock on the morning of the 28th, on a floating tricycle, and arrived safely at Calais, in France, at 5 o'clock the same afternoon.

A Parliamentary pamphlet has been published giving the results of the census of 1881 in the Isle of Man and the Channel Islands. It appears that in the Isle of Man the population had increased from 54,042, in 1871, to 54,089 in 1881. In Jersey it had decreased from 56,627 to 52,445, and in Guernsey and adjacent islands it had increased from 33,969 to 35,257.

Advices from Durban, relative to the death of King Cetewayo at the hands of the insurgents, assert that all his wives, many of his chiefs and a great number of his men were also killed.

Melbourne, 7th mo. 24th.—The opinion of the people with reference to the annexation of New Guinea and the New Hebrides is much excited. The Frenchmen at Noumea, New Caledonia, are in a ferment, owing to rumors that Great Britain will annex the New Hebrides. An agitation has commenced in favor of the annexation of the Islands by the French, and a deputation has waited upon the Governor of New Caledonia and urged their annexation, on the ground that the New Hebrides are a dependency of the colony. The Governor promised to take measures to counteract the designs of Australia.

An explosion has occurred in a mine at Caltanissetta, Sicily, by which 35 miners out of a total of 70 lost their lives.

A despatch to the London Daily Telegraph from Berne says: A convention between Switzerland and the United States, according to which any differences between the two republics are to be settled by arbitration, is about to be submitted to the Swiss Federal Assembly. The convention has been accepted by the United States.

Eighth mo. 16th has been fixed as the date for the opening of the International Electrical Exhibition at Vienna.

One hundred and eighty houses have been destroyed by fire in the town of Semenov, in the Government of Nizhnee-Novgorod, Russia.

General Wallace, the American Minister, has sent a fresh note to the Porte demanding a prolongation of the treaty of commerce between Turkey and the United States, but refusing to a revision of the tariff.

Over 5000 persons from Seltzer occurred in Egypt for the week ending 11th mo. 28th, 2683 of the number being in Cairo.

An analysis has been made of the water of the Nile which shows that it is infected with putrid matter above the cataracts.

The town of Cassamicciola, on the Island of Ischia near Naples, was almost entirely destroyed on the night of 7th mo. 28th. The neighboring towns of Forio and Laccameo were greatly damaged. Prof. Palmieri, Director of the Meteorological Observatory on Mount Vesuvius, states that the disaster was occasioned by subsidence of the ground. Four thousand lives are believed to have been lost.
